PREFACE

Genesis of the Encyclopædia.

THE idea of preparing a new Dictionary of the Bible on critical lines for the benefit of all serious students, both professional and lay, was prominent in the mind of the many-sided scholar to whose beloved memory the present volume is inscribed. It is more than twelve years since Prof. Robertson Smith began to take steps towards realising this idea. As an academical teacher he had from the first been fully aware of the importance of what is known as Biblical Encyclopædia, and his own earliest contributions to the subject in the Encyclopædia Britannica carry us as far back as to the year 1875. If for a very brief period certain untoward events arrested his activity in this direction, the loss of time was speedily made up, for seldom perhaps has there been a greater display of intellectual energy than is given in the series of biblical articles signed 'W. R. S.' which appeared in the Encyclopædia Britannica between 1875 and 1888. The reader who is interested in Bible study should not fail to examine the list, which includes among the longer articles BIBLE, CANTICLES, CHRONICLES, DAVID, HEBREW LANGUAGE, HOSEA, JERUSALEM, JOEL, JUDGES, KINGS, LEVITES, MALACHI, MESSIAH, MICAH, PHILISTINES, PRIEST, PROPHET, PSALMS, SACRIFICE, TEMPLE, TITHES, ZEPHANIAH; and among the shorter, ANGEL, ARK, BAAL, DECALOGUE, ELI, EVE, HAGGAI, LAMENTATIONS, MELCHIZEDEK, MOLOCH, NABATÆANS, NAHUM, NAZARITE, NINEVEH, OBADIAH, PARADISE, RUTH, SABBATH, SADDUCEES, SAMUEL, TABERNACLE, VOW.

Nor should the students of our day overlook the service which this far-seeing scholar and editor rendered to the nascent conception of an international biblical criticism by inviting the co-operation of foreign as well as English contributors. That names like those of Nöldeke, Tiele, Wellhausen, Harnack, Schürer, Gutschmid, Geldner, appeared side by side with those of well-known and honoured British scholars in the list of contributors to the Encyclopædia was a guarantee of freedom from dangerous eccentricity, of comprehensiveness of view, of thoroughness and accuracy of investigation.

Such a large amount of material illustrative of the Bible, marked by unity of aim and consistency of purpose, was thus brought together that the Encyclopædia Britannica became, inclusively, something not unlike an Encyclopædia Biblica. The idea then occurred to the editor and his publishers to republish, for the guidance of students, all that might be found to have stood the test of time, the lacunæ being filled up, and the whole brought up, as far as possible, to the high level of the most recent scholarship. It was not unnatural to wish for this; but there were three main opposing considerations. In the first place, there were other important duties which made pressing demands on the time and energy of the editor. Next, the growing maturity of his biblical scholarship made him less and less disposed to acquiesce in provisional conclusions. And lastly, such constant progress was being made by students in the power of assimilating critical results that it seemed prudent to wait till biblical articles, thoroughly revised and recast, should have a good chance of still more deeply influencing the student world.

The waiting-time was filled up, so far as other occupations allowed, by pioneering researches in biblical archæology, some of the results of which are admirably summed up in that fruitful volume entitled The Religion of the Semites (1889). More and more, Robertson Smith, like other contemporary scholars, saw the necessity of revising old work on the basis of a more critical, and, in a certain sense, more philosophical treatment of details. First of all, archæological details had their share — and it was bound to be a large share — of this scholar's attention. Then came biblical geography — a subject which had been brought prominently into notice by the zeal of English explorers, but seemed to need the collaboration of English critics. A long visit to Palestine was planned for the direct investigation of details of biblical geography, and though this could not be carried out, not a little time was devoted to the examination of a few of the more perplexing geographical problems and of the solutions already proposed (see e.g., APHEK, below, col. 191 f.). This care for accuracy of detail as a necessary preliminary to a revision of theories is also the cause of our friend's persistent refusal to sanction the republication of the masterly but inevitably provisional article BIBLE in the Encyclopædia Britannica, to which we shall return later. The reader will still better understand the motive of that refusal if he will compare what is said on the Psalter in that article (1875) with the statements in the first edition of The Old Testament in the Jewish Church (1880), in the Encyclopædia Britannica, article PSALMS (1885), and in the second edition of The Old Testament in the Jewish Church (1892).

It is only just, however, to the true 'begetter' of this work to emphasise the fact that, though he felt the adequate realisation of his idea to be some way off, he lost no time in pondering and working out a variety of practical details — a task in which he was seconded by his assistant editor and intimate friend, Mr. J. S. Black. Many hours were given, as occasion offered, to the distribution of subjects and the preparation of minor articles. Some hundreds of these were drafted, and many were the discussions that arose as to various difficult practical points, which have not been without fruit for the present work.

In September 1892, however, it became only too clear to Prof. Smith that he was suffering from a malady which might terminate fatally after no very distant term. The last hope of active participation in his long-cherished scheme of a Bible Dictionary had well-nigh disappeared, when one of the present editors, who had no definite knowledge of Prof. Smith's plan, communicated to this friend of many years' standing his ideas of what a critical Bible Dictionary ought to be, and inquired whether he thought that such a project could be realised. Prof. Smith was still intellectually able to consider and pronounce upon these ideas, and gladly recognised their close affinity to his own. Unwilling that all the labour already bestowed by him on planning and drafting articles should be lost, he requested Prof. Cheyne to take up the work which he himself was compelled to drop, in conjunction with the older and more intimate friend already mentioned. Hence the combination of names on the title-page. The work is undertaken by the editors as a charge from one whose parting message had the force of a command.

Such is the history of the genesis of the Encyclopædia Biblica, which is the result primarily of a fusion of two distinct but similar plans — a fusion desired by Prof. Robertson Smith himself, as the only remaining means of realising adequately his own fundamental ideas. With regard to details, he left the editors entirely free, not from decline of physical strength, but from a well-grounded confidence that religion and the Bible were not less dear to them than to himself, and that they fully shared his own uncompromisingly progressive spirit. The Bible Dictionary which he contemplated was no mere collection of useful miscellanea, but a survey of the contents of the Bible, as illuminated by criticism — a criticism which identifies the cause of religion with that of historical truth, and, without neglecting the historical and archæological setting of religion, loves best to trace the growth of high conceptions, the flashing forth of new intuitions, and the development of noble personalities, under local and temporal conditions that may often be, to human eyes, most adverse. The importance of the newer view of the Bible to the Christian community, and the fundamental principles of the newer biblical criticism, have been so ably and so persuasively set forth by Prof. Robertson Smith in his Lectures that his fellow-workers may be dispensed from repeating here what he has said so well already. 'There remaineth yet very much land to be possessed.' Let us assume, then, that the readers of this Encyclopædia, whatever be their grade of knowledge or sphere of work, are willing to make an effort to take this widely extended land in possession.

Principles of the Encyclopædia.

Every year, in fact, expands the narrow horizons which not so long ago limited the aspirations of the biblical scholar. It is time, as Prof. Robertson Smith thought, to help students to realise this, and to bring the standard books on which they rely more up to date. It may seem hopeless to attempt this with an alphabetically arranged encyclopædia, which necessarily involves the treatment of subjects in an isolated way. By an elaborate system of cross references, however, and by interspersing a considerable number of comprehensive articles (such as, in Part I., APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE, CAINITES, DRAGON), it has been sought to avoid the danger of treating minute details without regard to their wider bearings. Many of the minor articles, too, have been so constructed as to suggest the relation of the details to the larger wholes. Altogether the minor articles have, one ventures to hope, brought many direct gains to biblical study. Often the received view of the subject of a 'minor article' proved to be extremely doubtful, and a better view suggested itself. Every endeavour has been used to put this view forward in a brief and yet convincing manner, without occupying too much space and becoming too academic in style. The more comprehensive articles may here and there be found to clash with the shorter articles. Efforts, however, have been made to mitigate this by editorial notes in both classes of articles.

It will also doubtless be found that on large questions different writers have sometimes proposed different theories and hypotheses. The sympathies of the editors are, upon the whole, with what is commonly known as 'advanced' criticism, not simply because it is advanced, but because such criticism, in the hands of a resourceful scholar, takes account of facts, both literary and archæological, which the criticism of a former generation overlooked or treated superficially. They have no desire, however, to 'boycott' moderate criticism, when applied by a critic who, either in the form or in the substance of his criticism, has something original to say. An 'advanced' critic cannot possibly feel any arrogance towards his more 'moderate' colleague, for probably he himself held not very long ago views resembling those which the 'moderate' critic holds now, and the latter may find his precautionary tests end in his adopting, as nearer approximations to truth, views that now seem to him difficult. Prof. Robertson Smith's views of ten years ago, or more, may, at the present day, appear to be 'moderate' criticism; but when he formulated them he was in the vanguard of critics, and there is no reason to think that, if he had lived, and devoted much of his time to biblical criticism, his ardour would have waned, and his precedence passed to others.

There are, no doubt, some critical theories which could not consistently have been represented in the present work; and that, it may be remarked, suggests one of the reasons why Prof. Robertson Smith's early Encyclopædia Britannica article, BIBLE, could not have been republished, even by himself. When he wrote it he was still not absolutely sure about the chronological place of P (Priestly Code). He was also still under the influence of the traditional view as to the barrenness and unoriginality of the whole post-exilic period. Nor had he faced the question of the post-exilic redaction of the prophetic writings. The fundamental principles of biblical criticism, however, are assumed throughout that fine article, though for a statement of these we must turn to a more mature production of his pen. See, for example, The Old Testament in the Jewish Church(2), pp. 16 ff. (cp 1st ed. pp. 24 ff.), and notice especially the following paragraph on p. 17:—

'Ancient books coming down to us from a period many centuries before the invention of printing have necessarily undergone many vicissitudes. Some of them are preserved only in imperfect copies made by an ignorant scribe of the dark ages. Others have been disfigured by editors, who mixed up foreign matter with the original text. Very often an important book fell altogether out of sight for a long time, and when it came to light again all knowledge of its origin was gone; for old books did not generally have title-pages and prefaces. And, when such a nameless roll was again brought into notice, some half-informed reader or transcriber was not unlikely to give it a new title of his own devising, which was handed down thereafter as if it had been original. Or again, the true meaning and purpose of a book often became obscure in the lapse of centuries, and led to false interpretations. Once more, antiquity has handed down to us many writings which are sheer forgeries, like some of the Apocryphal books, or the Sibylline oracles, or those famous Epistles of Phalaris, which formed the subject of Bentley's great critical essay. In all such cases the historical critic must destroy the received view, in order to establish the truth. He must review doubtful titles, purge out interpolations, expose forgeries; but he does so only to manifest the truth, and exhibit the genuine remains of antiquity in their real character. A book that is really old and really valuable has nothing to fear from the critic, whose labours can only put its worth in a clearer light, and establish its authority on a surer basis.'

The freedom which Prof. Robertson Smith generously left to his successors has, with much reluctance, yet without hesitation, on the part of the editors, been exercised in dealing with the articles which he wrote for the Encyclopædia Britannica. The editors are well assured that he would have approved their conduct in this respect. Few scholars, indeed, would refrain from rewriting, to a large extent, the critical articles which they had produced some years previously; and this, indeed, is what has been done by several contributors who wrote biblical articles for the former Encyclopædia. The procedure of those who have revised our friend's articles has in fact been as gentle and considerate as possible. Where these articles seemed to have been destined by himself for some degree of permanence, they have been retained, and carefully revised and brought up to date. Some condensation has sometimes been found necessary. The original articles were written for a public very imperfectly imbued with critical principles, whereas now, thanks to his own works and to those of other progressive scholars, Bible students are much more prepared than formerly to benefit by advanced teaching. There is also a certain amount of new material from Prof. Smith's pen (in two or three cases consisting of quotations from the MS of the second and third courses of Burnett Lectures), but much less, unfortunately, than had been expected.

Freedom has also been used in taking some fresh departures, especially in two directions — viz., in that of textual criticism of the Old Testament, and in that of biblical archæology. The object of the editors has been, with the assistance of their contributors, not only to bring the work up to the level of the best published writings, but, wherever possible, to carry the subjects a little beyond the point hitherto reached in print. Without the constant necessity of investigating the details of the text of the Old Testament, it would be hard for any one to realise the precarious character of many details of the current biblical archæology, geography, and natural history, and even of some not unimportant points in the current Old Testament theology. Entirely new methods have not indeed been applied; but the methods already known have perhaps been applied with somewhat more consistency than before. With regard to archæology, such a claim can be advanced only to a slight extent. More progress perhaps has been made of late years in the field of critical archæology than in that of textual criticism. All, therefore, that was generally necessary was to make a strong effort to keep abreast of recent archæological research both in Old Testament and in New Testament study.

The fulness of detail with which the data of the Versions have been given may provoke some comment. Experience has been the guide of the editors, and they believe that, though in the future it will be possible to give these data in a more correct, more critical, and more condensed form, the student is best served at present by being supplied as fully as possible with the available material. It may also be doubted by some whether there is not too much philology. Here, again, experience has directed the course to be pursued. In the present transitional stage of lexicography, it would have been undesirable to rest content with simply referring to the valuable new lexicons which are now appearing, or have already appeared.

With regard to biblical theology, the editors are not without hope that they have helped to pave the way for a more satisfactory treatment of that important subject which is rapidly becoming the history of the movement of religious life and thought within the Jewish and the Christian church (the phrase may be inaccurate, but is convenient). Systems of Prophetic, Pauline, Petrine, Johannine theology have had their day; it is perhaps time that the Bible should cease to be regarded as a storehouse of more or less competing systems of abstract thought. Unfortunately the literary and historical criticism of the New Testament is by no means as far advanced as that of the Old Testament. At no very distant date a real history of the movement of religious life and thought in the earlier period may be possible. For such a history for the later period we shall have to wait longer, if we may infer anything from the doubtless inevitable defects of the best existing handbook of New Testament theology, that of the able veteran critic, H. J. Holtzmann. The editors of the present work are keenly interested in the subject at present called 'Biblical Theology'; but, instead of attempting what is at present impossible, they have thought it better to leave some deficiencies which future editors will probably find it not difficult to supply. They cannot, however, conclude this section without a hearty attestation of the ever-increasing love for the Scriptures which critical and historical study, when pursued in a sufficiently comprehensive sense, appears to them to produce. The minutest details of biblical research assume a brightness not their own when viewed in the light of the great truths in which the movement of biblical religion culminates. May the reader find cause to agree with them! This would certainly have been the prayerful aspiration of the beloved and lamented scholar who originated this Encyclopædia.

Acknowledgments.

To the contributors of signed articles, and to those who have revised and brought up to date the articles of Prof. Robertson Smith and other deceased scholars, it may seem almost superfluous to render thanks for the help they have so generously given. It constitutes a fresh bond between scholars of different countries and religious communions which is surely of happiest augury. But the special services of the various members of the editorial staff require specific acknowledgment, which the editors have much pleasure in making. Mr. Hope W. Hogg became a contributor to the Encyclopædia Biblica in 1894, and in 1895 became a regular member of the editorial staff. To his zeal, energy, and scholarship the work has been greatly indebted in every direction. Mr. Stanley A. Cook joined the staff in 1896, and not only has contributed various signed articles, which to the editors appear to give promise of fine work in the future, but also has had a large share in many of those that are of composite authorship and unsigned. Mr. Maurice A. Canney joined the staff in 1898; he also has contributed signed articles, and has been eminently helpful in every way, especially in the reading of the proofs. Finally, the editors desire to acknowledge their very special obligations to the Rev. Henry A. Redpath, M.A., editor of the Concordance to the Septuagint, who placed his unrivalled experience at their disposal by controlling all the proofs at a certain stage with special reference to the LXX readings.

POSTSCRIPT

If in what was written more than three years ago by way of preface to the Encyclopædia Biblica any modification were to be thought desirable, it would chiefly perhaps be in the sentences devoted to the immediate prospects of Biblical Theology. It is becoming more and more obvious that the yearly advancing study of the apocryphal and apocalyptic Jewish literature is destined to have considerable effect within the near future on the treatment of the religious ideas of both parts of our Bible. Nor can we doubt that the progress now being made in the investigation of the early Christian literature will also turn to the advantage of the Biblical Theology of the New Testament. It is on this ground that the editors have ventured to include in Vols. III. and IV. a number of introductory and descriptive articles connected with this new subject. To meet a possible objection, it may perhaps be added that the researches into the original text of the Old Testament with which the name of one of the editors is specially connected are by no means necessarily unfavourable to the study of Old Testament Theology. For even if the religious contents of parts of the Old Testament in their original form should turn out to be somewhat less rich and varied than is agreeable to traditional ideas, yet the text in its present form, even if not the original, has an independent right of existence, and the interpretation put upon this text by Jewish and early Christian students deserves the most respectful attention. The Old Testament was surely not a dead book to the Jews of the great post-exilic age, but was full of light, and susceptible of the most varied and edifying adaptations. At the same time, the historical student may justly cherish the hope that by the researches into the underlying text of precious passages in psalms and prophecies (not to add, narratives) which have just now been referred to, the course of historical development may become more comprehensible than it has hitherto been, while those who have the best of all enthusiasms—the enthusiasm for religion—will be stirred up to more and more admiration of the wonderful dealings of God in the religious training of that Israel within Israel to which the Christian church is under perpetual obligations. The Editors would also take this opportunity of expressing a natural regret that the discovery of the 'oldest code of laws in the world,' that promulgated by Ḫammurabi king of Babylon (2285-2242 B.C.), and disinterred in Dec. 1901–Jan. 1902 by M. J. de Morgan on the site of the ancient Susa, was not made a year or two earlier. This code is the most valuable single contribution of recent years to that study of ancient Semitic laws and usages with which the name of Robertson Smith is specially connected, and will not only throw fresh light on the legal codes of the Israelites, but also give a fresh impetus to the critical study of the Hebrew origines. On all accounts they are sorry not to have been able to make this new find helpful to the readers of the Encyclopædia.

To attempt any discussion of the criticisms, whether favourable or adverse, which have been made upon the methods employed or results set forth in the Encyclopædia would manifestly be out of place here. Other opportunities will occur; and time, too, will doubtless exercise its mellowing and reconciling influence. It may even be hoped that the confusing practice of denominating some critics super-naturalistic, others naturalistic, some critics sober and safe, others extravagant and unsafe, may soon pass away in the light of a fuller comprehension of the meaning of critical results, the complexity of critical problems, and the variety of legitimate and necessary critical methods. There are some other things of a more general nature which the editors would fain say in all simplicity and earnestness, but they prefer to ask leave to quote a passage from Dr. Hort's Introduction to the now famous edition of the New Testament by himself and Bishop Westcott, with the spirit of which they are in deepest sympathy, and the expressions of which, especially in the closing sentences, they can heartily adopt as their own.

'It only remains to express an earnest hope that whatever labour we have been allowed to contribute towards the ascertainment of the truth of the letter may also be allowed, in ways which must for the most part be invisible to ourselves, to contribute towards strengthening, correcting, and extending human apprehension of the larger truth of the spirit. Others assuredly in due time will prosecute the task with better resources of knowledge and skill, and amend the faults and defects of our processes and results. To be faithful to such light as could be enjoyed in our own day was the utmost that we could desire. How far we have fallen short of this standard, we are well aware: yet we are bold to say that none of the shortcomings are due to lack of anxious and watchful sincerity. An implicit confidence in all truth, a keen sense of its variety, and a deliberate dread of shutting out truth as yet unknown are no security against some of the wandering lights that are apt to beguile a critic; but, in so far as they are obeyed, they at least quench every inclination to guide criticism into delivering such testimony as may be to the supposed advantage of truth already inherited or acquired. Critics of the Bible, if they have been taught by the Bible, are unable to forget that the duty of guileless workmanship is never superseded by any other.'

In conclusion, the Editors desire anew to express their gratitude for the invaluable services of the members of the editorial staff—Messrs. Hogg, Cook, and Canney—which have been continued with unabated zeal to the termination of the work; as also, their great indebtedness to Dr. Redpath for having read the proofs with a special reference to the readings of the LXX. In connection with the maps their thanks are due not only to the authors of various articles to which these relate, but also to Prof. Max Müller, particularly for help in the preparation of the map of Syria according to the Egyptian monuments, to Col. Billerbeck for two maps of Syria according to cuneiform documents, and in a very special degree to Mr. (now Prof.) Hogg, who has throughout superintended the whole map-work in the Encyclopædia, including the indexing.

GENERAL EXPLANATIONS

THE labour that has been bestowed on even minor matters in the preparation of this Encyclopædia seemed to be warranted by the hope that it might be found useful as a students' handbook. Its convenient use will be facilitated by attention to the principles that have been adopted in regard to the following matters.

1. Classes of Articles. — The following notes will give a general idea what the reader may expect to find and where to look for it: —

i. Proper Names. — Every proper name in the Old and the New Testament canons and the OT Apocrypha (Authorised Version or Revised Version, text or margin) is represented by an article-heading in Clarendon type, the substantive article being usually given under the name as found in the AV text. The printing of Adoraim, on the same line as ADORA (col. 71), and Adullamite, three lines below ADULLAM (col. 73), in bold black type, are examples of a means of saving space.

ii. Books. — Every book in the OT and the NT canons and the OT Apocrypha is discussed in a special article — e.g., Acts, Chronicles, Deuteronomy. The 'Song of Solomon' is dealt with under the title CANTICLES, and the last book in the NT under APOCALYPSE.

iii. General Articles. — With the view, amongst other things, of securing the greatest possible brevity, many matters have been treated in general articles, the minor headings being dealt with concisely by the help of cross-references. Such general articles are: ABI (NAMES WITH), AGRICULTURE, APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE, APOCRYPHA, ARMY, BAKEMEATS, BIRDS, BREAD, CAINITES, CANON, CATTLE, CHARIOT, CHRONOLOGY, CITY; CLEAN AND UNCLEAN, HOLY AND PROFANE; COLOURS, CONDUITS AND RESERVOIRS, COOKING AND COOKING UTENSILS, CUTTINGS OF THE FLESH, DISPERSION, DIVINATION, DRESS.

iv. Other Subjects. — The following are examples of other important headings: — ADAM AND EVE, ANGEL, ANTICHRIST, ASHERAH, AZAZEL, BABEL (TOWER OF), BEHEMOTH AND LEVIATHAN, BLESSINGS AND CURSINGS, CALF (GOLDEN), CHERUB, CHRISTIAN (NAME OF), CIRCUMCISION, COMMUNITY OF GOODS, COUNCIL OF JERUSALEM, COVENANT, CREATION, DANCE, DECALOGUE, DELUGE, DEMONS, DRAGON.

v. Things. — The Encyclopædia Biblica is professedly a dictionary of things, not words, and a great effort has been made to adhere rigidly to this principle. Even where at first sight the rule seems to have been neglected, it will generally be found that this is not really the case. The only way to tell the English reader what has to be told about (e.g.) CHAINS is to distinguish the various things that are called, or should have been called, 'chain' in the English Version, and refer him to the articles where they are dealt with.

vi. Mere Cross-references (see above, 1, i.; and below, 2).

2. Method of Cross-References. — A very great deal of care has been bestowed on the cross-references, because only by their systematic use could the necessary matter be adequately dealt with within the limits of one volume. These references have made possible a conciseness that is not attained at the expense of incompleteness, repetition of the same matter under different headings being reduced to a minimum. For this reason the articles have been prepared, not in alphabetical order, but simultaneously in all parts of the alphabet, being thereafter worked up together constantly and kept up to date. The student may be assured, therefore, that the cross-references have not been inserted at random; they have always been verified. If any should be found to be unwarranted (no such is known), it must be because it has been found necessary, after the reference was made, to remove something from the article named to another article. The removed matter will no doubt be represented by a cross-reference.

The method of reference employed is as follows: —

i. Identification of Article. (a) Long Names. — To save space long headings have been curtailed in citations — e.g., APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE is cited as APOCALYPTIC.

(b) Synonymous Articles. — Persons or places of the same name are ranged as 1, 2, 3, etc. (Arabic numerals), under a common heading and cited accordingly. In other cases (and even in the former case when, as in ADNAH in col. 67, one English spelling represents different Hebrew spellings), the articles usually have separate headings, in which case they are cited as i., ii., iii., etc. (Roman numerals), although they are not so marked. Usually geographical articles precede biographical, and persons precede books. Thus SAMUEL i., 2 is the second person called Samuel; SAMUEL ii. is the article SAMUEL, BOOKS OF. If a wrong number should be found the explanation will be not that it was not verified, but that the article referred to is one of a very small number in which the original order of synonymous articles had to be changed: the precautions always taken in such circumstances must have failed in this case. Thus the BERED referred to in the article ALUSH is now BERED i., 1, not, as is stated in the earlier impressions, BERED ii., 1.

ii. Indication of Place in Article Cited. — Articles of any length are divided into numbered sections (§§ 1, 2, etc.) indicated by insets containing a descriptive word or phrase. As convenience of reference is the great aim, the descriptive phrases are limited to, at most, three or four words, and the sections are numbered consecutively. Logical subordination of sections, therefore, cannot appear. Divisions larger than sections are sometimes indicated in the text by I., II., etc., and subdivisions of sections by letters and numbers (a, b, c; α, β, γ; i., ii., iii.). References like (BENJAMIN, § 9, ii. β) are freely used. Most of the large articles (e.g., APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE, CHRONOLOGY) have prefixed to them a table of contents.

iii. Manner of Citation. — The commonest method is (see DAVID, § 11, [c] ii.). EZRA (q.v., ii. § 9) means the article EZRA-NEHEMIAH, BOOK OF, § 9. Sometimes, however, the capitals or the q.v. may be dispensed with. CHAINS printed in small capitals in the middle of an article would mean that there is an article on that term, but that it hardly merits q.v. from the present point of view. In articles (generally on RV names) that are mere cross-references q.v. is generally omitted; so, e.g., in ABADIAS in col. 3.

3. Typographical Devices. i. Size of Type. — (a) Letters. — Two sizes of type are used, and considerable care has been devoted to the distribution of the small-type passages. Usually the general meaning of an article can be caught by reading simply the large-type parts. The small-type passages generally contain such things as proofs of statements, objections, more technical details. In these passages, and in footnotes and parentheses, abbreviations (see below, p. xviii ff.), which are avoided as much as possible elsewhere, are purposely used. (b) Numbers. — Two sizes of Arabic numerals are used. (Note that the smallest 6 and 8 are a different shape from the next larger 6 and 8.) In making references, when only the volume is given, it is usually cited by a Roman number. Pages are cited by Arabic numbers except where (as is often the case) pages of a preface are marked with Roman numbers. When numbers of two ranks are required, two sizes of Arabic numbers (5_5) are used whether the reference be to book and chapter, volume and page, or section and line. If three ranks are needed, Roman numbers are prefixed (v. 5_5).

ii. Italics. — Italic type is much used in citing foreign words. In geographical articles, as a rule, the printing of a modern place-name in italics indicates that the writer of the article identifies it with the place under discussion. For the significance of the different kinds of type in the map of Assyria see the explanations at the foot of the map. On the two kinds of Greek type see below, 4 ii. (b). On the Greek MS D as distinguished from D, see below, 4 ii. d.

iii. Small Capitals. — Small Roman capitals are used in two ways: (1) in giving the equivalent in RV for the name in AV, or vice versa, and (2) in giving a cross-reference (see above, 2 iii.). On the use of small italic capitals see below, 4 ii. b.

iv. Symbols. — (a) Index Figures. — In 'almost always[6] clear,' the 6 indicates footnote 6. In 'Introd.[(6)]' the 6 means sixth edition. On the 2 in 'D_2' etc. see below, p. xviii. ff.

(b) Asterisk. — B* means the original scribe of codex B. If the Egyptian dobet were printed dobet* the * would mark the word as hypothetical in form (e.g., uncertain vocalisation). v. $_5$* means v. 5 (partly).

(c) Dagger. — A dagger † is used to indicate that all the passages where a word occurs are cited. The context must decide whether the English word or the original is meant.

(d) Sign of Equality. — 'AALAR, 1 Esd. 5_{36} AV = Ezra 2_{59} IMMER, i.,' means that the two verses quoted are recensions of the same original, and that what is called Aalar in the one is called Immer in the other, as will be explained in the first of the articles entitled IMMER.

(e) Sign of Parallelism. — ‖ is the adjective corresponding to the verb =. Thus: 'Aalar of 1 Esd. 5_{36} AV appears as Immer in ‖ Ezra 2_{59}.' ‖ also denotes Hebrew 'parallelism.' See, e.g., CLEAN and UNCLEAN, § 1 (3).

(f) Other devices. — '99 means 1899. 1 Ch. 6_{81} [66] means that verse 81 in the English version represents that numbered 66 in Hebrew texts. √ is used to indicate the 'root' of a word.

v. Punctuation. — As a rule commas are not used between citations, thus: 2 K. 6 21 25 Is. 21 7. Commas are omitted and semicolons or colons inserted whenever ambiguity seems thus to be avoided — e.g., the father Achbor [1] is called 'Father of Baal-hanan [1] king of Edom,' and the son Baal-hanan [1] is called 'ben Achbor [1]; one of the kings of Edom.'

4. Text-Critical Apparatus. — As all sound investigation must be based, not on the ancient texts as they lie before the student, but on what he believes to be the nearest approach he can make to their original reading, the soundness of every text is weighed, and if need be, discussed, before it is used in the Encyclopædia Biblica.

i. Traditional Original Text. — In quoting the traditional Hebrew text the editions of Baer and of Ginsburg have been relied on as a rule; similarly in the case of the New Testament, the texts of Tischendorf and of Westcott and Hort.

ii. Evidence of Versions. — The Vulgate (ed. Heyse-Tischendorf), the Syriac (ed. Lee, and London Polyglott; for the Apocrypha, Lagarde and the minor Greek versions (Field, Hexapla; Hatch-Redpath, Concordance) have been quoted quite freely; the testimony of the Septuagint has been attended to on every point.

In exceptional cases 'Holmes and Parsons' has been consulted; ordinarily Swete's manual edition (including the variants) and Lagarde's Pars Prior have been considered sufficient. In general (for the main exception see next paragraph) only variations of some positive interest or importance have been referred to. Almost invariably a quotation from the LXX is followed by symbols indicating the authorities cited (thus υιοι [BAL]). This does not necessarily imply that in some other MS or MSS a different reading is found; it is simply a guarantee that Swete's digest of readings and Lagarde have both been consulted. The formula [BAL], or 𝔊^BAL, standing alone means that the editors found no variant in Swete or Lagarde to report. In the parts, therefore, where Swete cites ℵ or other MSS as well as BA, BAL includes them unless the context indicates otherwise. When BAL stands alone the meaning is everywhere the same; it is a summary report of agreement in Swete and Lagarde.

Proper names have been felt to demand special treatment; the aim has been to give under each name the readings of Lagarde and all the variants of BℵA as cited in Swete. The commonest, or a common, form for each witness is given at the head of the article, and this is followed at once or in the course of the article by such variants as there are. Where all the passages containing a given name are cited in the article, the apparatus of Greek readings (as in Swete and Lagarde) may be considered absolutely complete. In other cases, completeness, though aimed at, has not been found possible.

The distinction between declinable and indeclinable forms has generally been observed; but different cases of the same declinable form have not as a rule (never in the case of common nouns) been taken note of. Where part of one name has been joined in the LXX to the preceding or succeeding name, the intruding letters have usually been given in square brackets, though in some very obvious cases they may have been ignored.

When MSS differ only in some giving ι and others giving ει this is indicated concisely thus: 'αβεια [B], αβια [AL],' becomes 'αβ[ε]ια [BAL].' Similarly, -τ., -ττ. becomes -[τ]τ.

Much care has been bestowed on the readings, and every effort has been made to secure the highest attainable accuracy. Naturally the Hatch-Redpath Concordance to the Septuagint has been freely used. As has been already stated, however (p. xii), the Encyclopædia Biblica has also had the benefit of Dr. Redpath's personal help. Unfortunately, misprints and other inaccuracies — inaccuracies sometimes appearing for the first time after the last proof reading — are especially liable to occur in a work of this kind. Corrections of errors, however minute, addressed to the publishers, will always be gratefully received.

Some typographical details require to be explained: —

(a) In giving proper names, initial capitals, breathings, and accents are dispensed with; they were unknown in the oldest MSS (cp Swete, vol. 1 p. xiii 2).

(b) The Greek readings at the head of an article are given in uncials, and the Vulgate readings in small italic capitals; elsewhere ordinary type is used.

(c) The first Greek reading is given in full; all others are abbreviated as much as possible. Letters suppressed at the beginning of a word are represented by a dash, letters at the end by a period. In every case the abbreviated form is to be completed by reference to the Greek form immediately preceding, whether that is given in full or not. Thus, e.g., 'αβελσαττειμ, β. . . . ττιμ, -ττειν, βελσα'[1] means 'αβελσαττειμ, βελσαττιμ, βελσαττειν, βελσα.' That is to say, the abbreviated form repeats a letter (or if necessary more) of the form preceding. Two exceptions are sometimes made. The dash sometimes represents the whole of the preceding form — e.g., in cases like αβια, -ς — and one letter has sometimes been simply substituted for another: e.g., ν for μ in ειμ, -ν. These exceptions can hardly lead to ambiguity.

(d) The following are the symbols most frequently quoted from Swete's digest with their meaning: —

* = original scribe.
a, b, c = other correctors.
ab = first corrector confirmed by second.
a? b? = a or b. a? b = b, perhaps also a.
a(vid) = prob. a.
a vid = a, if it be a bona fide correction at all.
D = testimony of the Grabe-Owen collation of D before D was partly destroyed (see Swete, vol. I p. xxiv).
D^{sil} = readings inferred from the collation e silentio.
ℵ$^{c.a}$ = a corrector of ℵ belonging to the 7th cent. (Sw., vol. 2 p. viii; cp vol. I p. xxi).
ℵ$^{c.b}$ = corrector of ℵ$^{c.a}$ or ℵ*; see Sw., vol. 2 p. viii.
ℵ$^{c.c}$ = corrector of ℵ$^{c.a}$ or ℵ*; see Sw., vol. I p. xxi.
B^{edit} = B as in Vercellone and Cozza's facsimile ed.

(e) The following are the MSS most commonly cited: —

ℵ Sinaiticus (cp Swete, vol. I p. xx).
A Alexandrinus (Swete, vol. I p. xxii).
B Vaticanus (Swete, vol. I p. xvii).
C Cod. Ephraemi Syri rescriptus Parisiensis (Swete, vol. 2 p. xiii).
D Cod. Cottonianus Geneseos (Swete, vol. I p. xxiii).
E Cod. Bodleianus Geneseos (Sw., vol. I p. xxvi).
F Cod. Ambrosianus (Swete, vol. I p. xxvi).
87 Cod. Chisianus (Swete, vol. 3 p. xii).
Syr. Cod. Syro-Hexaplaris Ambrosianus (Swete, vol. 3 p. xiii).
V Cod. Venetus (= 23, Parsons; Swete, vol. 3 p. xiv).
Q Cod. Marchalianus (Swete, vol. 3 p. vii).
Γ Cod. rescriptus Cryptoferratensis (Swete, vol. 3 p. ix f.).

5. Proper Name Articles. — Proper name articles usually begin thus. The name is followed by a parenthesis giving (1) the original; (2) when necessary, the number of the section in the general article NAMES where the name in question is discussed or cited; (3) a note on the etymology or meaning of the (personal) name with citation of similar names; (4) the readings of the versions (see above, 4 ii.). See for an example AARON. The Hebrew 'ben' ('b.'), 'son of,' 'b'ne,' 'sons of' is often used, partly for brevity and to avoid certain ambiguities (see above, 3 v.) and partly because of its indefinite meaning.

6. Geographical Articles. — The interpretation of place-names is discussed in the article NAMES. The maps that are issued with Volume I. are the district of Damascus, the environs of Babylon, and 'Syria, Assyria, and Babylonia' (between cols. 352 and 353). The last-mentioned is mainly designed to illustrate the non-Palestinian geography of the Old Testament. It is made use of to show the position of places outside of Palestine mentioned in Volume I. which happen to fall within its bounds.

In all maps biblical names are assigned to sites only when the article discussing the question regards the identification as extremely probable (the degree of probability must be learned from the article).

The following geographical terms are used in the senses indicated: —

Dēr, deir, 'monastery.'
Ḥaj (j), 'pilgrimage to Mecca.'
Jebel (J.), 'mountain.'
Kefr, Kafr, 'village.'
Khān, 'caravanserai.'
Khirbet-(Kh.), 'ruins of —.'
Nahr (N.), 'river.'
Tell, 'mound' (often containing ruins).
Wādī (W.), 'valley,' 'torrent-course.'
Welī, welȳ, 'Mohammedan saint,' 'saint's tomb.'

7. Transliteration, etc. — Whilst the Encyclopædia Biblica is meant for the student, other readers have constantly been kept in view. Hence the frequent translation of Hebrew and other words, and the transliteration of words in Semitic languages. In certain cases transliteration also saves space. No effort has been made at uniformity for its own sake. Intelligibility has been thought sufficient. When pronunciation is indicated — e.g., Bĕhēmōth, Leviāthān — what is meant is that the resulting form is the nearest that we can come to the original as represented by the traditional Hebrew, so long as we adhere to the English spelling.

In the case of proper names that have become in some degree naturalised in an incorrect form, that form has been preserved: e.g., Shalmaneser, Tiglath-pileser. Where there is an alternative, naturally the closer to the original is selected: therefore Nebuchadrezzar (with r as in Ezek., etc.), Nazirite. Where there is no naturalised form names are given in exact transliteration — e.g., Ašur-rēš-iši. In the case of Assyrian names, hyphens are used to separate the component parts, which begin with a capital when they are divine names — e.g., Puzur-Ašur; but Ašur-dān.

In the case of modern (Arabic) place-names the spelling of the author whose description has been most used has generally been retained, except when it would have been misleading to the student. The diacritical marks have been checked or added after verification in some Arabic source or list.

On the Assyrian alphabet see BABYLONIA, § 6, and on the Egyptian, EGYPT, § 12. One point remains to be explained, after which it will suffice to set forth the schemes of transliteration in tabular form. The Hebrew ḥ (ח) represents philologically the Arabic ḥ and ḫ, which are absolutely distinct sounds. The Hebrew spoken language very likely marked the distinction. As the written language, however, ignores it, ח is always transliterated ḥ. The Assyrian guttural transliterated with an h, on the other hand, oftenest represents the Arabic ḫ, and is therefore always transliterated ḫ (in Muss.-Arn. Dict., x, for χ), never ḥ. There is no ḥ in transliterated Assyrian; for the written language did not distinguish the Arabic ḥ from the Arabic h, ʿ, ġ, or ʾ, representing them all indifferently by ʾ, which accordingly does not, in transliterated Assyrian, mean simply א but indifferently א or ה or ḥ or ע or ġ. Hence, e.g., Nabū-nahid is simply one interpretation of Nabū-na'id. Egyptian, lastly, requires not only h, ḥ, and ḫ, like Arabic, but also a fourth symbol h̲ (see EGYPT, § 12, note).

8. Signatures. — Parts of articles as well as whole articles bear the signature of the author or authors, the exact share contributed by each writer being indicated, where possible, at the end thus: A. B. §§ 1–5; C. D. §§ 6–10. When the signature would be too complex, and in a majority of the 'minor articles' even otherwise, no attempt has been made to assign a definite authorship and the articles rest on the editorial responsibility. When in such an article there occurs a suggestion that seems to need a signature, its author's initials are appended to the whole article. A key to the signatures will be found on p. xxvii.

ABBREVIATIONS, SYMBOLS, AND BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTES

The following pages explain the abbreviations that are used in the more technical parts (see above, p. xiv 3 i. [a]) of the Encyclopædia. The list does not claim to be exhaustive, and, for the most part, it takes no account of well-established abbreviations, or such as have seemed to be fairly obvious. The bibliographical notes will, it is hoped, be welcome to the student.

The Canonical and Apocryphal books of the Bible are usually referred to as Gen., Ex., Lev., Nu., Dt., Josh., Judg., Ruth, S(a.), K(i.), Ch[r.], Ezra, Neh., Esth., Job, Ps., Pr., Eccles., C(an)t., Is., Jer., Lam., Ezek., Dan., Hos., Joel, Am., Ob., Jon., Mi., Nah., Hab., Zeph., Hag., Zech., Mal.; 1 Esd., 4 Esd. (i.e., 2 Esd. of EV), Tob., Judith, Wisd., Ecclus., Baruch, Epistle of Jeremy (i.e., Bar. ch. 6), Song of the Three Children (Dan. 3_{23}), Susanna, Bel and the Dragon, Prayer of Manasses, 1–4 Macc.; Mt., Mk., Lk., Jn., Acts, Rom., Cor., Gal., Eph., Phil., Col., Thess., Tim., Tit., Philem., Heb., Ja[s.], Pet., 1–3 Jn., Jude, Rev. [or Apoc.].

An explanation of some of the symbols (A, א, B, etc.), now generally used to denote certain Greek MSS of the Old or New Testaments, will be found above, at p. xvi. It may be added that the bracketed index numerals denote the edition of the work to which they are attached: thus OTJC$^{(2)}$ = The Old Testament in the Jewish Church, 2nd edition (exceptions RP$^{(2)}$, AOF$^{(2)}$; see below). The unbracketed numerals above the line refer to footnotes; for those under the line see below under D_2, E_2, J_2, P_2.

When a foreign book is cited by an English name the reference is to the English translation.

It is suggested that this work be referred to as the Encyclopædia Biblica, and that the name may be abbreviated thus: Ency. Bib. or EBi. It will be observed that all the larger articles can be referred to by the numbered sections (§§); or any passage can readily be cited by column and paragraph or line. The columns will be numbered continuously to the end of the work.

ENCYCLOPÆDIA BIBLICA

QUAIL (שְׂלָו, śĕlāw, Kr. שְׂלָיו, śĕlayw; ορτυγομητρα;[1] coturnix). Mentioned in EV in Ex. 16$_{13}$ Nu. 11$_{31}$f. Ps. 105$_{40}$ Wisd. 16$_{2}$ 19$_{12}$†; cp עוף כנף, Ps. 78$_{27}$. That the quail, not the sand-grouse (?) or the locust (Hasselquist's alternatives, Travels, 443) or the crane (Dean Stanley and H. S. Palmer, see § 2, note 2) is meant, is generally recognised.

1. Identification. The Ar. word for 'quail,' salwā, which is a loan-word, was found by C. Niebuhr (1774) to be still in use in Egypt. Another word for it is sumānā, given to it because of its 'fatness,' and Lagarde (Uebers. 81) has proposed to connect the name with Eshmun-Iolaos, the god who restored Heracles to life by giving him a quail to smell at. The quail was annually sacrificed among the Phœnicians in the month Feb.-Mar. to commemorate the reviving of Heracles (Athen. 9 47, referred to by WRS, Rel. Sem.(2) 469). There is no trace, however, of the sacred character of this bird among the Arabians or the Hebrews.

The Coturnix communis or C. dactylisonans of ornithologists is well-known in the Sinaitic peninsula, where it passes, migrating northward in spring, in immense flights. Tristram found them in the Jordan valley (Land of Israel, 460). They arrive in Palestine in March and April—though a few remain there during the winter—on the way to their breeding-places in the plains and cornfields of the upper country. Even these flocks are said to be surpassed in numbers by the autumn flight when they return S. to their winter-quarters. The quail flies very low, which Dillmann supposed to explain the important clause at the end of Nu. 11$_{31}$ (but see § 2). It is soon fatigued, and hence falls an easy prey to man. 160,000 have been captured in a season at Capri, where their plump flesh is esteemed a delicacy, as indeed it is all along the shores of the Mediterranean. They were salted and stored as food by the ancient Egyptians (Herod. 2 77).

A. E. S.—S. A. C.

2. The quails of the wanderings. There are two references to a supply of quails for the food of the Israelites—viz., in Ex. 16$_{12}$f. (scene, the wilderness of Sin, on the way to Sinai), and in Nu. 11$_{18-23}$ $_{31-34}$ (scene, Kibroth-hattaavah, after the departure from Sinai). The former belongs to P. He has just made Moses and Aaron tell the Israelites that in the evening they shall know that Yahwè has brought them out of Egypt, and that in the morning they shall see Yahwè's glory (vv. 6 f.). The evening event is the arrival of the quails; the morning event is the lighting down of the manna. The redactor has omitted P's account of the fall of the manna, the passage from 'the dew lay round' to 'has given you to eat' being J's (see Baentsch). The narrative in Nu. 11 [J] is much more detailed. The announcement of the quails specifies a month as the period during which quails should be eaten; after this the flesh was to become loathsome to the eaters. The coming of the quails is thus described (vv. 31-34), 'And a wind from Yahwè [a SE. wind, Ps. 78$_{26}$] took up quails from the sea [read וְרוּחַ מֵאֵת י׳ נָשָׂא שלוים],[1] and made them to fall by the camp, about a day's journey on this side, and a day's journey on the other side, round about the camp, like heaps of wheat[2] (כְּמוֹ־עֲרֵמִים) on the face of the ground.' The appropriateness of the figure is clear from what follows. 'And the people rose up all that day, and all the night, and all the next day, and gathered the quails; he that gathered least gathered ten homers, and they spread them all about for themselves [to dry them] round about the camp.' But the result was a fatal malady. 'While the flesh was yet between their teeth, ere it was chewed, the anger of Yahwè was kindled against the people,' etc. The story (with which cp Ps. 78$_{26-31}$) is told to account for the name 'Kibroth-hattaavah' (graves of lust); it belongs to the large class of ætiological legends. The more correct name, however, is probably 'Taberah.' See KIBROTH-HATTAAVAH.

T. K. C.

3. The malady. The peculiarity of the incident needs some better explanation than a reference to the statement of Aristotle (d. Plant. 1 5; cp Bochart, ii. 1 15) that quails eat poisonous things—e.g., hellebore—which are harmful to men. It may be more instructive, therefore, to give a parallel case from the Elizabethan voyages. The ship 'Desire' belonging to Cavendish's last and ill-fated expedition to the east by way of the Pacific, put back for home from the Straits of Magellan in 1592. They came to anchor at a harbour in Patagonia, named after the vessel Port Desire, and found on an island near it such numbers of penguins that the men could hardly go without treading on them. A party of twenty-two men was landed on the island to kill the birds and dry them on the rocks. From 30th Oct. to 22nd Dec.

1 ὀρτυγομήτρα means properly (see L. and S.) 'a bird which migrates with the quails,' perhaps = κρέξ, the land-rail, Rallus crex; but Photius and Hesychius explain as = 'a large ὄρτυξ' (Di.). The right Gk. word for quail, ὄρτυξ, is given by Jos. and Gr. Ven. On Rabbinical notices see Jomā, 75 b. Cp also FOWL, § 1, col. 1159, and n. 1.

1 [The traditional text contains two improbabilities—נָסַע, applied to a wind (Pasek should put us on our guard), and וַיָּגָז (𝔊, ἐξεπέρασεν), from גזז, which occurs again only in Ps. 90$_{10}$, where (see Che. Ps.(2)) it is corrupt. Both words spring out of the reading נָשָׂא, which alone suits the sense. The corruption, however, must be very old because of Ps. 78$_{26}$.—T. K. C.]

2 [The text has 'about two cubits' (כְּאַמָּתַיִם), which the commentators suppose to refer to the very low flight of the quails. Dean Stanley, however, (SP, 82) thought that large cranes (storks?) three feet high might be meant. Only our subservience to MT has prevented us from seeing that the true text must be כְּמוֹ־עֲרֵמִים, a figure which occurs again in Ex. 15$_{8}$ (כְּמוֹ־נֵד־נֶעֶרְמוּ).—T. K. C.]

they killed and dried 20,000; the captain (John Davis), the master, and John Lane, the narrator, were able to make a small quantity of salt by evaporating sea-water in holes of the rocks, wherewith they salted a certain number of birds. 'Thus God did feed us even as it were with manna from heaven.' Only 14,000 dried penguins could be got on board. The crew were put on rations of which the principal part was five penguins every day among four men. It was not until some time after that disease broke out, the dried birds having begun to breed a large worm in appalling numbers in the warmer latitudes.

Various symptoms of the malady here described are sufficiently characteristic of the acute dropsical form of the disease called beri-beri (some derive the name from the Arabic); there are, however, dropsical conditions caused by parasitic worms apart from the special dietetic errors to which beri-beri is commonly ascribed. But, however this may be, the parallelism between the two narratives is obvious. There is the same generic cause, and the quail is a fat bird, like the penguin, which would corrupt the more easily if it were dried with its fat. In St. Kilda, where the diet used to be of air-dried gannets and fulmars, it was customary to remove the fat before curing. C. C.

QUARRIES (RVmg. 'graven images'; פְּסִלִים; ΤΩΝ ΓΛΥΠΤΩΝ; idola, Judg. 3 19 26†). The pĕsīlīm near Gilgal are a well-known landmark. Heb. usage of pĕsel favours the sense 'sculptured sacred stones' (so Moore, Budde). Many scholars find an allusion to the stones mentioned in Josh. 4 8 20. If so, pĕsīlīm is used in its original sense of 'hewn stones.' Cp Ass. pašallu, a pillar; Tg. Pesh. give 'quarries,' a guess.

The view of the Ehud-story advocated elsewhere (see JERICHO, § 2), which detects an underlying form in which the place-names, now corrupted, were of the Negeb, throws doubt on both the above theories. Among the possible corruptions of ישמעאל (Ishmael) is פסל or פסיל: cp SHELEPH. In order to escape to Seirah (for the reading adopted by the present writer see SEIRAH), Ehud had to pass an outpost of Ishmaelites (= Jerahmeelites); for Eglon, the Miṣrite king, was a Jerahmeelite (see v. 13, where 'Ammon' and 'Amalek' both = 'Jerahmeel'). For פסילים, read therefore probably ישמעאלים.

2. Josh. 7 5 RVmg., see SHEBARIM. T. K. C.

QUARTERMASTER (שַׂר־מְנוּחָה), Jer. 51 59 RVmg. See SERAIAH, 4.

QUARTUS (ΚΟΥΑΡΤΟΣ [Ti. WH]) adds his salutation to that of Tertius, addressed to the Christians in Rome, at the close of Rom. 16 (22 f.). It has been conjectured that he may have been one of those Jews who were expelled from Rome by Claudius. See, further, SIMON (the Cyrenian).

In the lists of the seventy disciples by the Pseudo-Dorotheus and Pseudo-Hippolytus he appears as bishop of Berytus. In the apocryphal Acts of Peter and Paul he is a member of the prætorian guard, one of the soldiers who have charge of Paul in Rome.

QUATERNION (ΤΕΤΡΑΔΙΟΝ: Acts 12 4), a guard of four soldiers.

QUEEN OF HEAVEN (מְלֶכֶת הַשָּׁמַיִם; 𝔊 Η ΒΑΣΙΛΙΣΣΑ ΤΟΥ ΟΥΡΑΝΟΥ, except Jer. 7 18 Η ΣΤΡΑΤΙΑ ΤΟΥ ΟΥΡΑΝΟΥ[1] [Aq. Sym. Theod. ΒΑΣΙΛΙΣΣΗ]; Vg. regina caeli; Pesh. pulḥān šemayyā, except Jer. 44 19 malkat šemayyā;[2] Tg. כוכבת שמיא), an object of worship to which offerings were made by inhabitants of Jerusalem and other cities of Judah in the seventh century and by Jewish refugees in Egypt after the fall of the kingdom; see Jer. 7 16-20 44 15-30.

1. Cult.

The peculiarity of this worship appears, from Jeremiah's description, to have been the offering of a special kind of cakes which were made by the Jewish women with the assistance of their families ('the boys gather firewood and the fathers kindle the fire and the women knead dough to make cakes,' etc., Jer. 7 18; cp 44 19). The cakes were offered to the deity by fire (44 15 17 ff. 21 25; kiṭṭēr, קטר, erroneously translated in EV, 'burn incense'), and the burning was accompanied by libations (44 17 f.). These rites were performed 'in the cities of Judah and in the streets of Jerusalem' (7 17 44 17); the worship seems to have been domestic, and perhaps specifically a woman's cult (see 44 15 19 25);[1] that the men assist in the preparations (7 18) and assume their share of the responsibility (44 15 ff.) is not inconsistent with the latter view, nor are the expressions in which the prevalence of the worship is affirmed (44 17).[2]

The cakes (kawwānīm, כַּוָּנִים, Jer. 7 18 44 19†;[3] 𝔊 χαυῶνες, and in the latter passage χαυανες [Q*], χαυβωνες [א*]; Vg. placenta; Pesh. zauthārē, a species of sacrificial cakes;[4] Tg. כרדיטין or כרדוטין, perhaps χονδρῖται,[5] Gen. 40 16) were rightly compared by Chrysostom and other early commentators to the πόπανα or πέμματα of the Greeks, of which there were many varieties.[6] Some of these were made in the likeness of a victim; others imaged or symbolised the deity to whom they were offered.[7]

It has been thought by many that the kawwānim of the queen of heaven represented the moon,[8] or—upon a different view of her nature—the planet Venus (see below, § 3). Jer. 44 19 has been understood to testify to the iconic character of these cakes, the verb לְהַעֲצִבָהּ being connected with עצבים (IDOL, § 1*b*),[9] and translated 'to image her'; but both the text and the interpretation are extremely doubtful.

2. Title.

The translation 'Queen of Heaven' (EV) represents malkat haššāmáyim; and this interpretation—the only one which would naturally suggest itself to one who read the words מלכת השמים in an unpointed text—is supported by the oldest exegetical tradition (𝔊). The vowelled text, however, gives מְלֶכֶת (mĕlĕket), treating מלכת as a defective spelling of מלאכת from מלאכה,[10] 'work,' and this view of the derivation of the word is represented by Pesh. pulḥān šemayyā (religious work, cultus). The Jewish scholars with whom this interpretation originated doubtless thought that the worship of the מלכת השמים in Jer. 7 44 was the same as the worship of the 'host of heaven' (צבא השמים), Jer. 8 2 19 13 Zeph. 1 5 Dt. 4 19 17 3, etc.

This identification, suggested perhaps by a general comparison of the references to these cults, would seem to be confirmed by the passages in which the worship of the מלכת השמים appears to be equivalent to burning offerings or making libations 'to other gods' (see 7 18 44 15; cp 17-19), as though the cult were addressed to a collective object such as the heavenly bodies. A warrant for taking the word מלאכה in this sense was found in Gen. 2 where מלאכה (God's 'work which he wrought') in v. 2*a* is obviously parallel to צבא in v. 1.[11] This opinion was known to Jerome, who writes (Comm. on Jer. 7 18): reginæ cæli . . . 'quam lunam debemus accipere, vel certe militiæ cæli, ut omnes stellas intelligamus,' and is given a place in the margin of AV, 'frame, or workmanship of heaven.'

Modern scholars, however, almost without exception, have adopted the older and more natural interpretation, 'queen of heaven.' This prevailing opinion was vigorously assailed by Stade in 1886; he maintained that מלכת השמים (? malkūt) was a collective, 'the rule, that is, the ruling powers, of heaven,' a more comprehensive term than 'host of heaven'; at a later stage of the controversy he was inclined to conjecture that מלכת (מלאכת, 'work'; cp Gen. 2 1 f.) had been substituted for צבא by a scribe or editor to whom the word צבא was offensive. Stade did not, however, establish his main contention that the rendering 'queen of heaven' must be rejected; the result of the discussion upon this point was rather to confirm the conviction that that is the only satisfactory interpretation of the words.[1]

1 Probably reading צבא, as in 8 2 19 13.
2 Contamination from 𝔊, which is otherwise demonstrable in this verse.

1 Peritz, JBL 17 121 (1898), without apparent reason, connects 2 K. 23 7*b* with this cult.

It is not probable that a deity invoked as queen of heaven, to whose displeasure at the neglect of her worship the contemporaries of Jeremiah could attribute the calamities that had befallen them and their country, was a minor figure in the Semitic pantheon; the presumption is that the rites described by the prophet belonged to a specific cult of the great goddess Astarte. The title seems also to indicate that the worship was addressed to one of the heavenly bodies, and was one of the particular cults embraced in the general prophetic condemnation of the worship of the 'sun and moon and the whole host of heaven.' From an early time it has been disputed whether the queen of heaven in the sky was the moon[2] or the planet Venus.[3] The former opinion was probably in its origin only an application of the general theory which in the last centuries of the ancient world identified all manner of goddesses with the moon; in modern times it has appeared to follow from the current though ill-founded belief that the Astarte of the western Semites was a moon goddess. (See ASHTORETH, § 4.) In the Babylonian system, which was at the height of its influence in the W. in the seventh century, the star of Ištar was the planet Venus, whilst the moon was a great god, Sin. The traces in Syria and Arabia of cults similar to that described by Jeremiah connect themselves with the worship of Venus. Thus the name Collyridians was given to a heretical Arab sect because their women offered cakes to the Virgin Mary, to whom they paid divine honours.[4] See also Isaac of Antioch, ed. Bickell, 1 244 ff.

3. Identification.

More than one of the questions discussed above would be put beyond controversy if it were established that malkatu, or malkatu ša šamē, the literal equivalent of the Heb. malkat haššāmáyim, occurs in cuneiform texts as a title of Ištar;[5] but that the ideogram AA should be read malkatu is at best a plausible conjecture, on which no conclusions can properly be based. Ištar is called, however, bēlit šamē and šarrat šamē,[6] the latter exactly corresponding in meaning to the Hebrew malkat haššāmayim, 'queen of heaven.' In a catalogue of the names of Venus in various regions and languages preserved by Syrian lexicographers we are told that Venus was called malkat šemayyā by the Arzanians,[7] that is the inhabitants of Arzon, a diocese in the province of Nisibis (ZDMG 43 394 n.). The list shows in other particulars accurate information, and may be taken as evidence that a cult of Venus with the epiklesis 'queen of heaven' survived in that locality into Christian times.

Herodotus (1 105) sets it down that the temple of Aphrodite Urania in Askalon was the oldest seat of her worship; thence it passed to Cyprus and Cythera.[8]

According to Pausanias (i. 36 7) the religion was of 'Assyrian' (Syrian) origin,[1] taken up by the people of Paphos in Cyprus and of Ascalon in Phœnicia; the Cytherans learned it from the Phœnicians (cp iii. 23 1); it was introduced into Athens by Ægeus. We may take these passages as evidence of the belief of the Greeks that the worship of the 'heavenly' goddess ('Αφροδίτη Οὐρανία, more often simply ἡ Οὐρανία)[2] was of oriental origin. It is highly probable that in this they were right,[3] and that the epiklesis is in some way connected with the title Queen of Heaven in the Semitic religions.[4]

The goddess of Carthage, in the inscriptions T-n-t (pronunciation unknown), must have had a similar title, since by Latin writers and in Latin inscriptions she is called Cœlestis.[5]

Milkat in Phœnician and Punic proper names, on the other hand, is more probably the divine sovereign of the city or community (cp Milk) than of the heavens.

QUIRINIUS (ΚΥΡΗΝΙΟΣ [Ti. WH], Lk. 2 2). The name of this official is given in an inscription as P. Sulpicius Quirinius. The main facts of his life are given by Tacitus, Ann. 3 48. A native of Lanuvium, of an undistinguished family, he was elected consul in 12 B.C.; some years later he was sent on an expedition against the Homonadenses in Cilicia, who had vanquished Amyntas, king of Galatia. For his successes against these mountaineers he received the honour of a triumph. When Gaius Cæsar was sent out to the East in 2 A.D., Quirinius accompanied him as his tutor. In 6 A.D. Quirinius was appointed as legatus of the Emperor Governor of Syria, and in that capacity took over Judæa on the deposition of Archelaus, and made a census of the newly annexed district (Jos. Ant. 17 13 18 1). At this post he remained four or five years. At a later time (Tac. Ann. 3 22) he caused some scandal in Rome by accusing his divorced wife, Lepida, of having long before tried to poison him. Unpopular at Rome, he retained the favour of Tiberius, who in 21 A.D. procured him a public funeral.

1. Life.

To these facts one of importance is added by the celebrated Lapis Tiburtinus (CIL 14 3613), which inscription, though much mutilated, appears to prove that Quirinius' proconsulate of Syria in 6 A.D. had been preceded by an earlier tenure of the same office. The view of Mommsen is that this previous tenure was in 3-1 B.C., and that the crushing of the Homonadenses, who dwelt in Cilicia, at that time attached to the province of Syria, was an event of this first proconsulate. It cannot well be dated earlier, because Sentius Saturninus governed Syria 9-7 B.C., and Quinctilius Varus from 7 B.C. to after the death of Herod (Tac. Hist. 5 9), since he put down a sedition which arose when Herod died.

Amid these facts, the statements of Lk. as to the date and circumstances of the birth of Jesus (2 1-5) raise intricate questions. The miraculous events preceding the birth cannot be discussed from the historical point of view; but the asserted census in Judæa and the journey of Joseph and Mary to Bethlehem come within the field of historical investigation.

2. The census.

Lk.'s statements are as follows :—

(1) Cæsar Augustus decreed a general census of the Roman world. Of such a general census nothing is known from other sources, though Augustus made a census of Roman citizens only. However, we need not delay over this statement, which is unimportant for our purpose, and may be merely an exaggeration.

(2) This census was first carried out in Palestine in the days of Herod, when Quirinius was governor of Syria. Here several difficulties arise. From the above-cited testimony of Tacitus, it appears that Quirinius was not proconsul of Syria until after the death of Herod. Palestine being not strictly a part of the Roman Empire, but a dependent or protected kingdom under Herod, a Roman census would not be carried out in that district. On the other hand, we know that when in 6 A.D. Archelaus the son of Herod was deposed from his tetrarchy of Judæa, and the district was annexed to the province of Syria, Quirinius, who was then for the second time proconsul of Syria, carried out a census in Judæa, which caused, as we learn from Josephus (Ant. xviii. 1 1), much disaffection in that country. It is not unnatural to suspect that Lk. may have misdated his census.

(3) For the purposes of the census every man went to the abode of his family or clan; thus Joseph went to Bethlehem the town of David,[1] and with him his affianced wife, Mary. It is, however, pointed out that in a Roman census every man reported at his place of residence. No instance is known to us in antiquity in which the citizens of a country migrated to the ancestral home of their family, in order to be enrolled. In any case, no ancient census would require the presence of any but the head of a household. Women would certainly not have to appear in person.

These considerations have led many historians, such as Mommsen, Gardthausen, Keim, Weizsäcker, and Schürer, to the view that Lk.'s statements about the census of Quirinius are altogether mistaken. On the other hand, some writers, such as Huschke and Wieseler and many English theologians, have adopted an apologetic attitude in regard to Lk.'s statements.[2] The most recent apologetic work on the subject is that of Prof. W. M. Ramsay, Was Christ born at Bethlehem? in which work it is pointed out in regard to Quirinius that Lk. does not say that it was he who conducted the census, but only that it was made when he was in some position of authority in Syria (ἡγεμών, not ἀνθύπατος, proconsul). He may have been in command of troops of the Syrian province against the Homonadenses at the time. It is further maintained that a census conducted by Herod in his own dominions might decidedly differ from a Roman census, especially in the point that the people might be numbered not by domicile, but by clan or family.

3. Ramsay's Theory.

[1] [On the birthplace of David, see DAVID, § 1; DEBIR; JUDAH, § 4.]

[2] A summary, and refutation of their views will be found in Schürer's GVI (3) 510-543 (ET i. 2 105-143).

A new element has been introduced into the discussion by the discovery from papyri published by Messrs. Grenfell, Kenyon, and others, that an enrolment occurred in Egypt at intervals of fourteen years from the year 20 A.D. onwards, and probably from the time of the regulation of Egypt by Augustus, that is, also in the years 6 A.D. and 8 B.C., and further that this enrolment was a census by families, not a mere valuation of property. One or two definite, though not conclusive, pieces of evidence, seem to indicate that this periodical census was not confined to Egypt, but was, in some cases at all events, extended to Syria.

Arguing on the basis of this new discovery, Prof. Ramsay maintains that a census may probably have been held in Syria in 9-8 B.C., and gives certain reasons why, if Herod at the same time proposed a census in Judæa, he should have postponed it to the year 6 B.C., and then carried it out on a different plan from that usual in a Roman census. The date 6 B.C. Ramsay accepts as probably that of the birth of Jesus.

To set forth Prof. Ramsay's arguments at length is impossible, and they are so minute as not to bear compression. But if we grant their validity they leave unexplained several difficulties. Why should a census in Judæa be dated by Lk. by the irrelevant fact of a campaign being at the time fought by Quirinius in Cilicia? Even if an enrolment by tribes was carried out by Herod, would this be likely to involve a journey of all Jews to the native town of their family? How could the presence of Mary be required at Bethlehem, when it was a settled principle in all ancient law to treat the male head of a family as responsible for all its members? In Palestine especially it is difficult to imagine such a proceeding as the summoning of women to appear before an officer for enrolment. On all these questions the new discoveries shed no light.

The last difficulty is further increased by the use by Lk. of the word ἐμνηστευμένῃ (unless, indeed, it be an early emendation of the text by some scribe). For this word implies that Mary at the time was not the wife of Joseph, but only betrothed to him. In such circumstances her travelling with him to Bethlehem is even more inexplicable. She would not go as an heiress, or in her own right, as we have no reason to suppose that she was descended from David, and indeed from the context it is clear that she was not.

Josephus tells us that the census of Quirinius was a great innovation, causing alarm and revolt; it is therefore not easy to think that a similar census can have been held twelve or fourteen years earlier, and passed off with so little friction that Josephus does not mention it. It is true that Prof. Ramsay discriminates in character the earlier census which he supposes from the Roman census of Quirinius of 6 A.D.; but it is doubtful how far this view is maintainable, especially as Lk. uses the same word (ἀπογραφή) to designate the known census of Quirinius and the supposed earlier census (Acts 5 37). Thus there can be no doubt that the supposition of errors of fact in Lk. would, from the purely historical point of view, remove very great difficulties. The question which remains is whether our opinion of Lk. as a historian is so high that we prefer to retain these difficulties rather than to suppose serious errors in his narrative of the birth of Jesus. See, further, CHRONOLOGY, §§ 57 ff.; GOSPELS, § 22 (col. 1780, n. 2), and cp NATIVITY, NAZARETH. P. G.

RAAMAH (רַעְמָה; ρεγμα [BAD^silEL] ρεγχμα [A]), one of the sons of CUSH [q.v.] Gen. 10 7 (but רַעְמָא; 1 Ch. 1 9 RV Raama). Raamah is also grouped with Sheba in Ezekiel's list of trade centres (27 22 רַעְמָה; ραμα [B], ραγμα [AQ]). A Sabæan inscription (Glaser, 1155) refers to 'the hosts of Saba and Ḥavilân' as attacking certain people 'on the caravan-route between Ma'ân (=Ma'în, ? Bab. Magan) and Raġmat' (Hommel, AHT 240; cp ZDMG 30 122). Here we have at any rate one Raamah. Glaser, however, places Raamah near Rās el-Khaima, on the Persian Gulf (Skizze, 2 252). Against identification with Regma, on the Arabian side of the same gulf, see Dillmann. Cp GEOGRAPHY, § 23, and Crit. Bib. on Gen. 10 7 Ezek. 27 22 where 'Raamah' is brought nearer to Palestine. See CUSH, 2; SABTA.

RAAMIAH (רַעַמְיָה, 'Yahwè thunders?' cp 3 R, 67, 46 c d, where Rammān, the storm-god, is called the god ša rimi, i.e., 'of thunder' [Del. *Ass. Cp GOVERNMENT, § 26.

In Ezra 2 2 the name is miswritten as REELAIAH, and in Zech. 7 2 (probably) as REGEMMELECH (q.v.). All these forms seem to come from 'Jerahmeel'. The race-element counts for much in the later history of Israel [Che.].

RAAMSES (רַעַמְסֵס), Ex. 1 11. See RAMESES and cp PITHOM.

RAB. The use of רַב, rab, 'chief, head, leader' in compound titles descriptive of rank or office (corresponding to the Gr. αρχι-) is sufficiently well exemplified in Assyrian, Phœnician, and Aramaic.

Typical examples are:—rab dup-šar-ri 'head scribe' (see SCRIBE), and rab nikasi 'treasurer' (cp Heb. נְכָסִים), see Del. Ass. HWB 609*b*, Phœn. רב חרש, 'head workman' (CIS 1 64), רב ספרם, 'head of the scribes' (ib. 86 14), רב כהנם, 'head of the priests' (ib. 119), Palm. רב חילא, 'general,' רב שירתא, 'leader of the caravan' (in Gk. bilinguals στρατηλάτης, συνοδιάρχης[1]), רב שוק, 'chief of the market'[2] (cp רב אגרא, 'head of the ἀγορά'); and Nab. רב משריתא, 'chief of the camp(s).'

This usage of רב seems to be wanting in the S. Semitic stock, and in Hebrew is not frequent. Here the more common term employed is śar (שַׂר, peculiar to Heb.) which is frequently found in pre-exilic writings (cp PRINCE), and its occurrence in the later literature should be looked upon in some cases, perhaps, as a survival of a once popular idiom, and in others as an intentional archaism.

In the sense of 'great' the Heb. rab is not common[3] in the early writings; the best instances being the poetical fragment Gen. 25 23 ('elder' opposed to צעיר), Nu. 11 33 (J or E), 1 K. 19 7, Am. 6 2. In agreement with this is the usage of the Heb. compounds of רב which express a rank or office. Of foreign origin, on the other hand, are the compounds Rab-saris, Rab-shakeh, and Rab-mag, which appear to be titles borrowed from the Assyrian. The rest occur in later literature only, and are mere descriptions of office.

It is very probable that they have been formed simply upon Assyrian or Babylonian analogy; (a) רַב טַבָּחִים, 2 K. 25 8 (in an exilic or post-exilic narrative, see KINGS, § 2 n. 2); cp רַב טַבָּחַיָּא, Dan. 2 14†;[1] EV 'captain of the guard,' AVmg. 'chief marshal' (ἀρχιμάγειρος [87 BAQL]),[2] see EXECUTIONER, 1. Contrast with this שַׂר הַטַּבָּחִים, Gen. 37 36 39 1 41 12; (b) רַב בֵּית, Esth. 1 8†, officer of the household (οἰκονόμος [BאALβ]); and (c) רַב סָרִיסָיו, Dan. 1 3† (see RAB-SARIS), but שַׂר הַסָּרִיסִים, Dan. 1 7-11 18† (ἀρχιευνοῦχος [87 BAQΓ]). שׂר must probably be looked upon here as an intentional archaism. The writer has modelled the narrative of Daniel to some extent upon that of Joseph (Bevan, Dan. 31), and remembers the שַׂר הָאוֹפִים, שַׂר הַמַּשְׁקִים, and שַׂר הַטַּבָּחִים, which recur in Gen. 39-41.

RABBAH. RABBATH of the Ammonites (רַבַּת, רַבָּה בְּנֵי עַמּוֹן, ραββα, Josh. 13 25 [A], Am. 1 14 6 2 1 Ch. 20 1 [B bis, once ραββαν as accusative]; ραββαθ, 2 S. 11 1 12 27 29 Jer. 49 2 [A], 1 Ch. 20 1 [bis A]; ραββαθ υἱῶν αμμων, 2 S. 12 26 [B], 17 2 17 [A], Ezek. 21 20; ρεββαθ Jer. 49 3 [א]; ραββωθ Jer. 49 3 [Q*vid.]; ραβαθ Jer. 49 2 [א*]; ραβαθ υἱῶν Αμμων, 2 S. 12 26 [A], 17 27 [B]. In Dt. 3 11 𝔊 translates ἐν τῇ ἄκρᾳ τῶν υἱῶν Αμμων and in Ezek. 25 5, τὴν πόλιν τοῦ Αμμων. In Josh. 13 25, B reads Ἀράδ. The Vulgate has Rabba or Rebbath according to the Hebrew construction, except in Jer. 49 3 Ezek. 25 5 where we have Rabbath for רַבָּה. In Polyb. Hist. v. 7 4, it appears as ραββαταμανα).

1. Name.

Rabbah is mentioned in Dt. 3 11 as the location of Og's 'bed' or sarcophagus (see BED, § 3); also in Josh. 13 25, in connection with the borders of Gad. In 2 S. 11 f. 1 Ch. 20 we have an account of the siege and capture of Rabbah by Joab and David. In the oracles against Ammon by Amos, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, Rabbah represents Ammon, as being its one important city. Jer. 49 4 refers to the treasures and the well-watered valleys of Rabbah, and Ezek. 25 5 Amos 1 14 to its palaces. These oracles announce the ruin of Rabbah as part of the punishment of Ammon. In Ezek. 21 20 Nebuchadrezzar hesitates whether to march against Jerusalem or Rabbah, but decides for Jerusalem by casting lots. Thus Rabbah was the capital of Ammon during the whole period of the history of the Ammonites, and shared their fortunes throughout (see AMMON). It has been suggested that Rabbah may be the Ham (see HAM, 2) of Gen. 14 5.

2. History.

Rabbah continued an important city in post-exilic times. It is not mentioned in OT in connection with the Jewish history of the period; but the Ammonites are referred to in Nehemiah, 1 Maccabees, and Judith, and doubtless Rabbath remained their capital. Ptolemy Philadelphus, 285-247 B.C., gave it the name of Philadelphia, and probably by erecting buildings and introducing settlers gave it the character of a Greek city; it became one of the most important cities of the Decapolis, Eus. Onom. Ῥαμαδ and Ἀμμαν.

In 218 B.C. it was taken from Ptolemy Philopator by Antiochus Epiphanes, Polyb. 5 17. In the time of Hyrcanus (135-107 B.C.) we read of a Zeno Cotyles, tyrant of Philadelphia, Jos. Ant. xiii. 8 1 15 3. According to a conjecture of Clermont-Ganneau, Rabbath should be read for Nadabath in 1 Macc. 9 37; see NADABATH. In 63 B.C. it was held by the Arabs (Jos. BJ i. 6 3), who were defeated there by Herod, 30 B.C. (i. 19 5 and 6). The extensive Roman remains show that it participated in the prosperity of Eastern Palestine in the second and third centuries A.D. Later, it was the seat of a Christian bishopric. The city is said by Abulfeda (Ritter, Syr. 1158) to have been in ruins when the Moslems conquered Syria.

3. Site.

Rabbah (the mod. 'Ammān) was situated on one of the head-waters of the Jabbok, about 22 m. E. of the Jordan. 2 S. 12 26-28 apparently distinguished between 'the royal city' or 'the city of waters,' and 'the city.' The 'waters' referred to in the second of these names may be the Nahr 'Ammān, a stream rich in fish, which takes its rise at the site of Rabbah (so Buhl, Pal. 260 [§ 132]). In that case the first two names belonged to a lower quarter of the town in the valley (cp § 4). The 'city' may be a designation of the citadel, which was situated on a hill N. of the valley. One would naturally like to find some Ammonitish ruins. There are old rock-hewn tombs, and the remains of the outer walls of the citadel seem very ancient, being formed of great blocks of stone without any cement. What is left of the city walls may belong to the time of the Ptolemies. Conder even thinks that the remains of a reservoir and aqueduct may belong to the subterranean passage which enabled Antiochus to capture the citadel. If so, they may carry us back to Ammonite times, and show how the ancient citadel was supplied with water. The great bulk of the ruins—baths, colonnades, temples, theatres, and tombs—are Roman. There is a small building, which Conder regards as Sasanian or early Arab; and ruins of a Christian cathedral (5th or 6th cent.?) and two chapels. Rude stone monuments (dolmens, etc.) have also been found.

[3] The exact opposite is the case, however, with רַב, 'much, many' (as opposed to מְעַט).

[1] In Dan. also רַב סִגְנִין, 2 48 (see DEPUTY), and רַב חַרְטֻמַּיָּא, 4 6 5 11 (see MAGIC, § 2 a).

RABBAH (הָרַבָּה, as if 'the Rabbah'; ϲωθηΒα [B], αρεΒΒα [AL], Arebba), mentioned with Kirjath-jearim in Josh. 15 60. Read most probably 'Kirjath-Jerahmeel the great' (Che.). See SOLOMON, § 3.

RABBI (ραΒΒει [Ti. WH], many MSS ραΒΒι; Heb. רַבִּי), a title of honour and respect given by the Jews to their learned doctors, more especially to their ordained teachers and spiritual heads (cp HANDS [LAYING ON OF]). רַבִּי (lit. 'my great one,' with the suff. as in Heb. אֲדֹנִי, Syr. ܡܪܝ; cp Fr. monsieur, etc.) is from רַב (see RAB) which at a later period among the Jews was frequently used in the narrower sense not only of a master as opposed to a servant, but of a teacher as opposed to a pupil (cp Ābōth, 1 6 and Ber. 63 b where רב and תלמיד are used of Yahwè and Moses respectively); see DISCIPLE, § 1. Rab (an older pronunciation is Rib) was especially used as the title of the Babylonian teachers, and designates par excellence Abbā Arēkā, a noted exegete of the beginning of the third century A.D. Rabbi, on the other hand, was the title given to Palestinian teachers,[1] and, used alone, applies to Jehudah Hannāsī, the chief editor of the Mishna.

In the NT, Rabbi occurs only in Mt., Mk., and Jn. It is once applied by his followers to John the Baptist (Jn. 3 26), but everywhere else is used in addressing Jesus (Mt. 26 25 49 Mk. 9 5 11 21 14 45 Jn. 1 38 3 2 4 31 6 25 9 2 11 8).[2] Lk. and Mk. both favour the use of διδάσκαλε (see DISCIPLE, TEACHER), which in Jn. 1 38 is the Gr. translation of ῥαββεί, but ἐπιστάτα occurs only in Lk. (e.g., 5 5 8 45, etc.). Almost synonymous with ῥαββεί are the terms πατήρ and καθηγητής (Mt. 23 9 10) which are probably equivalent to the Aramaic אַבָּא and (so Wünsche) מוֹרֶה.[3]

From its use in the NT it is evident that Rabbi had not yet come to be employed as a title, but was merely a form of address (cp Dalman, Der Gottesname Adonaj, 21), whence Mt. 23 7 f. appears to be an anachronism (cp Grätz, Gesch. 4 500). Ewald's argument (Gesch. Is. 5 25 n. 2), from the words of Abṭaliōn in the Pirḳê Ābōth, 1 16 (שְׂנָא אֶת־הָרַבָּנוּת), that רַב and רַבָּן must have been in use for a long time, rests on an erroneous interpretation of רבנות (lit. 'lordship'; cp Strack 'herrschaft').

A fuller form is Rabboni (Mk. 10 51 Jn. 20 16, ῥαββουνεί [B], ῥαββουνί [minusc.], ῥαββωνεί [Δ in Mk. and D in Jn.]), cp the Aram. ribbōn (רִבּוֹן) another form of rabbān (רַבָּן), but with the retention of the ă sound in the first syllable.[1] רבון in Aram. is used by a slave of his master, or a worshipper of his God, and is, like Rabbi, explained as meaning διδάσκαλε (Jn. l.c.). According to 'Ārūch (s. אביי), a רבן was more honourable than a רבי, and a רבי than a רב, but greatest of all was one whose name alone was mentioned (גדול מרבן שמו). The title רַבָּן was first held by Gamaliel I. (see GAMALIEL).

For the Jewish use of these various titles, see EB(9), s.v. 'Rab, Rabbi,' and for NT usage, Dalman, Die Worte Jesu, 272 ff.

RABBITH (הָרַבִּית; ΔαΒειρωΝ [B], ραΒΒωθ [AL]), a city in Issachar, properly hā-Rabbīth, Josh. 19 20.† Identified with Râbâ, N. of Ibzīḳ (Buhl, 204). C. Niebuhr (Gesch. 1 367; cp 𝔊[B]) reads דָּבְרַת, DABERATH [q.v.]; cp Josh. 21 28. But perhaps the true reading is רחבות, and P's original authority related to the Negeb (cp SHUNEM).

RABBONI. See RABBI, end.

RAB-MAG (רַב־מָג; rab-mag), a title applied to NERGAL-SHAREZER [q.v.] (Jer. 39 3; ραΒαμαθ [B], -ακ [A]; -αγ [Q], ρα'μαγ [ℵ*], Βαμαγ [ℵ c.a?]; v. 13 ροΒομογ [Theod. in Q mg.] om. 𝔊); see RAB. Older critics explain 'chief Magian'; but the Magians (μαγοι) are a Median tribe according to Herodotus (1 101), and have no place in Babylonia. Rab-mugi is said to be the title of a physician referred to in an Assyrian letter (tablet K 519) respecting a sick man (Pinches in RP(2) 2 182; cp Wi. OLZ, Feb. 1898, col. 40). Schrader (KAT(2) 417 f.) and Hommel (Hastings, DB 1 229 a), however, derive mag from emḳu, emgu, 'wise,' and Frd. Delitzsch (Heb. Lang. 13 f.) from maḫḫu 'prophet, soothsayer' (= eššepu, אַשָּׁף). From a text-critical point of view these suggestions have no probability. There is strong reason to believe that רב־מג is corrupt. See NERGAL-SHAREZER.

1. Name.

T. K. C.

2. Assyrian equivalent. The Assyrian term referred to is generally rab mugi, also rab mugu. There is nothing in K. 519 to connect this officer even remotely with a physician: see Harper's Ass.-Bab. Letters, 97, for text, and Chr. Johnston's Epistolary Literature of the Assyrians and Babylonians, 163, for transliteration and translation. The writer, Ardi-Nanā, is the Court Physician (as Johnston shows). The rab mugi only reports, or brings the report of, the sick man's condition. He is likely to have been an express messenger. There was a rab mugi of the bitḫalli and another rab mugi of the narkabâti (on Rm. 619, no. 1036, see Johns' Assyrian Deeds and Documents, 2, no. 1036). Hence the Rab-mag may have had to do primarily with chariots and horses, and been the master of the horse in the Assyrian Court.

1 The Targ. on 2 K. 2 12 makes Elisha call Elijah Rabbi; cp Targ. on Ps. 55 14.

2 The AV frequently has MASTER; cp Mt. 26 25 49 Mk. l.c., Jn. 4 31 9 2 11 8. The Pesh. renders by ܪܒܝ and in Jn. 1 38 3 26 4 31 6 25 9 2 11 8 by ܪܒܝ.

3 Against this see Dalman, Die Worte Jesu, 276, 278 f. אבא as a term of address seems to be unknown to the Targumists. It is rather a title of respect. καθηγητής, according to this scholar is a Gr. variant to διδάσκαλος—v. 10 being another recension of v. 8.

1 Pressel in PRE s.v. 'Rabbinismus,' explains the a to be a Galilean provincialism; cp Kautzsch, Gram. Bibl. Aram. 10. The change of ă and ĭ is similar to that in Syr. pešḥā and πασχα.

Hezekiah (2 K 18 17; ραφεις [B], ραβσαρεις [A], ραψεις [L]; rabsaris), and (b) an officer present at the capture of Jerusalem (Jer. 39 3, ναβουσαρεις [B], -σαρις [ℵ^cQ], -σεεις [ℵ*] and ραβσαρις [Q^{mg.} ib. and Theod. in v. 13 where BℵA om.; rabsares). In both passages, however, we should possibly read either עֲרָב אַשּׁוּר, 'Arabia of Asshur' (cp TARSHISH) or שַׂר עֲרָבִים, 'the prince of the Arabians' (see NERGAL-SHAREZER); indeed in the case of Jer. (l.c.) the probability is very strong. As to 2 K. (l.c.) a doubt is permissible (cp SENNACHERIB, § 5), and we therefore offer the views of Rab-saris which are possible on the assumption that an Assyrian invasion was really referred to in the original narrative. The title has often been interpreted 'chief eunuch,' and Schrader (KAT[(2)] 319) thinks that it may be the translation of a corresponding Assyrian phrase (so Dillm.-Kittel, Jesaia, 312). This, at any rate, is not very probable.

Winckler conjectured (Unters. 138) that it was a reproduction of an artificial Ass. phrase rab-ša-riš—a learned scribe's interpretation of rab-sag (RAB-SHAKEH), which is half Sumerian; while, according to Pinches (letter in Acad., June 25, 1892), rab-ša-reši, 'chief of the heads' was the title of the special officer who had charge of the royal princes (cp Dan. 1 3). Finally, Del. (Ass. HWB 694*a*) registers ša-riš as the title of a court-official of uncertain meaning. We may plausibly hold that the second element in rab-saris is both Hebrew and Assyrian, but primarily Assyrian (see EUNUCH), and that rab-saris (=Heb. rab-šališ) means chief captain. If so, it hardly differs from RAB-SHAKEH (q.v.).

How רב סריסיו in Dan. 1 3 (cp v. 7) is to be understood, is not quite clear. The context suggests that the writer misunderstood the phrase which he found already corrupted in 2 K. 18 17; for eunuchs, having the charge of royal harems, were frequently employed in superintending the education of princes. See EUNUCH. Even if the story of Daniel has been recast, this explanation may, at any rate, serve provisionally. T. K. C.

RAB-SHAKEH (רַב־שָׁקֵה; ραψακης [BℵAQΓOCL]; rabsaces), the title (so RV^{mg.}; see RAB) of the officer sent by the Assyrian king to Hezekiah (2 K. 18 17-19; Is. 36 f., and in the Heb. original of Ecclus. 48 18, AV RABSACES; ραβσακης, Is. 36 2 [B] 4 12 22 37 4 [BQ^{mg.}] 36 13 [Q^{mg.}] 37 8 [B? Q^{mg.}]). In its Heb. form it has been taken to mean 'chief cup-bearer'; but a cup-bearer would not have been intrusted with important political business. The word is the exact reproduction of the Assyr. rab-šaḳe 'chief of the high ones' (i.e., officers)—for so the Rab SAG or Rab SAG^{pl.} of the inscriptions should be read (Del. Ass. HWB, 685*a*). This was the title of a military officer, inferior to the Tartan, but of very high rank. A rab-šaḳe was despatched to Tyre by Tiglath-pileser III. to arrange about tribute (KB 2 23, cp Del. l.c.). Just so the Rab-shakeh goes (with the Tartan, according to 2 K.) to Jerusalem. He is acquainted both with Hebrew ('the Jews' language,' 2 K. 18 26) and with Aramaic; such a leading diplomatist needed no dragoman. Since the time of Tiglath-pileser III. there was a large Aramæan population in Assyria. Cp Schr. KAT[(2)] 320; ARAMAIC, § 2. If, however, the original narrative referred to a N. Arabian rather than an Assyrian incursion, the name underlying Rab-shakeh may very possibly be 'Arāb-kūš, 'Arabia of Cush.' Cp RAB-SARIS. T. K. C.

RACA (ραχα [Ti.], ρακα [Treg. WH]; probably an abbreviated form of the Rabb. ריקא; cp Kau. Gram. Bibl. Aram. 10; Dalm. Aram. Gram. 138, n. 2; for interchange of κ and χ cp Dalm. ib. 304, n. 2, and see ACELDAMA, § 1), a term of abuse in the time of Christ, Mt. 5 22 †. Whether it conveys a more or a less offensive meaning than μωρέ (EV, 'Thou fool') is disputed; indeed, the whole passage, as it stands, is obscure. According to Holtzmann, there is a double climax in the clauses introduced by 'But I say to you'; (1) from wrath in the heart to its expression in a word, and (2) from the denial of the intellectual capacity of a brother to that of his moral and religious character, while the punishments referred to range from that awarded by a mere local court ('Beth-din') to that by the Sanhedrin, and finally to that of the fiery Gehenna. Holtzmann, however, understates the offensiveness of Raca and exaggerates that of μωρέ. Raca (cp Jn. 9 4) involves moral more than intellectual depreciation, and μωρός nowhere in the NT bears the sense of 'impious' (the OT נָבָל; see FOOL). Nor is it at all probable that Jesus would have recognised the provisional institution of the Sanhedrin side by side with the Messianic punishment of Gehenna, and assigned the punishment of one abusive expression to the former, and of another to the latter. The text must have suffered a slight disarrangement; the clause about Raca should be parallel to the clause about murder. Read probably thus, 'Ye have heard that it was said to the ancients, Thou shalt not murder, and whosoever murders is liable to the judgment, and whosoever says 'Raca' to his brother, is liable to the Sanhedrin. But I say unto you, Every one who is angry with his brother is liable to the (divine) judgment, and whoever says, Thou fool, is liable to the fiery Gehenna.' The Law as expounded by the Rabbis treated libellous expressions[1] as next door to murder. But such gross offences as murder and calling another 'Raca' could never occur if on the one hand anger were nipped in the bud, and on the other even such seemingly harmless expressions as 'thou simpleton' (μωρέ) were scrupulously avoided. So first J. P. Peters (JBL 10 131 f. [1891]; 15 103 [1896]), except that he prefers to repeat 'It was said,' etc., and 'But I say,' avoiding rearrangement. See FOOL. T. K. C.

RACAL, AV RACHAL.

RACE, RACE-COURSE. See generally HELLENISM, § 5 (with references), WRESTLING.

'Race' is an apt rendering of στάδιον in 1 Cor. 9 24 (RVmg. 'race-course') and of ἀγών (lit. contest) in Heb. 12 1. In Ps. 19 5 RV preferably renders 'ōraḥ (ארח) by 'course.' In Eccles. 9 11, m'rōṣ (מֵרוֹץ) is properly an abstract='running' (EV's rendering of מְרוּצָה, 2 S. 18 27).

RACHAB (Mt 1 5), RV RAHAB.

RACHAL, RV, RACAL. For 'in Rachal' (בְּרָכָל) in 1 S. 30 29 we ought, probably, following 𝔊^{BL} (εν καρμηλω, but εν ραχηλ [A]), to read 'in Carmel' (בכרמל); so all critics—'A necessary emendation' (Bu., SBOT). See CARMEL, 2, col. 706.

RACHEL (רָחֵל, 'ewe,' see WRS Kin. 219,[2] ραχηλ [BℵADEQL]), the 'mother' of the tribes of Israel settled in the highlands of West Palestine, between the Canaanite strips of territory at Esdraelon and Aijalon. Rachel died when Benjamin or Benoni was born (Gen. 35 16 ff.).

1a. No mere name.

Was there, we may ask, at some remote period, a distinct clan with the ewe 'Rāḥēl' as its totem, and the 'maṣṣēbah of Rachel's grave' (see RACHEL'S SEPULCHRE) as its chief sacred spot? The members of such a clan would be b'nē Rāḥēl. They all lived in Ephraim; but in time some came to be banded together, as Jeminites (BENJAMIN, § 1). Then, perhaps, the others began to drop the name b'nē Rāḥēl in favour of something else (cp JOSEPH i., § 2; EPHRAIM, § 5 ii.; MANASSEH, § 2). Rachel, certainly, as far as we can see, was no mere name, as in historical times was Leah. In Jer. 31 15 (cp Mt. 2 18) we hear of Rachel weeping for her children (although there is no explicit indication who these are understood to be); and at a later date, in the story of Ruth, Rachel and Leah are the builders of the 'house of Israel' (Ruth 4 11). According to the legend as we know it (both J and E) Rachel was the beloved wife, a feature that it is natural to connect with the acknowledged superior splendour and power of northern Israel. There is a remarkable passage in J, however, where Jacob seems to speak as if he had had only two sons (Gen. 42 38). The question therefore arises whether there may not have been an older form of the story where Rachel was the only wife, just as Rachel's 'double,' Rebecca, was the only wife of Isaac. This question Steuernagel answers in the affirmative (Einwanderung, 39). He also makes the interesting suggestion that there may be a monument of the importance of Rachel in the name Israel. As the men of the Gad tribe were called Ish Gad (see GAD, § 1), so, Steurnagel suggests, the men of the Rachel (or Jacob, or Joseph) tribe were perhaps called Iś-Ra'-el (on ś see SHIBBOLETH, and on the change of ḥ to ' in words containing a liquid, see REUBEN, col. 4092, n. 9.

[1] On the importance attached to words like Raca, cp Koran, 17 24, 'And say not to them, Fie,' and Ghazâli's description of the weighing of a man's actions; 'But the angel bringeth yet a leaf which he casteth into the scale of the evil actions. On this leaf is written the word "Fie!" Then the evil actions outweigh the good. . . . The order is given to cast this man into hell.' (La perle precieuse de Ghazâli [Gautier], 1878, p. 80.)

[2] Grüneisen (Ahnencultus, 257) proposes to read Aharhel for the Judahite name AHARHEL, comparing 𝔊^{BAL} ἀδελφοῦ Ρηχαβ (also the Benjamite AHRAH, אחרח, 𝔊 ιαφαηλ). [According to Cheyne Rachel may be a fragment of ירחמאל, Jerahmeel; see JACOB, § 3, SHAPHAN, and for a similiarly doubtful name, see LEAH.]

1b. Relation to other wives. We must now consider Rachel's relation to Bilhah. Rebecca has no such attendant (DEBORAH [q.v., 2] is not represented as a concubine of Isaac). Sarah, however, has Hagar; and in Sarah's as in Rachel's case, the son of the wife is not born till after the son of the concubine. This is obscure (cp MANASSEH, § 3). In Rachel's case the most natural conjecture would be that 'Joseph' was not born till after the sons of Bilhah were settled in Canaan. So Guthe (GVI 41). Steuernagel thinks that Rachel (or rather Jacob-Rāhēl) entered Palestine from the E. just in the rear of Bilhah (Einwanderung, 98; cp Guthe, GVI 42), and that it was because the Bilhah tribes (Dan and Naphtali) came to be treated as 'brothers' of Joseph that their 'mother' Bilhah came to be called a concubine of Jacob. Why only Rachel was a full wife is often explained by the importance of the Rachel tribes in historical times. There may, however, have been religious grounds (so, for example, Steuernagel, Einwanderung, 45). Of what race her maid came we are not told (on the statements in later writings, see ZILPAH, § 1); but Rachel herself was a daughter of Laban, which appears to point to a belief in the presence of Aramæan elements in N. Israel (differently, LABAN, REBEKAH). If Rachel was the chosen wife of Jacob, she was not the only one. The surreptitious introduction of Leah seems an important feature of the story. Quite as difficult of clan-historical interpretation is the representation of Rachel as Leah's sister.[1] Are we to infer that there were once actually two tribes, a Ewe tribe and a Wild-cow tribe, living in association? If so, where and when? Or is it that when the northern Ephraim tribes came to be associated with the southern tribes they came all to be regarded as brothers, and therefore as having a common father though different mothers? The theory is attractive. It explains, however, why Rachel and Leah are fellow-wives, hardly why they are sisters.[2]

The points that remain are the stealing of the teraphim, the initial barrenness, and the story of the dūdā'īm.

1c. Other points. The stealing of the teraphim by a woman as a feature in this quaint story tells us something of the light in which the teraphim came to be viewed (Gunkel compares the case of Michal, cp HPSm. Sam. p. xxxiv.). It is through the initial barrenness that Dan and Naphtali come to be older than Joseph (see NAPHTALI, § 2). The real origin of the story of the dūdā'īm is not clear (see ISSACHAR, § 2, REUBEN, § 3, NAPHTALI, § 2). E does not mention them; but in the original J they no doubt cured Rachel's barrenness. This is now obscured, as the birth of Zebulun precedes that of Joseph. According to the dates assigned to the births in the present text of Jubilees, 28 23 f., however, Joseph comes immediately after Issachar, before Zebulun, although it is Joseph and Zebulun, not (as it ought to be) Joseph and Issachar that are born in the same year. On the general question of the order in which the tribes are enumerated, see TRIBES. H. W. H.

2. Rachel's death. The death of Rachel is related in Gen. 35 16-20 (JE); the narrative throws much light on the earlier phase of the tribal traditions, but needs perhaps to be studied in connection with a comprehensive textual criticism.

As pointed out in JACOB, § 3, the phraseology of Gen. 29 1 suggests that, according to a very early form of the tradition, the home of Laban was among the Jerahmeelites of the S. Evidence which was not in the writer's hands when that article was written, or at least was not fully appreciated by him, is now before him in abundance, showing that this was indeed the case —i.e., that Laban was indeed originally regarded as an Aramæan or Jerahmeelite (ירחמאל=ארם) of the S. Laban's Ḥaran was, however, not Hebron but a district of the Negeb which also supplied to Sanballat (?) the designation חרני (MT Hōrōnī), 'Haranite' (see SANBALLAT). It was there that Rachel and Leah—a distinction without a difference, if רחל and לאה are both corrupt fragments of Jerahmeel—dwelt, according to the early tradition and the 'Bethel,' where the divinity appeared to Jacob was, if not, strictly speaking, in 'the land of the b'ne Jerahme'el' (29 1), at any rate, at no very great distance from it, for, like Ḥaran, it was in the Negeb. In the Negeb, too, was the Gilead of the famous story of the compact between Jacob and Laban, and of not a few other much misunderstood OT passages, and in the Negeb was 'Shechem'—i.e., Cusham (see SHECHEM, 2). It therefore became superfluous to emend the 'Ephrath' of Gen. 35 16 19 into 'Beeroth,' a change which on a more conservative view of the tribal traditions (see EPHRATH, 1; JOSEPH i., § 3) was helpful, and indeed necessary. The 'Ephrath' of the story of Rachel's death is the Ephrath of the Negeb (in Gen. 2 14 Jer. 13 4 ff. it appears to be called Pĕrāth; cp PARADISE, § 5; SHIHOR); its other name, according to the gloss in v. 19, was בית־לחם, a popular distortion of בית ירחמאל, 'Beth-jerahmeel.' See RACHEL'S SEPULCHRE. Thus 'Rachel' (the vocalisation is of course relatively late, and not authoritative for the early tradition)—i.e., Jerahmeel—was fitly enough buried at one of the leading centres of the Jerahmeelite race in the Negeb. Before her death she gave birth to a son variously called Ben-oni and Ben-jamin. 'On' is one of the place-names of the Negeb (see ON i.), and 'Jamin' is, in its origin, a popular corruption of an abbreviated form of 'Jerahmeel.' (There is, in fact, enough to warrant the surmise that Benjamin's original home was in the Negeb). The early tradition also made a statement respecting the distance between the place where Rachel died and Ephrath or Beth-jerahmeel.

There was but kibrath hā-āreṣ (כברת הארץ) to come to Ephrath when Rachel travailed. None of the explanations of kibrath in Ges. Thes., or elsewhere is satisfactory,[1] and in the Psalter ארץ and ארח have a tendency to get confounded. Probably we should read kim'aṭ hā-ōraḥ, כִּמְעַט הָאֹרַח, 'a trifle (left) of the way.' See RACHEL'S SEPULCHRE.

H. W. H., § 1 a-c; T. K. C., § 2.

RACHEL'S SEPULCHRE. The biblical references are (a) Gen. 35 19*b* (JE), (b) 48 7*b* (R), (c) 1 S. 10 2 f. (d) Jer. 31 15, (e) Mt. 2 16-18. It is generally supposed (see Buhl, Pal. 159, and Dillm. on Gen. 35 19) that either (i.) there was a double tradition with reference to the site of Rachel's grave, one (a, b, e) placing it near Bethlehem in Judah, another (c, d) 'in the border of Benjamin' towards Ramah (so Nöld., Del.[(5)], Dillm.); or (ii.) the gloss 'that is Bethlehem' in (a) and (b), which (e) appears to follow, is based upon a geographical confusion and is to be disregarded (so Holzinger, Gunkel, and Oxf. Hex.). The weak point in i. is thought to be that Rachel has nothing to do with the S. kingdom, and the weak point in ii. certainly is that a N. Ephrath is undiscoverable. Before proceeding further we must criticise the text (see Crit. Bib.).

1 In Test. xii. Patr., Naph. 1, etc., Bilhah and Zilpah also are sisters. See ZILPAH, § 1.

2 Perhaps they were sisters simply because of the frequency of such a marriage of sisters in the society in which the story was told (see MARRIAGE, § 2, (1)). [For a different view, see REBEKAH.]

1 כברה is conventionally regarded as a measure (𝔊 ἱππόδρομος; Pesh. a parasang). Of course, the Ass. kibrâti, 'a quarter of the world,' can hardly, by any ingenuity, be made illustrative. It is clear that the text is corrupt. So also in 2 K. 5 19 כברת ארץ (no article before ארץ) is shown by the context to be corrupt (see NAAMAN).

(a) and (b) בית־לחם is a popular corruption of בית ירחמאל. 'Ephrath' and 'Beth-jerahmeel' are both place-names of the Negeb. We have no reason to doubt that the gloss in Gen. 35 19*b* and 48 7*b* is correct, and that Beth-jerahmeel either had Ephrath as its second name, or was in the district called Ephrath. We must remember that Ephrath was traditionally the wife of Caleb (1 Ch. 2 19).

(c) The geographical description has suffered serious corruption. The text should run, 'When thou departest from me to-day, thou shalt find two men by Beth-jerahmeel in Shalishah.' See SHALISHA, ZELZAH.

(d) Jer. 31 being most probably of late origin, we could not be surprised if it contained a statement based on a misunderstanding of the Rachel tradition. It is quite possible, however, that the Ramah spoken of is the same that is meant in the underlying original of Jer. 40 1 ff., which probably referred to a Ramah (= Jerahmeel) in the Negeb, which was the starting-point of the captives who went to a N. Arabian exile. If so, the writer may also conceivably have known of Rachel as having died and been buried in the Negeb. Taking, as was supposed, a profound interest in the fortunes of her descendants, Rachel had never ceased to grieve over the tribe of Joseph, which had gone into exile with other N. Israelites in N. Arabia (see Crit. Bib. on 2 K. 17 6[1]). When, however, the Jerahmeelite setting of the early Israelite legends, and the N. Arabian exile of the two sections of the Israelite race, had passed into oblivion (partly through corruption of the texts), it was natural that the sepulchre of Rachel should be transferred to the N., in spite of the fact that no Ephrath was in existence to impart to this transference a superficial plausibility.

According to JE, the site of Rachel's tomb was marked by a sacred pillar (see MASSEBAH), which existed in the writer's time (Gen. 35 20). The tomb known in our own day as Rachel's has plainly been restored, though the tradition has attached to the same spot throughout the Christian period. It is a short distance from Bethlehem, on the road to Jerusalem. According to Clermont-Ganneau,[2] it may perhaps be the tomb (cenotaph) of the Jewish king Archelaus (cp HEROD, § 8) referred to by Jerome (OS 101 12). T. K. C.

RADDAI (רַדַּי), son of Jesse, and brother of DAVID [q.v. § 1 a, n.] (1 Ch. 2 14†; ζαδδαι [B], ζαβδ. [B^ab], ραδδαι [A], ρεδαι [L]). Ewald identifies with him the corrupt רעי (Rei) of 1 K. 1 8, see SHIMEI 2. The name is more probably a corruption of זבדי (see Marq. Fund. 25 cp 𝔊 B^ab); see ZABDI.

RAGAU. 1. See RAGES.

2. (ραγαυ [Ti.WH]), Lk. 3 35, RV REU. See GENEALOGIES, ii. § 3.

RAGES (ραγας, -γων, -γοις [τη -γη BA 6 10 is uncertain; in Tob. 4 20 ℵ αργοις], rages [Vg.], rāgā [Syr.]), an important city in NE. Media, situated in the province of Rhagiana, near the celebrated Caspian Gates, and hence a place of great strategical importance. It is frequently mentioned in the above form in the Book of Tobit (1 14 4 1 20 5 5 6 13 9 2). In Judith (1 5 15) the name appears as Ragau (ραγαυ, ragau [Vg.], 'plain of Dūrā,'[3] and rĕgū [Syr.]), which is apparently identical with REU [q.v.].

This city, which is frequently mentioned by classical writers, occurs as Rhagā in the Avesta (Vend. ch. 1), and also in the Behistun Inscription of Darius Hystaspis 2 13). After suffering various changes, it fell into decay; but the name may perhaps survive in the huge ruins of Rhey, situated some 5 m. SE. of Teheran. See Rawlinson, Monarchies, 2 272 f.; Curzon, Persia, 1 345-352; Smith's Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Geog., s.v.

RAGUEL (רְעוּאֵל). (1) RV REUEL. See JETHRO, REUEL. (2) a man of the tribe of Naphtali (Tob. 6 12; cp 1 1 7 4), related to Tobias; husband of Edna, whose only daughter Sara became the wife of Tobias ραγουηλ, 3 7 17; -ηλος).

In Enoch 20 4 Raguel is the name of one of the archangels. Perhaps this was suggested by Tob. 3 17, where the name Raguel occurs in connection with Raphael (both names may have a similar origin; see REUEL, RAPHAEL). That the name has any reference to this angel's rôle as a 'chastiser' (Charles on Enoch 20 4) is hardly probable. T. K. C.

RAHAB (רַהַב), a synonymous term for the DRAGON (q.v.) in post-exilic writings, sometimes also applied to Egypt (or, as may plausibly be held, to Miṣrim, the N. Arabian foe of Israel; see MIZRAIM, § 2 b), Job 9 13 (κήτη τὰ ὑπ' οὐρανόν), 26 12 (τὸ κῆτος), Ps. 89 10 [11] (ὑπερήφανον), Is. 51 9 (LXX om.), 30 7 (ὅτι ματαία ἡ παράκλησις ὑμῶν αὕτη), Ps. 87 4† (ρααβ).[1]

1. References. From Job 9 13 26 12 we perhaps learn that Rahab was another name for Tiāmat, the dragon of darkness and chaos. 'God,' says Job in his despondency, 'will not turn back his fury; [even] the helpers of Rahab bowed beneath him.' On the 'helpers of Tiāmat,' see DRAGON, § 5. Later, Job again refers to the fate of Rahab (or is it Bildad, following out Job's suggestions in his unoriginal way?),

By his power he threatened (גָּעַר) the sea,
And by his skill he shattered Rahab.

Here 'sea' and 'Rahab' are coupled, as 'sea' and 'Leviathan,' probably, in Job 3 8 (see LEVIATHAN), and in v. 13 the 'dragon' is referred to. In Ps. 89 9 f. [10 f.] the same parallelism is observable, and since v. 11 proves that the psalmist has the creation in his mind, the view that Rahab is a synonym for Leviathan or the dragon again becomes plausible. The passage runs,—

Thou (alone) didst crush Rahab as a dishonoured corpse;
With thy strong arm thou didst break down thine enemies.

The invocation to the arm of Yahwè in Is. 51 9 also refers to Rahab. Here, however, though the allusion to the Dragon-myth is obvious, there is also a special reference to מצרים (see DRAGON), or perhaps to the people called Miṣrim in N. Arabia. How this was possible we seem to learn from Is. 30 7 (on the text see SBOT, ad loc.). It has been held (cp Duhm, ad loc.) that the latter half of the verse is a later addition. Living in an age when the mythological interest had revived, a reader was struck by the resemblance between the characteristics of the dragon of chaos and those of מצרים. Both were pre-eminent in strength; both in the olden time had rebelled against Yahwè; for מצרים, therefore, as well as for the dragon, the fate of abject humiliation (cp Is. 19) was reserved. In Ps. 87 4 Rahab, according to the exegetical tradition, is simply a synonym for Egypt (as the Targum already explains it), though even here this is not beyond critical questioning.

2. Meaning. Rahab in Hebrew would mean 'raging,' 'insolence.' This would be not unsuitable as a title of the chaos-dragon, a reference to which is plainly intended in all the above passages except the last. It would not be strange, however, if Rahab were a Hebraised form of some Babylonian mythic name. In the third of the creation-stories mentioned elsewhere (see CREATION)—that which begins 'cities sighed, men [groaned]'—the dragon is repeatedly called by a name which Zimmern and Gunkel would like to read rebbu (for ruhbu*), and to consider the Ass. equivalent of Rahab. The name, if it means 'violence,' would be specially appropriate in the story of the tyranny exercised by Tiāmat. Unfortunately the reading is uncertain. The polyphonous character of the Assyrian script allows us equally to read kalbu, 'dog,' and labbu, 'lion' (Gunkel, Schöpf. 29 4 18). For another theory of the origin and precise significance of the title Rahab we may be allowed to refer to Crit. Bib.

[1] In Job 9 13 26 12 Is. 51 9, Symm. has ἀλαζονείᾳ, ἀλαζονείαν, in Is. 51 9 30 7 Aq. ὅρμημα, Theod. πλάτος, in Is. 30, Symm. has ταραχαί or -χή, in Ps. 87 4 Aq. has ὁρμήματος, Symm. ὑπερηφανίαν.

RAHAB (רָחָב; ραaβ), Josh. 2 1 3 6 17 23 25. The story of Rahab must not be taken literally. She is clearly the eponym of a tribe, and the circumstances of the tribe are reflected in her fortunes. The statements in Josh. 6 23 25 apply to no tribe known to us so well as to the Kenites, who were admitted among the Israelites on relatively unfavourable terms—as sojourners; hence the term zōnāh. The name רחב is best accounted for as the equivalent of חֶבֶר, 'Heber,' the second name of the tribe of the Kenites.[1] See JERICHO, § 4; RECHABITES.

In Heb. 11 31 Rahab is praised as an example of faith. This is suggested by the edifying speech of Rahab in Josh. 2 9-11, of which, however, only v. 9*a* is recognised by critical analysis as belonging to the earlier narrative (see Oxf. Hex. 2 321). It is no doubt startling that Rahab should be a worshipper of Yahwè—if Rahab is to be viewed as a Canaanite. If, however, Rahab is a symbolic term for the Kenites, all becomes plain, for the Kenites were worshippers of Yahwè (cp KENITES). The attempts of (later) Jewish and Christian interpreters to explain away the term zōnāh, 'harlot,' as 'hostess, innkeeper,' also now prove to be doubly unnecessary (see above). On Rahab's good works (James 2 25), cp the Jewish view in Weber, Jüd. Theol. 332. The mention of her in the genealogy of Jesus (Mt. 1 5) rests on the assumption that she became the wife of SALMON [q.v.]. No less a man than Jeremiah is stated in Megillah 14*b* to have been a descendant of Rahab on his mother's side. This passed for an edifying belief.

RAIN. That at the present day rain is considered in Palestine as one of God's best gifts, is undeniable.

1. Conception of rain.

Moslems, Christians, and Jews can unite in imploring heaven for the 'showers that water the earth' (Ps. 72 6). But it is a question whether the fertilising operation of the Baalim was associated in early times with the rain of heaven, or only with springs, streams, and underground flow (cp BAAL, § 1). Robertson Smith, who discusses the subject fully in Rel. Sem. lect. 3, comes to the conclusion that originally the Baalim were gods of the streams and fountains, but that, as husbandry spread, the 'gods of the springs' extended their domain over the lands watered by the sky, and gradually added to their old attributes the new character of 'lords of rain' (p. 106). Yahwè in the OT is certainly the rain-giver; Jer. 14 22, 'Can any of the vanities of the heathen cause rain?' In Ps. 65 9 [10], according to the traditional text, the early rain is called 'the river of God.' The word used (פֶּלֶג) is remarkable. Generally it occurs in the plural for the artificial streams used in irrigation (Is. 30 25 32 2 Ps. 1 3 119 136 Prov. 5 16 21 1 Lam. 3 48). Here, if MT is right, there is a similar conception. The rain is imagined as water which has been drawn from the great heavenly reservoirs (Gen. 7 11) and sent down on earth through the solid dome of the sky. This is illustrated by Job 38 25, 'Who has cleft a channel for the waterflood' (so RV; šéṭeph, שֶׁטֶף, 'torrential rain'). With this cp v. 28, where the 'rain' (māṭār, מטר) and the 'parted streams of dew' (read פַּלְגֵי טַל, for אֶגְלֵי טַל; see DEW) are parallel expressions.

Naturally, rain and rain-mist (ṭal, טַל) are prominent in poetic benedictions. In Dt. 33 13 the 'precious things of heaven above' (reading מֵעַל for מִטַּל)[2] are the rain, the rain-mist, and the dew. In Gen. 27 28 the fine rain, or rain-mist, of heaven stands first among the blessings called down upon Jacob's land by Isaac. In Dt. 28 12 Moses promises to obedient Israel that Yahwè 'will open his good treasury, the heaven, to give the rain in its season'; to this treasury the Book of Enoch refers (60 20 f. 69 23); cp DEW. The 'self-springing plants of Yahwè' in Is. 4 2 (SBOT) are those which depend on the moisture which God sends from this heavenly storechamber. Notice, too, that in Ps. 104 13 God is said to 'water the mountains from his upper chambers.' It is a slightly different mythic symbol which a poet in Job uses—'Who (but Yahwè) can tilt the bottles of heaven?' (Job 38 37). To be able to bring rain through prayer was one of the greatest proofs of eminent piety. Elijah 'prayed fervently that it might not rain, and it rained not,' etc. (Jas. 5 17); and Josephus (Ant. xiv. 2 1) relates that, in the time of King Aristobulus, there was a man named Onias, 'righteous and beloved of God,' who by his prayers could bring rain to the parched earth. Cp PRAYER.

Palestine is well described in Deut. 11 11 (in contradistinction to Egypt) as 'a land of hills and valleys, which drinks water, when rain falls from heaven.' Shortly afterwards (v. 14) a fuller description is given. See also Hos. 6 3 Joel 2 23 Zech. 10 1 f. (see Nowack), Job 29 23, and Ja. 5 7 (πρόϊμον καὶ ὄψιμον; BN insert ὑετόν, giving the sense rightly). The distribution of rain is very unequal. On one occasion Thomson found the ground in the Jordan valley like a desert, while at Tiberias the whole country was 'a paradise of herbs and flowers.' Just so it was in ancient times. 'I caused it to rain upon one city, and caused it not to rain upon another city: one piece was rained upon, and the piece whereupon it rained not withered' (Am. 4 7). The prophet continues, 'So two or three cities wandered unto one city to drink water, but they were not satisfied,' on which Thomson remarks that this is 'a fact often repeated' in Palestine.[1] The variableness of the climate helps to account for the frequent failure of the crops, both in ancient and in modern times, and gives point to the promises of regularity in the seasons on condition of obedience to the divine commands.[2] The former or autumnal rains (יורה, מורה) usually begin about the end of October. In Lebanon they may begin a month earlier; but no dependence can be placed upon this, and according to Thomson (LB 90) the winter rains are sometimes delayed till January. They are usually accompanied by thunder and lightning (Jer. 10 13). The next four months may be called the rainy season. In April rain (the latter rain, מַלְקוֹשׁ, √לקשׁ, 'to be late') falls at intervals; in May the showers are less frequent and lighter, and at the close of that month they cease altogether.

2. Former and latter rain.

It appears from Glaisher's observations (PEFQ, 1899, p. 71) that the heaviest monthly rainfall in 1897 was 11.21 in., in January; the next, 6.74 in. in December, and that the total fall for the year was 27.72 in. This refers to Tiberias. At Jerusalem the total fall was 41.62 in. At Tiberias no rain fell from May 25 to Oct. 29, making a period of 156 consecutive days without rain. At Jerusalem, none fell from May 26th to Oct. 20, making a period of 146 consecutive days without rain.

3. Hebrew terms.

1. גֶּשֶׁם, gėšem, a violent downpour, 1 K. 18 41 Ezek. 13 11; continuous, Ezra 10 9 13; such as the early or latter rain, Lev. 26 4 Jer. 5 24 Joel 2 23; accompanied with wind, 2 K. 3 17 Prov. 25 14.

2. מָטָר, māṭār, a more general term, e.g., 'the rain (מְ׳) of heaven,' Dt. 11 11. A torrential rain is 'a sweeping rain' (Prov. 28 3); or the two words גשם and מטר may be combined, Zech. 10 1 Job 37 6.

3. זֶרֶם, zérem, a rain-storm, Is. 25 4 28 2 32 2 Hab. 3 10 Job 24 8; sometimes accompanied by hail, Is. 28 2 30 30. The supposed occurrences of a verb denom. (Ps. 77 18 90 5, MT) are probably due to corruption.

4. and 5. יוֹרֶה, yōreh, and מוֹרֶה, mōreh, the former rain, and מַלְקוֹשׁ, malḳōš, the latter rain, see § 2.

6. רְבִיבִים, rĕbībīm, EV 'showers,' Jer. 3 3 14 22 Mi. 5 6 [7] Dt. 32 2 Ps. 65 11 [10] 72 6†.

7 רְסִיסִים, rĕsisim (from √רסס, 'sparsit, stillavit'), sprinkled moisture. In Cant. 5 2† (EV 'drops of the night') of the night-mist (see DEW), but probably applicable to rain in general (see רביבים). In Dt. 32 2 Lagarde and Grätz correct שְׂעִירִים into רסיסים. In Ps. 104 13 also מַרְסִיסֶיךָ should perhaps be read for מִפְּרִי מַעֲשֶׂיךָ. T. K. C.

RAKEM (רָקֶם), 1 Ch. 7 16 EV, pausal form for REKEM, 4.

RAKKATH (רַקַּת, 'bank,' an Aramaic word? δακεθ [B], ρεκκαθ [A], ρα. [L]), a 'fenced city' of Naphtali, mentioned between Hammath (S. of Tiberias) and Chinnereth (on the upper part of the E. side of the Sea of Galilee), Josh. 19 35. Two identifications of Rakkath are offered in the Babylonian Talmud in the same context (Meg. 5*b*, 6*a*). According to R. Johanan, Rakkath was the important city of Sepphoris. But the etymological midrash attached to this identification is such as entirely to discredit it. Raba, on the other hand, refers to a generally received opinion that Rakkath is Tiberias, and according to Neubauer (Géog. du Talm. 209) the use of the name Rakkath for Tiberias lasted into the fourth century A.D. Certainly the position of Rakkath in the list of cities at least permits this view. Only, (1) we must not suppose that Tiberias stood exactly on the site of the ancient Rakkath. For, as Josephus informs us (Ant. xviii. 2 3), the land upon which it was built had been occupied by tombs, which implies that the ancient town (however it was named) had lain at a short distance from the site of the new city. And (2) it is possible enough that רקת is a fragment of קרית (city of), and should be prefixed to כנרת (Chinnereth). T. K. C.

RAKKON (רַקּוֹן, not in 𝔊ᴮᴬ; 𝔊ᴸ ηρεκκων), Josh. 19 46 (probably a vox nihili). See ME-JARKON.

RAM (רָם; ραμ [BAL]). 1. The name of a Judahite family, whose eponym is variously described as the second son of Hezron the grandson of Judah (1 Ch. 2 9: ραμ and αραμ [BA], αραμ [L]; v. 10, αρραν [B, cp אֹרֶן v. 25], αραμ [AL]), and as the firstborn son of Jerahmeel the firstborn son of Hezron (v. 25, ραν [B]; v. 27, αραμ [B]). The same supposed person is also named in the (late) genealogy of David, as the son of Hezron, Ruth 4 19 (αρραν [BA], αραμ [L]), and consequently in Mt. 1 3 4 (ARAM [AV]; Ram [RV]; Αραμ [BN etc.]: see also ARNI, Lk. 3 33). Doubtless Ram is a shortened form of some well-known name, hardly Jehoram (Nöld.) or Abiram (Klost. Gesch. 112), but rather the name from which both these names probably sprang—Jerahmeel (Che.).

2. Name of the supposed family of the Elihu of Job (32 2; ραμ [BN]; ραμα [A]; αραμ [C]), certainly not a shortened form of the ethnic name Aram, unless there was a southern Aram.

RAM (אַיִל), Gen. 15 7, etc. See SHEEP.

RAM, BATTERING (כַּר), Ezek. 4 2 21 27 [22]. See SIEGE, § 2 f.

RAMA (ραμα [Ti.WH]), Mt. 2 18, RV RAMAH.

RAMAH (רָמָה, Jer. 31 15 Neh. 11 33, elsewhere הָרָמָה, 'the height'; usually ραμα [BAL]; gentilic, רָמָתִי, Ramathite; see SHIMEI, 9). 1. A city of the tribe of Benjamin, Josh. 18 25 Neh. 11 33 (BN*A om.), incidentally referred to in Judg. 19 13 (om. 𝔊ᴬ) Is. 10 29 Hos. 5 8 (ἐπὶ τῶν ὑψηλῶν [BAQ]), Ezra 2 26 (αραμ [B], τῆς ραμα [AL]), and stated in 1 K. 15 17 (ρααμα [B], ραμμαν [A], ραμα [L]) to have been fortified by Baasha king of Israel in order to isolate Jerusalem (cp ASA). Near it lay the grave of Rachel, according to Jer. 31 15 (τῇ ὑψηλῇ [N*A]), where the tribal ancestor is poetically represented as appearing on her grave, and uttering a lamentation for the exile of her children.[1] Near it was also, a later writer believed, the palm tree of the prophetess Deborah (Judg. 4 5, τῆς βαμα [B], ιαμα [A]). This Ramah is no doubt the mod. er-Rām, a village with ancient remains, 2600 ft. above the sea-level, 5 m. N. from Jerusalem. Its rediscovery is due to Robinson (BR 1 576).

2. The home of Samuel and his father Elkanah (1 S. 1 19 2 11 7 17 8 4 15 34 16 13 19 18 ff. 25 1 28 3), also called, or rather miscalled, in EV of 1 S. 1 1, RAMATHAIM-ZOPHIM [q.v.]. It was in the hill-country of Ephraim and more particularly in the land of ZUPH [q.v.]. According to Eus. and Jer. who call it αρμαθεμ σειφα Armathem Sophim (OS 225 12; 96 17) it was near Diospolis, and Jer. adds that it was 'in regione Thamnitica.' This addition agrees with what is said in 1 Macc. 11 34 of RAMATHEM [q.v.] as having originally been reckoned to Samaria, and suggests identifying Ramah with Beit-rima, a place mentioned in the Talmud (Neub. Géogr. 82), situated a little to the N. of Tibnah (Thamna). This is the view of Buhl, Pal. 170; Kittel, Hist. 2 107. It accords with the route of Saul described in 1 S. 9 1 ff.; cp Wellh. TBS 70. See also PEFMem. 3 12 149 ff. (On 𝔊's readings, see RAMATHAIM-ZOPHIM.)

3. 2 K. 8 29: ρεμμωθ [B], ραμωθ [A], ραμαθ γαλααδ [L]. See RAMOTH-GILEAD.

4. RAMAH [AV RAMATH] OF THE SOUTH; Josh. 19 8 (βαμεθ κατὰ λίβα [B], ραμμωθ [A?], ιαμεθ κατὰ λίβα [A?L]). See RAMATH OF THE SOUTH.

5. A 'fenced city' of Naphtali (Josh. 19 36; αραηλ [B], ραμα [AL]), the modern Rāmeh, 1295 ft. above sea-level, W. of Ṣafed, on the southern slope of the ridge (here rising to a height of 3480 ft.) which forms the boundary between Upper and Lower Galilee. Cp Guérin, Gal. 1 453 f.

6. A place mentioned in the delimitation of the territory of Asher, Josh. 19 29. According to Robinson beyond all doubt to be identified with the village of Rāmeh (PEF Survey:—Râmia), in the latitude of Rās en-Nāḳūra, situated 'upon an isolated hill, in the midst of a basin with green fields, surrounded by higher hills' (BR 4 63). Buhl (Pal. 231) accepts this identification, whilst admitting that the frequent occurrence of the name prevents a final decision. Apart from the name, indeed, one might prefer to locate Ramah a little way to the W., at or near the ruins of Belāt, on a hill which commands a grand prospect. The language of Josh. 19 28 f., however, does not seem to favour either view. The border of Asher is traced in v. 28 from Hammon (Ḥămūl) to Kanah (Ḳānā) and thence to Sidon; then in v. 29 we are told to turn back southward to Ramah, and draw a line thence to Tyre and to Hosah (near Rās el-'Ain); somewhere on the coast to the S. of Hosah (at the mouth of the river SHIHOR-LIBNATH) the border ends. Can the meaning be that the territory within the first of these lines belongs to Tyre and Sidon together, and that within both lines taken together (the second modifying the first) to Tyre, both territories being theoretically possessed by Asher? If so, Ramah would seem to be not very far from Tyre; indeed, this is the natural inference from the Hebrew of v. 29*a*. Its true site may perhaps be lost.

(Since this was written, an abundance of similarly perplexing phenomena have been noticed by the present writer, which can only be explained on the hypothesis that the original document referred to districts in the Negeb. Cp SHIHOR-LIBNATH; TYRE; ZEMARAIM, last par.) T. K. C.

RAMATH-MIZPEH (רָמַת הַמִּצְפֶּה; αραβωθ κατα την μασσηφα [B], ραμωθ κ. τ. μασφα [A], ραμεθ κ.τ.μ. [L]), a place on the northern border of the Gadites, Josh. 13 26†. Probably the same as MIZPEH (4), MIZPAH (2).

1 On the discrepant traditions respecting the site of Rachel's grave, and on Mt. 2 18, see EPHRATH, RACHEL.

RAMATH OF THE SOUTH (רָאמַת נֶגֶב; for 𝔊 see RAMAH, 4), and (in 1 S.) RAMOTH OF THE SOUTH (רָמוֹת נֶגֶב; ραμα [BL]-θ [A] νοτου, ραμα προς μεσημβριαν [Sym.]), apparently the most remote of the Simeonite towns (Josh. 19 8); mentioned also among the towns in the Negeb to which David sent presents from ZIKLAG (Ḥaluṣah), 1 S. 30 27. The full name was Baalath-beer-rama(o)th-negeb, i.e., 'Baalah of the well of Ramath (Ramoth) of the Negeb,' or 'Baalah of the well, Ramath of the Negeb' (see BAALATH-BEER). The name, however, needs correction by the help of v. 6 f. and Josh. 15 32. The lists of the Simeonite and Judahite towns are disfigured by errata, nor do they agree as they should. The opinion of the present writer is that the most remote of these towns was most probably called Baalath-beer-ramah (also Baalath-en-rimmon),—i.e., Baalah of the well (also, fountain) of Ramah or Rimmon,—and that both Ramah and RIMMON (q.v.) are popular corruptions of 'Jerahmeel.' Consequently in 1 S. 30 27 the second of the names in the list should be not Ramoth-negeb, but Jeraḥmeel-negeb. See EN-RIMMON, TAMAR, NEGEB.

In Josh. 15 32 Lebaoth (לְבָאוֹת) and in 19 6 Beth-lebaoth (בֵּית־ל׳) are miswritten for בַּעֲלַת. In 1 Ch. 4 33 'Baalath-beer' becomes shortened into 'Baal.' T. K. C.

RAMATHAIM-ZOPHIM (הָרָמָתַיִם צוֹפִים; αρμαθαιμ σ(ε)ιφα [BL]; αρ. σωφιμ [A]), the name of the city of Elkanah in the hill-country of Ephraim, 1 S. 1 1. The text, however, has Ha-ramathaim-ṣophim, the article being prefixed to ramathaim. The difficulties of this supposed compound form, and indeed of MT's reading, however viewed, are well set forth by Driver (TBS ad loc.), who, with Wellhausen and W. R. Smith, following 𝔊's σ(ε)ιφα, reads צופי 'a Zuphite,' which is explained by a reference to 1 Ch. 6 20 [35], Kr. as = 'a member of the clan called ZUPH' [q.v.]. Haramathaim is also plausibly explained by Wellhausen (TBS 34 f.) as the later form of the name Ha-ramah (see RAMATHEM), which was introduced into 1 S. 1 1 from a tendency to modernisation, and stands (αρμαθαιμ), in 𝔊, not only here, but also wherever הרמה has the ה of motion attached to it. With the form αρμαθαιμ we may rightly compare the αραμαθα or αρμαθα or ραμαθα of Josephus and the αριμαθαια of the NT.

The name Ha-ramah in the Hebrew text almost always occurs in the augmented form הָרָמָתָה. The exceptions are 1 S. 19 18-20 1 25 1 28 3. Here we constantly find בָּרָמָה except in 19 18 22, where הָרָמָתָה occurs. 𝔊^A accordingly represents the former word by ἐν ραμα, the latter by εἰς αρμαθαιμ—a new distinction suggested perhaps by the occurrence of ת in הרמתה, The same correction has penetrated once into 𝔊^BL, for in 19 22, where הרמתה and ברמה occur at different points, 𝔊^BL gives first εἰς αρμαθαιμ and then ἐν ραμα (cp v. 18 in Σ).

The objections to the above plausible explanation of Ramathaim-zophim are—(1) that Ha-ramathaim occurs nowhere else in the MT, (2) that the Chronicler is an insufficient authority for the existence of a clan called Zuph, (3) that 'land of Zuph' occurs in a passage (1 S. 9 5) which has all the appearance of corruptness (see ZUPH), and (4) that 1 S. 1 1 itself is obviously no longer in its original form.[1] The probability is that איש אחד (EV, 'a certain man') should be [איש ירח]מאלי, a Jerahmeelite,' and that מן הרמתים צופים מהר אפרים should be מן המטרי [ה]ירחמאלי ממצפה מהר אפ so that the whole sentence becomes (omitting the superfluous variant ירחמאלי at the beginning and certain variants at the end), 'And there was a Jerahmeelite of the family of the Matrites, whose name was Elkanah.' מטרי (Maṭri), however, like 'Tamar' and 'Ramath,' is only a corruption of ירחמאלי, 'Jerahmeelite,' and 'mount Ephraim' is in southern not in central Palestine (so Judg. 17 1 19 1, etc.). See Crit. Bib.

The ARIMATHÆA of the NT is identified by Eus. (OS 225, 12) with the city of Elkanah, and said to be situated near Diospolis (Lydda). This situation is beyond question suitable for the Ramathaim of 1 Macc. 11 34, and perhaps too for the Arimathæa of the NT. RAMATHEM, RV RAMATHAIM (ραθαμειν [A𝔖V]), the seat of one of the governments formerly belonging to Samaria which were transferred to Judæa under Jonathan by king Demetrius, 1 Macc. 11 34. On the name, see NAMES, § 107, and RAMATHAIM-ZOPHIM.

RAMESES (רַעְמְסֵס; ραμεσση [BAFL], ραμεση [L], Gen. 47 11; or Raamses, רַעַמְסֵס, Ex. 1 11, ραμεση [FL], 12 37 Nu. 33 3, ραμεσσων [B^aA], 5 ραμεσσης [B^ab]; also Judith 1 9 [RAMESSE, AV]; see also Redpath; RAMESSES). For kings Rameses I. and II. see also EGYPT, § 57 f.

In Ex. 1 11 Raamses is one of the cities built by the Israelites as Egyptian serfs; in 12 37 they march from Raamses (eastwards) to Succoth (cp also Nu. 33 3 5). In Gen. 47 11 the family of Jacob receive from Joseph 'a possession in the land of Egypt, in the best of the land, in the land of Rameses, as Pharaoh had commanded.' The land of Rameses is, according to vv. 4 6 etc., a part of Goshen, or, more probably, is synonymous with Goshen.

In 46 28 𝔊 has indeed for the Goshen of Heb. 'to Heroopolis (i.e., adding PITHOM, or ETHAM [q.v.]), into the land of Ramesse' (καθ' Ἡρώων πόλιν εἰς γῆν Ραμεσση). [For various views of this passage, with discussion, see JOSEPH (in OT), col. 2587, n. 4.]

1. The land and the town. It is usually assumed that the land has its name from the town, the administrative centre of that province. The present writer would, however, prefer to understand Rameses here as having preserved the original sense, namely, that of a royal name. Goshen, or at least its eastern part, still recalled by its name that the great Pharaoh Rameses II. had been its opener and coloniser (see GOSHEN). In the name of the town, on the other hand, the original sense, which must once have been 'house, place, city (or similarly) of Rameses,' seems to have been forgotten, owing to the popular abbreviation which omitted the first part. It is not necessary to derive the combination 'land of Rameses,' which looks very archaic, from that secondary use

The royal name which the Hebrew has preserved here was Ra'-m(e?)s-su,[1] or, following more the later pronunciation, Ra' (this can, of course, be written in many ways)-me(?)s-s(e),[2] 'the sun-god Rē' has borne him.' The classic transliterations are Ραμψης, Ραμεσσης (in varying the Manethonian fragments, etc.), Ramses. From these Greek forms the Massoretic scholars seem to have taken their vocalisation; whether the Hebrew consonants are intended to render the name as Ra'-mes-(ĕ)s, or in a seemingly more archaic form, Ra'-mesē-s (the verbal root was originally masy, tertiæ Jodh), can, therefore, not be decided from the biblical punctuation. In the rendering of the consonants, the preservation of the 'Ain deserves mention as a sign of antiquity.

2. Pharaoh Rameses. The Pharaoh meant is the famous Rameses II., called also Osymandyas (this is the official name; User-ma'(t)-rē') or Sesostris[3] by the Greeks, also Ram(p)ses (etc.), Meiamūn ('loving Amon'); see EGYPT, § 58. His reign of nearly sixty-seven years is less remarkable for his military achievements in Asia (which were very modest) than for his paramount activity as a builder. For his great work of irrigating and colonising the Wādy Ṭūmīlāt, see GOSHEN, § 4. This enterprise seems to have been completed before the twenty-first year of his reign. Gen. 47 might anticipate a later name for the region E. of Goshen proper. The building of the city of Rameses (as well as of Pithom), however points unmistakably to that earlier part of the reign of Rameses II.—i.e., to the end of the fourteenth century B.C.

[3] On the reason of the confusion of this name with a king of dyn. 12 in Manetho, different opinions prevail. A popular (but already contemporaneous) abbreviation of the name Rameses seems to be at the root of the Greek form.

It must be accidental that the expression 'land of Rameses' has not yet been read on the Egyptian monuments, although we find allusions to the merits of Rameses II. as a coloniser (which characteristically are wanting with other kings). A city, or rather cities, bearing the name of this king are, however, mentioned repeatedly.

3. The city Raamses.

In the twenty-first year (see above) of his reign, Rameses received ambassadors of the Hittite king bringing the treaty of peace and alliance 'in the city: house of Ra'-mes-su, Mey (or old Mer)-amūn, doing the commands of his father Amon, of Harmachis and Atum, the lord of Heliopolis, the Amon of Ra'-mes-su Mey-amūn, the Ptaḥ of Ra'-mes-su Mey-amūn, and Sēt.' This list gives to us the names of the official gods of the new city, confirming its position in eastern Goshen, where Atum of Heliopolis was the chief god. LD 3_{194} says: 'thou hast made for thyself a splendid residence to fortify the frontier of the country, The House of Ra'messu Meyamūn; . . . a royal palace is in it.' Pap. Anastasi 2_{1} 4_{6} gives a poetical description of a residence,[1] 'the castle: "Great of Victory (or Strength)" is its name, between Phœnicia (!) and Egypt.' The local gods are Amon, associated with Set, then Astarte and Buto. These gods and the name do not agree with our house of Rameses mentioned above; indeed, the city 'great of victori(es)' (mentioned also in the great text of Abydus, in Pap. Leyden, 1_{348}, and in the expedition of Sety I. against the Bedouins (?) does not seem to be identical (as is usually supposed), but must be a later foundation of Rameses, N. of Goshen. Anast. iii. 1_{12} f. 'the house of Ra'messu Meyamūn' appears as identical with the place 'Great of victori(es)' (3_{2} etc.). Its description seems to point to the country W. of Tanis, not very far from the sea. Thus a monument which has led Brugsch considerably astray becomes intelligible. In Tanis was found a statue of a priest who had among other titles that of a 'prophet of Amon of Rameses of (the city?) House of Rameses (and?) Amon (of the one) great of strength.'[2] Brugsch (Dict. Geogr. 418, etc.) concluded from it that Rameses and Tanis-Zoan were one and the same city, sought consequently for Goshen far in the N., and came thus to his strange Exodus-theory, considering the Sirbonian bog as the 'sea' through which the Israelites passed. The statue furnishes rather the confirmation that we have two different Rameses-cities. Consequently, we have to be very careful in distinguishing them; LD 3_{194} refers possibly to the later foundation,[3] as it dates from the year 34 of Rameses.

The biblical Rameses can, of course, be only a city in or near Goshen. That mentioned in the treaty with the Hittites seems to be identical, if we may judge by the local gods alluded to.

4. Situation.

Compare the granite group found at Tel(l) el-Maskhūṭa which represented Rameses II. between Atum and Harmachis, the principal gods of that district. From this group Lepsius concluded that Tel(l) el-Maskhūṭa was the biblical Rameses (see PITHOM), but on insufficient grounds. The excavations of Naville have shown that the names Pithom and Succoth are to be associated with that locality, but not Rameses. The latter city remains to be determined. In accordance with Ex. 12_{37} Nu. 33_{3} 5 it should be sought for in the western part of Goshen, E. of Pithom-Etham. There are not many points bearing traces of ancient cities in that region; Lepsius described the place (Tell) Abu-Soleimān (or Islēmān), as showing extensive ruins, and thought of Pithom. Naville (Pithom, (3) 36) disputes the existence of town-ruins at that spot. He marks Shugafieh (in which he believes he finds the Roman garrison place Thohu or Thou) and Tell Rotab as the only ruins, W. of Pithom-Tel(l) el-Maskhūṭa. Both localities exhibit extensive ruins of the Roman age, and seem to have been Roman military stations; it is not improbable that they were settled before that period. If so, we may expect the settlements to go back to the time of Rameses' colonisation; but nothing certain can be said until a thorough exploration of those ruins has been made.

For the various attempted identifications of Rameses, see Ebers, art. 'Ramses,' HWB(2), 1254*a*, and cp Durch Gosen zum Sinai,(2) 512 ff.; Naville, Land of Goshen (1887), 18, 20; Brugsch, Steinschrift und Bibelwort, 1891, p. 154. [The question of identification assumes a fresh aspect if we hold that primitive tradition represented the early home of the Israelites as, not in Mizraim, but in Mizrim. In this case we must suppose that here as elsewhere the geographical setting of the story has been transformed on the basis, probably, of corrupt texts. Possible corrections or restorations are indicated in col. 3211, n. 2.] W. M. M.

RAMOTH-GILEAD (רָמֹת גִּלְעָד, i.e., 'heights of Gilead'), otherwise RAMOTH IN GILEAD (רָאמֹת בַּגִּלְעָד, η ραμωθ εν (τη or γη) γαλ., Dt. 4_{43} [ραμμωθ A], Josh. 20_{8} [αρημωτθ B] 21_{38} 1 Ch. 6_{65} [80] [ραμμων B, ραμαθ L]), RAMOTH (1 K. 4_{13} [ερεμαθ B, -ερμαθ L]), but more correctly RAMAH (2 K. 8_{29} [ρεμμωθ B, ραμαθ L]) or Ramath-Gilead (cp AHAB), a fortress on the E. of Jordan, the administrative centre of one of Solomon's prefectures (1 K. 4_{13}), hotly disputed by the Israelites and the Aramæans in the reigns of Ahab, Ahaziah, and Joram (1 K. 22_{3} ff. [ρεμμαθ BA, ραμαθ L], 2 K. 8_{28} 9_{14} [ρεμμωθ B, ραμαθ L], 2 Ch. 18_{3} ff. [ραμμωθ A, ραμαθ L], 22_{5} f. [ραμα B, ρεμμωθ A, ραμαθ L]); also one of the so-called 'cities of refuge' (Dt. 4_{43} Josh. 20_{8} 21_{38}, where it is assigned to Gad).

1. OT References.

Largely on account of the striking narrative in 1 K. 22, the name of Ramoth-Gilead is extremely familiar to readers of OT, and yet, after all the researches of scholars, no one is able to tell exactly where the place was. It is the object of this article (1) to record the chief opinions which have been held as to the site of Ramoth-Gilead, and (2) to offer what, in the opinion of the present writer, looks like the true solution of the problem.

Let us begin with the Talmud, according to which Ramoth-Gilead lay over against Shechem (Neub. Géog. 55, 251), while, as Eusebius and Jerome tell us (OS 287_{91} 145_{31}), it was known to them as a village, 15 R.m. W. of Philadelphia (Rabbath-Ammon). These views are irreconcilable. Most scholars till lately preferred the authority of Eusebius, and identified Ramoth-Gilead with the modern es-Salṭ,[1] 10 m. S. of the Jabbok, and 11 E. of the Jordan. Cp GILEAD, § 7.

2. Sites (a)-(d).

The town acquired some importance during the Crusades,

[1] See Erman, Egypt, chap. 9, for a translation.

[2] This ('a-zr) seems to be synonymous with 'great of strength (or victory) or victories,' 'a-nḫt or 'a-nḫtw. If not, it might point to a temple (not a city) of Rameses II. Has a '(loving) Amon' been mutilated?

[3] There may be more Rameses-cities. It seems that a Nubian colony near Abusimbel was one. Cp (with considerable caution) the essay of Lepsius, ÄZ, 1883, p. 4 (on Pithom and Rameses).

[1] The name is a corruption of Salton Hieraticon, which occurs in the Notitt. Vet. Eccles. as the name of a trans-Jordanic episcopal city (Reland, Pal. 315); the epithet hieraticon may be explained by the πόλις φυλῆς γαδ ἱερατική of Eus. in the Onom.

when Saladin fortified it with other towns on the E. of the Jordan; it is now the capital of the Belḳā, but cannot claim to represent Ramoth-Gilead. The place could not be approached by chariots (see 1 K. 22 34 f.). It 'hangs on the steep sides of a narrow gorge, entirely shut in on the N., and opening out on a narrow flat of garden-land at the other end; and even this open extremity of the ravine is blocked by a high ridge at right angles to the town, closing up the only outlet.'[1] It is also far too southerly; a place easily accessible from Jezreel and not far from the Aramæan border is imperatively required.

Ewald (Gesch. 3 500 note) and Conder (Heth and Moab, 175; Smith's DB(2) 1 1191) do more justice to the biblical narratives by fixing the site of Ramoth-Gilead at Reimūn, a lofty and ancient site a few miles W. of Jerash (Gerasa), in the Jebel ʿAjlūn. The place was quite open to Aramæan incursions, and could be reached by chariots up the valley of the Jabbok. Sir G. Grove (Smith's DB(1) 2 1003) and Merrill (East of the Jordan, 284 ff.) urge the claims of Jerash itself; Oliphant too (Land of Gilead, 213) thinks Ramoth-Gilead must have been either at or near Jerash.[2] This view is supported by the Arabic Joshua (20 8 21 38 Rāmat al-Jaraš). G. A. Smith, however (HG 588) is not satisfied with any of these identifications, and thinks Ramoth-Gilead, being so hotly disputed by Aram and Israel, must have been farther N., near the N. limit of Gilead—the Yarmūk (so G. A. Cooke, l.c.). Irbid and Ramtheh [er-Remthè], he remarks, are both of them fairly strong sites. Er-Remthè has been very recently favoured by Smend (ZATW, 1902, p. 153), who finds in the name er-Remthè an echo of an Aramaic form רָמְתָא*. Buhl combines Ramoth-Gilead with the mod. Jalʿūd, N. of es-Salṭ (see GILEAD, 2), and whilst Smend identifies Ramoth-Gilead with Mizpeh-Gilead, Buhl inclines to distinguish between them.

To get beyond Prof. G. A. Smith's acute but vague conjecture, we must look at the Hebrew of 1 K. 4 13.

3. Site (e). Removing the accretions on the original text we find it stated that one of Solomon's prefects called Ben-geber (nothing depends on the correctness of this reading) was over the region of Argob, and resided in Ramoth-Gilead. Is the latter circumstance probable? Surely his residence must have been in Bashan, unless indeed we prefer to omit the statement about Argob and Bashan, and make Ben-geber the prefect of the so-called Havvoth-Jair, which Nu. 32 39-41 places in Gilead. Possibly for רמת גלעד, 'Ramath-Gilead,' we ought to read רָמַת צַלְחַד, 'the Ramah of Ṣalḥad.' Ṣalḥad is probably the true name of the fortified city on the extreme SE. of Bashan, which protected that fertile land from the invasions of the nomads; it is called in MT SALECAH [q.v.]. The objections raised to the other sites certainly do not apply to Ṣalḥad. For other supposed traces of the name see GILEAD, § 8, SUCCOTH, ZELOPHEHAD.

Ṣalḥad is situated on an eminence forming one of the southernmost heights of the Jebel Ḥaurān (see Driver, Dt. 53). That the district to the N. of Edrei (Derʿāt) and Ṣalḥad fell into the region of Argob, will hardly be doubted (cp Driver, in Hastings' DB 1 147). It was also probably Ṣalḥad (Ramath-Ṣalḥad) that Benhadad kept back, contrary to the agreement in 1 K. 20 34, and the Israelitish kings therefore sought to recover (1 K. 22 3, etc.). Holding it, the Aramæan kings had the fertile district of Argob at their mercy. The harmonising process of an editor corrected רמת צלחד, 'Ramath-Ṣalḥad,' wherever it occurred, into רמת גלעד, 'Ramoth-Gilead.'

It is probable that no better explanation can be found

4. Site (f). on the assumption that the current view respecting the Aramæans with whom the kings of Israel were so often at war, and respecting the region of the legendary Og, king of Bashan, is correct.

The assumption in question is at first sight a reasonably safe one, and it receives support from the legend of the meeting of Jacob and Laban, in the earlier form disclosed to us by textual criticism of Gen. 31 17-54. We may even go farther, and pronounce it not improbable that Ṣalḥad really was the place which the editor of the Book of Kings in its present form thought to be referred to in the account of the Aramæan wars. But it was not the place which was meant in the original narratives (see PROPHET, § 7). It was at Cusham, not at Damascus (as the traditional text represents) that Ben-hadad, or Bir-dadda, dwelt (1 K. 13 18; see TAB-RIMMON), and it was the great achievement of Jeroboam II. that he recovered Cusham and Maachath-jerahmeel for Israel. It must have been a fortress on the border of the Negeb, towards Arabia, that the Aramæans (= Jerahmeelites) and the Israelites so hotly contested. Ahab fell when endeavouring to regain it. Joram won it back for a time from the N. Arabian king Ḥazaʾilu (Hazael), and Jehu (himself of Jerahmeelite extraction[1]) was serving in the garrison when Elisha (a prophet of the Negeb; see PROPHET, § 7) sent to anoint him king. Both 'Ramah' and 'Gilead' are, when S. Palestine and the Negeb are concerned, corruptions of 'Jerahmeel,' but while 'Ramah' or 'Ramath' is a mere popular distortion, 'Gilead' seems to be a transcriptional corruption of that ethnic name. The place intended is probably the 'Tamar' (רמת = תמר) fortified by Solomon, according to 1 K. 9 18, cp 2 Ch. 8 4. Cp TAMAR, TADMOR. T. K. C.

RAPHAEL (רפאל, 'God heals'; the name, however, has possibly grown out of something very different; see REPHAEL [Che.]; ραφαηλ), one of the most sympathetic figures in Jewish narrative literature, is introduced to us in the Book of Tobit, where under the name of AZARIAS ('Yahwè is a help') he accompanies Tobias in his adventurous journey and conquers the demon ASMODÆUS [q.v.] (Tob. 3 17 8 2 9 1 11 2 7). He is, however, a disguised visitor from heaven, being really 'one of the seven[2] angels [archangels] who present the prayers of the saints and enter into the presence of the glory of the Holy One' (12 15). In the Book of Enoch (100 20) Rufael (= Rafael) is called 'the angel of the spirits of men'; it is his function to 'heal the earth which the angels have defiled,' as a preliminary to which he has to place AZAZEL (q.v.) in confinement. This view of the essential connection between a name and the person bearing it is thoroughly antique; it has strongly coloured the story of TOBIT (q.v.), and is endorsed in the Midrash (Bemidbar rabb., par. 2), according to which Raphael is to heal the iniquity of Ephraim (i.e., the ten tribes). The later Midrash also represents him as the angel commissioned to put down the evil spirits that vexed the sons of Noah with plagues and sicknesses after the flood, and as the instructor of men in the use of simples; he it was who was the promoter of the 'Book of Noah,' the earliest treatise on materia medica (Rönsch, Buch der Jubiläen, 385 sq.). See ANGELS, § 4, note.

From the context it obviously lay not very far from Carnaim (Ashteroth-Karnaim). It is no doubt the Raphana mentioned by Pliny (HN v. 18 74) as one of the cities of the Decapolis, and may possibly be identical with the Capitolias of Ptol. (v. 15 22), 16 m. from Edrei (Der'ăt). That ῥῶ(σ)σος, a mountain range and town S. from Amanus on the gulf of Issus, is intended is improbable; others prefer TARSUS [q.v.]. The mention of a town ill accords with the enumeration of such peoples as PUT and LUD, and the name is possibly a corruption of TIRAS. See ROSH.

RATHUMUS (ραθυμος [BL], ραθυος? [A*]), 1 Esd. 2 16 ff. = Ezra 4 8 f., REHUM, 5.

RAVEN (עֹרֵב, from ערב, 'to sink' [of the sun], 'be black'; κοραξ; corvus). It is noteworthy that the lilies and the ravens possess the same representative character in a famous saying of Jesus, at least according to the version in Lk. 12 24 (but in Mt. 6 26 τὰ πετεινά); in the OT too they are referred to in evidence of God's providential care (Job 38 41 Ps. 147 9). In Cant. 5 11 their glossy black plumage (cp deriv. above) is referred to. In Prov. 30 17 Is. 34 11 Zeph. 2 14 [1] (crit. emend. with 𝔊BℵC.aAQΓ), other habits of the raven are mentioned, and in Gen. 8 7 the raven is stated to have been the first bird let out of Noah's ark.[2]

1. OT References.

[The feeding of Elijah by the ravens (1 K. 17 4 6) has been regarded as a supernatural feature appropriate to the circumstances of the prophet, but if, as Cheyne suggests, Elijah's hiding-place was at Rehoboth in the extreme S. of Palestine, a reference to 'Arabians' would gain considerably in plausibility, nor can it be a loss to edification that human instruments should take the place of 'unclean' birds like the ravens (see MIZRAIM, § 2 [b]). An analogy for the emendation referred to is offered by Jer. 3 2 in 𝔊 Pesh., which give 'like a crow' (עֹרֵב, κορώνη, na'bā) for 'like an Arabian' (עֲרָבִי). This is an error, but in Bar. 6 54 the crow is no doubt mentioned. The gods of the Babylonians are there likened to the crows (κορῶναι) that fly between heaven and earth.]

It is probable that the Heb. 'ōrēbh included all the members of the family Corvidæ—i.e., the crows, choughs, rooks, jays, and jackdaws, as well as the true raven. Tristram enumerates eight species of Corvidæ at present found in Palestine; among which the C. umbrinus or brown-necked raven may be specially mentioned, as it is almost ubiquitous. They feed to some extent on carrion, but will also attack animals of some size, though usually only when these are weakly or injured.

2. Species.

[1] A comparison of Zeph. l.c. with Is. 34 11 shows that חֹרֶב in the famous passage should be עֹרֵב.

[2] In the cuneiform account the raven is the last; see DELUGE, §§ 2, 17, and cp Jastrow, Rel. Bab. and Ass. 503.

The raven has always been regarded as a bird of omen, and excited superstitious awe which is not even yet entirely extinct. To the ancients it was one of that class of living creatures which were at once venerated and shunned.[1] It is not surprising, therefore, to find the raven in the list of (so-called) 'unclean' birds (Dt. 14 14; cp CLEAN, § 9). Besides the Midianite chieftain's name OREB, the Ar. clan-name Ġorāb indicates that the bird did not always possess an ill-omened character; and it is a significant fact that Ġorāb was one of the names of heathenism which Mohammad made its bearer change.[2]

3. Character.

A. E. S.—S. A. C.

RAZIS (ραζ[ε]ις [AV*vid.] razias [Vg.]), 'an elder of Jerusalem,' 'called Father of the Jews for his good-will toward them.' His story is told in 2 Macc. 14 37 ff. The name is possibly from an original רָזֶה = רָזִי, 'to be lean.' The Syr., however, gives his name as r-g-sh.

RAZOR (תַּעַר, etc.), Nu. 6 5, etc. See BEARD.

REAIAH (רְאָיָה, 'Yahwè has seen'; but cp JORAH).

1. A Calebite, son of SHOBAL; 1 Ch. 4 2 (ραδα [B], ρεια [A], ρεαα [L]). Reaiah ought also, perhaps, to be read for HAROEH (q.v.) in 1 Ch. 2 52, but both forms may be corruptions.

2. A Reubenite; 1 Ch. 5 5 (AV REAIA; ρηχα [BA], ραια [L]).

3. The family name of a company of (post-exilic) Nethinim: Ezra 2 47 (ρεηλ [B], ραια [A], αρ. [L]); Neh. 7 50 (ραεα [Bℵ], ρααια [AL]) = 1 Esd. 5 31 (ιαειρος [B], ιαιρος [A], ραια [L]; AIRUS [AV], JAIRUS [RV]).

REBA (רֶבַע, probably by transposition from עֲרָב, 'Arabia,' cp REKEM [Che.]; ροβοκ, -βε [B], ροβοκ, ρεβεκ [A], ροβεκ, -ε [L]), one of the five chiefs of Midian, slain after the 'matter of Peor'; Nu. 31 8 Josh. 13 21.

REBEKAH or [NT] REBECCA (רִבְקָה; ρεβεκκα [ℵADEL]; Rebecca; on the name, see below, § 2), sister of Laban, and therefore daughter of Nahor, according to J (see Di. on Gen. 24 15), but daughter of Bethuel, according to P (see Gen. 25 20). For the idyllic story of her betrothal and marriage, which is not only beautiful in itself, but a valuable record of Israelitish sentiment in the time of the writer or writers, it is enough to send the reader to the original narrative. Gunkel, it may be observed, thinks he can trace a double thread (J*a* and J*b*) in this narrative. It is certainly possible that more than one hand has been concerned in the story; at the same time the narrative would hardly gain by being reduced to the limits of the assumed J*a*. Another critic (Steuernagel, Einwanderung, 39) draws a weighty critical inference from the parallelism between Gen. 24 and 29. Independently, a larger inference of the same kind is drawn in § 2 of the present article.

1. Traditions.

It has been thought that there is a discrepancy between J and P as regards the original home of Rebekah. J brings her from Aram-naharaim, from the city of Nahor (24 10); P from Paddan-aram (25 20 f.; cp 28 2 f.). The discrepancy, however, did not always exist. 1. It is possible to hold that both in J and in P Rebekah had a traditional connection with the northern Jerahmeelites of Ḥaurān (for ארם most probably has been worn down from ירחמאל, and נחור may have come from

[1] Having been originally worshipped, they were honoured, and their presence was considered lucky; but their specific 'holy' character made them 'taboo,' and as such they were to be avoided. For this paradoxical conception, see CLEAN, § 7.

[2] See WRS, Kin. 200, 301, We. Heid.(2) 203. The raven was intimately associated with Apollo and Æsculapius; see Frazer, Paus. 3 72 f. Coronis is said to have been transformed into a raven. In Rome, a flight of ravens on the left hand was considered lucky, on the right hand unlucky. In northern Europe one is reminded of the ravens of Odin, and those of Flokki, by whose aid he discovered Iceland. Similarly the Vikings are said to have carried ravens in their ships to be able to find the bearing of the nearest land (cp CASTOR, and for the painting or carving of a totem on a boat, Frazer, Totemism. 30 f.).

חור, while פרן may be miswritten for חרן—i.e., חורן). See LABAN, NAHOR, PADDAN-ARAM. 2. It is also plausible to hold the view set forth in JACOB, § 3, where it is shown that there was possibly a still earlier tradition which put Laban's home at Hebron. At any rate, both narrators have distinguished themselves in the delineation of Rebekah's character, which has some strong points of affinity to that of her son Jacob. She was accompanied, according to MT, to Isaac's home at Beer-lahai-roi (i.e., Beer-jerahmeel) by her nurse (24 59), who, from the corrupt text of 35 8, is supposed to have been named Deborah (see DINAH, col. 1102, n. 1). Probably, however, the 'nurse' is not referred to, but the 'precious possessions' (מִגְדָּנֹת, cp v. 53) of the newly won bride. In the view of the present writer Laban was originally a southern Jerahmeelite, originally, it may be, placed in the Negeb, so that he may also have been called TUBAL (q.v.)—a name which seems to underlie בתואל (Bethuel!). See, further, RACHEL, § 2. Possibly, Rebekah is a personification alternately of the southern and of the northern Jerahmeelites. She has been, one may almost say, created as a true woman, with beating heart and planning brain, by J and E.

The explanation רִבְקָה, 'cord' (§ 71) is linguistically attractive; cp מַרְבֵּק, and the ποιμένιος θυγάτηρ of one of the Onomastica (OS 204 29). But we cannot get to the bottom of such names without considering the tribal relations of the patriarchs; wives and husbands alike are tribal personifications. It is probable that Abraham, Rebekah, and Leah-Rachel represent a tribal name. Abraham (from Ab-raham) means probably 'father of Jerahmeel'; Leah and Rachel (doubles), come from worn-down forms of Jerahmeel. Rebekah, or rather Ribkah, probably also comes from the latter name; רבק=רקב=רחם, cp, perhaps, the clan-names or tribe-names Becher, Heber, and the local name Hebron.[1] Observe that Rebekah's father Bethuel (perhaps = TUBAL [q.v.]) is the son of Nahor—i.e., the southern Haran, by Milcah [Jerahmeel]. The same ethnographic traditions are repeated over and over again genealogically.

1. One of the murderers of Ishbosheth (2 S. 4 2 ff.: ρεκχα [B, in vv. 5 f. 9]). His father was RIMMON (q.v.).

2. The eponym of the RECHABITES (2 K. 10 15 Jer. 35 6 ff.). A 'son of Rechab' is a 'Rechabite'; so even in Neh. 3 14 (see MALCHIJAH, 7).

RECHABITES [HOUSE OF THE] (בֵּית הָרֵכָבִים; οικος αρχαβειν [Bℵ], αλχαβειν or χαραβειν [A], ραχαβ[ε]ιν [Q], ρηχαβιται [Sym.]). The Rechabites have usually been considered to be a sort of religious order, analogous to the NAZIRITES [q.v.], tracing its origin to the Jehonadab or JONADAB, son of Rechab, who lent his countenance to Jehu in the violent abolition of Baal-worship. In Jer. 35 we meet with the Rechabites as continuing to observe the rule of life ordained by Jonadab their 'father,' abstaining from wine and dwelling in tents in the land of Judah till the Babylonian invasion forced them to take refuge in Jerusalem (JEREMIAH ii., § 17). According to Ewald (GVI 3 543), Schrader (BL 5 46), and Smend (Rel.-gesch.(2) 93 f.) they were an Israelitish sect which represented the reaction against Canaanitish civilisation, and took the Kenites—the old allies of Israel—as a model. In 1 Ch. 2 55*b*, however, the 'house of Rechab' is represented as belonging to the Kenites, and in 1 Ch. 4 12 (𝔊[BL]) the ἄνδρες ρηχαβ (MT אנשי רכה, 𝔊[A] ἄ. ρηφα, RV 'the men of Recah') including TEHINNAH (perhaps Kinah = Kenite) appear among the descendants of Chelub[1] (= Caleb). We have no right to set this statement aside on the ground of the late date of the Chronicler. It is perfectly credible that the Kenites who dwelt in tents among the Israelites long continued to feel themselves the special guardians of the pure religion of Yahwè, and were honoured as such by Jeremiah. Budde assumes that in the time of Jehu a Rechabite named Jonadab formally reimposed the old obligations on his fellow-clansmen, at the same time perhaps offering the privileges of fellowship to those from outside who accepted the Rechabite rule of life, and thus converting it to some extent into a religious order.[2] This is a plausible hypothesis, and rests upon the assumption that the Jonadab spoken of in Jer. 35 6-10 14 16 18 is the Jonadab who had a connection with Jehu. It is possible, however, that the true name of the reputed father of the Kenites was not Hobab but Jonadab (see HOBAB). This hypothesis is, at any rate, simpler than the other for the Rechabite laws are those characteristic of nomad races—e.g., the Nabatæans (Diod. Sic. 19 94)—and we cannot help expecting the legislator of the Kenites to stand, like Moses, at the head of the history of his people.

The notice in 1 Ch. 2 55*b* is therefore most probably to be accepted, except in so far as the corrupt name 'Hammath'[3] there given to the 'father' of the Rechabites is concerned. Rechabites and Kenites are synonymous terms. No doubt this second name 'Rechabites' is puzzling; nor is it easy to believe that Yahwè, the God of the Kenites, had Recab-el (charioteer-god) as a title. It is a question, therefore, whether the readings רכבים 'Rechabites,' and בֵּית רֵכָב 'house of Rechab,' ought not to be emended in accordance with many analogies elsewhere, unless indeed we assume that the popular speech, which uses transposition freely, fluctuated. In Judg. 4 11 we meet with 'Heber the Kenite,' and in v. 17 with 'the house of Heber the Kenite.' It is highly probable that רכב, רכבים should be either חבר, or רחב, רחבים. In the former case, Jonadab comes before us anew as 'a son of Heber,' and the Rechabites become 'Heberites.' In the latter 'Rechab' gives place to 'Rehob' (= REHOBOTH) and 'Rechabites' to 'Rehobites' (= Rehobothites). Perhaps the former view is preferable. We can now see the full force of Judg. 4 11, 'Now Heber the Kenite (the eponym of the "Heberites," miscalled "Rechabites") had severed himself from Kain, even from the b'ne Hobab (Jonadab?). The Heberites (Rechabites) of Israel are a branch of the Heberites (Rechabites) of N. Arabia, equally with whom they honoured Jonadab as their ancestor and legislator.

Possibly בני חבב in Judg. 4 11 (cp Nu. 10 29) should rather be בְּנֵי חֶבֶר—i.e., the Heberites. Whether 'Heber' (cp חבר כהנים, Hos. 6 9) had originally a religious sense, and marked out the Kenites as a priestly tribe (cp Jer. 35 19, and see MOSES, § 17), or whether it is connected with the mysterious Habiri of the Amarna Tablets (see HEBREW LANGUAGE, and cp HEBER) is of course uncertain. Another form which the second name of the Kenites has assumed by corruption is almost certainly the RAHAB [q.v.] of legend. Very possibly, too, the Danite place-name BENE-BERAK should be Bene-rechab—i.e., Bene-heber; indeed the famous Barak (Judg. 4 5) was perhaps really a Heberite (= Heber the Kenite). See KENITES.

Later Jewish tradition said that the Rechabites intermarried with the Levites and so entered the temple service. Hegesippus, in his account of the death of James the Just, even speaks of Rechabite priests, and makes one of them protest

It is noteworthy, as regards the use of the idiom, that ἱλάσκεσθαι is employed alternately with καθαρισμὸν ποιεῖσθαι in 𝔊 to represent the conception of atonement. The latter phrase regards the act with reference to its effect upon men, the former with reference to its significance in relation to God.

RVmg. always has 'chronicler'; AVmg., often, 'remembrancer' or 'writer of chronicles.' The sense in which the word was taken by 𝔊 and Vg. is obvious. The Hebrew title might suggest that of the 'magister memoriæ' at the Roman Imperial court (Smith, Dict. Gr. and Rom. Ant., s.v. 'Magister'), or that of the king's remembrancer, whose duty formerly was to remind the judges of the Exchequer Court 'of such things as are to be called and attended to for the benefit of the crown' (Bouvier, Law Dict., s.v.). But the office of the mazkīr was almost certainly much more responsible than either of these. It might perhaps more aptly be compared to that of one of the chief advisers of the crown or of the 'keeper of the king's conscience.' See GOVERNMENT, § 21; cp HISTORICAL LITERATURE, § 5.

RED SEA. At Rās Moḥammad the Red Sea, 'one of the most remarkable oceanic gulfs on the globe,' is divided by the peninsula of Sinai into two gulfs, the western or Gulf of Suez, now about 130 geographical m. in length, with an average width of about 18, and the eastern or Gulf of 'Aḳabah, about 90 m. long, and of proportionate narrowness. On the question as to the extent of the Red Sea in early historic times, see EXODUS i., § 15.

Whether by the statement in Ex. 10 19 that the W. wind 'took up the locusts and drove them into the "Red Sea" (יָמָּה־סּוּף, εἰς τὴν ἐρυθρὰν θάλασσαν), the whole of what is known to geography as the Red Sea is meant, or only the Heroopolitan gulf (Gulf of Suez), cannot be decided from this passage alone. It is evident that the western gulf is meant in 13 18 (the way of the wilderness of the Red Sea—which the Israelites followed leaving Egypt). In 15 4, Pharaoh's captains are drowned in the Red Sea (parallel: 'sea,' the expression generally used in the chapters on the passage through 'the sea'), in v. 22 the Israelites leave the Red Sea. Similarly Nu. 14 25 33 10 f. Dt. 1 1 (after 𝔊, correctly EV) 40 11 4 Josh. 2 10 4 23 24 6 Judg. 11 16, etc., mean the Arabian gulf of the ancients, the modern Gulf of Suez. The eastern gulf, the sinus Ælaniticus or Gulf of 'Aḳabah, seems to be meant in Ex. 23 31 (?) (frontier of Israel) Nu. 21 4 (S. of the territory of Edom) Dt. 2 1 (to the S. of Mt. Seir) 1 K. 9 26 (ships built at Ezion-geber, on the Red Sea) Jer. 49 21 (adjoining the Edomites). Consequently, the name seems to apply to the Red Sea in general.

1. ἐρυθρὰ θάλασσα. The rendering of the English version goes back through the Vulgate to the Ἐρυθρὰ θάλασσα of 𝔊BAL (where only Judg. 11 16 has θάλασσα Σιφ). The expression is common to classical (Æschylus, Pindar, Herodotus) and biblical Greek (1 Macc. 4 9 Wisd. 10 18 19 7 Acts 7 36 Heb. 11 29). The original meaning of the name was a subject of discussion with the Greeks. They thought of a source with reddish water, or of the alleged reddish colour of the sea itself, or of that of the mountains surrounding it; or they invented a king Erythras.[1] Egyptologists have compared the name došret, 'red land,' given by the ancient Egyptians to the desert in contrast to the kēmet, 'black land'—i.e., cultivable ground or Egypt proper (see EGYPT, § 1); also the Edomites as alleged 'red men,' or the 'apury around Goshen (§ 61).[2] Unfortunately, none of these names is ever found connected with the Red Sea; on the Egyptian name 'water' (or sea) 'of the circle' (or circuit?) and the hypothetical explanation of this expression, cp WMM As. u. Eur. 254. Thus the origin of the Greek name is certainly to be sought for not in Egypt, but among the Semites. Some misunderstanding of a Palestinian or Syriac expression by the Greeks is quite likely. It must be recalled, in passing, that the Greeks used the name in a much wider sense than we do, extending it over the whole sea between Africa and India (cp Herod. 2 11, etc.).[3]

2. Yam sūph. The Hebrew name yam sūph, יַם־סוּף—i.e., sea of the water-plant sūph—is also mysterious. The sūph (see FLAG, 1) belongs specially to Egypt (cp Ex. 2 3 5 Is. 19 6) and the Nile; only in Jon. 2 6 is it used of seaweeds, probably by poetic license. The word seems to be identical with the Coptic ϫοογϥ, papyrus, which is not found in the earlier language but appears as ṭu-fī in texts of the nineteenth dynasty.[1] Whether it be a foreign or a vernacular word cannot be determined; consequently it must remain an open question whether it was borrowed from Egyptian by the Palestinians or vice versâ. It is remarkable that the Coptic version, which otherwise strictly follows 𝔊, in Exodus renders 'Sea of šari' which seems to be sari, σαρι—according to Theophrastus, Pliny, and Hesychius, the name of an Egyptian water-plant (see Peyron, Lex. Copt. 304, who, however, prefers an impossible etymology).[2] It would therefore seem that the Coptic translator here consulted the Hebrew, rendering 'sea of papyrus-plants' (Luther renders Schilfmeer). These aquatic plants, of course, never grew in the salt water of the Red Sea; modern travellers have found, not without difficulty, some clumps of reeds on spots not far from Suez where fresh water mixes with the Red Sea (see Knobel-Dillmann, on Ex. 13 18); but the derivation of the name from these would be more than improbable. Others have thought (after Jon. 2 16) of seaweeds which are said to be plentiful in some parts of the Red Sea; but the common, early use of the word sûph is against this. We can understand how Brugsch (l'Exode, 11, etc.) was led by these freshwater plants to assume the swamps of NE. Egypt as the locality of the Exodus; he quite forgot, however, that the name yam sûph applies also to the Ælanitic gulf.[3] The freshwater Timsāḥ-lake with its large marshes full of reeds, exactly at the entrance of Goshen, would fulfil all conditions for the Exodus and for the Hebrew name (see EXODUS i., § 16). The word 'sea' is used of lakes in most oriental languages, especially in Hebrew (cp Nu. 34 11, 'Sea of Chinnereth,' etc.). Still, it would be very strange if the Crocodile Lake, or other swamps on the frontier of NE. Egypt, should have furnished a name to the whole Red Sea, including the Ælanitic gulf which was nearer to most Palestinians than the Egyptian lakes. On the connection between the present bitter lakes and the Gulf of Suez, which most scholars assume for biblical times, see EXODUS i., § 15. In the opinion of the present writer this theory must be rejected, and thus the Hebrew name remains obscure.

[1] See Wiedemann's Commentary on Herod. 2 11 (who quotes Strabo, 16 779, Mela, 3 8, Nearchus, 30, Eust. Dion. Perieg. 36) The statement that the expression is found in an Egyptian inscription is incorrect.

[3] The Persian gulf also thus belonged to it. The tradition that the Phœnicians came originally from the Red Sea—i.e., Lower Babylonia—has been strangely misunderstood by scholars.

W. M. M.

With wonted precision and discriminating use of authorities BDB's Lexicon (s.v. סוּף) gives the following, on which it is not superfluous to comment, because it is one of the objects of the present work to intermix the old and the new, and by a junction of the forces of all critical students, to make definite advances wherever this is possible.

3. Is the solution hopeless?

'יַם־סוּף probably = sea of rushes or reeds (less probably sea of [city] Suph), which Greek includes in wider name θαλ. ἐρυθρά, Red Sea (cp Di. Ex. 13 18 and especially WMM As. u. Eur. 42 f., who explains as name originally given to upper end of Gulf of Suez, extending into Bitter Lakes, shallow and marshy, whence reeds [probably also reddish colour]); name applied only to arms of Red Sea,' most often to Gulf of Suez, sometimes to Gulf of 'Aḳaba. It is noted also that מִיַּם־סוּף should possibly be read for מול ס׳ in Dt. 1 1. BDB also points out (s.v. יָם) that in Ex. 14 2 (bis) 9 Is. 51 10 (bis) 63 11, etc. הַיָּם, and in Is. 11 15 probably יַם־מִצְרַיִם = the 'Red Sea.' In the latter statement, however, 'probably' seems to be an exaggeration. 'The tongue (bay?) of the sea of Egypt' is a strange circumlocution for יַם־סוּף; indeed, to render מצרים, 'Egypt' in vv. 11 15 is only plausible if אשור may be rendered 'Syria' (cp Stade, ZATW 2 291). That there are errors in the text of 11 11-16, is certain; that לשון is sometimes a corruption of ישמעאל (cp Ps.(2) on Ps. 120 3), may also be assumed; that אשור sometimes stands for אשחור (Ashḥur), a synonym of ירחמאל (Jerahmeel), is also difficult to gainsay. Methodical criticism, therefore justifies us in reading, והחרים י׳ יִשְׁמְעֵאלִים [מִצְרִים], 'And Yahwè shall place a ban upon the Ishmaelites' (cp v. 14); מצרים is an archaising gloss. Even alone, this would suggest the view that יַם־סוּף may be an early textual corruption, nor could it be said that 'Sea of Sûph' was improbable, except on the ground that the correctness of the supposed place-name 'Sûph' in Dt. 1 1 was open to question. But when we have recognised that ספרת, Neh. 7 57, is a corruption of צָרְפַת—i.e., Zarephath in the Negeb (see SOPHERETH)—it at once becomes a plausible view that ספר or סוּף in the MT are sometimes corrupt abbreviations of the same place-name Zarephath (Ṣarephath). Just as the 'Dead Sea' was called ים המלח, a popular corruption (as many text-critical considerations suggest) of ים ירחמאל, so יַם־סוּף, as a name for the Gulf of 'Aḳabah, may be a corrupt abbreviation of יַם־צָרְפַת, where צ׳ is to be taken as a race-name = the Zarephathites (see ZAREPHATH). A similar explanation may be given of SUPH and SUPHAH. Prof. Sayce (Crit. Mon. 255 ff.) is of opinion that Yam Sûph, wherever the phrase occurs, means the Gulf of 'Aḳabah. This, however, involves the further statement that the identification of the sea crossed by the Israelites with the Yam Sûph (Ex. 15 4 22) is incorrect. This is surely too bold. In Ex. 15 4 22, as elsewhere, the best course is to read ים צרפת (cp MOSES, § 12), unless, indeed, we prefer to read יַם׳ צרפת. All difficulties are obviated, if we adopt the view of the primitive tradition respecting Israel advocated in col. 3208 ff., and suppose that the place of sojourn of the primitive Israelites was in the land of Mizrim, adjoining the land of Jerahmeel, on the border of the Negeb (see NEGEB). It is possible that the legend spoke of a great deliverance of the Israelites in ימן צרפת, where ימן (sometimes corrupted into יָוָן, 'Javan') represents ירחמאל (Jerahmeel). Quite early, the mark of abbreviation in ים׳ may have been lost, and צ׳ have become corrupted into סופר and סוּף. Then, floating mythic stories may have led to an alteration of the old legend. One such possible story is referred to elsewhere (MOSES, § 10). Another may now be added. We know that מצרים (Mizrim? or Mizraim?) was regarded as the antitype of the primitive תַּנִּין or 'dragon' (see DRAGON, § 4). There was also, in the Creation-story, a statement of the production of the dry land by the withdrawal of the water from a part of the ocean's bed (Gen. 1 9). This may very well have been regarded as a type of the deliverance of the Israelites, the story of which (so soon as textual corruption made this possible) was adjusted so as to fit this intuition. On Jon. 2 6 ('sûph, was bound about my head'), see Crit. Bib. On the whole, the closing sentence of § 2 seems to the present writer to be perfectly correct; but a special biblical scholar ought hardly to rest without trying some fresh avenue to the truth. REED. 1. קָנֶה, ḳāneh, 1 K. 14 15 κάλαμος (2 K. 18 21 Is. 36 6, etc., Mt. 11 7 12 20, etc.), is a word which is common to Heb., Syr., Arab., and Ass., and has passed into Gr. and Lat. as κάννα—canna, and into Eng. as 'cane.' The name is probably of Semitic origin (Lag. Uebers. 50; Barth, Nominalb. § 9 c); but the nature of its connection with the root קנה is obscure.[1] Besides the general meaning 'stalk' (Gen. 41 5 22) or 'shaft' (Ex. 37 17, etc.),[2] קָנֶה is used more specifically of (a) reedgrass, (b) sweet or aromatic cane(?).

[1] See WMM As. u. Eur. 101. Sêbe(t), 'reed,' which was formerly compared with סוּף, is different.

[2] Ebers, Durch Gosen, 519, makes it probable that this word is s'r in hieroglyphics. This, however, could not well be identical with the above Coptic word.

[3] The Sirbonian bog would, however, justify the name as little as the Gulf of Suez.

(a) Reedgrass is frequently mentioned, though there is little to help in determining the particular species intended. It was distinct from sûph (see FLAG) and gōme' (see RUSH), but like these grew by the banks of rivers (e.g., the Nile, Is. 19 6) and pools (Is. 35 7). It appears to have been somewhat tall (Job 40 21) and thick (to justify the metaphor in Job 31 22; EV 'bone,' AV^mg. 'chanel-bone'); and the jointed nature of the stalk appears to be indicated in the repeated references to the broken or bruised reed (2 K. 18 21, etc.).[3] Perhaps the most probable identification is with the tall Arundo Donax, L., which grows abundantly in S. Europe: though other species may have been included under the name.[4] In Ps. 68 [30] 31 חַיַּת קָנֶה certainly cannot be rendered 'the company of spearmen' (as AV); such a phrase can only be rendered 'the wild beast of the reeds' (cp AV^mg., 'the beasts of the reeds'). The animal intended may be the crocodile

[1] The קין (lance) of 2 S. 21 16, may be a kindred word, though the correctness of the text is very questionable.

[2] So of the beam of a balance (Is. 46 6), and of a measuring reed or rod (Ezek. 40 3, etc.), on which last see WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 1.

[3] With these references cp the Talmudic phrase 'push with a reed'—of a feeble arguer (Löw, 344).

[4] The evidence of the Syriac lexicographers is somewhat in favour of Arundo Phragmites, L. (Löw, 341).

(cp Ps. 74 14, etc.), or the hippopotamus (cp Job 40 21). A symbol of Egyptian power seems to be required, and this the hippopotamus nowhere is. See CROCODILE.

[It is not surprising, considering the obscurity of the context, that opinion should not be quite unanimous. Duhm thinks that the swine is meant (cp 80 13 [14]), as the symbol of a Syrian population. Cheyne (Ps.(2)) reads חַיּת קַרְנֵי הַשֵּׁן, 'the wild beasts of pointed horns.'

(b) By the ḳāneh of Cant. 4 14 Is. 43 24 Ezek. 27 19, the קְנֵה הַטּוֹב of Jer. 6 20, and the קְנֵה בֹשֶׂם of Ex. 30 23 is meant some aromatic product. It formed an ingredient in the holy anointing oil, the others being myrrh, cinnamon, cassia, and olive oil. It came to the Jews 'from a far country' (Jer. 6 20, cp Ezek. 27 19), and was costly (Is. 43 24). The more general use of ḳāneh in other passages suggests that this 'fragrant cane' was an aromatic reed or flag, such as Axorus Calamus, L.: others, however, prefer to identify the substance as cassia bark, which is yielded by 'various species of cinnamomum occurring in the warm countries of Asia from India eastward' (Flück. and Hanb.(2) 527).

2. עָרוֹת, 'ārōth (ἄχι; Is. 19 7†), which is in AV rendered 'paper reeds,' means properly 'bare places,' and (if not corrupt, see Che. SBOT, and Marti, ad loc.) refers to the uncultivated and treeless meadows along the banks of the Nile.

3. אֲגַמִּים, 'ăgammīm, which generally means pools or marshes, is in Jer. 51 32 (but 𝔊 has συστέματα [BℵA] or συστήματα [B^(a?b)Q] though Aq., Sym. translate ἕλη) applied to the clumps or beds of reeds (such as grow on marshy spots), which are said to be 'burned with fire' (Grätz, however, would read אַרְמֹנִים, 'castles'). Cp POOL, 1.

4. אָחוּ, 'āḥū, is twice in RV text (Gen. 41 2 18) and once in RV^(mg.) (Job 8 11) rendered 'reed-grass': on this see FLAG.

5. אֵבֶה, 'ēbeh, in Job 9 26† (ἴχνος ὁδοῦ?) is rightly rendered 'reed' in RV^(mg.). Cp Ass. abu or apu. The allusion is to the light canoes or skiffs of reed anciently, and still, in use on the Nile; cp Is. 18 2 ('vessels of papyrus') and SBOT ad loc.

[It is not strange that this rendering should be a distinctly modern one. The explanation of ēbeh as 'reed' only goes back to Hiller (Hierophyticon, 1725) and Schultens (1737). Vg. (following Tg.) gives poma portantes (cp אֵב); Symm. σπεύδουσαι (AV^(mg.) 'ships of desire'); Pesh. and over 40 MSS read אֵיבָה, '(ships of) hostility'; and lastly Olshausen reads אֶבְרָה, '(ships of) wings.' See OSPREY, ad fin., for a new emendation.]

REEDS, WILD BEAST OF THE. See above 1 (a).

REELAIAH or rather, Reeliah (רְעֵלָיָה; ρεελειa [B], ρεελιac [AL]), Ezra 2 2 = Neh. 7 7, RAAMIAH = 1 Esd. 5 8 where it is corruptly REESAIAS [AV], RESAIAS [RV], (ρησαιου [BA], δεμιου [L = רעמיה = רעמיה]); the form REELIAS [q.v.], however, appears elsewhere in the same verse. Like 'Raamiah' it may represent 'Jerahmeel'; the existence of N. Arabian elements within the Jewish community can hardly be denied (Che.). Cp REGEM-MELECH.

REELIUS, RV Reelias (Βορολειογ [B], ρεελιογ [A]), a duplicate of the name of the fourth in the post-exilic list of leaders in 1 Esd. 5 8, which has by a scribe's error been substituted for Βαγοι (see v. 14 [A]) or Βαγογαι [L], i.e., Bigvai (see Ezra 2 2 Neh. 7 7).

REGEM (רֶגֶם; ραγεμ [B], ρε. [A], ρεγμα [L]), a Calebite name, one of the sons of Jahdai; 1 Ch. 2 47.

REGEM-MELECH (רֶגֶם־מֶלֶךְ; αρβεcεερ [BℵΓ], -cερ [ℵ^(c.a)], -cεcερ [A], -cεε [Q], ο βαcιλεγc; see below). A citizen of Jerusalem concerned in a deputation sent to the prophet Zechariah, Zech. 7 2 (see SHAREZER, 2). Most probably (as Marquart suggests) he is to be identified with RAAMIAH, one of the twelve (?) leaders of the Jews (Ezra 2 2 and parallel passages).[1] The present writer suspects, however, that both 'Raamiah' and 'Regem-melech' are simply corruptions of 'Jerahmeel.' The Jew spoken of would be (like so many others) partly of Jerahmeelite extraction. It would thus become unnecessary to explain Regem in Regem-melech by the Aram. רגם, jaculari.

Marti now (1897) reads, for 'Regem-melech and his men,' 'fourteen men,' ארבעה עשר אנשים, a trace of which he finds in 𝔊's αρβεσεερ ὁ βασιλεύς. This accounts rather ingeniously for αρβεσεερ. But we have no right to eliminate רגם מלך. αρβεσεερ may represent ערבאצר (cp שראצר)—i.e., עֲרָב אַשֻּׁר (= Asshurite Arabia). Cp SHAREZER, 2; RAB-SHAKEH.

REHABIAH (רְחַבְיָה[וּ], 'Yah is a wide place,' cp the use of רְחֹב in Ps. 4 2 18 37 [36] or quite as possibly an ethnic = רְחֹבִי, 'Rehobite' (Che.); ρααβια), b. Eliezer b. Moses (1 Ch. 23 17 24 21: αβια [L]; 26 25: ραβιαc [B], ρaa- [A], αβια [L]). Cp MOSES, RECHABITES, REHOBOAM.

REHOB (רְחֹב, 'broad place'; ροωβ [BAL]).

1. The northern limit of the 'spies,' apparently Aramæan, and in the direction of Hamath (Nu. 13 21 ρααβ [B], ροωθ [F] 2 S. 10 8 ροαβ [A], βαιθρααβ [L]); see BETH-REHOB. In the context of both passages, however (see NEGEB, MAMRE, ZOBAH), there are phenomena which suggest that both 'Rehob' and the 'Beth-rehob' of 2 S. 10 6 are incorrectly or imperfectly written for 'Rehoboth,' and that this 'Rehoboth' is the place of that name in the Negeb (see REHOBOTH). 'Hamath' may be miswritten for Maacath or MAACAH (q.v.), not improbably the southern Maacah. It may be added that, from this point of view, 'Aram' in the original narrative which underlies 2 S. 10 meant 'Jerahmeel,' a still shorter form of which is RAM (q.v.); also that 'ben Rehob,' the designation of Hadad-ezer in 2 S. 8 3 12, probably means 'native of Rehoboth' (see ZOBAH).
T. K. C.

2. and 3. The name of two unidentified Asherite cities, the one mentioned between Ebron and Hammon (Josh. 19 28, ρααβ [B]), the other with Accho and Aphek (ib. 30, ρααυ [B, see UMMAH], ραωβ [A] -οβ [Compl.], αρωβ [L]). There may well have been several Rehobs; but the mention of two in the Asherite list seems due to an error. It is only the second one which we know to have existed. It is enumerated (with Aphek and Accho) in Judg. 1 31 (ερεω [B]) among the cities of Asher in which the Canaanites remained; and again in Josh. 21 31 (P, ρααβ [B]), 1 Ch. 6 75 [60] (om. L) in a post-exilic list of Levitical cities assigned to the b'ne Gershon.[2] A possible connection with raḥu[bu?] in an Eg. list, may be mentioned (cp WMM As. u. Eur. 394). Of more importance, however, is the occurrence of the name raḥubụ (pap. Anast.) between K'iyng (see HEBER, 1), and Baytị-Ša'-â-rụ (perhaps Beth-shean?),[3] which is doubtless the same as the Roob, ροωβ of the Onom., situated near Beth-shean (OS(2) 145 21 286 82 f.). Now this Rehob in OT times must have been included within the borders of Issachar. It seems not improbable that the name in Josh. 19 28 (see above) has been accidentally transplanted from the list of cities of Issachar once given by E in vv. 17-23.[4] See BETH-REHOB.

REHOBOAM (רְחַבְעָם, as if 'the clan is enlarged.'[1]

But רחביה, REHABIAH, favours the view that either עם is the divine name 'Amm [cp AMMI, NAMES IN], or [Che.] the name is, or represents, one of the current modifications of 'Jerahmeel.' Possibly the true form was Rehab'el, just as the true form of JEROBOAM [q.v.] may have been Jerubba'al; the origin of both names, however, may be suspected to have been 'Jerahmeel.' Cp, however, Gray HPN, 59; ροβοαμ [BAL]).

Son of Solomon, and first King of Judah (about 930 B.C. ?). According to 2 Ch. 12_{13} the queen-mother was 'Naamah, an Ammonitess.' This supposed half-Ammonitish origin of Rehoboam would be important, were it probable (cp the -'am in the name). But we have no reason to think that Solomon's chief wife was an Ammonitess. Much more probably he married the 'companion' of David's old age, by an error (it seems) of 𝔊 and MT called Abishag. If so, עמונית may be a corruption of שׁוּנַמִּית, Sunammith, and Rehoboam's mother was probably Naamah the Shunamite (cp Cant. 6_{12} [13]). The queen-mother, however, need not have been an Issacharite; the Shunem from which she came was most probably in the Negeb (see SHUNAMMITE). Had it been otherwise, Rehoboam might have counted on the support of the tribesmen of Issachar. But Issacharites were certainly not among 'the young men that had grown up with him and stood before him,' of whom we are told in 1 K. 12_8.

The traditional story of the events which led to the disruption is considered elsewhere (see JEROBOAM, 1). It is necessary, however, to refer to it again in connection with the article SOLOMON. It would seem that in spite of the compulsory (?) cession of twenty cities to the king of Miṣṣur, Solomon succeeded in retaining a large part of the Negeb. It also appears that as late as the time of Amos (see PROPHET, § 35) Israelites from the N. frequented the venerable sanctuaries of the Negeb—a region which the second Jeroboam had recovered for Israel. It is further probable that the place-name which appears in Genesis (MT) as 'Shechem' should rather be Cusham, and that a place in the Negeb, on the border of the N. Arabian Cush is intended. See SHECHEM. Very possibly it was there that the great assembly was held, which issued in the rejection of Rehoboam by the larger part of Israel. That the story given in 1 K. 12 is correct, is intrinsically improbable. We do not know what it was that actually kindled the spark of disaffection, nor is it necessary that we should. The differences of N. and S. were reasons enough for a separation; in race and perhaps even in matters of cultus there was by no means complete unity among the federated clans of Israel. Was Rehoboam really forty-one years old at his accession? We may doubt it, even without laying stress on 1 K. 12_8; cp 2 Ch. 13_7. So far as we can see, he displayed no vigour, even in the feud between himself and Jeroboam; the historians ascribe this partly to the intervention of a prophet named SHEMAIAH. And in spite of the cities in the S. which Solomon (and, as the Chronicler states, Rehoboam himself) had fortified, he could not hinder the successful incursion of 'Shishak, king of Egypt,' or rather 'Cushi, king of Miṣrim' (see SHISHAK), which resulted in the loss of the treasures which Solomon had collected for the temple. This is the one great event recorded of his reign. See ISRAEL, § 28, and on Rehoboam's wives (2 Ch. $11_{18\ 20}$), MAACAH, MAHALATH.

REHOBOTH (רְחֹבוֹת; ευρυχωρια [ADL]), the name of one of the wells dug by Isaac (Gen. 26_{22}).

1. Identification. See GERAR. Rĕhōbōth was really, however, an important place, to which great kings and diviners appear to have traced their origin, and where great prophets took refuge, and received messages from their God (see below). It may perhaps be the city of Rubuta mentioned in the Am. Tab. (182_{13} 183_{10}), and once called apparently Ḥubuti (239_{47}). In 183_{8-10} we read that the warriors of Gazri, Gimti, and Kilti have taken the region of Rubuti. Gimti is Gimti-Kirmil, i.e., Gath of JERAHMEEL (q.v., § 4 [f.]), Kilti is Keilah. The localities, except Gezer, lie pretty near together. Presumably the site is that of the mod. Ruḥaibeh, 8 hours SW. of Beersheba, at the point 'from which the roads across the desert, after having been all united, again diverge towards Gaza and Hebron.' Robinson, who visited the place, hesitated to make this identification, because 'this appears to have been nothing but a well' (BR 1_{291}). Rowlands[1] and Palmer saw more clearly. In the Wādy itself there is only one well; but on the sloping sides of the side-valley, in which the ruins are situated, are many wells, reservoirs, and cisterns. 'A little beyond this the Wādy opens out, and receives the name of Baḥr bela mi ('the waterless sea [lake]'), and on the left comes in a small valley called Šutnet er-Ruḥaibeh, in which names are preserved both the Sitnah and Reḥoboth of the Bible' (Palmer, Desert of the Exodus, 385). Probably Ruḥaibeh also represents the 'Reḥoboth by the River' of Gen. 36_{37} (רְחֹבוֹת הַנָּהָר; ροωβωθ τῆς παρὰ ποταμόν, or τοῦ ποταμοῦ [AL], om. B; de fluvio Rohoboth, or de R. quæ juxta amnem sita est [Vg.]). See SAUL (2), PETHOR. The appended description distinguished this Reḥoboth from other places of the same name. The 'River' is the River of Miṣrim (see MIZRAIM, § 2 b; EGYPT, RIVER OF). For passages in the accounts of Bela, Balaam, and Elijah, in which Reḥoboth appears under disguises due to corruption in the text, see BELA, CHERITH, PETHOR; also MARCABOTH, NEGEB, § 2 c.

This, however, does not exhaust the list of probable references to Reḥoboth. It may have been displaced

2. Further OT references. by 'Ḥebron' in Gen. 23_2 35_{27} Judg. 1_{10}[2] (see KIRJATH-ARBA); in this case, it was at Reḥoboth, not at Ḥebron, that the famous cave of 'the MACHPELAH' (? Jerahmeel, Gen. 23_{17-20}) was situated. The error may have been a very early one (perhaps in the original P). No doubt, too, 'B'ne Ḥeth' in Gen. 23_3 ff. is miswritten for 'B'ne Reḥoboth' (חת for ת[ב]ח[ר]); so also 'Ḥittite' (חתי) in Gen. 26_{34} and 36_2 should be 'Reḥobothite' (רחבתי), and 'daughters of Ḥeth' (בנות חת) in Gen. 27_{46} should be 'daughters of Reḥoboth' (בנות רחבת); see JACOB, § 2.

The Book of Ezekiel, too, yields one remarkable reference to Reḥoboth, if in Ezek. $16_{3\ 45}$, 'thy mother was a Ḥittite,' we should read 'Reḥobothite' (‖ 'Amorite,' or rather 'Arammite' = 'Jeraḥmeelite'). On the probability that the early population of Jerusalem consisted of Jeraḥmeelites or Reḥobothites, see ZION, and cp Crit. Bib.

Most probably, too, 'URIAH the Ḥittite' should be 'Uriah the Reḥobothite,' and 'Ḥaggith' (the name of Adonijah's mother) in 2 S. 3_4 should be Reḥobith (רְחֹבִית). 'Cherethite' (כְּרֵתִי), too, can at last be rightly read; it should be 'Reḥobothite' (רְחֹבֹתִי). This, in fact, is a necessary inference from the corruption of רחבות into כרית in 1 K. $17_{3\ 5}$ (see CHERITH, and cp PELETHITES, ZAREPHATH). Thus David's faithful guards were not Philistines, but men of S. Palestine. That the Reḥobothites and Ṣarephathites, however, were always friendly to David is more than can be safely stated. Both tribes or peoples are apparently referred to as hostile to David in 2 S. 21_{15-22}. 'Philistines' should be 'Ṣarephathites,' and 'Gath' (גת) and 'Gob' (גב) are probably corrupt fragments of 'Reḥoboth' (רחבות). It will be remembered that the Miṣrites were famous for their tall stature (1 Ch. 11_{23}; cp Is. 45_{14}?), and that the Ănāḳīm are connected with Kirjath-arba. Now Kirjath-arba (קרית ארבע), or perhaps -'arâb (ק' עֲרָב) is at any rate not Ḥebron, but may be Reḥoboth (cp SODOM). These conjectures favour the view that Goliath, David's antagonist in the legend, was of Reḥoboth, not of Gath.

In short, it would appear that older and very different stories underlie the narratives in MT and 𝔊 of 1 S. 17 and (especially) 2 S. 21_{15-22} 23_{8-23}; either there has been a confusion between has been rejected in favour of P's account of the tribal limits; see Addis (loc. cit.).

[2] 'Canaanites' here should be 'Kenizzites' (as in some other parts of Judg. 1 and elsewhere).

two wars of David—one with the 'Philistines' and one with the Ṣarephathites and Reḥobothites, or there has throughout the life of David been a great error of the scribes—פלשתים written for צרפתים and כרתים for רחבתים. If so, it becomes at once probable that Ṣarephath and Reḥoboth are also referred to in 2 S 5 17-25 and 6 1-11 (see ZAREPHATH, ZIKLAG). 'OBED-EDOM [q.v.] the Gittite' should be 'Arāb-edom the Rehobothite.' Only on this critical conjecture can we explain the action ascribed to David in 2 S. 6 10 (cp ARK, § 5). This may be taken together with a less certain but not unimportant conjecture relative to Baal-peraṣim and Pereṣ-uzza (see PERAZIM, ZAREPHATH). The royal city of Achish (1 S. 27 5) was not 'Gath' but 'Reḥoboth.' This would throw a light on the story of Shimei's journey in 1 K. 2 39 ff. (see SHIMEI). Elsewhere (SISERA) it is suggested that both 'Achish' and 'Nahash' probably come from 'Ashhur' (='Asshur,' also='Geshur') so that 'Sisera' (=Asshur) may represent the Nahash, king of Ammon (rather Jerahmeel), of 1 S. 11 1 2 S. 10 2.

Other disguised references to Reḥoboth may perhaps be found in 1 S. 14 47 (where 𝔊ᴸ presupposes בֵּית רְחֹב, probably a corruption of רְחֹבֹת) and in 2 S. 8 3 12 10 6 8. In 1 S. 14 the conquest of Reḥoboth is ascribed to Saul; in 2 S., more correctly to David. In 2 S. 11 1 12 26-30 this important event is described; the phrases 'the royal city' and the 'city of waters' are both the result of textual corruption (read 'the city of Jeraḥmeel,' or 'of the Jeraḥmeelites'). See further Crit. Bib., and cp SAUL, § 3; URIAH. See also MIZRAIM, where it is argued that Gen. 10 14 probably refers to Reḥoboth (not Caphtorim) as the starting-point of the Pelištim (cp 2 S. 21 18 ff.). T. K. C.

REHOBOTH-IR (רְחֹבֹת עִיר; ροωβωc πολιν [AD]; ροωβοθ π. [D^a]; ροωβωθ π. [EL]) or 'the city Rehoboth,' one of the four cities mentioned in Gen. 10 11†. The name cannot be identified with any of the cities in the neighbourhood of Nineveh and Calah, with which it is associated. In the inscriptions of Sargon and Esarhaddon mention is made of the rêbit Ninâ, as a place in which was situated the old city Maganuba, on the site of which Sargon founded his city of Dûr-Sargon, the modern Khorsabad. Rehoboth-Ir might represent Rêbit-âli, and this might be equivalent to Rêbit-Ninâ, and be a popular name for Dûr-Sargon (cp Del. Par. 160 f. Calwer Bib.-Lex. 723 b). The word rêbitu (from ra'batu?) denotes primarily the outskirts of a city, in some cases the fields and plantations which were part of the city but lay outside its walls, though possibly within the exterior circumvallation. Thus it was in the rêbit of Dûr-ili that Sargon fought with Ḫumba-nigaš king of Elam, at the commencement of his reign: and it was in the rêbit of Nineveh that Esarhaddon made his triumphal entry after his capture of Sidon, KB 2 126. There is evidence that rêbit is the name of the farm or estate in the open country and was usually followed by the name of its owner; thus Rêbit Rîmâni-ilu denotes the estate of Rîmâni-ilu (see Assyrian Doomsday Book, 62). This would suggest that, if a town-name, Rehoboth 'Ir implies a founder 'Ir. No such town name, however, has come down to us.[1]

1. Assyriological inquiry.

The failure of attempts to explain Rehoboth-Ir and Resen (not to add Accad and Calneh) from Assyriology compels biblical critics to look at the problem from a fresh point of view, suggested by experience of the confusions and misunderstandings of biblical names which abound in the traditional text. The problem thus viewed is part of a much larger one which affects the whole of the Nimrod passage, and indeed the context in which that passage occurs. It is far from unlikely that Nimrod was really a N. Arabian not a Babylonian hero, and 'Rehoboth-Ir and Calah' should most probably give place to 'Rehoboth and Jerahmeel.' See NIMROD, REHOBOTH. C. H. W. J., § 1; T. K. C., § 2.

2. Text-critical solution.

REHUM (רְחוּם as if 'beloved,' an Aramaic word [§ 56], but very possibly one of the popular transformations of 'Jerahmeel'; cp Harim, Rekem, Raamiah, and see SHIMSHAI [Che.]).

1. A leader (see EZRA ii., § 8 e) in the great post-exilic list (EZRA ii., § 9) Ezra 2 2 (ιρεουμ [A], ρειουμ [L], B om.); probably the same as (4) below. That the form NEHUM (נְחוּם; ναουμ [BℵAL]) in Neh. 7 7 is incorrect is shown by 1 Esd. 5 8 (ροειμου [B], ρομελιου [A^a], ναουμ [L], EV ROIMUS).

2. b. Bani, a Levite, in list of wall-builders (see NEHEMIAH, § 1 f., EZRA ii., §§ 16 [1] 15 d) Neh. 3 17 (βασουθ [B], ραουμ [ℵA], ρεουμ [L]).

3. Signatory to the covenant (EZRA i., § 7); Neh. 10 25 [26] (ραουμ [BℵA], ρε. [L]).

4. A priest in Zerubbabel's band (EZRA ii., § 6 b), Neh. 12 3, miswritten for HARIM of v. 15 (so Guthe in SBOT; BℵA om.; ρεουμ [ℵ c.a mg. sup. L]).

5. The name of a high official (בְּעֵל טְעֵם) who joined with Shimshai the scribe and others in making representations against the Jews to Artaxerxes (Ezra 4 8 9 17 23). EV, following the early Hebrew commentators, who explain 'recorder,' calls him 'the chancellor'; 'the governor' would perhaps more exactly convey the force of בְּעֵל טְעֵם ('man of commands'), which is either the translation of an old Persian title (Pahlavi framātār—so Andreas in Marti, Aram. Gram.) or may even represent a Greek title (e.g., ἔπαρχος). The latter alternative assumes that the writer transported the political relations of the Greek period into the Persian period to which documents used by him belonged (so Marquart, Fund. 60). It is desirable, however, that Ezra and Nehemiah should be re-examined in the light of the theory that the underlying original narrative related to the N. Arabian, not to the Persian, rule. This may affect our conclusions in many minor points.

T. K. C.

The versions of Ezra leave the title untranslated (ραουλ βαδαταμεν, ραουμ βααλ, ραουμ βαλγαμ, ραουμ [B], ρεουμ βααλταμ ρεουμ [A], ρεουμ βελτεεμ [L], beelteem [Vg.]). In 1 Esd. 2 16 ff., RATHUMUS (ραθυμος) called the 'news-writer' (v. 17, ὁ [εἰς] τὰ προσπίπτοντα, EV 'the story-writer'), cp Jos. (Ant. xi. 2 1) ρ. ὁ. πάντα τὰ πραττόμενα γράφων. In other cases his title has been treated as a proper name BEELTETHMUS, a scribe's corruption of βεελτεεμος, v. 16 ρ. καὶ βεελτεθμος [B], ραθυος καὶ βαελτεθμος [A^a], ραθυμος καὶ βεελτεμος [L], v. 25 [21] . . . ραθύμῳ τῷ γράφοντι τὰ προσπίπτοντα καὶ βεελτεθμῳ . . . [B] . . . βεελτεμωθ' [A], ρ. γρ. τ. πρ. κ. βεελτεμῳ [L, v. 18], a doublet).

REI (רֵעִי; ρηcει [BA], also a Palm. name [Vogüé, Syr. Centr. nos. 16, 22], but 𝔊ᴸ [και] οι εταιροι αυτου, with reference to Shimei; cp Jos. Ant. vii. 14 4: 'Shimei David's friend' and see Th.), coupled with SHIMEI (q.v. n.), among those who did not favour Adonijah (1 K 1 8). Winckler (Gesch. 2 241) identifies him with Ira, the Jairite, who was a 'priest to David' (2 S. 20 26); he argues ingeniously to show that this Ira (or Jair) was a priest of Bethlehem. But for כֹּהֵן we should possibly read סֹכֵן 'a high officer' (cp SHEBNA). Ewald reads רֵעִי for רֵעִי and identifies (not plausibly) with David's brother RADDAI [q.v.].

REINS. 1. (כְּלָיוֹת, kᵉlāyōth; νεφροι [𝔊 and Rev. 2 23†]; renes), properly the kidneys (of animals offered in sacrifice, except in Job 16 13 Ps. 139 13 Lam. 3 13, where the human kidneys are referred to). 'A not less important seat of life [than the blood], according to Semitic ideas, lay in the viscera, especially in the kidneys and liver, which in the Semitic dialects are continually named as the seats of emotion, or more broadly in the fat of the omentum and the organs that lie in and near it' (Rel. Sem.[(2)] 379). Consequently P represents these parts as Yahwè's appointed share of the sacrifices (cp LIVER). We even find a peculiar symbolism connected with kidney-fat (see FOOD, § 1 a, but note that the text of the passages is doubted; see MILK, § 1). It is much more natural to find the 'reins' (as EV calls the 'kidneys,' when used metaphorically) employed as a term for the organ, not only of the emotions (see Ps. 73 21 Job 16 13 19 27 [not 𝔊 but Theod.]) but of the moral sentiments (see Jer. 11 20 17 10 20 12 Ps. 7 10 16 7 (?) 26 2). 'Trier of the reins and the heart' is the characteristic and title of Yahwè, not only in the OT, but also in the Hebraistic Book of Revelation (Rev. 2 23). In Ps. 16 7, however, 'yea, my reins instruct me in the night seasons' can hardly be right. It is Yahwè, not the 'heart' or the 'reins,' who trains and disciplines men (see Che. Ps.(2) ad loc.).

2. חֲלָצַיִם, ḥălāṣáim, is in Is. 11 5 rendered 'reins' by EV simply for want of a synonym for 'loins.'

3. The AVmg. of Lev. 15 2 22 4 for זוֹב, zôb, is not literal, and is based on a long-exploded pathology (cp MEDICINE, § 5).

REKEM (רֶקֶם). 1. Apparently a Benjamite place-name, Josh. 18 27 (ΝΑΚΑΝ [B?], ΡΕΚΕΜ [A], ΡΕΚΕΝ [L]), but most probably a corruption of ירחמאל, Jerahmeel, and equivalent to בַּחֻרִים, BAHURIM (another of the developments of JERAHMEEL).[1]

2. A king of Midian, Nu. 31 8 (ροκομ [BAFL]). Cp (3).

3. One of the 'sons' of Hebron mentioned with TAPPUAH and SHEMA [qq.v.] in 1 Ch. 2 43; in 2 44 [MT] he is father of Shammai father of Maon, but in 𝔊 (ρεκομ [B], ροκομ [A], ρωκημ [L]) it is Shema who is ancestor of Shammai, the intermediate links being RAHAM and JORKEAM [qq.v.]; Rekem, Raham, Jorkeam, and Carmel are all probably corruptions of JERAHMEEL. Cp JOKDEAM.

4. In pause RAKEM (so EV), a Manassite; 1 Ch. 7 16 (BA om., ρακαμ [L]). Seemingly there was a strong Jerahmeelite element in the population of the Manassite territory.

These explanations suggest the true explanation of the phrase בני קדם; see EAST, CHILDREN OF, where the reader is referred to the present article for textual criticism of the phrase. One plausible view of the original form of the story of GIDEON (q.v., § 1) requires us, in Judg. 6 3 33 7 12 to read בני רקם (see Pesh.), i.e., בני ירחמאל; note the gloss 'Amalekites.' This should be taken in connection with the Targumic use of רקם for Kadesh; here too רקם must come from ירחמאל; the full name of Kadesh was Kadesh-jerahmeel, barnea' and 'reḳem' having the same origin. See SELA. In fact, wherever we meet with phrases like 'the sons' or 'the land' or 'the mountains of Kedem' we may safely regard Kedem as a corruption of Rekem, i.e., Jerahmeel, with the doubtful exception of Gen. 10 30 (i.e., if ספרה [EV 'toward Sephar'] does not come from צרפת, cp SEPHARAD). Cp OPHIR. See Gen. 25 6 29 1 Nu. 23 7 1 K. 5 9 [4 30] Is. 11 14 Jer. 49 28 Ezek. 25 4 10 Job 1 3. Similarly in Gen. 15 19 KADMONITES must be a corruption of 'Jerahmeelites.'

REMALIAH (רְמַלְיָהוּ, § 39; ΡΟΜΕΛΙΑ[C]), father of PEKAH (q.v.), 2 K. 15 25 etc., Is. 7 4 f. 8 6. Probably a corruption of ירחמאל, Jerahmeel. Pekah's Gileadites may really have come from the Negeb (on the southern גלעד, see Crit. Bib. on Jer. 8 22 22 6 Am. 1 3). Similarly, Jehuw as not improbably an Ishmaelite (see NIMSHI), and Joab a Miṣrite (see ZERUIAH). It is easy to understand that the boldest adventurers might be of N. Arabian extraction.

REMPHAN (ΡΕΜΦΑΝ, Stephens with 1, 31 etc.; cp ΡΕΜΦΑΜ [D, Vg. Iren.]; ΡΟΜΦΑΝ [ℵ*]; ΡΟΜΦΑ [B], ΡΕΜΦΑ [61, Arm.]), or (Μ being intrusive, as in ΝΟΜΒΑ beside ΝΟΒΑ, 1 S. 21 1), as RV, REPHAN (ΡΕΦΑΝ [CE, Syrr., Memph. Theb. Æth.]; cp ΡΑΙΦΑΝ, [Aℵc]; ΡΑΦΑΝ, Just. Dial. 22, ex Amos), occurs, with the prefix 'the star of the god' (so RV with BD, Pesh., etc. and 𝔊AQ*), or 'the star of your god' (so AV, with AℵCE, Vg., Harcl., etc.), in Acts 7 43, in a quotation from Amos 5 26, 𝔊 (where BA ΡΑΙΦΑΝ, Q ΡΕΦΑΝ, Complut. ΡΕΜΦΑ). The same Jablonski who ventured on a Coptic explanation of BEHEMOTH (q.v.) explained Rempha or Rompha from the Coptic, as 'king of heaven,' nullo plane apice immutato ('Remphah, Ægyptiorum Deus,' in Opuscula, ed. Te Water, 2 [1806], pp. 1-72). But 'king of heaven' in Egyptian would be suten em pet.[1] Gloag (Comm. on Acts 1 249), Lumby (Acts, in Cambridge Bible, ad loc.), and Merx (Schenkel's Bib.-Lex. 1 517) suppose Rephan to be the Egyptian name for Saturn. So (besides Spencer and Kircher) Lepsius the Egyptologist, who says that Seb or Saturn is called repa-n-neteru, 'the youngest of the gods,' and suggests a possible connection with Rephan (Die Chron. der Æg. 93). On phonetic and other grounds this view is not more acceptable than Jablonski's, and the simple explanation is that ρεφαν should rather be ραιφαν—i.e., ריפן, where ר is perhaps a corruption of כ, and פ (soft) a phonetic substitute for ו. See CHIUN.

1 ב dropped out, and ח became ק (for the reverse process see H. P. Smith on 1 S. 8 16).

REPHAEL (רְפָאֵל, as if 'God heals'; cp Aram. ירפאל, רפאל, NAMES, § 30; ΡΑΦΑΗΛ [BAL]), a Korahite, b. Shemaiah; 1 Ch. 26 7†.

Probably 'God heals' is a late popular etymology, devised after the original name had become corrupted; that it took hold of the imagination we see from the RAPHAEL of Tobit and Enoch. The present writer suspects that Rephael, Irpeel, Raphu [Beth-]rapha, and perhaps even REPHAIAH (q.v.), all come ultimately from an ethnic. See PEDAH-ZUR; REPHAIM. Hommel (Exp. T 8 [1897] p. 563) compares the name of an Arab, temp. Sargon, in a text transcribed by Winckler, Ya-ra-pa, also the S. Arabian name Hi-rapa'a.

REPHAH (רֶפַח; ΡΑΦΗ [BA], ΡΑΦΑ [L]), mentioned in the list of the B'ne Ephraim 1 Ch. 7 25. Both Rephah and RESHEPH (q.v.) occur nowhere else and are probably corrupt. Cp EPHRAIM, § 12.

REPHAIAH (רְפָיָה, §§ 30, 62, as if 'Yahwè heals'; ΡΑΦΑΙΑ [BAL]). On the ultimate origin of the name see REPHAEL, and note in confirmation that in Neh. 3 9 Rephaiah (5) is a 'son of Ḥur'—i.e., most probably, of Jerahmeel. In 1 Ch. 2 19 Hur is the son of Caleb and Ephrath. Who the Calibbites are, we know [see CALEB]; Ephrath is probably a distorted fragment of Zarephath. Cp PARADISE, col. 3573, n. 5. See below, no. 5.
T. K. C.

1. b. Hananiah, mentioned in the genealogy in 1 Ch. 3 21 (ραφαλ [B]), where, for בני 'sons of,' 𝔊 and Pesh. four times read בנו 'his son.' So Kittel; Bertheau follows MT.

2. A Simeonite chieftain who attacked the Amalekites of Mt. Seir (apparently in Hezekiah's time), 1 Ch. 4 42 f. (ραφαιας [L]). See ISHI, SIMEON.

3. b. TOLA (q.v.): 1 Ch. 7 2 (ραφαρα [B]); cp ISSACHAR, § 7.

4. b. BINEA, 1 Ch. 9 43 (ραφαιαν [ℵ], αραχα [L]) = 1 Ch. 8 37 (רָפָה, RAPHAH; ραφαι [B], αραχα [L]). Cp BENJAMIN, § 9 ii. β.

5. b. HUR (4), the ruler of half 'the district of Jerusalem,' and one of the repairers of the wall (Neh. 3 9; ραφαιας [L]).

[He was of Jerahmeelite origin (see above). According to Meyer (Entst. 119) the Calibbites and Jerahmeelites did not become universally recognised as real Jews before the time of P. The study of proper names pursued in a series of articles in the present work confirms this, but with limitations. In Neh. 3 Hur, Malchijah, Paseah, Rephaiah, Urijah; in Ezra 8 Elam, Michael, Jeliel, Ariel; in Neh. 11 Mahalaleel, Jeroham, Malchiah, Micha are transparent 'Jerahmeelite' names. The Jerahmeelites became so prominent that the genealogists had to do them fuller justice. But the same study of names suggests that Jerahmeelite clans were recognised both in Judah and elsewhere before the exile.—T. K. C.]

REPHAIM (רְפָאִים; ραφα[ε]ιν [or -μ], and [Gen. 14 Josh. 12 13, and 1 Ch.], γιγαντες [BAEL]; Josh. 17, 𝔊BA om.), a race of reputed giants, found by the Israelites in occupation of territory on both sides of the Jordan.

1. OT references.

Before attempting any linguistic or historical explanation, we must look into the several passages where the traditional text recognises the name, viz., Gen. 14 5 15 20 Dt. 2 11 20 (ραφαραειν [F once]) 3 11 13 Josh. 12 4 13 12 17 15, to which we may add 2 S. 21 16 18 20 22, cp 1 Ch. 20 4 6 8 (children of Hārāphā). The geographical phrase 'valley of Rephaim' will be treated only incidentally here (see next article).

1. Gen. 14 5. Chedorlaomer and his allies 'smote the Rephaim in Ashteroth-karnaim.'

No stress can be laid on this passage. In its present form Gen. 14 is probably later even than the archæological notices in Dt. 2 10 f., and the names at present found in Gen. 14 5 probably come from a very late editor who arbitrarily 'corrected' a very corrupt text (see SODOM).

2. Gen. 15 20. The list of Canaanite peoples in Gen. 15 19-21 comes apparently from a late redactor, but has merely suffered from ordinary transcriptional corruption; the redactor had no historical theory to serve, and reproduced, though inaccurately, names derived from earlier sources.

The order of the names is, Kenites, Kenizzites, Kadmonites (from 'Jerahmeelites'?), Hittites (from 'Rehobothites'?), Perizzites (Zarephathites?), Rephaim, Amorites, Canaanites, Girgashites (from 'Girshites' or 'Geshurites'?), Jebusites (Ishmaelites?).' We may infer that, according to tradition, a people called 'Rephaim' was to be found in the far S. of Palestine.

3. Dt. 2 11 20 3 11 13. A 'remnant of the Rephaim,' under their king Og, survived in Bashan, which was therefore called 'the land of the Rephaim.' But we are also told that the Emim of Moab and the Anakim (of Hebron? or of Rehoboth?) were reckoned among the Rephaim. The passage comes from a late editor (D_2), and 'Bashan' should certainly be 'Cushan' (see OG).[1]

If גת (Gath) in 2 S. 21 20 is miswritten for רחובת (REHOBOTH), this statement is confirmed, for the warriors spoken of in that passage were Rephaites. It is true, in Nu. 13 33 the b'nē 'Anāķ are said to belong to the Nephīlīm; but we shall see presently that the 'Rephaim' and the 'Nephīlīm' must have been closely connected—i.e., 'Rephaim' and 'Nephīlīm' may have been interchanged.

4. Josh. 12 4 13 12 depend on Dt. 2 11, etc.; but 17 14 f. has its own peculiarities. When purified from corrupt repetitions 17 14 f. states that the tribe of Joseph (b'nē Joseph) complained to Joshua that it was too large to have but one lot and portion. Joshua's reply was, 'If thou art a great people, go up to the forest-land, and clear away (space) for thyself in the land of the Perizzites and the Rephaim.' The Josephites objected that access to this region would be impeded by the Canaanites with their chariots of iron, and Joshua rejoined that the forest-land is not unattainable, and that their strength is equal to the task of driving out the Canaanites.[2] Here it would appear that the forest-land spoken of means the hill-country N. of Shechem; the view that trans-Jordanic territory is intended is not plausible.[3] But room must be left for the possibility that 'Shechem' should be 'Cusham,' and 'Canaanites' 'Kenizzites.' There were probably b'nē Ephraim in the Negeb (see Crit. Bib.).

5. In 2 S. 21 22 (cp 20) four champions of the Philistines are said to have been 'born (יֻלְּדוּ) to the Rāphā (לְהָרָפָה) in Gath' (v. 22; cp v. 20), while of two of them it is said that they were 'of the descendants of the Rāphā' (HPSm., מִילִידֵי; cp 1 Ch. 20 4), or perhaps rather (cp 𝔊 in v. 22) 'of the Rephaim.'[4]

There is, however, great difficulty in the text as it now stands. Surely the Philistines were quite formidable enough without having to accept the assistance of the remnant of the Rephaim. Are we to suppose that the references to the Rephaites in 2 S. 21 16 22 are a later appendage to the tradition, suggested by a reminiscence of the tradition respecting Og? Or is there not some explanation arising out of a somewhat more definite view of the older populations of Canaan made possible by textual criticism?

2. Origin of name.

It would be tedious to sum up here all the evidence directly or indirectly affecting the subject in hand provided by our textual criticism. Two passages, however, are specially important. In Josh. 17 15 it is evident that הַפְּרִזִּי and הָרְפָאִים are two competing readings, and that the former is more probably correct. And in 2 S. 5 18-20 it is plain that the spot called בַּעַל־פְּרָצִים is in the valley of Rephaim. It is maintained elsewhere (see PELETHITES, ZAREPHATH) that the tribe whose centre on the S. Palestinian border was at Zarephath (= ZEPHATH) was prominent in early Israelitish legend, and that its name underwent strange mutilations and corruptions. Among these transformations may probably be included Zelophehad, Ṣalḥad, names connected with the N.; and Pelištim[1] and Letušim, names connected with the S. That 'Perizzi' and 'Pelišti' are connected is not a violent supposition. Both are most probably corruptions of Ṣārephāthī (Zarephathite), and it is hardly less plausible to conjecture that Rephā'īm is a corruption of Peraṣīm, though an alternative derivation from Jeraḥme'elim is equally possible. Thus—to return to the story in 2 S. 5 18-20—instead of 'Baal-perazim' in the 'valley of Rephaim,' the original tradition probably spoke of 'Baal-ṣārĕphāthīm in the valley of Jeraḥme'elim (or Ṣārĕphāthīm).' That such long names were early corrupted, and that the corruption took different forms in different parts of Palestine, can easily be understood.

The result to which we are tending, and which it would lead us into too many digressions to justify fully, is that the Ṣārĕphāthīm or Jeraḥme'elim migrated into many parts both of eastern and of western Palestine. They started from the S.; it is not a random statement of Gen. 10 6 that PUT (פוט from צרפת) was the brother of (the N. Arabian) Cush and Mizraim and the son of Ḥam (Jerahmeel?), and of Gen. 25 3 that LETUSHIM was the brother of Leummim (Jerahmeelim?) and the son of Dedan (i.e., S. Edom). The Ṣārĕphāthīm were in fact probably a branch of the Jerahmeelites, who, as our textual criticism tends to show, spread over many parts both of Western, and even of Eastern, Palestine (note the Phœnician Zarephath, and cp JERAHMEEL; EAST, CHILDREN OF). The Jerahmeelites or Ṣarephathites, according to the genealogies, became largely fused with the Israelites, and how much truth there may be in the statement that OG the Rephaite (Ṣarephathite? or Jerahmeelite?) and his people were smitten, till there were no survivors (Nu. 21 35), it is impossible to say.

It is hardly worth while to discuss the question whether the representation of the Rephaim—i.e., possibly the Jerahmeelites of Ṣārĕphath—as giants (cp Am. 2 9, where 'the Amorite' is thus described) is purely mythical. Whether the Edomitish race (to which the Jerahmeelites belonged) was taller than the later Israelitish race or not, it is certain that the instinctive tendency of legend (both in Europe and in Asia) to picture aboriginal races as of gigantic stature would have led to such a representation. According to Robertson Smith,[2] 'the giant-legends arose in part [1] There is no occasion to reject the second בענקים as an erroneous repetition from the preceding clause.

[3] See Steuernagel, ad loc.

[4] It is usual to take הרפה as an eponym; but the art. is unfavourable to this view. רפה surely comes from רפא, which originally had after it the stroke of abbreviation (הרפא׳=הרפאים). In 2 S. 21 22 read יֻלְּדוּ לְבֵית הָרְפָאִים, 'were born to the (or, a) house of the Rephaim' (cp L's τῷ οἴκῳ). [In 2 S. 21, 𝔊BA has ραφα and also γίγαντες with ραφα in v. 22: 𝔊L γίγαντες in vv. 16, 18, Τιτᾶνος v. 20, γίγαντες and ραφα v. 22, whilst in 1 Ch. 20 𝔊 has γίγαντες in vv. 4, 6, 𝔊BA ραφα, 𝔊L ραφαιν and also 𝔊 γίγαντες.]

from the comtemplation of ancient ruins of great works and supposed gigantic tombs.' This may very well have been the case, in view of the legends attaching to huge sarcophagi, like that assigned to Og in Dt., at the present day. See OG.

A brief reference to other theories of the origin of the name Rephaim must suffice. The view that it is connected with Ar. rafa'a 'to lift up,' and means 'giants,' is not at all plausible; no cognate of rafa'a can be pointed to in Hebrew, Aramaic, or Assyrian. Stade (GVI I 116 120) was the first to connect the name with the Rephaim or 'shades' (see DEAD and DEATH). This has been taken up by Schwally (Das Leben nach dem Tode, 64, n. 1 [1892]; ZATW 18 132 [1898]). From the sense of 'spirits of the dead' arose, it is supposed, that of 'primeval population.' Schwally confirms this by a legend of the Hovas in Madagascar (ZATW, l.c.). This is surely most improbable. The transition is difficult, even if we do not hold, with Stade, that רפאים, the word for 'the shades,' means 'the weak.' It is most reasonable, therefore, to hold that, like a large proportion of ethnic names, Rephaim has been worn down from a longer form, and this form we may venture to trace either in Jeraḥme'elim or in Ṣarephāthīm.

REPHAIM, VALLEY OF, also VALLEY OF THE GIANTS (עֵמֶק־רְפָאִים; Josh. 15 8 18 16 2 S. 5 18 22 23 13 1 Ch. 11 15 14 9 Is. 17 5: Is. ἐν φάραγγι στερεᾷ[1] [BℵAQΓ]; Josh. 15, γῆς ραφαειμ [AL], -ν [B], Josh. 18 εμεκραφαειν [BL], -μ [A], 2 S. 5, τὴν κοιλάδα τῶν τ[ε]ιτάνων [BAL], 2 S. 23 τῇ κοιλ. ραφαειμ [B], -ν [A], τιτάνων [L]; 1 Ch. τῇ κοιλάδι τῶν γιγάντων [BℵAL]; vallis Raphaim and gigantum).

According to the prevalent theory, which supposes the same locality to be referred to in all the passages, the 'Valley of Rephaim' was an upland plain near Jerusalem and Bethlehem (cp 2 S. 23 13 f.) where not only corn and olive trees flourished (Is. 17 5 f.), but the so-called Baca trees (see MULBERRY) grew. At its N. end was a hill over which ran the boundary of Judah and Benjamin (Josh. 15 8 18 16). The plain was famous as the scene of fights between David and the Philistines, (2 S. 5 18 22 23 13; cp 1 Ch. 14 9 11 15). Elsewhere, however, has been offered the theory that the enemies referred to in 2 S. 5 18 22 and the related passages were not the Philistines but the Zarephathites (see ZAREPHATH), and that the place referred to in 2 S. 23 14 was not Bethlehem but Beth-jerahmeel (thus the whole scene becomes historically and geographically more plausible). Elsewhere, too (see REPHAIM) we have urged that Rephaim, the name of an early population of Canaan, is probably a much worn-down form either of Ṣārĕphāthīm (Zarephathites), or perhaps more probably of Jeraḥme'ēlīm.

1. Prevalent theory criticised.

It would seem, then, that in 2 S. 5 18 22, etc., the 'valley (upland plain) of Rephaim (Jeraḥme'ēlīm)' cannot be a plain near Jerusalem, and that, like the 'ēmeḳ hā-ēlāh of 1 S. 17 2 (see ELAH, VALLEY OF), it was one of the 'valleys or spaces between the low sloping hills' (Palmer) in the neighbourhood of Ruḥeibeh (Rehoboth), possibly indeed the Wādy Ruḥeibeh itself, though the broad Wādy el-Milḥ may also come into consideration (see NEGEB).

2. David's valley of Rephaim.

In the case of Is. 17 5, when we consider the manifest play on the name Ephraim in the next verse, it is possible to suppose (a) that רְפָאִים (Rephaim) should rather be אֶפְרַיִם (Ephraim), and to identify this 'ēmeḳ with a part of the Great Plain of Esdraelon. (b) There are, however, also good critical arguments for identifying this 'ēmeḳ with that in the story of David. The question is subordinate to the large inquiry, Does Is. 17 1-11 predict the ruin of Syria and Ephraim, or of the kingdom of Jerahmeel? See Crit. Bib. But there is no objection to the view (c) that the 'ēmeḳ rĕphā'īm of Josh. 15 8 18 16 really did derive its name from the Jeraḥme'elim; in fact, the early population of Jerusalem was probably a combination of Amorites and Jerahmeelites (see REHOBOTH). The upland plain referred to seems to be the Beḳā'a, which stretches from the SW. side of Jerusalem southwards as far as Mār Elyās (3 hr. from Jerusalem), which may indeed be the 'mountain' referred to in Joshua.

3. Two other valleys of Rephaim?

Eus. and Jer. (OS 288 22 147 6) place the 'Valley of Rephaim' on the N. of Jerusalem, and Kittel (Gesch. der Hebr. 2 131) follows them on grounds derived from the (surely corrupt) text of 2 S. 5 22 ff. Tobler's main objection[1] to the ordinary view is that 'ēmeḳ means a 'valley,' not a 'plain.' But 'ēmeḳ is constantly used of plains shut in by hills, and this is just what the Beḳā'a is, 'shut in on all sides by rocky hill-tops and ridges' (Porter).

REPHAN (ρεφαν), Acts 7 43 RV, AV REMPHAN.

REPHIDIM (רְפִידִים, plain-country, 'strata' ??; ραφιδειν [BAFL], Ex. 17 1 8 19 2 Nu. 33 14 f.†), a place where the Amalekites attacked the Israelites and were defeated by Joshua with the aid of the wonder-working staff of Moses. As we see from his arrangement of the passages of diverse origin which he has brought together, R considers this event to have occurred when, according to P, the Israelites encamped at Rĕphīdīm immediately before entering the wilderness of Sinai. He also thinks that the spot (spots?) called Massah and Meribah was (were?) in the district of Rephidim, which, in this case, must have extended to, or perhaps even have been equivalent to, Horeb (see Ex. 17 6, 'the rock in Horeb'). On the analysis of sources, see EXODUS (BOOK), § 3.

The existence of a popular tradition of a war waged with varying fortunes by the early Israelites against the Amalekites may be assumed without discussion (see AMALEK, § 2; MOSES, § 12). But we have still to ask, Did tradition connect this war, or an episode of this war, with Rephidim? Some scholars (Oxf. Hex. 107) have doubted this; according to them, the connection of the battle described in Ex. 17 8-16 with Rephidim is purely editorial. Textual criticism may contribute something to the decision of this point. Among the names of the stations of the Israelites there are only two which end in -im, viz., Elim and Rephidim. It is difficult not to conjecture that both these names are corruptions of ethnics. That Elim probably comes from Jeraḥmeel or Jeraḥmeelim has been suggested already (MOSES, § 12). We have also conjectured that Marah (the reported name of the preceding station) has arisen out of another fragment of Jeraḥmeel, viz., Maraḥ (from Reḥem; cp REKEM, SELA). It may now be added that Rephidim is probably a corrupt fragment of Jeraḥmeelim.

1. Form and contents of legend.

'Rĕphīdīm' (רפידים), we may suppose, comes from 'Rĕphīlīm' (רפילים), which, through the intermediate stage of 'Rĕphāĕlīm' (רפאלים), comes from 'Remaelim' (רמאלים), i.e., 'Jĕraḥmĕēlīm' (ירחמאלים); the corruption is easier and not less certain than that which we meet with sometimes, of Jeraḥmeel into Ephraim.

Bacon (Ex. 88, note *) has acutely conjectured that Ex. 15 26 (a passage usually assigned to R_D) may be based on an earlier document which derived the name Rephidim from rapha (רפא), 'to heal.' The name presupposed in the early tradition may have been not Rephidim but Rephaelim; רְפָאֵל naturally suggests the explanation, 'for I am Yahwè that heals thee.'[2] In short, the closing words of v. 26 may originally have stood in a context relative to the name Rephaelim.

From this point of view we cannot question the fact that early tradition connected the battle in Ex. 17 8-16 with Rĕphīdīm, the name of which place (like Meribah) appears to be a distortion of the ethnic Jĕraḥmĕēlīm. The truth is that there were traditional stories in circulation respecting two fertile spots in the Jeraḥmeelite country occupied by the migrating Israelites. One appears in a double form in Ex. 15 23-25*a*, and in v. 27; another has also a double representation in Ex.

[1] Dritte Wanderung, 202.

[2] See RAPHAEL, and cp Eth. Enoch, 10 7, where Raphael is commanded to proclaim that God will heal the earth.

17 1*b* 2 4-7 (part) and, in a very fragmentary form, in vv. 3 7 (part). The second certainly refers to the oasis of 'Ain Gadīs (the fountain of the Jerahmeelite Kadesh). And it is not unreasonable to hold that the Amalekite attack spoken of in Ex. 17 8 was connected in the original tradition with this fountain, the possession of which was naturally grudged by the Jerahmeelites (now become unfriendly?—see MOSES) to the intruding Israelites. (In this case, the 'hill' spoken of in vv. 9 f. may be one of the earth-covered limestone hills at the north-eastern sweep of the oasis; cp Trumbull, Kadesh-barnea, 273.) This, at any rate, is the view suggested by the text of Ex. 17 in its present form; but even if we reject it, there is strong probability in the opinion that the Amalekites attacked Israel in Rĕphīdīm—i.e., Jĕraḥmĕēlīm—because we have express evidence (Nu. 13 29, cp Gen. 14 7) that the Negeb, including Kadesh, was the region specially occupied by the Jerahmeelite clans.

That the story of the Amalekite attack, not less than that of the smitten rock (v. 6, 'the rock in Horeb'), is placed too early by R, seems beyond doubt. The Moses who stood apart from the fight, holding the 'rod of Elohim,' but who after a time was in danger of letting his hand sink, and who committed the military leadership to Joshua, is clearly an old man; we are placed by this story at the beginning of the various wars which tradition referred to the close of the life of Moses. See MOSES; and cp JEHOVAH-NISSI, MASSAH AND MERIBAH, WANDERINGS.

2. Earlier geographical theories. In the above statement we have been compelled to assume that Horeb or Sinai was not in the so-called Sinaitic Peninsula, but in close proximity to Kadesh, i.e., in the Jebel Magrah, on the SW. frontier of the Negeb (see MOSES, §§ 5, 14). If, however, we suppose that Sinai is either Jebel Serbāl or Jebel Mūsā (see SINAI, § 18), we may, with several modern geographers (Lepsius, Ebers, Ritter, A. P. Stanley, C. W. Wilson, E. H. Palmer), be tempted to attach ourselves to the tradition, recorded especially by Kosmas Indicopleustes (535 A.D.) and Antoninus Martyr (circa 600 A.D.), which identifies Rĕphīdīm with Feirān, the ancient Pharan, the ruins of which stand at the junction of the Wādy 'Aleyāt with the Wādy Feirān, about 4 m. N. of Serbāl. Antoninus Martyr speaks of an 'oratorium,' whose altar is set on the stones which were put under Moses while he was praying. Evidently he refers to the Jebel et-Tahūneh, on the right bank of the Wādy Feirān, which is about 720 ft. high, and is covered with remains of Christian tombs, cells, and chapels. This view was adopted as a whole by the members of the Sinai Expedition, excepting F. W. Holland (see Ordnance Survey of Penins. of Sinai, 153 ff.). More plausible, if the connection of the story of the rock and that of the battle be maintained, is the view of Ebers (Durch Gosen zum Sinai, 212; cp Lepsius, Briefe, 349 ff.) that the biblical Rĕphīdīm is to be placed in the dry, north-western part of the Wādy Feirān, where the Amalekites might be supposed to have gathered to prevent the Israelites from entering the oasis. Robinson's theory (BR 1 179), adopted by F. W. Holland (Recovery of Jerusalem, 534 ff.), that Rĕphīdīm is in the narrow gorge of el-Watiyeh in the great Wādy es-Sheikh—the Wādy by which, according to this traveller, the Israelites approached Horeb—is less defensible, for reasons well summed up by E. H. Palmer (Sinai, 202); cp also Ritter (Palestine and the Sinaitic Peninsula, 1 323). All these theories depend, as we have seen, on the correctness of the traditional theory as to the general position of Horeb or Sinai, which is open to much question, and indeed appears to some scholars hardly defensible. T. K. C.

RESAIAS (ρηcαιογ [BA]), 1 Esd. 5 8 RV = Ezra 2 2, REELAIAH.

RESEN (רֶסֶן; λαcεμ [ADL]; -εν [E]; Resen) is named in Gen. 10 12, as a city lying between Nineveh and Kalah.

1. Assyriological inquiry. Menant therefore considered it to be represented by the ruin-heaps of Selāmīye. Bochart and recently Nöldeke have connected it with the Larissa of Xenophon (Anab. iii. 4 7), the site of which, however, is uncertain, though Frd. Del. (Calwer Bib.-Lex. 731) suggests identifying it with Nimrūd (cp CALAH). In the inscriptions, so far published, no city of any importance bears a name like Resen. A city of the name Rê-êš-ê-ni (Rêš-êni) appears as not far from Nineveh, in the Bavian description of Sennacherib (KB 2 116 f., cp Del. Par. 188 261); but there is nothing to show that it was an ancient foundation. There is little hope of its identification till the district has been properly explored. C. W. H. J.

2. Text-critical solution. From an exegetical point of view the matter is further complicated by the words which follow Resen—'the same is the great city.' Does this refer to Resen? No one would have doubted this, but for the silence of antiquity as to any important city near Nineveh with a name resembling Resen. Rêš-êni—i.e., 'fountain-head, place of fountains,' is not a probable name at all. To suppose a 'tetrapolis' with two such doubtful names as Rehoboth-Ir and Resen is a desperate expedient. If, however, Nimrod was a N. Arabian, not a Babylonian, hero, a probable identification of Resen may be made. כלח (misread Calah) is in the view of the present writer one of the many corruptions of ירחמאל (Jerahmeel); נינוה (which was read Nineveh) not improbably comes from חברון (Hebron); and הוא העיר הגדולה is certainly a corruption of הוא ירחמאל (that is, Jerahmeel), a gloss on כלח. 'Between Hebron and Jerahmeel' appears to be a suitable description of Beersheba, the name of which is sometimes corrupted into בּוֹר עָשָׁן and עָשָׁן. See NIMROD. § 1, C. W. H. J.; § 2, T. K. C.

RESERVOIR (מִקְוָה, Is. 22 11, RV). See CONDUITS, § 1 [5].

RESHEPH (רֶשֶׁף; cαραφ [B], ραcεφ [A], ραcηφ [L]), a 'son' of Ephraim, 1 Ch. 7 25 (see EPHRAIM, § 12). The other names include SHEERAH (i.e., Ashḥur?), Ammihud (i.e. Jeraḥmeel?) Elishama (i.e., Ishmael?). 'Resheph' therefore should perhaps be צרף (cp 𝔊[B]), and mean 'Zarephathite'; cp בן הצרפי, Neh. 3 31—i.e., a Zarephathite. Clermont-Ganneau, however, suggests that Arsūf (= the Apollonia of Jos.), about 7 m. N. of Jaffa, may correspond to an ancient town Resheph. Resheph (identified with Apollo) was the Phœnician and N. Syrian fire-god and war-god (cp CIS 1 n. 10, and Hadad-inscr. from Zenjīrlī, ll. 3, 11), whose cultus was introduced into Egypt during the eighteenth and nineteenth dynasties (see list of gods on altar in Turin Museum, TSBA 3 429, l. 67, and plate; and cp E. Meyer, ZDMG 31 719 728 f.).[1] Close to Arsūf is an extraordinary holy place—a Ḥarām, which, under Moslem forms, possibly continues a primitive cultus (Cl.-Ganneau, Horus et saint Georges, 17; cp Baed.(2) 239). 1. General. The resurrection of Jesus is held to be the central fact upon which the Christian church rests. Even at a date so early as that of 1 Cor. Paul treats it as such in an elaborate discussion (1 Cor. 15 1-26). In particular he rests upon it three fundamental thoughts of the Christian faith: (1) the belief that the death of Jesus was not—what in accordance with Dt. 21 23 (Gal. 3 13) it must have seemed to be—the death of a malefactor, but a divine appointment for the forgiveness of sins and for the salvation of men (1 Cor. 15 17 Rom. 4 25 6 4-7, etc.); (2) a vindication of the supremacy of the exalted Christ over the Church (1 Cor. 15 25 f. Rom. 1 4 2 Cor. 13 4, etc.); and (3) a pledge of the certainty of an ultimate resurrection of all believers to a life of everlasting blessedness (1 Cor. 15 18-20 6 14 Rom. 6 8 8 11, etc.).

Whilst the second and the third of these points were so held at all times, that was not quite the case with the first. At a date as early as that of the speeches of Peter in Acts (see ACTS, § 14) the resurrection of Jesus was not the divine confirmation of the truth that the death of Jesus laid the foundations of the salvation of mankind; the death is there represented rather as a calamity (3 13-15 5 30) even if it was (according to 2 23 4 28) fore-ordained of God. But the significance of the resurrection of Jesus does not become on that account the less; on the contrary it figures as being itself the act with which the forgiveness of sins is connected (5 31, cp 3 25). Most modern schools of theology in like manner refrain from regarding the resurrection as an event without which the theologian would not be able to regard Jesus' death as a divine arrangement for the salvation of men.

Such theologians also, however, do not on that account attach to it any the less importance; rather do they see in it the divine guarantee for the truth that the person of Jesus and the cause which he represented could not remain under the power of death, but must of necessity at last gain the victory over all enemies in spite of every apparent momentary triumph.

It seems accordingly in logic inevitable that if at any time it should come to be recognised that the resurrection of Jesus never happened, the Christian faith with respect to all the points just mentioned would necessarily come to an end.

The shock to which the Christian religion and the Christian church would be exposed by any such discovery would appear to be all the heavier when it is reflected that only two other propositions can be named which would place it in equal or greater danger; the one, that the death of Jesus did not procure the salvation of mankind, the other that Jesus never existed at all. The first of these two theses would leave many schools of thought within the limits of Christianity comparatively unaffected, for they find the redeeming work of Jesus in his life, not, as Paul and orthodox theologians generally, in his death; on the other hand their faith would be most seriously affected if they found themselves constrained to recognise that Jesus remained under the power of death.

The reason for dreading all these dangers is that upon the assumption of the resurrection of Jesus (as also upon that of his atoning death and upon that of his existence at all) are based propositions which are fundamental to the Christian faith,—propositions concerning God and his relation to men, upon the truth of which no less an issue depends than the salvation of mankind. The question concerns things of priceless value, and the judgments upon which all interest concentrates are (to use the language of modern German theologians) Werthurtheile—i.e., judgments which declare that to be able to believe such and such is for the religious man a thing of absolute value; unless such things can be accepted he can only despair. Thus the believing man can cherish no more urgent desire than that the basis upon which these beliefs, which are for him so priceless, rest should be raised securely above the reach of doubt.

Yet what is this basis? It consists in an affirmation regarding a fact in history which is known to us only through tradition and accordingly is open to historical criticism just as any other fact is. Indeed, whilst the very existence of Jesus and the fact of his death on the cross have been questioned by only a very few,[1] and on the other hand the meaning of his death, as soon as the fact has been admitted, is left an open question to every one, we find that the resurrection of Jesus—as is not surprising in view of its supernatural character—is in very many quarters and with growing distinctness characterised as unhistorical, and that not merely when it is conceived of as having been a revivification of the dead body of Jesus, but also when it is defended in some spiritualistic form.

The present examination of the subject will not start from the proposition that 'miracles are impossible.'

Such a proposition rests upon a theory of the universe (Weltanschauung), not upon exhaustive examination of all the events which may be spoken of as miracles. Even should we by any chance find ourselves in a position to say that every alleged miraculous occurrence from the beginning of time down to the present hour had been duly examined and found non-miraculous, we should not thereby be secured against the possibility of something occurring to-morrow which we should be compelled to recognise as a miracle. Empirically, only so much as this stands fast—and no more—that as regards present-day occurrences the persons who reckon with the possibility of a miracle (by miracle we here throughout understand an occurrence that unquestionably is against natural law) are very few, and that present-day occurrences which are represented as miraculous are on closer examination invariably found to possess no such character.

The normal procedure of the historian accordingly in dealing with the events of the past will be in the first instance to try whether a non-miraculous explanation will serve, and to come to the other conclusion only on the strength of quite unexceptionable testimony. Needless to say, in doing so, he must be free from all prepossession. He must accordingly, where biblical authors are concerned, in the first instance, look at their statements in the light of their own presuppositions, even though in the end he may find himself shut up to the conclusion that not only the statements but also the presuppositions are erroneous.

I. NARRATIVES EXAMINED

For our most authentic information on the subject of [1] Loman, who in 1881 altogether denied the existence of Jesus, affirmed it in 1884 and still more distinctly in 1887. Amongst those who have most recently maintained the negative may be named Edwin Johnson, the author of Antiqua Mater (anonymous; 1887) and The Rise of Christendom (1890), and John M. Robertson, Christianity and Mythology (1900) and A Short History of Christianity (1902).

2. Gospel narratives of resurrection compared.

the resurrection of Jesus we naturally look to the Gospels ; these, however, exhibit contradictions of the most glaring kind. Reimarus, whose work was published by Lessing as Wolfenbütteler Fragmente, enumerated ten contradictions ; but in reality their number is much greater. (Mk. 16 9-20 is not taken account of in this place ; see below, § 8.)

(a) Of the watch and seal set upon the sepulchre, and of the bribing of the soldiers of the watch, we read only in Mt. (27 62-66 28 4 11-15). In Mk. and Lk. these features are not only not mentioned ; they are excluded by the representation of the women as intending to anoint the body and (in Mk. at least) as foreseeing difficulty only in the weight of the stone, not in the presence of a military guard. In Mt. the women's object is simply to see the sepulchre (28 1) ; they have therefore heard of its being guarded, as in fact they very easily could.

(b) According to Lk. (23 54 56) the women got ready the spices before sunset on Friday ; according to Mk. (16 1) they did not buy them till after sunset on Saturday. In Jn. the incident does not occur at all, for according to 19 38-40 Joseph of Arimathæa and Nicodemus have already embalmed the body before laying it in the grave, whilst according to Mk. 15 46 = Mt. 27 59 f. = Lk. 23 53 Joseph alone (without Nicodemus) simply wrapped it in a fine linen cloth.

(c) The persons who come to the sepulchre on the morning of the resurrection are : according to Mk. (16 1), Mary Magdalene, Mary of James (cp MARY, §§ 26 23), and Salome ; according to Mt. (28 1) only the two Marys (the designation 'the other Mary' is explained by 27 56) ; according to Lk. (24 10), in addition to the two Marys, Joanna (cp 8 3) 'and the other women with them' ; according to Jn. (20 1) only Mary Magdalene,[1] to whom, however, are added Peter and the beloved disciple. In agreement with this last we have only the notice in Lk. (24 24) that after the women 'some of those with us' (τινὲς τῶν σὺν ἡμῖν) had gone to the sepulchre and had found the report of the women to be true ; also the notice in 24 12 (a verse not found in the 'western' MSS) according to which Peter ran, after the visit of the women, to the sepulchre, and stooping down beheld the linen clothes alone, and wondering departed. This verse, though we can hardly suppose it to have come from Jn. 20 3-8, is still open to the suspicion of being a later interpolation,—all the more because the mention of Peter alone does not harmonise with the 'some' (τινές) of v. 24, and 'them' (αὐτῶν) of v. 13 connects with v. 11, not with v. 12.

(d) The time of the visit of the women to the sepulchre is : in Mk. (16 2) 'when the sun was risen,' in Lk. (24 1, 'at early dawn') and Jn. (20 1, 'early, when it was yet dark') before sunrise, but in Mt. (28 1) about half a day earlier.

'Late on the Sabbath' (ὀψὲ σαββάτων) means unquestionably, according to the Jewish division of the day, the time about sunset, and the words immediately following— τῇ ἐπιφωσκούσῃ εἰς μίαν σαββάτων, 'as the light shone forth towards the first day of the week' (see WEEK, § 7)—are elucidated by Lk. 23 54, where the transition from the Jewish Friday to Saturday (Sabbath)—in other words the time of sunset—is indicated by the expression σάββατον ἐπέφωσκεν, 'the Sabbath shone forth.' This expression is usually explained by reference to the custom of kindling the lights somewhat before the beginning of the Sabbath because on the Sabbath it was unlawful to do so. Keim, however (Gesch. Jesu von Nazara, 3 552 f.; ET 6 303), produces evidence of the same usus loquendi for the other days of the week ; and this will cover the case of its employment in Mt. The word 'by night,' νυκτός, in 28 13 also goes to show that Mt. pictured to himself the journey of the women to the sepulchre and the opening of the sepulchre of the earthquake (or the angel) as having happened by night. Furthermore it is conceivable that Mt. should have been brought to this divergence to the extent of half a day from the account by the other evangelists precisely if he had followed Mk. with strict precision. For in point of fact Mk. indicates, first (16 1), sunset by the phrase 'when the Sabbath was past' (διαγενομένου τοῦ σαββάτου) and, next (16 2) mentions sunrise ; his reference to sunset is in connection with the purchase of the spices, a circumstance which Mt. had no occasion to notice. Thus Mt. might come to look upon the second time-determination as synonymous with the first, inasmuch as the actual words 'very early on the first day of the week' (λίαν πρωὶ τῇ μιᾷ τῶν σαββάτων), if the Jewish division of the day is assumed, does not absolutely exclude such a view. Cp, further, § 26 a.

(e) According to Mk. (16 4), Lk. (24 2), and Jn. (20 1) those who came to the sepulchre found that the stone at the door had already been rolled away ; according to Mt. (28 2) it was rolled back in the presence of the women by an angel who in a great earthquake came down from heaven.

(f) In Mk. (16 5-7), as in Mt. (28 2-7), there is only one angel ; in Lk. (24 4-7) and Jn. (20 12 f.) there are two (in Lk. called 'men,' ἄνδρες, but 'in dazzling apparel,' ἐν ἐσθῆτι ἀστραπτούσῃ, somewhat as in Mt. 28 3 Mk. 16 5).

(g) According to Mk. this one angel, according to Jn. the two, sat in the sepulchre ; according to Mt. the one angel sits without the sepulchre upon the stone ; according to Lk. the two come up to the women, to all appearance not until these have already left the sepulchre.

(h) As for what was seen in the sepulchre, according to Mk. (16 5) it was only the angel, and according to Lk. (24 3), at least when the women entered, there was nothing. According to Mt. (28 2-5) the women do not inform themselves as to the condition of the grave. Similarly Mary Magdalene, according to Jn. 20 1, at her first visit. Thereafter the beloved disciple is the first to look in, when he sees the linen clothes (20 5) ; next Peter enters and sees besides the linen clothes the napkin wrapped up in a place by itself (20 6 f.). Finally, Mary looks in and sees the two angels.

(i) The explanations given by the angels to the women contain the one point in the whole narrative in which there is, at least in the synoptics, complete agreement (v. 6) : 'he rose, he is not here' (ἠγέρθη, οὐκ ἔστιν ὧδε). To this in Mk. and Mt. there is the preface : 'fear ye not' ; the same two also have the words 'ye seek the crucified one' (similarly in Lk.). In Jn. the angels say merely (20 13) : 'Woman, why weepest thou ?'

(k) The discrepancies in the instructions given to the women are among the most violent in the whole account : in Mk. and Mt. there is the injunction to say to his disciples (Mk. adds : 'and to Peter') that Jesus goes before them to Galilee and that there they will see him as he had said to them (in Mt. 28 7 also perhaps we ought to read, 'behold, he said to you,' ἰδοὺ εἶπεν ὑμῖν); in Lk. on the other hand what we read is 'remember how he spake before of his death and resurrection while he was yet in Galilee.' Here, that is to say, still the word Galilee, but the sense quite opposite. In Lk. strictly there is no injunction at all (cp under r) and in Jn. we find no words which could even seem to answer to the command in Mk. and Mt.

(l) No less marked are the differences as to the announcements made by the women to the disciples. According to Lk. (24 9) they report their discovery ; according to Mt. (28 8) they intend to do so, and v. 16 leaves it to be inferred that they carried out their intention ; according to Jn. (20 2 18) Mary Magdalene reports, in the first instance to the two disciples, and in the second to the disciples at large, what she has seen. On the other hand, according to Mk. 16 8 the women out of fear say nothing to any one.

(m) As regards results of the message, in the last case of course, that in Mk., where the women say nothing, there can be no immediate consequence. According to Mt. (28 16) the message issues in immediate compliance with the command to go to Galilee; according to Jn. (20 3-10) Mary's first communication leads to the running of the two disciples to the sepulchre, whilst her second (20 18) is not said to have produced any effect. In Lk. (24 11) the women's statement produces merely the unbelief of the disciples, unless we are to regard as genuine v. 12, according to which Peter alone of the whole number hastens to the grave (see above, c).

[1] It must not be inferred from the plural, 'we do not know' (οὐκ οἴδαμεν : 20 2), that Jn. thought of other women as also present. The inference is excluded by the sing. 'comes' (ἔρχεται) of v. 1. The pl. 'we know' (οἴδαμεν) therefore can only be intended to express Mary Magdalene's thought that other Christians in whom perhaps some knowledge of the facts might be presumed did not actually possess it any more than herself—if it is not an unconscious reminiscence of the 'women' of the Synoptics. In 20 13 we find correctly the singular : 'I know not.'

(n) An appearance of the risen Jesus at the sepulchre itself is reported only in Jn. (20 14-17), where it is made to Mary Magdalene; an appearance on the way back from the sepulchre to the city only in Mt. (28 9 f.), where it is made to the two Marys. Whilst in this last case, however, the women embrace Jesus' feet, in Jn. he does not permit Mary Magdalene to touch him.

(o) The injunction received from Jesus himself is according to Mt. the same as that given by the angels. The women are to direct the disciples, here called 'brethren' (ἀδελφοί) by Jesus, to go to Galilee; according to Jn. Mary Magdalene is simply bidden tell his 'brethren' (ἀδελφοί) that he is ascending to heaven (cp above, k).

(p) An appearance of Jesus on the day of the resurrection on the road to Emmaus is known only to Lk. (24 13-35).

(q) An appearance to Simon Peter before the evening of the same day is known only to Lk. (24 34).

The view of Origen (for the passages see in Resch, TU v. 4 423 and x. 3 770-782), that the third evangelist says, and rightly, that Simon was the companion of Cleopas on the walk to Emmaus, is quite inadmissible. As in Origen the name is constantly used without any addition, it is evident that only Peter can be intended. It has to be observed on the other hand, however, that the announcement of an appearance of the risen Jesus to Simon is made, and made by the eleven (and their companions), to the two disciples on their return from Emmaus. For this reason, therefore, Resch prefers to read 'saying' in the nominative (λέγοντες for λέγοντας) with cod. D, according to which it is the Emmaus disciples who make the announcement. To this it has to be remarked that neither Lk. nor Origen, in view of 24 31 35, can have intended to say that Jesus had appeared in Emmaus to Peter only and not to Cleopas also. If, again, by the Simon in Origen's MSS of Lk. we ought to understand some disciple other than Peter, such a conjecture would be quite as baseless as that other guess of Church fathers and Scholiasts (see Tisch. on 24 18) that the companion of Cleopas was Nathanael, or the evangelist Luke, or a certain Am(m)aon, whose name perhaps comes from the place-name Emmaus.[1]

(r) An appearance on the same evening to the eleven and their companions (τοὺς ἕνδεκα καὶ τοὺς σὺν αὐτοῖς), at which Jesus asks the disciples to touch his hands and feet, and eats a piece of a broiled fish, is recorded by Lk. (24 33 36-51). The disciples are at this interview enjoined by Jesus to remain in Jerusalem till Pentecost (cp above, k). Jn. also (20 19-24) assigns an appearance before the 'disciples' to the same evening, and we must presume, therefore, that here the same interview is intended as that related by Lk. The circumstances, however, are very different. In Jn. Thomas is expressly stated not to have been with the eleven; and that the number of the 'disciples' included others than the ten apostles as we read in Lk. (οἱ σὺν αὐτοῖς) is not to be supposed, since Jesus solemnly sends them forth (πέμπω ὑμᾶς) and imparts to them not only the gift of the Holy Spirit (which in Lk. v. 49 he holds forth as a promise for Pentecost) but also the authority to bestow or withhold forgiveness of sins (cp MINISTRY, §§ 4, 34 c). Lk. makes no reference to the circumstance that the doors were shut when Jesus entered, any more than he does to the conferring of the authority just mentioned; Jn. on the other hand knows nothing of Jesus having eaten. Besides his hands, Jesus shows not his feet but his side—the piercing of which, indeed, is mentioned only in Jn. 19 34; but he does not suffer himself to be touched, yet without expressly forbidding this as he had done in the case of Mary Magdalene.

(s) Jesus first suffers his hands and his side to be touched eight days afterwards, by Thomas in presence of 'his disciples'; but this is mentioned only in Jn. (20 26-29) and after he has again entered the same house (πάλιν ἦσαν ἔσω) through closed doors.

(t) 'After these things' (μετὰ ταῦτα), but only according to Jn. 21, Jesus appears once more by the lake of Galilee to Peter, Thomas, Nathanael, the sons of Zebedee, and two other disciples who are not named.

(u) Galilee also, but certainly at an earlier date, was the scene of the appearance, recorded only in Mt. (28 16-20), to the eleven on the mountain to which Jesus had directed them to go (when and where he made the appointment is nowhere stated, but seems to have been recorded in a source that was used at this point). Jesus here enjoins upon them the mission to the Gentiles and baptism in the name of the Trinity. The missionary precept is in substantial agreement with Lk. 24 49 and also with Jn. 20 21 (see above, r).[1]

3. Extent of discrepancies.

That one and the same event should be to some extent differently described even by eye-witnesses is intelligible enough, as also that some particular incident connected with it should in later reminiscence be erroneously dissociated from it and attached to some other similar event.

(a) Thus no serious importance ought, for example, to be given to the circumstance that the words in which the disciples are bidden by the angel to betake themselves to Galilee, do not exactly agree in the different accounts, and that one narrator assigns the missionary precept to one appearance, another to another. To this, however, there are limits.

Whether the sepulchre was guarded or not guarded, how many women went to the sepulchre, whether or not the disciples were bidden go to Galilee, whether or not when Jesus appeared Mary Magdalene was alone, whether or not Thomas was present, whether or not Jesus asked for food and then actually partook of it, whether or not he allowed himself to be touched; above all, whether the appearances occurred in Jerusalem or in Galilee, and whether the women reported what they had seen at the sepulchre or were silent about it—these and many other points are matters with regard to which the eye-witnesses or those who had their information directly from eye-witnesses, could not possibly have been in the least uncertainty. Yet, what differences! Differences, too, of which it is impossible to say that they are partly explicable by the fact that one narrator gives one occurrence and another another without wishing thereby to exclude all the rest. Lk. enumerates a consecutive series of appearances and brings it to a close (24 51) with the express statement that Jesus parted from them; and all these occurrences are represented as having happened on one and the same day. In Jn., on the other hand, the events of the twentieth chapter alone require eight days. Mt. and Mk. know of appearances to disciples only in Galilee, Lk. and Jn. 20 only of appearances in Jerusalem and its neighbourhood (Emmaus), neither of the last-named evangelists taking any account whatever of any appearances in Galilee—not till Jn. 21 do we come upon one of this description; but this chapter is by another hand (see JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, § 40).

[1] The harmonistic attempt to dispose of this appearance in Galilee by maintaining that Galilee here means one of the summits of the Mount of Olives near Jerusalem—whether the summit on the N. or that called in 2 K. 23 13 the 'mount of corruption' (see DESTRUCTION, MOUNT OF; OLIVES, MOUNT OF, § 5), by which supposition Mt. 28 16 is brought into agreement with Lk. 24 50 Acts 1 12, has its basis only on assertions of mediæval pilgrims. The matter is not improved by the purely conjectural assumption of Resch (TU x. 2 381-389 x. 3 765 f.) that in Mt. 28 16 and already in 26 32 28 7 10 = Mk. 14 28 16 7, 'Galilee' (Γαλιλαία) is a wrong rendering of the gĕlīlā (גְּלִילָה) in the original Hebrew gospel postulated by him, the neighbourhood of Jerusalem (περίχωρος Mt. 3 5 Mk. 1 28, etc.) being what was really intended. In Tertullian's (Apol. 21) 'cum discipulis quibusdam apud Galilæam Judææ regionem ad quadraginta dies egit' Resch even finds Galilæa used as the name of this district (see, against this, Schürer, TLZ, 1897, p. 187 f.). That, further, the Mount of Olives belonged to this district Resch accepts from the mediæval pilgrims; and that it constituted the central point of the district, so that the disciples could at once understand by the 'district' to which (according to Mk. 16 7 = Mt. 28 7 10) they were directed the Mount of Olives, as being the 'mountain where Jesus had appointed them' (τὸ ὄρος οὗ ἐτάξατο αὐτοῖς ὁ Ἰησοῦς: 28 16), he derives from his own authority. The Acta Pilati and the Gesta Pilati, finally, which place the ascension of Jesus at once in Galilee and on the Mount of Olives, embody no true geographical recollection but only a quite crude harmonistic attempt (cp the passages in Zahn, Gesch. d. Kanons, 2 937; also Thilo, Cod. Apocr. NT 1 617-622). See also MATTHIAS.

(b) Refuge is often sought in the reflection that sometimes an event may, after all, have actually happened, even if the accounts of it are quite discrepant. A famous illustration often quoted in this connection is the case of Hannibal, who quite certainly did cross the Alps, although Livy's account of the route taken by him is entirely different from that of Polybius. Most assuredly. The fact, however, that, whatever be the contradictions of chroniclers, he actually did cross the Alps is a certainty for us, only because we know for certain that at one date he was to be found on the Gallic side, and at a subsequent date on the Italian. If it were just as clearly made out that Jesus, after his death, came back again to this life, we could, indeed, in that case, with an easy mind, leave the differences between the narratives to settle themselves. Here, however, the position of matters is that the actuality of the resurrection of Jesus depends for its establishment upon these very narratives; and in such a case unimpeachable witnesses are naturally demanded.

Livy and Polybius lived centuries after the occurrence which they relate, and they were dependent for their facts upon written sources which perhaps were wanting in accuracy, and, moreover, were themselves in turn derived from inadequate sources. If any deficiency, even of only an approximately similar character, has to be admitted in the acquaintance of the writers of the gospels with the circumstances of the resurrection of Jesus, there is little prospect of anyone being induced to accept it as a fact, on the strength of such testimony, unless he has from the beginning been predisposed to do so without any testimony. And as a matter of fact we cannot avoid the conclusion from the contradictions between the gospels that the writers of them were far removed from the event they describe. If we possessed only one gospel, we might perhaps be inclined to accept it; but how far astray should we be according to the view of Lk. if we relied, let us say, on Mt. alone, or, according to the view of Jn., if we pinned our faith to Lk. In point of fact, not only do the evangelists each follow different narratives; they also each have distinct theories of their own as to Galilee or Jerusalem being the scene of the appearances, as to whether Jesus ate and was touched, and so forth (cp § 19 a, 27 c, d).

Shall we then betake ourselves to extra-canonical sources? Of these, several are often regarded as superior to the canonical in antiquity; so, for example, the Gospel of the Hebrews. This view, however, so far as the extant fragments at least are concerned, is distinctly not warranted (see GOSPELS, § 155).

4. Gospel of the Hebrews.

(a) For our present discussion the following citation by Jerome (Vir. ill. 2) from this gospel comes into consideration:—

'The Lord after he had given the cloth to the slave of the priest, went to James and appeared to him; for James had sworn that he would not eat bread from that hour in which he had drunk the cup of the Lord until he should see him rising again from them that sleep'; and again after a little: 'Bring, says the Lord, food and bread,' and immediately there is added: 'he brought bread and blessed and break and gave to James the Just and said to him: My brother, eat thy bread, because the son of man has risen again from them that sleep.' ('Dominus autem cum dedisset sindonem servo sacerdotis, ivit ad Jacobum et apparuit ei; juraverat enim Jacobus se non comesurum panem ab illa hora qua biberat calicem domini donec videret eum resurgentem a dormientibus'; rursusque post paululum: 'afferte, ait dominus, mensam et panem,' statimque additur: 'tulit panem et benedixit ac fregit et dedit Jacobo Justo et dixit ei: frater mi, comede panem tuum, quia resurrexit filius hominis a dormientibus.'

This story is, to begin with, untrustworthy, because, according to the canonical gospels, James was not present at all at the last supper of Jesus.[1]

Lightfoot's conjecture (Gal.(4) 266 = Dissert. on Apost. Age, p. 26) that 'dominus' ought to be read for 'domini' seems, indeed, to be supported by some ecclesiastical writers (see in Handmann, TU v. 3 79-82) who reproduce the passage in this sense; but it is by no means certain. 'The Lord had drunk the cup' (biberat calicem dominus) would then have reference to the death of Jesus; such a figurative expression, however, is little in keeping with the simple narrative style of the fragment. Moreover, the bread which Jesus 'blesses and breaks' clearly answers to the bread of the eucharist, and this is to the point if James had eaten nothing since being present at the last supper. Earlier students may have perceived the contradiction between the reading 'of the Lord' (domini) and the canonical narratives just as easily as Lightfoot, and on this account have substituted 'the Lord' (dominus: in the nom.).

(b) Nor is the Gospel of the Hebrews wanting at other points in equally bold contradictions to the canonical gospels. Jesus is represented as having given his linen garment to the servant of the high priest. This (apart from what we read in the Gospel of Peter; see below, § 5 b) is the only appearance, anywhere recorded, of Jesus to a non-believer. What enormous importance would it not possess, were it only historical! How could the evangelists, and Paul, possibly have suffered it to escape them? It is, however, only too easily conceivable that they knew nothing at all about it.

In order to reach James it was first necessary for Jesus, according to our fragment, to walk; but it was not so in the case of the servant of the high priest, who must, accordingly, be thought of as having been in the immediate neighbourhood of the sepulchre. What was he doing there? The most likely conjecture will be that he was taking part in the watching of the sepulchre. This, however, means yet another step beyond the already unhistorical canonical account (below, § 20), in so far as according to Mt. 27 62 66 the chief priests and Pharisees took part only in the sealing of the stone at the door of the sepulchre, and has its parallel in the part taken by the presbyters in the watching of the sepulchre according to the Gospel of Peter (38), which, as regards this part of the narrative, goes still another step farther than the canonical account (see below, § 5 a). It has further to be remarked that the linen cloth was the only clothing the body had when it was laid in the tomb (§ 2 b); Jn. 19 40 20 5-7, which speaks of several cloths, is plainly not taken into account in the gospel of the Hebrews. This being so it would have been too great an offence against decorum that Jesus should have given this garment to the servant of the high priest. It will therefore be necessary to suppose that he had already assumed another form. In that case also, however, the handing over of the garment to the servant makes an advance upon the canonical account. The synoptists, in reporting the resurrection, make no mention of the cloth at all, and in Jn. the clothes are all found lying in the sepulchre, which at all events better accords with the reserve with which the mystery of the resurrection is treated than would be the case if we were asked to believe that Jesus had brought the cloth with him from the sepulchre as a trophy and deposited it as an ultimate proof of his resurrection. Lastly, it has to be remembered how violently the gospel of the Hebrews, although in agreement with Paul (1 Cor. 15 7) as regards an appearance to James, also conflicts with that apostle in so far as it makes out this appearance to have been the first; also how natural it was that precisely in a gospel for Hebrews James, the head of the church at Jerusalem, should be glorified by means of some such narrative as this.

(c) In Ignatius (ad Smyrn. 3 2) we meet with the following passage:—'and when he came to those about Peter he said to them, Take, handle me and see that I am not a demon without a body. And straightway they touched him and believed' (καὶ ὅτε πρὸς τοὺς περὶ Πέτρον ἦλθεν, ἔφη αὐτοῖς· λάβετε ψηλαφήσατέ με καὶ ἴδετε ὅτι οὐκ εἰμὶ δαιμόνιον ἀσώματον. καὶ εὐθὺς αὐτοῦ ἥψαντο καὶ ἐπίστευσαν). Eusebius (HE iii. 36 11) confesses that he does not know where Ignatius can have taken this from. Jerome (Vir. ill. 16), on the other hand, informs us that it comes from the Gospel of the Hebrews (only he wrongly names the Epistle of Ignatius to Polycarp, not that to the Smyrnæans).

Brandt (390-395; see below, § 39) plausibly conjectures that the quotation belongs to the passage, quoted above under a, marked by Jerome by the words 'again after a little' ('rursus post paululum'): Jesus appeared to James, then went with him to Peter and his companions, permitted himself to be touched there, and ordered food to be brought, and so forth. We hear of the invitation to touch him in Lk. 24 39, and that passage, not Jn. 20 27, must be the one in view since nothing is said about Thomas, and on the other hand 'bodiless dæmon' (δαιμόνιον ἀσώματον) agrees with the 'spirit' (πνεῦμα) of Lk. or with the 'appearance' (φάντασμα, v. 37) which is the reading of D and of Marcion,—of Marcion because in point of fact he really regarded the risen Jesus as a spirit (πνεῦμα). This second fragment, accordingly, conveys nothing new. Lk. may unhesitatingly be regarded as its source. See, further, below, § 9 a.

In the fragment of the Gospel of Peter discovered in

[1] On the simple statement, 'he appeared to James,' 1 Cor. 15 7, see § 11 c.

1892 various scholars, and particularly Harnack, have discerned a maximum of really ancient matter ('a first-class source').[1] It is to be observed, however, that, (a) as regards the watch set on the sepulchre, the Peter fragment goes still further beyond the canonical account than the Gospel to the Hebrews does (see § 4 b).

5. Gospel of Peter.

Not only do the elders of the Jews keep watch along with the Roman soldiers; the writer also is able to give the name of the officer in command of the guard (Petronius) and to inform his readers that the stone at the door of the sepulchre was sealed with seven seals, and that a booth was erected for the use of the guard. What is still more surprising, the soldiers report the occurrence of the resurrection not to the chief priests but to Pilate,—precisely the person from whom, according to Mt. 28 14, all knowledge of the fact ought if possible to have been withheld,—and it is Pilate who, at the request of the Jews, enjoins silence on the soldiers (28-49).

(b) The actual resurrection of Jesus, which in the canonical accounts is, with noticeable reserve, always only indicated as having occurred already, never described, is here represented as having occurred before the very eyes of the Roman and Jewish watchers, and, indeed, in a way which can only be described as grotesque (35-44).

During the night the heavens open, two men (youths) come down in dazzling splendour, the stone rolls away of its own accord, the two youths enter the sepulchre, three men re-emerge, two of them supporting the third, the heads of the two reach to the sky, that of the third goes beyond it (cp Wisd. 18 16); a cross follows them, and to the question heard from heaven 'Hast thou preached to the dead?' it answers 'Yea'; the heavens open once more, a man comes down and enters the sepulchre (this is the angel whom the women see there next morning). This, however, is not all; in v. 19 after the cry of Jesus 'My Strength, my Strength, thou hast abandoned me' (ἡ δύναμίς μου, ἡ δύναμίς μου, κατέλειψάς με—thus, in all probability, by way of toning down the expression of God-forsakenness) we find the words 'and when he had spoken he was taken up' (καὶ εἰπὼν ἀνελήφθη), which can hardly be understood otherwise than as meaning a taking up into heaven.[2] This last, therefore, is twice related in our fragment; for that Jesus goes into heaven along with the two angels is made clear by the word of the angel to the women (v. 56): 'he is risen and has gone thither whence he was sent' (ἀνέστη καὶ ἀπῆλθεν ἐκεῖ ὅθεν ἀπεστάλη).

(c) The account of what Mary Magdalene and 'her friends' found at the sepulchre (50-57) is essentially in agreement with what we read in Mk. So, also, the statement that they flee filled with fear, without our being told that they related to any one what had occurred. On the closing day of the paschal festival 'the twelve disciples' are still weeping and mourning in Jerusalem (58 f.).

(d) On this closing day the disciples betake themselves each to his home, that is to say, to Galilee. For in v. 60 the narrative proceeds: 'but I, Simon Peter, and Andrew . . . went (to fish) to the sea, and with us were Levi the son of Alphæus whom the Lord . . .' (here the fragment breaks off). Plainly the continuation related an appearance of Jesus by the sea of Galilee, such as we meet with in Jn. 21. Yet in Jn. it is precisely Andrew and Levi who are not mentioned.[3]

(e) The element here that admits of being regarded as especially old is that the first appearance of Jesus occurs in Galilee and to Peter. Hardly, however, to Peter alone as is stated by Paul (1 Cor. 15 5) and Lk. (24 34). Furthermore, it might seem to be original here that the first appearance does not occur until more than eight days after the death of Jesus. Such, however, cannot be regarded with certainty as the meaning of the fragment.

Unquestionably the writer is in error if he thinks that on the last day of the paschal festival many pilgrims, and also the apostles, set out for their homes; for this day fell in that year on a Sabbath, and even if, that had not been so, it had the validity of a Sabbath and thus precluded the possibility of travelling. Another evidence of ignorance or carelessness in matters of chronology is seen in v. 27, where, after describing the burial of Jesus, Peter goes on to say: 'we fasted and sat mourning and weeping day and night (νυκτὸς καὶ ἡμέρας) until the Sabbath,' although the writer, according to v. 30, rightly dates the death of Jesus on the evening of Friday. If this be so, it is not impossible that he may have regarded the paschal festival as one not of eight days' duration, but of only two. The Sabbath is rightly regarded by him as the first day of the feast; in v. 50 he mentions the Sunday (κυριακή) as the day on which the women visited the sepulchre; and immediately after the words 'the women fled full of fear,' he proceeds in v. 58 to add: 'and it was the last of the days of unleavened bread' (ἦν δὲ τελευταία ἡμέρα τῶν ἀζύμων). Although the possibility is not excluded that these words transplant us to a later date, it still remains the most natural interpretation of the form of expression to suppose the meaning to be: 'but at that time (when the women fled) it was the last of the days,' etc. Thus it is impossible at least to be quite certain that an interval of more than eight days between the resurrection and the first appearance of Jesus is intended. Besides, as we shall afterwards discover (see below, § 22 d), it has not the smallest inherent probability.

(f) On the whole, then, what we have to say with regard to the gospel of Peter must be that, inasmuch as the greater part of its contents is of a legendary character, we cannot rely upon anything we find in it merely because it is found in the gospel of Peter. If the reader by any chance finds any statements contained in it to be credible, he does so on grounds of inherent probability alone, and must ask, almost in astonishment, how by any possibility a statement of such a kind could have found its way hither. Moreover, the data which come most nearly under this category are already known to us from canonical sources:—such as that the resurrection and the ascension were but one and the same act (§ 16 e), that the disciples received from the women no word as to the state of the sepulchre, and that the first appearance of the risen Jesus was in Galilee (Mk. 16 7 f. Mt. 28 7 16 f.). The sole statement worthy of credence met with in the gospel of Peter and nowhere else is that found in v. 27—that the disciples fasted (cp § 36 a). In Peter, however, we can have no certainty that the author is drawing upon authentic tradition; he may very easily have drawn upon his own imagination for this realistic touch.

There remains yet one other extant account of the resurrection by a writer who in like manner did not feel himself bound to follow the canonical accounts; it occurs in a Coptic book of anti-Gnostic tendency, found at Akhmîm in Egypt, and described by Carl Schmidt (SBAW, 1895, pp. 705-711); the conversation of the risen Jesus with his disciples contained in it has been reproduced and discussed by Harnack (Theol. Studien für B. Weiss, 1897, pp. 1-8), who dates it somewhere between 150 and 180 A.D.

6. Coptic resurrection narrative.

The contents are as follows:—Mary, Martha, and Mary Magdalene wish to anoint the body of Jesus, but find the sepulchre empty. Jesus appears to them and says: 'I am he whom ye seek,' and bids that one of them go to their brethren and say 'Come, the Master is risen.' Martha does so, but meets with no credence, and Mary, whom Jesus sends after Martha has reported her failure, has no better success. Finally Jesus himself goes along with the women, calls the disciples out, and, as

[2] Cp Acts 1 11 Mk. 16 19. Ss also, which in Mk. 15 37 Lk. 23 46 rightly says '(Jesus) expired (or, ended),' has in Mt. 27 50 'his spirit went up'; and Origen (Comm. in Mt. series [Lat.], ed. de la Rue, 3 928 b, § 140) 'statim ut clamavit ad patrem receptus est.'

[3] As regards Levi, Resch (TU x. 8 829-832 x. 4 196) tries to controvert this, maintaining Levi's identity with Matthew (Mk. 2 14 ‖ Mt. 9 9), whom in turn, on account of the like meaning of the two names, he identifies with Nathanael who appears in Jn. 21 2. Of these two identifications, however, even that of Levi with Matthew is questioned, and complete identity in the meanings of two names can never be held to prove the identity of the bearers. Cp PHILIP, col. 3701, n. 1; NATHANAEL. The attempt may be made, without such identifications of different names, to maintain the identity of the fact recorded in the Gospel of Peter with that recorded in Jn.; this may be done by pointing to the possibility that Andrew and Levi may be intended by the two unnamed disciples in Jn. 21 2. It is an attempt which would to a certain extent be plausible but only if a fact might really be assumed which both writers wish to describe. But Jn. 21 1-14 is open to the suspicion of being, not a description of a fact, but rather the clothing of an idea; and we may suspect, in particular, that the two unnamed disciples were added only in order to gain the complete number 'seven' (below, § 29 c; SIMON PETER, § 22 c). Therefore, to identify with the account in the Gospel of Peter (to which Gospel the idea intended in Jn. was presumably quite foreign), the identification being based on so slender a foundation, would be very imprudent.

they still continue to be in doubt, bids Peter, Thomas, and Andrew touch his hands, his side, and his feet respectively, citing also Wisd. 18 17. Then they confess their sins, especially their unbelief.

This narrative contains much that is new, but nothing that could claim greater credibility than the canonical gospels. An appearance of Jesus occurs at the sepulchre, not, however, to one woman or two, as in Jn. and Mt. respectively, but to three; so also the unbelief of the disciples dwelt on in Lk. 24 11 37 (41) reappears in intensified form, and in addition to Thomas two other disciples are bidden touch the wounds of Jesus.

Other isolated details also, differing from those commonly current, have come down to us from a time, presumably, in which older traditions still continued to produce after-effects.

7. Isolated extra-canonical details.

(a) Cod. Bobbiensis (k) has this interpolation before Mk. 16 4 (see Old Latin Biblical Texts, 2 22): 'Suddenly, however, at the third hour, darkness came on by day throughout the whole world and angels came down from heaven and will rise (read: and rising) in the brightness of the living God went up with him, and forthwith it was light' ('subito autem ad horam tertiam tenebræ diei factæ sunt per totum orbem terræ et descenderunt de cœlis angeli et surgent (read: surgentes) in claritate vivi dei simul ascenderunt cum eo et continuo lux facta est'). This about the angels agrees with the Gospel of Peter (see above, § 5 b), except that there the event occurs during the night, whilst in cod. k we are bidden think of it as preceded by an eclipse and therefore as happening by day—at the third hour, in other words at 9 A.M.

It is, however, hard to believe that the interpolator actually supposed that the women took some three hours (from sunrise) to consider who should roll away the stone (16 2). Perhaps the time datum is the result of a confusion. This would be all the easier because a darkness is elsewhere reported as having occurred at the crucifixion—although, to be sure, in the afternoon from twelve till three (so also in Gospel of Peter, 15, 22).

If we leave the darkness out of account and understand the third hour according to Roman and modern reckoning as three o'clock in the morning, then the final clause 'continuo lux facta est' agrees with both texts of the Anaphora Pilati (A, 9 = B, 8, in Tischendorf's Evang. Apocr.(2) 440, 447), according to which at this hour the sun rose, manifestly to mark the time of the resurrection.[1] So also agrees Lagarde's reconstruction of the Didaskalia, 5 14, which Resch (TU x. 3 756) quotes from Bunsen's Analecta Antenicæna, 2 313: that Jesus slept throughout the Sabbath and for three hours over and above. One has only to reckon the day in Roman fashion from midnight to midnight.

(b) In the Didaskalia (extant in Syriac), which came into existence in the third century, based upon older sources, we read (ed. Lagarde, 88 f., according to Resch, TU x. 3 761) that 'during the night before the dawn of the first day of the week Jesus appeared to Mary Magdalene and Mary the daughter of James, and in the morning of the first day of the week he entered the house of Levi, and then he appeared also to us; moreover he said to us while he was instructing us: Wherefore do ye fast on my account in these days?' and so on. Mention is made of Levi in the Gospel of Peter also (above, § 5 d), but in a wholly different connection. The fasting is also mentioned there (§ 5 [f]). The second Mary is called the daughter (not the mother) of James in Ss also.

(c) According to K, Syr.cur Syr.hieros, Vg. etc., in Lk. 24 43 Jesus gives what is left from what he ate (i.e., according to TR and AV, fish and an honeycomb) to the disciples.

(d) In Tatian's Diatessaron Capernaum is named in Mt. 28 16 instead of the mountain in Galilee. In the scene by the open sepulchre which Tatian gives after Jn. Mary is named without any addition, and Ephrem in his commentary understands this of Mary the mother of Jesus. This is indicated also by the fact that previously she has been entrusted by the crucified Jesus in the words of Jn. 19 26 f. to the beloved disciple. Nevertheless there may be a confusion here, as the Diatessaron elsewhere undoubtedly makes use of the canonical gospels.

(e) A Christian section of the Ascensio Jesaiæ (3 13-4 18; see SIMON PETER, § 27) presents a variation on the Gospel of Peter. Upon [the watch of] those who watched the sepulchre follows 'the descent of the angel of the church which is in heaven' (3 15: ἡ κατάβασις τοῦ ἀγγέλου τῆς ἐκκλησίας τῆς ἐν οὐρανῷ), and 'the angel of the Holy Spirit [Gabriel?], and Michael the chief of the holy angels on the third day will open the sepulchre and the Beloved sitting on their shoulders will come forth' (3 16 f.: ὁ ἄγγελος τοῦ πνεύματος τοῦ ἁγίου καὶ Μιχαὴλ ἄρχων τῶν ἀγγέλων τῶν ἁγίων τῇ τρίτῃ ἡμέρᾳ αὐτοῦ ἀνοίξουσιν τὸ μνημονεῖον καὶ ὁ ἀγαπητὸς καθίσας ἐπὶ τοὺς ὤμους αὐτῶν ἐξελεύσεται).

(f) From a still later date we have a recent notice of an apocryphal work, in a Georgian translation, belonging according to Harnack to the fifth or the sixth century; it relates to Joseph of Arimathæa, and we are told that its hero is expressly spoken of as the first to whom Jesus appeared. He had been thrown into prison by the Jews for having begged the body of Jesus (SBAW, 1901, pp. 920-931, and, more fully, von Dobschütz in Z. f. Kirchengesch. 23 1-27 [1902]).

In any event all these notices serve to show how busily and in how reckless a manner the accounts of the resurrection of Jesus continued to be handed on.

8. Mk. 16 9-20.

The shorter conclusion of Mk. (that headed Ἄλλως by WH) contents itself with simply saying the opposite of the statement (that the women said nothing to anyone of what they had seen and heard at the grave) in 16 8; but the longer conclusion gives a variety of details.

(a) A brief summary of its most important points has been given already (see GOSPELS, § 138 g); but it will be necessary to examine more closely some of the current views respecting it.

Rohrbach (see below, § 39), in his hypothesis based upon certain indications of Harnack, gives his adhesion to the opinion of Conybeare (Expos. 1893 b, pp. 241-254), that Mk. 16 9-20 is the work of the presbyter Aristion. We shall discuss this thesis in the form in which it has been adopted by Harnack (ACL ii. [= Chron.] 1 695-700). In order to displace the genuine conclusion of Mk. (see below, § 9) in favour of another which should be more in agreement with the other three gospels, and at the same time be the work of an authoritative person, the presbyters of the Johannine circle in Asia Minor who brought together the four gospels into a unity took a memorandum by the presbyter Aristion who, according to Papias, had been a personal disciple of Jesus (JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, § 4).

(b) Harnack and Rohrbach, in order to maintain the literary independence of Aristion, find it necessary to deny that Mk. 16 9-20 is a mere excerpt from the canonical gospels and other writings. In this, however, they cannot but fail. The borrowing, indeed, is not made word for word; in point of fact, however, even the smallest departure from the sources admits of explanation on grounds that are obvious. Verse 9 is compounded from Jn. 20 1 11-17 and Lk. 8 2; vv. 10 f. from Jn. 20 18 and Lk. 24 10 f.; v. 12 reproduces Lk. 24 13-32 and v. 13*a* Lk. 24 33 35. That the eleven did not believe the disciples from Emmaus (v. 13*b*) directly contradicts Lk. 24 34 it is true; but this is easily explicable from the view of the author that unbelief was the invariable effect of the accounts as to appearances of the risen Jesus—a view which (v. 14) he expressly puts into the mouth of Jesus himself. Thus it is by no means necessary to postulate an independent source; all that is needed is unity in the fundamental conception of the matter.

(c) Zahn (Einl. § 52 = 2 227-240) derives vv. 14-18 from Aristion, but declines to do so alike in the case of vv. 9-13 and in that of 19 f. In 14-18 he finds not mere compilation but actual narrative, and that without dependence on the canonical gospels. In reality, however, v. 14 simply carries further what is found in Lk. 24 25 38 Jn. 20 27; v. 15 is an adaptation of Mt. 28 19 to Pauline and Catholic phraseology ('world' [κόσμος], 'preach the gospel' [κηρύσσειν τὸ εὐαγγέλιον], 'creature' [κτίσις]), and if baptism in the name of the Trinity is not mentioned that becomes very intelligible after Conybeare's demonstration (ZNTW, 1901, pp. 275-288; cp Hibb. Journ. 1, p. 96 ff.) that even Eusebius down to 325 A.D. read nothing as to this in Mt. (cp MINISTRY, § 5 c). Verse 16 is the most elaborated dogmatic of the apostolic and post-apostolic time (Acts 16 31; MINISTRY, § 26). The casting-out of devils in v. 17 rests on Mk. 6 7 13 Mt. 10 1 Lk. 9 1 10 17, the speaking with new tongues (i.e., languages of foreign peoples) on Acts 2 1-13 (cp SPIRITUAL GIFTS, § 10); 'they shall take up serpents' (v. 18) is borrowed partly from Acts 28 3-6 and partly from the express promise of Jesus in Lk. 10 19; the gift of healing of diseases by laying-on of hands from Acts 28 8. Without limitation to the method by imposition of hands such a gift is already bestowed upon the apostles in Mt. 10 1 Lk. 9 1, and is exercised by them in Mk. 6 13 Lk. 9 6.

The drinking of deadly poison with impunity is the only thing for which we have to look outside of the NT canon; but here it is not Aristion that we encounter but the daughters of Philip, from whom Papias claims to have heard of such a thing in the case of Justus Barsabas (cp PHILIP, § 4 a). To say the least, then, vv. 17 f. are quite as much a mere cataloguing abstract as vv. 9-13 are. Nor is the situation changed by the addition after v. 14 which Jerome quotes in one place from Greek MSS: 'And they apologised saying: this age of iniquity and unbelief is under Satan, who by [his] impure spirits does not suffer the true virtue of God to be apprehended; wherefore now reveal thy justice' (et illi satisfaciebant [made amends, here meaning: apologised] dicentes: saeculum istud iniquitatis et incredulitatis sub Satana est, qui non sinit per immundos spiritus veram dei apprehendi virtutem; idcirco jam nunc revela justitiam tuam).[1] It is very easily explained as being a gloss.[2]

(d) The conclusion of Mk. betrays no acquaintance with Jn. 21 or the Gospel of Peter; on the other hand we cannot say with confidence that the author had occasion to use them even had he known them. In the Gospel of Peter (27) the disciples are spoken of as in Mk. 16 10 as 'mourning and weeping' (πενθοῦντες καὶ κλαίοντες). But this collocation of words is quite current (Lk. 6 25 Jas. 4 9 Rev. 18 11 15 19), and the idea conveyed was an obvious one both from the situation itself and also as fulfilment of the prophecy in Jn. 16 20, and thus is no proof of literary dependence.

(e) There is thus no particular reason why we should assign to a personal disciple of Jesus such as Aristion the authorship of so meagre an excerpt as Mk. 16 9-20 from which absolutely nothing new is to be learned.

A marginal gloss—comparatively late it may be—in an Oxford MS. of Rufinus speaks of the story about Justus Barsabas in Eus. HE iii. 39 9 (see above, c) as a communication from Aristion (Expos. 1893, b, p. 246). Should this happen to rest upon older tradition, it conceivably may have been what furnished the occasion for attributing to Aristion first the allusion to the same thing in Mk. 16 18 and afterwards erroneously the whole passage vv. 9-20.

(f) Neither is there much greater probability in the conjecture of Resch (TU x. 2 450-456) that in Conybeare's Armenian Manuscript by the presbyter Ariston is meant the Jewish Christian Ariston of Pella in Peræa, to whom the Dialogue between Jason and Papiscus is attributed. There is absolutely nothing specifically Jewish-Christian in the conclusion of Mk. (see above, b, c). The other part of Resch's hypothesis—that it was this Ariston who at the same time gathered together the four gospels into one whole—is quite inadmissible. Resch is able to make out a Jewish-Christian character for this grouping only insomuch as Mt. is assigned the first place.

Even apart, however, from the question about Ariston and Aristion the attempt to bring into close connection the composition of Mk. 16 9-20 and the grouping of the four gospels as sole canonical sources for the life of Jesus must be given up.

If, however, there be even merely an element of truth in the theory that the genuine conclusion of Mk. was removed on account of its inconsistency with the other gospels, we are led to the conjecture that what it stated must have been all the more original in proportion as the others are recent.

9. Lost conclusion of Mk.

(a) Harnack and Rohrbach suppose that the lost conclusion was what lay at the foundation of the Gospel of Peter and Jn. 21.

What is said, they think, was to the effect that as the women said nothing about what had occurred at the sepulchre (16 8) the disciples went to Galilee—not at the command of Jesus but (as in the Gospel of Peter) of their own motion and in deep depression. Here Jesus appeared to a group of them by the lake as they were fishing (so far the Gospel of Peter) and rehabilitated Peter who had been overwhelmed with a sense of his guilt in denying Jesus (cp Jn. 21 15-17). The saying of Jesus, on the other hand, about the beloved disciple (20-24) is an addition of the author of Jn. 21. Apart from that saying Jn. 21 describes the first appearance of the risen Jesus, which is given as the third appearance (21 14) only in order to bring Lk. and Jn. into agreement. Rohrbach seeks to discover in the genuine conclusion of Mk. also an appearance of Jesus to the eleven, and brings into connection with this the fragment in Ignatius spoken of above (§ 4 c) which Rohrbach would fain detach from the Gospel of the Hebrews and claim for the genuine conclusion of Mk.

(b) Of such hypotheses we may admit everything that can be based upon Mk. 16 7. Even if the women, as we read in v. 8, kept silence as to the injunction of the angel, it still remains the fact that, according to the view of the author, it was the divine will that 'the disciples and Peter' should go to Galilee and there see the risen Jesus. That the disciples should have fulfilled this injunction without being acquainted with it is explained in the Gospel of Peter by the fact that the festival had come to an end; according to GOSPELS, § 138 a, there is a quite different explanation. In any case it is clear that it cannot have been Mk.'s intention to close his gospel at 16 8; he must have treated also the Galilæan events for which he had prepared his readers. From the remarkable order 'his disciples and Peter' we must not conclude that an appearance to the disciples was first related and then one to Peter; for it is not said that his disciples and Peter will see him, but 'Tell his disciples and Peter.' All we can conjecture with any confidence is that Peter in some way or other played a special part in the lost narrative.

(c) What we find in Harnack and Rohrbach going beyond this is quite untenable. That the Gospel of Peter and Jn. 21 have no common source, results at the outset from the fact that the names of the apostles on the shore of the lake are not the same (cp § 5 d, n.) That Jn. 21 originally was a description of the first appearance of the risen Jesus, is in itself not impossible; but there is nothing that directly indicates it.

The reserve of the disciples, in particular (21 12), in virtue of which none of them durst ask the Lord who he was, would be appropriate, not only at the first, but at any appearance. In the consummately delicate manner in which it is referred to in vv. 15-17, Peter's denial could have been alluded to at any other appearance besides the first, if the situation presented occasion for it; and a rehabilitation of Peter which one cannot help expecting at the first appearance, need not have carried with it, in the first instance, more than his restoration to grace, not his investiture with the office of leader of the church (cp § 37 c). This installation of Peter, however, is explained much more readily by reference to a later ecclesiastical situation. The Fourth Gospel at its first publication had met with opposition, and in the circles in which it had arisen it was perceived that it would fail to meet with ecclesiastical recognition if the great prominence given to the beloved disciple and the comparative depreciation of Peter, which run through the entire book (see SIMON PETER, § 22), were to be continued. It was determined, therefore, to recognise in an appendix the authority of Peter to some extent (MINISTRY, § 36 a). If this be so, however, the words about the abiding importance of the beloved disciple (21 20-24), as also about the death of Peter (21 18 f.), which would certainly be inappropriate at a first appearance, will be integral parts, not merely inorganically attached additions. Yet once more, the thought that Jesus instituted a substitute for the Last Supper (in 21 13 the reminiscence of this is quite manifest) is not appropriate to a first appearance of Jesus, but must be regarded as the result of after reflection (see § 29 c).

(d) Harnack and Rohrbach become very specially involved in obscurities when they maintain that the genuine conclusion of Mk. with its first appearance of Jesus was at the same time in agreement with the account in 1 Cor. 15 5, and with that in Lk. 24 34, according to which Jesus appeared to Peter. The expression of Paul, and in like manner that of Lk., unquestionably mean: to Peter alone. That, however, is exactly what Jn. 21 does not say, nor yet in all probability did the Gospel of Peter.

[1] Jer. contr. Pelag. 2 15; ed. Vallarsi, 2 758 f. Zahn (Gesch. d. NTlichen Kanons, 2 935-938; Einl. § 52, n. 7) defends the reading 'sub Satana . . . qui' given above; the usual reading is 'substantia . . . quæ.'

[2] Van Kasteren (Rev. bibl. internat., 1902, pp. 240-255) seeks to defend the authenticity of this appendix. He maintains, besides, that the whole passage (16 9-20) has been used in Hermas, Sim. ix. 25 2, and even in Heb. 1 1-4 2 3-5. These arguments are missing in Burgon, Last Twelve Verses of Mk. (1871), and rightly. They rest only on vague resemblances which would be quite as capable of supporting the posteriority as the priority of Mk. 16 9-20, if they necessarily implied literary acquaintance.

In Jn. 21 7 not only is Peter not the only one to recognise Jesus; he is not even the first; the first is the beloved disciple. Rohrbach has recourse to the conjecture that, in the genuine conclusion of Mk., at the decisive scene, the recognition of Jesus and the word of restitution, the other disciples apart from Peter were either, like the disciples at Emmaus whose 'eyes were holden' (Lk. 24 16), prevented by divine arrangement from recognising Jesus, or were not present at all, and that this scene was followed by another separate appearance to the eleven (above, a). Harnack, to judge by his silence, does not accept this, but in doing so leaves it all the more unclear how far the appearance to several disciples is to be held the same as an appearance to Peter (alone).

(e) If such an appearance cannot be assumed to have been contained in the lost conclusion of Mk. with certainty, the attempt must also be abandoned to invest the passage with the nimbus which would attach to it if it had really contained the full narrative of what Paul and Lk. (24 34) dismiss with a single word as the earliest of the occurrences after the resurrection of Jesus. The lost conclusion in question may have been relatively more original than the canonical and extra-canonical accounts which have come down to us; but we cannot safely venture to regard it as having been absolutely the first.

10. 1 Cor. 15 1-11 in itself considered.

If now it has been made out that the extra-canonical accounts contain nothing of any consequence which goes beyond the canonical—except (ultimately) the existence of an interval of more than eight days between the resurrection of Jesus and his first appearance (§ 5 e)—and that the canonical gospels are at irreconcilable variance with each other, we have finally to turn to the narrative of Paul. It has fared badly. Reimarus and Lessing completely ignored it. The entire body of conservative theology denies it any decisive importance, and the most advanced critical theology in rejecting all the Pauline epistles of course rejects this also. It is very striking to observe, however, how slight are the objections that can be brought against it. Let us take, in the first place, those which are urged against the account in itself considered.

(a) Steck (Galater-br., 1888, pp. 180-191) finds at the very outset that the word 'make known' (γνωρίζω: 1 Cor. 15 1) shows the writer to have been aware that he was making a statement which, at the time of his making it (according to Steck, in the 2nd cent.), was new. The answer is simple; a writer can surely quite easily say of a thing already known 'I make known unto you,' if he wishes to call attention to it as something very weighty, or desires gently to reproach or rebuke his readers for not having kept it in mind. The remark holds good here as well as in 12 3 Gal. 1 11.

(b) According to 15 11 what precedes is given out alike by Paul and by the original apostles. Steck holds it to be artificially composed to suit such a purpose; the twelve would represent the narrower circle of disciples destined for the mission to the Jews; the 500 that wider circle, hinted at in Lk. 10 1, for the mission to the Gentiles. In this case, however, we are constrained to ask why the author, who according to Steck had full scope for his fancy, should have chosen the number 500, not 70? And why does he cite James (surely a Jewish Christian!) after, not before, the alleged representatives of the Gentile mission, and afterwards, over and above, 'all the apostles,' whom no one can assert to have belonged distinctly to the Jewish-Christian or to the Gentile-Christian circle?

(c) Whether the original apostles included in their preaching also this, that Jesus had appeared to Paul, may be regarded as questionable in view of their strained relations with Paul. At an earlier date, however, when the churches of Judæa glorified God in Paul (Gal. 1 23 f.) they certainly proclaimed it, since the conversion of this most zealous opponent of Christianity cannot but have seemed to them to be the greatest triumph of the new religion. Accordingly, Paul might very well assume that they were still doing so. Yet it must not by any means be positively affirmed that he says so; for from 1 Cor. 15 6 onwards the verbs no longer depend, as in vv. 3-5, on 'how that' (ὅτι); the sentences are all independent propositions. Otherwise we should be compelled to go so far as to say that Paul describes the contents of v. 8 also—that is, the appearance of Jesus to himself—as something which according to v. 3 he has received (παρέλαβον). Steck does not shrink from drawing this inference. In doing so, however, he does the writer an injustice. For when the writer wrote v. 3, his intention was to set forth what he had received; but he was surely not thereby precluded from adding something of the same kind with regard to himself, of which the readers would be able to see for themselves that he had not 'received' it. In like manner also he must not be debarred from saying in v. 11, by way of résumé, that he and the original apostles preach in the manner stated in the preceding context, although certainly v. 9 f., perhaps also v. 8, do not form part of the preaching of the original apostles.

(d) Van Manen (Paulus, 3, 1896, pp. 67-71) finds 15 1-11 out of agreement with vv. 12-58; for in the former passage the hope of a future resurrection of the body is made to depend upon the fact of the resurrection of Jesus, whilst in the latter it is held upon quite different grounds into which this fact does not enter. It must be noted, however, that if a thing rests upon more grounds than one, it is quite fitting that these should be set forth separately. Besides, in point of fact, the resurrection of Jesus is returned to in v. 20 as having a bearing upon the argument.

(e) Another point made by Van Manen is that 'was seen' (ὤφθη) is repeated in v. 6, but not in v. 5 b. That, however, really proves nothing against either the genuineness or the unity of the section. The addition in v. 6 'of whom the greater part remain until now, but some are fallen asleep' is found by Van Manen too copious in style after the curt expressions in vv. 3-5; and, moreover, he considers it to be brought in too late, since, if such an observation were to be made with reference to the 500, it ought also to have been mentioned with regard to the 12, whether they were still alive or not. But here again it may be replied that the Corinthians either knew or could have informed themselves as to the twelve, whilst the case was different with the 500. As for 'all the apostles' (τοῖς ἀποστόλοις πᾶσιν) in v. 7, to which Van Manen takes particular exception on the ground that they are identical with the 'Peter and the twelve' in v. 5, our reply must simply be that this is not the case; see MINISTRY, § 17.

(f) Paul's designation of himself (15 9) as the least of the apostles, is regarded by Van Manen as not in agreement with his claim to apostolic rank and authority (1 1 4 16 9 1 f. 11 16). Yet a solution of the apparent contradiction can be found in 15 10: 'not I, but the grace of God.' Besides, the slight against Paul would be unintelligible on the part of an admirer of his in the second century; it is intelligible only in the mouth of Paul himself, who elsewhere also shows himself as ready to humble himself in the sight of God as he is disinclined to do so before men.

(g) A further argument of Van Manen (p. 126) is that in 15 8-10 the life of the apostle is looked back upon as already completed. Yet Paul might also look back upon his life so far as completed and say quite fairly, as he does say: 'I laboured more abundantly than they all.'

(h) In particular, no difficulty ought to be caused by the words: 'last of all he appeared to me also.' Paul could quite well have been aware that since the appearance of Jesus made to himself, no other had been reported. But of those which he himself, according to 2 Cor. 12 1-4 4 6, afterwards lived to experience, none approached to that of Damascus in fundamental importance; thus he had all the more occasion to close his series with it, because his first vision of the risen Jesus may itself have occurred a considerable time after the other appearances (§ 36 [f]), and importance attached to the number of distinct persons who had seen visions, rather than to the number of visions such persons had had.

For the rest, Brandt (414 f.) gives up as un-Pauline only one expression: 'as unto the one born out of due season' (ὡσπερεὶ τῷ ἐκτρώματι), which he considers to have been borrowed by a glossator from the Valentinian gnosis (cp Straatman, Krit. Stud. over 1 Cor., vol. 2, Groningen, 1865, pp. 196-204). Yet no stringent necessity for this is apparent. It is true that the expression (ἔκτρωμα) does not literally fit Paul, for it denotes an early birth, whereas he could more appropriately have been called a late birth. There is some difficulty, therefore, in supposing that Paul himself can have actually chosen this expression. To meet this difficulty we may perhaps suppose that Paul is taking up a phrase which had been used against him by way of reproach, because after all it has some applicability to his case. This theory would also best explain the definite article (before ἐκτρώματι), which is reproduced neither in AV nor in RV ('one born').

11. 1 Cor. 15 1-11 older than the Gospels.

That 1 Cor. 15 1-11 is dependent on the Gospels has been pronounced impossible even by Steck, since it contains appearances of Jesus which are not found there. It is only the earlier date of 1 Cor. that Steck disputes.

(a) Steck regards it as certainly historical that the first news of the resurrection of Jesus was brought by the women. In the omission of this point from 1 Cor. he finds an artificial touch; the more naive representation is that of the Gospels.

Even if it be granted for the moment that the narrative about the women at the sepulchre is historical, the attitude of conservative theology itself shows that the priority of the gospels by no means follows, for that theology attributes to the historical Paul, who wrote his epistles before the gospels were composed, a deliberate silence about the women. If, however, the genuineness of the Pauline epistles cannot be effectively disputed from this point of view, the question whether Paul did not wish to say anything about the women, or whether he did not know about them, remains quite open (cp § 15).

(b) Steck conjectures further that matters in which 1 Cor. partially agrees with the Gospels, had been drawn by both from a common source. Thus the appearance to the 500 is perhaps a modification of the original account of what happened at Pentecost. The two accounts are, however, totally different. Steck resorts to his conjecture, only because he finds the application of the vision-hypothesis to the case of 500 men at once too difficult. As to this see, however, § 36*e*.

(c) The appearance to James in 1 Cor. is considered by Steck to be derived from the source of the Gospel to the Hebrews, or from that Gospel itself. Here, however, the question arises: Which is the more original? The bare statement 'he appeared to James,' or the incredible fable discussed above (§ 4*a*, b)? In fact the question comes up in a still more general form: Which is the more original—the bare narrative of Paul as a whole, or that of the Gospels? In itself considered, a narrative so brief as that given in 1 Cor. 15 could, doubtless, be regarded as a later excerpt, as we have shown to be the case with Mk. 16 9-20 (§ 8*b*, c). But the distinction in the Mk. appendix is just this, that the excerpt is characterised, not by its bareness, but by its embodying the most legendary features. Its freedom from such features will always speak in favour of the priority of 1 Cor. 15, so long as the spuriousness of the entire epistle remains unproven. As to this last cp GALATIANS, §§ 1-9. Indeed, were one compelled to give up the genuineness of the epistle as a whole, it would still be necessary to affirm with Brandt (415) that the high antiquity of 15 1-11 (before the Gospels had arisen) stands fast quite apart from the question of its belonging to 1 Cor. Nor is the question why the Gospels, if they are later, have passed over so much that is given in 1 Cor. 15 unanswerable (see § 23 e).

If we may venture to assume the priority of the Pauline account to that of the Gospels, the main question will be whether or no Paul omitted any accounts of the resurrection of Jesus which were known to him.

12. Completeness of 1 Cor. 15 1-11.

Did we not possess the Gospels, the idea that he has done so would never have occurred to any one. For Paul nothing less than the truth of Christianity rested upon the actuality of the resurrection of Jesus (1 Cor. 15 14 f. 17-19). Paul himself had once found it impossible to believe; he knew, therefore, how strong was the inclination to disbelief. All the more carefully, therefore, must he have sought to inform himself of everything that could be said in its support. During his fifteen days' visit to Peter and James (Gal. 1 18 f.), he had the best opportunity to perfect his knowledge on the subject in the most authentic manner. In Corinth the future resurrection and, along with it, as a logical consequence according to the argument of Paul (1 Cor. 15 12 16), also the resurrection of Jesus was disputed, and the entire basis of the Christian church called in question. In 15 12-58 Paul presents every possible argument wherewith to confute the deniers of the resurrection; is it in these circumstances conceivable that he could have passed over any proofs of the resurrection of Jesus, whilst yet holding that resurrection to be the first and most important fact wherewith to silence his opponents? But indeed his very manner of expressing himself excludes this in the most decisive manner. By his careful enumeration with 'then . . . next . . . next . . . then . . . lastly' (εἶτα . . . ἔπειτα . . . ἔπειτα . . . εἶτα . . . ἔσχατον; 15 5-8) he guarantees not only chronological order but also completeness.

The only point which one can venture along with Brandt (415) to leave open, is whether Paul here is only repeating a fixed number of appearances which according to 15 11 he was in the habit of bringing forward everywhere, in agreement with the original apostles, in his preaching of the resurrection of Jesus.

13. 1 Cor. 15: number of appearances.

Now it is not inconceivable that from such an enumeration this or that appearance to inconspicuous persons, which seemed not to be attested with absolute certainty, or not to be of sufficient importance, may have been excluded, just as we find that of those received by Paul himself, only the first is related (§ 10 h). This concession, however, in no way alters the significance for Gospel criticism of the Pauline account; for to this category of accounts which Paul might conceivably in certain circumstances very well have omitted, that to the two disciples at Emmaus—a singularly characteristic narrative—assuredly does not belong; and still less do the other gospel narratives which all of them speak of appearances of Jesus to the most prominent persons known to ancient Christianity, and in circumstances of the most significant kind.

It is not to be denied that Paul only enumerates the appearances of Jesus; he does not describe them. It will therefore be illegitimate to argue from his silence that he rejects or knows nothing of any special circumstances which may have been connected with this or that appearance.

14. 1 Cor. 15: Jesus eating and being touched?

Still, it does not by any means follow that we are at liberty to regard such important facts as that Jesus ate, or permitted himself to be touched, as matters which Paul knew but passed over. They are of such fundamental importance, and go so far beyond the mere fact of his having been seen, that Paul, had he known them, could not but have mentioned them, unless he deliberately chose to let slip the most important proofs for his contention.

It is a great mistake to reply that Paul knew that Jesus had eaten and been touched, but passed over both as being inconsistent with his doctrine that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God (1 Cor. 15 50). When this is said, it is rightly presupposed indeed that Paul regarded the risen Christ as being already exalted to heaven (cp § 16 e). This doctrine, however, is one which Paul first elaborated for himself as a Christian; as a Jew he knew no other conception of the resurrection than that which thought of all forms of life in the future world as exactly reproducing those of the present (cp § 17 c). If, accordingly, he had heard from eyewitnesses that Jesus had eaten and been touched, this would have fitted in most excellently with the idea of the resurrection which he entertained at the time of his conversion, and he would have had no occasion to construct another in an opposite sense. 1 Cor. 15 50 accordingly does not prove that Paul knew that Jesus had eaten and been touched, but was silent because he did not like to think this true; it shows, on the contrary, that he had never heard anything of the kind.

That Paul knew of the empty sepulchre, also, can be maintained only in conjunction with the assumption that for particular reasons he kept silence regarding it.[1]

15. 1 Cor. 15 and the empty sepulchre.

(a) Most perverse of all would it be to seek for such reasons in 1 Cor. 14 34. Even on the assumption that vv. 33*b*-35 are genuine (which, in view of the inconsistency with 11 5 13 and the introduction of 14 34 f. after 14 40 in DEFG, etc., is very questionable) the words are directed only against the intervention of women in the meeting of the congregation and merely on grounds of decorum; by no means against the testimony of women as to a matter of fact, least of all a fact of such importance and one with regard to which they alone were in a position to give evidence.

[1] It is quite illegitimate to find a testimony to the empty sepulchre in Paul's 'that he hath been raised' (ὅτι ἐγήγερται: 1 Cor. 15 4) on the special ground that he connects the 'that he was seen' (ὅτι ὤφθη) by means of 'and' (καί) and thereby seems to indicate that he knows of an independent evidence of the resurrection of Jesus apart from the fact of his having been seen. If he really knew of any such evidence it was his interest to mention it. If, however, the only evidence he had was the fact that Jesus had been seen he still was under necessity, from his own point of view, to regard the being raised up as a separate fact. He would have said less than he believed himself entitled to say had he omitted this.

(b) Not less wide of the mark is the other explanation of Paul's silence upon the empty sepulchre, that the idea of a reanimation of the dead body did not fit in with his theology. If it were indeed the fact that his theology was opposed to this, it is nevertheless true that this theology of his came into being only after his conversion to Christianity. When he first came to know of Jesus as risen he was still a Jew and therefore conceived of resurrection at all in no other way than as reanimation of the body (§ 17 e). Since, as soon as he had become a believer, he certainly held what had been imparted to him about Jesus to be a divine arrangement, he had no occasion whatever to alter his conception. Thus nothing then prevented him from believing that the grave was found empty—on the supposition that this was reported to him. And even in the wording of 1 Cor. there was no hindrance to his so believing.

That Jesus was buried and that 'he has been raised' (1 Cor. 15 4) cannot be affirmed by any one who has not the reanimation of the body in mind. It is correct to say that Paul has abandoned the Jewish conception in so far as he figures to himself the body of Jesus as being like the dead at the Last Day, who 'shall be raised incorruptible,' and like the bodies of those who shall then be alive and who 'shall be changed' (1 Cor. 15 42-52). The risen Jesus therefore was incapable of eating or of being touched (see §§ 14, 17 e); on the other hand, if he was to rise from the dead his body must needs come forth from the grave, otherwise the idea of resurrection would be abandoned. This is the case in 2 Cor. 5 1-8, according to which every individual immediately on his death passes into a state of glory with Christ; but it is not yet so in 1 Cor.

(c) Relatively the most reasonable suggestion is that Paul is silent regarding the empty sepulchre (though acquainted with the fact) because he fears that an appeal to the testimony of women will produce an unfavourable impression. This, however, is to misjudge Paul. If he knew and believed what was reported about the empty grave he must of course have regarded the participation of the women as a divine appointment; and just as he refused to be ashamed of the gospel although aware that in so many quarters it was regarded as mere foolishness (Rom. 1 16 1 Cor. 1 23) so also he would have refused to be ashamed of an appointment of God whereby women were made the chief witnesses to the truth of the resurrection.

Before proceeding to draw our final conclusions, however, from 1 Cor. 15, it will be convenient that we should examine the accounts of the ascension.

16. Ascension.

(a) The view which is found in all books of doctrine and which underlies the observance of the ecclesiastical feast of the ascension, that Jesus was taken up into heaven forty days after his resurrection, rests solely upon Acts 1 3 9 (13 31 is not so exact), and thus on a datum which did not become known to the compiler of Acts till late in life.

We conjecture it to have been first made plain to the writer of Acts by the consideration that the disciples seemed still to be in need of much instruction at the hands of Jesus. The suggestion that the number forty is not to be taken literally becomes all the more natural in proportion to the lateness of its appearing. Moses passes forty days on Mount Sinai with God when receiving the law (Ex. 34 28); according to 4 Esd. 14 23 36 42-49 Ezra spends forty days in dictating afresh the OT (which had been lost in the destruction of Jerusalem in 586) and seventy books of prophecy, and is thereafter taken up into heaven.[1]

(b) In his gospel the author of Acts has assigned the ascension to a time late in the evening of the day of the resurrection (Lk. 24 13 29 33 36 50 f.).

Brandt (375-377) thinks Lk. cannot really have intended to represent Jesus as having ascended at night and therefore supposes the scene with the disciples at Emmaus not to have been introduced by the author until after 24 36-53 (appearance to the disciples, and ascension) had been written. If Brandt is right we may suppose Lk. thought of the ascension as having occurred some hours earlier. The words 'and was carried up into heaven' (καὶ ἀνεφέρετο εἰς τὸν οὐρανόν: v. 51) are wanting, it is true, in ℵ*D and some Old Latin MSS. But even if the shorter form should be the more original, the words 'he parted from them' (διέστη ἀπ' αὐτῶν), which all authorities have (D ἀπέστη), would convey the same sense. Without some definite departure of Jesus it would be incomprehensible how the disciples should have been limited, as we read in v. 52 f., to praising God in the temple without having further intercourse with Jesus. It is highly probable that the words 'and was carried up into heaven' (καὶ ἀνεφέρετο εἰς τὸν οὐρανόν) were struck out at a very early period by a reader who wished to remove the discrepancy with Acts 1 3-9.[1]

(c) In any case the dating of the ascension as having happened late on the day of the resurrection is confirmed by Barn. 15 9: 'We keep holy the eighth day (i.e., Sunday) . . . in which also Jesus rose from the dead and, after appearing, went up to heaven' (ἄγομεν τὴν ἡμέραν τὴν ὀγδόην . . . ἐν ᾗ καὶ ὁ Ἰησοῦς ἀνέστη ἐκ νεκρῶν καὶ φανερωθεὶς ἀνέβη εἰς οὐρανούς), as also by Mk. 16 9-20, where the order of the events in Lk. clearly lies at the foundation; in all probability also by Jn. 20 17 22, according to which on the morning of the resurrection Jesus is not yet ascended and in the evening already imparts the Holy Spirit to the disciples.

According to 7 39 the Holy Spirit first comes into being after Jesus has been glorified, in other words after his exaltation to heaven where he is encompassed by glory (δόξα). That Jesus does not suffer himself to be touched in 20 17 is not formally contradicted by what is said of the evening of the same day (in 20 20 he only shows the disciples his wounds); the contradiction does not emerge till eight days afterwards (20 27). On the other hand it perfectly fits in with the theory of 7 39 that the Holy Spirit is called (EV) another comforter (ἄλλος παράκλητος: 14 16) who cannot come until after Jesus has gone away (Jesus must thus be thought of as the first παράκλητος and in point of fact is called παράκλητος in 1 Jn. 2 1, although there he is thought of as exalted) and that Jesus will send him forth from the father, that is, from heaven (15 26); cp further 16 7.

(d) The Fourth Gospel is distinguished from Lk., Barn., and Mk. 16 9-20 by this, that it represents Jesus as still continuing to appear on earth after he has ascended.

When Jesus foretells his coming again in Jn. 14 18 it is clear from the connection with vv. 16 f. that he means the coming of the Holy Spirit, with whom, in fact, according to 7 39, 2 Cor. 3 17 he is identical. On the other hand, the manner in which the same thought is expressed in 16 16 19 ('a little while . . . and ye shall see me') speaks strongly for the view that the appearances of the risen Jesus are intended; so also perhaps in 14 19 21, whilst 14 28 16 22 admit both interpretations and perhaps ought to receive both.

(e) The original conception of the ascension has been preserved in this, that the appearances of the risen Jesus occur after he has been received up into heaven; resurrection and ascension are a single act, Jesus is taken up directly from the grave, or from the underworld, into heaven.[2] Any direct proof for this, it is true, can hardly be adduced apart from the Gospel of Peter (above, § 5 b); the proof lies in the silence of the NT writers as to a special act of ascension. In particular, it ought (if known) to have been definitely mentioned in 1 Cor. 15 4-8, since, in point of fact, according to Lk., the appearances to Peter and the apostles, etc. were made before the ascension, whilst those to Paul on the other hand undoubtedly occurred after that event; and yet Paul uses with reference to them all the same word 'was seen' (ὤφθη, on which see below, § 17 a).

[1] According to the Valentinians and Ophites (ap. Iren. i. 1 5 [3 2] 28 7 [30 14]) Jesus remained on earth for eighteen months after his resurrection; so also Asc. Isa. 9 16 in the Ethiopic text (545 days); according to Pistis Sophia, 1, eleven years.

[1] On the apologetic side there is often an inclination to make use of the well-known fact that the ancients were in the habit of employing for their literary work ready-made papyrus rolls of a fixed length, within the limits of which they were wont to confine themselves. It is suggested that Lk., through failure of his space, may have found himself compelled to report the ascension so very briefly and inexactly, that it was possible for the impression to arise that he meant to assign it to the resurrection day, whereas in reality he meant to place it forty days later, and already had the intention of setting this forth more precisely in his later work. It may suffice, in answer to this, to say that Lk. must have perceived that the paper was coming to an end long before the last moment, and cannot have been forced, by any such discovery, into giving an account of the events which was not in accordance with his knowledge.

[2] The descent into the underworld is originally merely another expression for his death and burial. Whether a preaching of Jesus in the underworld is connected with this (so MINISTRY, § 26) is for our present purpose indifferent.

So, also, Rom. 8 34, Eph. 1 20 (and with reference to the followers of Jesus Eph. 2 5 f.) place the sitting at the right hand of God immediately after the resurrection, Heb. 1 3 10 12 12 2 immediately after the death of Jesus; Eph. 4 9 f. places over against the descent (καταβῆναι) into Hades only the ascent (ἀναβῆναι) that raises Jesus above all heavens. So also the 'who brought up' (ἀναγαγών) of Heb. 13 20 means direct translation from Hades to Heaven if at least by ἐν αἵματι we are to understand 'with blood,' which according to 4 14 6 20 8 2 9 12 Jesus must offer in the heavenly sanctuary. 1 Pet. 3 19 22 too, and indeed also Acts 2 32-35 Rev. 1 18, admit this sense without violence, and equally little is the reader compelled by the expression 'goes before you into Galilee' (προάγει ὑμᾶς εἰς τὴν Γαλιλαίαν), Mk. 16 7 = Mt. 28 7, to assume that Jesus made the journey from the sepulchre to Galilee by way of earth; the purpose of the expression is simply to convey that Jesus expects his disciples in Galilee in order that he may appear to them there, and this he can very well have done from heaven. For Mt. this interpretation is directly indicated by the writer's closing his book without any ascension; he must have thought of it as inseparably connected with the resurrection. Another consideration pointing in the same direction rests on the fact that in 28 18 Jesus is already able to say that all authority has been given him in heaven and on earth. As regards Mk. we can say nothing positive with reference to this point; there is, however, not the least probability that his lost conclusion differed from Mt. in this respect. In Clem. Rom., Hermas, Polycarp, Ignatius we still find no mention of an ascension, nor yet is it spoken of in the Didachè (this last, it ought to be added, indeed, does not even mention the resurrection). Justin, Irenæus, and Tertullian continue to regard both events as two parts of one act (see Von Schubert, Comp. des pseudopetrin. Evangelien-fragments, 1893, 136-138); the Apology of Aristides (Syriac in Robinson, Texts and Studies, i. 1 4 l. 7 f.; Greek, ibid. 110 l. 20 f. [chap. 15], German in Raabe, TU ix. 1 3, § 2, end) says similarly that after three days he rose again and was taken up into heaven.[1]

II.—Determination of Outward Facts.

17. Real nature of the appearances.

The original conception of the ascension as set forth in the preceding section will supply us directly with some guidance when we proceed to the task of disentangling the real historical facts regarding the resurrection from the multitude of the accounts which have come down to us.

(a) As we do so we must in the first instance take Paul's account as our guide. That account is fitted to throw light upon the nature of the appearances made not only to Paul himself but also to others, for he would not have employed the same word 'was seen' (ὤφθη) if anything had been known to him by which the appearance made to himself was distinguished from those which others had received.

(b) Appearances of the risen Jesus did actually occur; that is to say, the followers of Jesus really had the impression of having seen him. The historian who will have it that the alleged appearances are due merely to legend or to invention must deny not only the genuineness of the Pauline Epistles but also the historicity of Jesus altogether. The great difference between the attestation of the nativity narratives and that of those of the resurrection lies in the fact that the earliest accounts of the resurrection arose simultaneously with the occurrences to which they relate.

(c) The idea held regarding the occurrences was that Jesus made his appearances from heaven (§ 16, e). He thus had the nature of a heavenly being. Broadly speaking, the angels were the most familiar type of this order of being—the angels who can show themselves anywhere and again disappear.

(d) It was thought, as matter of course, that after each appearance Jesus returned into heaven. So regarded, each appearance ended with an ascension.

[1] The order in 1 Tim. 3 16 where 'was received up in glory' (ἀνελήφθη ἐν δόξῃ) comes after 'was preached to the nations, was believed on in the world' (ἐκηρύχθη ἐν ἔθνεσιν, ἐπιστεύθη ἐν κόσμῳ), accords with no known or conceivable position of the ascension. May we hazard the conjecture that the author perhaps placed it at the close of his enumeration simply in order to close with a concrete fact rather than a somewhat vague and indeterminate proposition, and so make a better ending for his poetical piece, and that in doing so he followed perhaps some such train of ideas as that in Mk. 16 15 f. 19, only giving it a somewhat different turn: the command of Jesus that his disciples should preach him and believe in him was fulfilled and he was raised up to heaven?

Precisely for this reason, however, it is not permissible to suppose that any single ascension once and for all was ever observed; on such a supposition Jesus would still have remained a denizen of earth after the appearances preceding the final one.

(e) That the risen Jesus ate or was touched was never observed. Not only does Paul say nothing of any such occurrence; the thing would also be contrary to the nature of a being appearing from heaven. Flesh and bones, which are attributed to Jesus in Lk. 24 39, assuredly he had not; he really made his appearances, although it is expressly denied in the verse just cited, as spirit (πνεῦμα) in the sense in which the angels are spirits (πνεύματα: Heb. 1 14). On this point the Jewish Christians most certainly agreed with Paul (§ 15 b) so far as the person of Jesus was concerned.

It is indeed the case that in Jewish-Christian circles there was current a conception of a resurrection with a new earthly body, in accordance with which Jesus was taken to be the risen Baptist, or Elijah (Mk. 6 14-16). This, however, was not the only conception by which Christians were influenced. On the contrary, from Jesus himself they had received the idea that in the resurrection men shall be as the angels of God (Mk. 12 25 and ||). And if there was any case in which more than in another they had occasion to apply this exalted conception, it would be in that of the body of their risen Lord. They knew indeed his prediction that one day he would come again on the clouds of heaven (Gospels, § 145 [f]). For them also, as for Paul (1 Cor. 15 20), Jesus was the first-fruits of them that sleep; with his resurrection, accordingly, a new era began. Not only so; it is extremely probable that the 'similitudes' of the Book of Enoch (chaps. 37-71; cp Apocalyptic, § 30) are pre-Christian: and there an existence in heaven is attributed to the Messiah and Dan. 7 13 explained as referring to him.[1] The original apostles may very well have had knowledge of this, even without having ever read the book. There is, therefore, not the slightest difficulty in attributing to them the conception of the resurrection body of Jesus which Paul himself had and imputed to them. It is only with regard to the future resurrection of all mankind that Paul parts company with them, in so far as he thinks of the resurrection body of believers as being as heavenly and free from flesh and blood as was the resurrection body of Jesus (1 Cor. 15 44-53), a consequence drawn neither by the Jewish Christians nor yet by the later Gentile Christians who taught the resurrection of the flesh (symbolum Romanum, see Ministry, § 27, n., and, later, symbolum apostolicum; Hermas, Sim. v. 7 2; Justin, Dial. 80, end; 2 Clem. Rom. 9 1 14 5, etc., and already 1 Clem. 26 3). That the Pharisaic, and accordingly also the primitive Christian, expectation looked for a reanimation of the body appears in such passages as 2 Macc. 7 10 f. 14 46 Mt. 27 52 Acts 2 31 Rev. 20 13. Josephus also states this correctly in Ant. xviii. 1 3, § 14, BJ iii. 8 5, § 374; it is only in BJ ii. 8 14, § 163, that by the expression 'remove into another body' (μεταβαίνειν εἰς ἕτερον σῶμα) he has Hellenised the conception and thereby misled his readers.

(f) On the other hand, it is fully to be believed that men had the impression that they saw in full reality (below, § 34 b, c, d) the wounds which Jesus had received on the cross, or perhaps even perceived that he showed them. The form which men beheld must of course show the most complete resemblance to that which Jesus bore upon earth, and to this, after the crucifixion, the wounds (not, however, the wound in the side, the spear-thrust being unhistorical, see John, Son of Zebedee, § 23 d) necessarily belonged. As the form of the risen Jesus at the same time appeared in heavenly splendour and created the certainty that Jesus had vanquished death and laid aside everything that was earthly, there remains a possibility that in the case of many to whom he appeared attention was not fixed upon his wounds. It is particularly easy to suppose this in the case of Paul.

(g) From the nature of the appearances as described, it is further quite possible that they occurred even when the witnesses found themselves, as in Jn. 20 19 26, shut in with closed doors, or that, as we read in Mk. 16 14 19, Jesus was taken up into heaven direct from the apartment. Even if one entertains doubts as to whether the authors cited had enough certain information to enable them to say that this actually was so in the cases which they give, it still has to be acknowledged that the statement is not inconsistent with the nature of the appearances.

On the other hand, there is to be drawn from the various accounts one deduction which goes very deep: no words were heard from the risen Jesus.

[1] Muirhead, Times of Christ (1898), pp. 140-150; Schmiedel, Prot. Monatshefte, 1898, pp. 255-257; 1901, p. 339 f.

18. No words heard.

(a) At first sight the hearing of words might appear not to be excluded by the simple 'was seen' (ὤφθη) of Paul. It is to be noted, however, that where Paul speaks of having received messages from heaven, he expressly specifies 'revelations' (ἀποκαλύψεις) as well as 'visions' (ὀπτασίαι: 2 Cor. 12 1-4), and where the distinction is employed it is clear that spoken words come under the former not the latter category.

(b) As against this, appeal will doubtless be made to the reports in Acts as to the appearances of Jesus to Paul on the journey to Damascus. Not successfully, however; they contradict one another so violently (see ACTS, § 2) that it is difficult to imagine how it could ever have been possible for an author to take them up into his book in their present forms, not to speak of the impossibility of accepting them in points where they are unsupported by the epistles of Paul. In these epistles, there is not the slightest countenance for the belief that Paul heard words, although he had the strongest motives for referring to them had he been in a position to do so. It is on the appearance on the journey to Damascus that he bases his claim to have been called to the apostolate by Jesus himself. The claim was hotly denied by his opponents: it was to his interest, therefore, to bring forward everything that could validly be adduced in its support. In pressing it (1 Cor. 9 1, 'Am I not an apostle?') he assuredly would not have stopped short at the question, 'Have I not seen Jesus our Lord?' had he been in a position to go on and ask, 'Has he not himself named me his apostle?' with such words engraven on his memory as those we read in Acts 9 6 22 10 or (above all) 26 16-18. The analogy of the angelic appearances cited above (§ 17 c) thus no longer holds good. Words are heard from angels; no words were heard from Jesus.

(c) What holds good of the appearance to Paul is true also (see § 17 a) of the others of which we read. If, too, we apply a searching examination to the words which have been reported, it is precisely the most characteristic of them that we shall find ourselves most irresistibly constrained to abandon. The request for food and the invitation to touch the wounds of the crucified Jesus (Lk. 24 39 41 Jn. 20 27) are, as we have seen in § 17 e, inadmissible. So also, as has been seen in § 16 e, the saying, I am not yet ascended unto the Father (20 17). The power to forgive sins or to declare them unforgiven (20 23) belongs to God alone, and cannot be handed over by Jesus to his disciples (see MINISTRY, § 4). The doctrine that the passion of Jesus was necessary in virtue of a divine appointment is invariably brought forward by Paul as the gospel that had been made manifest to himself alone and must be laboriously maintained in the face of its gainsayers; how triumphantly would he not have been able to meet them had he only heard the least suggestion that the men of the primitive church had heard the same doctrine from the mouth of Jesus himself in the manner recorded in Lk. 24 25-27 44-46! Once more, how could the original apostles have been able to call themselves disciples of Jesus if, after having been sent out by him as missionaries to the Gentiles (Lk. 22 47 f. Mk. 16 16 and the canonical text of Mt. 28 19), they actually made it a stipulation at the council of Jerusalem (Gal. 2 9) that their activity was to be confined within the limits of Israel? As for the text of Mt. 28 19 on baptism and the trinitarian formula, see MINISTRY, § 5 e, cp Hibb. Journ., Oct. 1902, pp. 102-108; and on Jn. 21 15-22 see above, § 9 c.

19. Galilee the scene of the first appearances.

An equally important point is that the first appearances happened in Galilee. The most convincing reasons for this conclusion have already been summarised under GOSPELS (§ 138 a). (a) In addition to what is said there special emphasis may be laid on the fact that there is no gospel in which appearances to men (not women) are reported as having been made both in Galilee and in Jerusalem; for Jn. 21 is an appendix by another hand.

It is only Mt. that, besides the appearance to the disciples in Galilee, knows of that made to the women on the return from the sepulchre (28 9 f.); this, however, will be regarded by very many as unhistorical, being absent from Mk. (which nevertheless is in this section so closely followed by Mt.) and containing nothing more than a repetition of the injunction already given by the angel to the women, to bid the disciples repair to Galilee. In any case the appearance comes from a separate source. If we leave Mt. 28 9 f. out of account it becomes perfectly clear that no one gospel from the first reported appearances of the risen Jesus in Galilee as well as in Jerusalem. The gospels in fact fall exactly into two classes: Mk., Mt. and the Gospel of Peter are for Galilee; Lk., Jn., and Mk. 16 9-20 for Jerusalem, and the Gospel of the Hebrews also does not indicate in any way that it looks for James and Peter and Peter's companions elsewhere than in the place where it finds the servant of the high priest (see above, § 4 a, b), viz., in Jerusalem. It is only afterwards that the writer of Jn. 21 sees fit to change this 'either, or' into a 'both, and'; so also Mt., but without admitting an appearance to any male disciples in Jerusalem.

If, however, Galilee and Jerusalem were at first mutually exclusive, both cannot rest upon equally valid tradition; there must have been some reason why the one locality was changed for the other.

(b) Such a reason for transferring the appearances from Galilee to Jerusalem has been indicated in GOSPELS (§ 138 a). Its force becomes all the greater when it is realised how small has been the success of even the most distinguished critics in attempting to make out the opposite.

All that Loofs (see below, § 39) has to say is (p. 25), 'Those narrators who represent the whole life of Jesus, with the exception of the last eight days, as having been passed in Galilee, may have transferred to Galilee also the appearances of the risen Jesus, with regard to which they were very defectively informed; they may have done so all the more easily because the first persons of whom they had occasion to speak in connection with the resurrection were women from Galilee.' The question at once presents itself: What has the circumstance that they belonged to Galilee to do with the present matter? They were in point of fact in Jerusalem. What is the relevancy of the observation that the activity of Jesus, apart from the last eight days, had been wholly in Galilee? His grave at any rate was in Jerusalem, and his disciples were also there, according to the testimony of Mk., Mt., and the Gospel of Peter, at least. That the present writer holds the statement as to the presence of the disciples at Jerusalem to be unhistorical does not affect the argument; for the point is that Loofs regards precisely that statement as historical. It is all the more necessary to ask: How does Loofs know that Mk. and Mt. were very defectively informed with regard to the appearances of the risen Jesus?

If this was indeed so, if Mk. and Mt. had to fall back on their own powers of conjecture, where else were they to look for appearances if not in Jerusalem where the grave, the women, and the disciples were? Thus the tradition which induced them to place the appearances in Galilee must have been one of very great stability.

B. Weiss (to pass over other names), in the interests of the Jerusalem tradition, doubts the historicity of the statement that the women received from the angel the injunction to bid the disciples proceed to Galilee, especially as this injunction is merely a reminiscence of Jesus words in Gethsemane, that after he rose from the dead he would go before the disciples to Galilee (Mk. 14 28). So Leben Jesu(2) 2 590 (ET 3 393). On p. 596 (ET 399 f.), however, Weiss says that that command of the angel to the women (to direct the disciples to go to Galilee) is only a reminiscence of the command of the same character which the risen Jesus himself lays upon Mary Magdalene, according to Mt. 28 9 f. (where, according to Weiss, only the second Mary is erroneously conjoined with Mary Magdalene rightly mentioned by the eye-witness John [20 1 f. 11-18]). Thus what Weiss holds to be an error (the command to bid the disciples go to Galilee) must be held (if the Jerusalem tradition is to be maintained) to have got itself clothed in a very remarkable form: not only as an angelic word (Mt. 28 7 Mk. 16 7) but also as a word of the risen Lord himself (Mt. 28 10), in the account of an appearance that is guaranteed by an eye-witness.

(c) In reality the error lies in quite another direction: in making Jesus appear at the sepulchre to the women, or Mary Magdalene, as the case may be. On the account in Mt. see above (a). That of Jn., however, is open to just as serious objections, for its chief saying, 'I am not yet ascended unto the Father,' rests on a theory of the nature of the Holy Ghost that is peculiar to the Fourth Gospel (§ 16, c). If, however, Jn.'s account can lay no claim to authenticity we may be all the surer that it is a transformation of the account of Mt. Of its being so there are, moreover, several indications. In Jn., as in Mt., one of Jesus' sayings is only a repetition of a word of the angels: 'Woman, why weepest thou?' A reminiscence of the fact that when the women met Jesus they had in Mt. already retired from the sepulchre may perhaps be recognised in 'she turned herself back' (ἐστράφη εἰς τὰ ὀπίσω) in Jn. 20 14. Only one woman appearing at the grave in Jn. is perhaps to be explained by the observation that the recognition-scene becomes more dramatic when Jesus has no need to utter more than a single word: 'Mary.' Cp. further, § 25, c.

(d) In 1 Cor. 15 Paul mentions no place. The enumeration he gives would not preclude the reader from supposing that the various appearances had occurred in quite different places—for example, most of them in Galilee, even if that to James were to be thought of as having been made in Jerusalem. It is, however, quite improbable that James was in Jerusalem again so soon (see MINISTRY, § 21 d), or that he should have experienced the appearance of the risen Jesus at so late a time that it might nevertheless be supposed that James had already removed to Jerusalem (see below, § 36 [f]).

The sealing and watching of the sepulchre (Mt. 27 62-66 28 4 11-15) is now very generally given up even by those scholars who still hold by the resurrection narratives as a whole.

20. Watch at sepulchre unhistorical.

(a) As already pointed out above (§ 2 a), in Mk. it is not only, as in Lk. and Jn., absent; it is absolutely excluded by the women's question: they have no apprehensions about the watch, only about the stone. (b) Again, it is exceedingly improbable that the Jews remembered any prophecy of Jesus that he was to rise again in three days (Mt. 27 63). According to the Gospels Jesus made prophecies of the kind only to the innermost circle of his disciples (Mk. 8 27 31 9 30 f. 10 32-34 and ||). Indeed in Mk. and Lk. not even the women remember the prophecy, otherwise they would not have set out to anoint the body. (c) Again, the explanation which the high priests and elders suggest, according to Mt. 28 13, is untenable; for if the soldiers were asleep at the time they could not testify that the disciples stole the body. (d) Not less unlikely is the supposition that the Jewish authorities actually believed the account of the soldiers regarding the fact of the resurrection of Jesus. Surely the consequence must have been, as with Paul at a later date, their conversion to the faith of Jesus. If, on the other hand, they remained unmoved, they must also have believed that, however perplexing it might at first sight appear, the affair was capable of explanation otherwise than by the resurrection of Jesus, and must have moved Pilate to institute a strict inquiry into the conduct of the soldiers, rather than have sought to bribe the soldiers. (e) Above all, the soldiers could not have accepted a bribe, least of all if they had nothing better to say by way of ostensible defence than that they had fallen asleep. For this the penalty was death. According to Acts 12 19 we actually find Agrippa I. putting to death the soldiers who had allowed Peter to escape from prison, and this is conclusive as to the nature of military responsibilities, even if in point of fact the liberation of Peter was brought about through no fault of his keepers (cp SIMON PETER, § 3, e). Roman soldiers knew only too well the strictness with which discipline was administered, and the promise of the Jewish authorities to obtain immunity for them from Pilate, if needful (Mt. 28 14), would have made no impression on them. (f) The best criticism on this whole feature of the narrative is the simple fact that the Gospel of Peter, which unquestionably is later than Mt., avoids it altogether and concludes quite differently (above, § 5 a).

That Jesus was buried in a usual way, not—as is conjectured by Volkmar (Religion Jesu, 77 f. 257-259 [1857], Die Evangelien [1870] = Marcus u. die Synopse [1876], 603) on the basis of Is. 53 9 22 16-18 Rev. 11 8 f.—left unburied, or at most cast into a hole and covered with some earth, is established by 1 Cor. 15 4 (cp Keim, Gesch. Jesu von Nazara, 3 525-527, ET 6 271-274).

21. Empty sepulchre unhistorical.

But the accounts of the empty sepulchre are none of them admissible. As to this the leading points have already been summarised in GOSPELS (§ 138 e). Some further considerations may be added.

(a) The three points from which we have to start are the silence of Paul (as of the entire NT apart from the Gospels; see, especially, Acts 2 29-32)—a silence which would be wholly inexplicable were the story true (§ 15); next, the statement in Mk. 16 8 that the women said nothing of their experiences at the sepulchre—a statement which has to be understood in the sense that Mk. was the first to be in a position to publish the facts; in other words, that the whole story is a very late production; lastly, if (as we have seen) the first appearances of Jesus were in Galilee, the tidings of them must have arrived at Jerusalem much too late to allow of examination of the sepulchre with any satisfactory results. If a body had been found it would have been too far advanced in decay to allow of identification; if there were none, this could be accounted for very easily without postulating a resurrection.

(b) The attempt to explain the evangelical reports without assuming a resurrection is, however, the line taken by very many theologians also who hold by what is said as to the empty sepulchre and yet assume no miracle. In the first place they postulate a removal of the body by persons whose action had no connection with the question of a resurrection.

On account of the approach of the Sabbath (they hold) the body had in any case to be laid in some grave or other, even perhaps without leave asked of the owner. It was, therefore, necessary that it should be removed afterwards to a more suitable place; or the owner himself may have removed it. A reminiscence of this is even discovered in Jn. 20 15. Or, if the sepulchre belonged to Joseph of Arimathæa, even he may not have desired to have the body of a stranger permanently occupying a place in the sepulchre of his family. On all these assumptions what strikes one is the promptitude with which the transference must have been made. To do so on the Sabbath before sundown was unlawful; yet very early next morning the transference had already been effected (according to Mt. even immediately after the sundown which marked the close of the Sabbath; see, however, § 2 d).

(c) Others suggest that the enemies of the Christians had removed the body of Jesus in order that it might not receive the veneration of his followers. The surprising thing in this would be, not so much that such a policy would have given the greatest possible, though unintentional, impetus to such veneration, as rather this, that such action would presuppose a disposition to worship the dead body for which it would be difficult to find a precedent among the Jews, for whom any contact with a corpse meant defilement.

(d) For a long time the favourite view was that the disciples themselves actually had done what, according to Mt. 27 64, the Jewish authorities were apprehensive they might do, and, according to 28 13 15, imputed to them falsely, namely, that they had stolen the body in order that they might afterwards proclaim that Jesus had risen.

Renan (Apôtres, 42 f., ET 69 f.), without expressly stating this purpose of the disciples, is inclined to attribute a share in the removal of the body to Mary Magdalene (whose predisposition to mental malady [Lk. 8 2] he accentuates), because only a woman's hand would have left the clothes in such order as is described in Jn. 20 7. That a theft of this kind would have had the effect of convincing gainsayers of the resurrection of Jesus is not very easy to believe. On the other hand, it could in certain circumstances have made some impression on followers of Jesus.

The question forces itself, however: Who was there to set the plan on foot? The disciples were utterly cast down; to all probable seeming, in fact, they were not even in Jerusalem at all (GOSPELS, § 138 a). The theory thus breaks down at the outset, and it seems superfluous to ask whether the disciples would have ventured to act in a sense contrary to the ordinance of God who had suffered their master to die.

(e) We mention, lastly, yet another theory, which is most clearly a mere refuge of despair—the theory, namely, that the earthquake (mentioned only in Mt. 28 2) opened a chasm immediately under the sepulchre, into which the body of Jesus disappeared.

Not only this, however, but also all the other hypotheses mentioned in the foregoing paragraphs, become superfluous on the adoption of the view that the statements about the empty sepulchre are unhistorical.

22. The third day.

As soon as his approaching death came to be foreseen by Jesus, he must have looked forward also to its annulment, unless, indeed, he at the same time had abandoned the belief that he was the Messiah ordained by God to establish the divine kingdom upon earth. (a) As is said elsewhere (GOSPELS, § 145 [f]), it is not probable that Jesus foretold simply his resurrection; that took him into heaven, whereas the work of the Messiah lay upon earth. The most important prediction accordingly was that of his coming again from heaven. The time fixed by him is variously stated in the Gospels as being at the end of the then living generation (Mt. 16 27 f.), after a probably shorter interval (10 23), and in the immediate future (ἀπ' ἄρτι, Mt. 26 64). The most certain conclusion that can be deduced from this variation clearly is that Jesus never gave any precise date, and this for the reason that he himself (see Mk. 13 32 = Mt. 24 36) did not know it; yet it is also very possible that he used the expression 'in' or 'after' 'three days' as a conventional designation for a very short interval (Lk. 13 32 Mk. 14 58 15 29 and parallels, on which cp MINISTRY, § 2 a).

(b) As soon as the question came to be one not of his coming again from heaven, but of his rising again from the dead, the expression 'after three days,' in itself a very indefinite one, came to have a more exact meaning. The Jewish belief was that the soul lingered for three days only, near the body it had left, in the hope of returning to it; after that the body became so changed that a reanimation was no longer possible (see JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, § 20 a; and Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus, 2 324 f.). It was only natural that in thinking of the resurrection of Jesus this limit should be kept in mind (Mk. 8 31 9 31 10 34 and ∥; Lk. 24 7 21 46). If it is somewhat difficult to believe that Jesus uttered these prophecies so early (especially in connection with Peter's confession at Cæsarea Philippi; see GOSPELS, § 145 e), and with such exactitude of detail, it must nevertheless be recognised that he may very well, at one time or another, have expressed himself in some such sense.

(c) The OT texts that have special relevance in this connection are 2 K. 20 5 and Hos. 6 2 (in both of which the interval of three days is brought into connection with a revivification, if not after death, at least after a sickness or time of weakness); and Jonah 2 1 [1 17] also—the three days' sojourn of the prophet in the belly of the whale—is in Mt. 12 40, albeit in a very inappropriate and interrupting way (see GOSPELS, § 140 a), interpreted with reference to the period during which Jesus was to remain in the grave. Paul expressly refers to the Scriptures in 1 Cor. 15 4. A forsaking 'for a small moment' is spoken of also in Is. 54 7.

(d) In this way it became possible for the resurrection of Jesus, if expected at all, to be expected exactly after three days. The expectation, however, would hardly have had any result if those who had expected had not also had the consciousness of having seen him. In itself considered it was not absolutely imperative that the first appearances should coincide with the precise time of the expected resurrection. But if they had occurred much later the belief that the resurrection actually had happened precisely three days after death could hardly have been held very firmly. As, however, we find it in point of fact held with equal firmness by Paul (1 Cor. 15 4) and by the evangelists, the balance of probabilities favours the view that the first appearances happened on the same day or only a little later.

With this it fits in very well if we suppose that the disciples shortly after the arrest of Jesus, and Peter shortly after his denial, had already set out for Galilee, so that they might arrive there on the third day (cp Jos. Vit. 52, § 269). This is, moreover, the reason why the Gospel of Peter, in spite of all appearance, has no probability in its favour if it really means to convey that the disciples did not set out on their return journey to Galilee until the eighth or rather the ninth day after the death of Jesus, and that thus at least eleven days elapsed before the first appearance of the risen Jesus was experienced (see above, § 5 e).

(e) According to the Gospels Jesus remained under the power of death not for about seventy-two hours but only for somewhere between twenty-six and thirty-six hours. These, however, in fact, according to Jewish reckoning, are distributed between Friday, Saturday, and Sunday. In two of the OT passages referred to above—2 K. 20 5 and Hos 6 2—we read not 'after three days,' but 'on the third day.' Thus the Gospel tradition literally satisfies the expression.

It must have appeared fitting that the rising of Jesus should occur at as early a moment as possible after the third day had begun. From the same sense of fitness the visit of the women, once it was accepted as a fact, was naturally assigned to the early morning hours. Where Mk. has 'after three days' (μετὰ τρεῖς ἡμέρας; 8 31 9 31 10 34), the parallel passages consistently have 'on the third day' (τῇ τρίτῃ ἡμέρᾳ: Mt. 16 21 17 23 20 19 Lk. 9 22 18 33 as also 24 7 46, cp also 24 21 Acts 10 40). The latter expression in Mt. and Lk. may possibly be dependent on the account of the course of events as given by themselves, and thus Mk.'s phrase might seem to have been the original one. Yet we must not imagine that the two phrases were for the evangelists really incompatible. Matthew himself says in one place (27 63 f.) that Jesus foretold his resurrection 'after three days' (μετὰ τρεῖς ἡμέρας) and represents the Jews as basing upon this their petition to Pilate that the sepulchre may be guarded 'till the third day' (ἕως τῆς τρίτης ἡμέρας). Were this to be taken literally it would have no sense, for in that case no watch would have been asked for precisely the fourth day, which was the critical one. From this it follows also that we are not compelled to regard Mt. 12 40 (see above, c) as genuine for the reason that, according to the report in the Gospels, the time of the fulfilment was shorter than that appointed in Jesus' prophecy. Jn. 2 19-21 says: ἐν τρισὶν ἡμέραις.

As for the number of the appearances, Paul knows of more than we find in any one Gospel—viz., five, over and above that made to himself.

(a) It is not possible, however, to identify each of even the few Gospel accounts with one of Paul's.

23. Number of appearances.

Let one example suffice in illustration of the kind of violence in dealing with texts required in order to effect identifications. Resch (TU v. 4 421-426, x. 2 381-389, x. 3 768-782 790-814 824-827) identifies the appearance to Peter with that to the unnamed disciple at Emmaus (see above, § 2 q), that to the Twelve with Lk. 24 36-49 and Jn. 20 19-24 (above, § 2 r), that to the Five Hundred with Lk. 24 50 f., where, nevertheless, 'them' (αὐτούς) denotes precisely the same persons as we find in 24 33 36. That to James he identifies with that to Thomas and the other disciples in Jn. 20 26-29. This James he holds to be identical with James the son of Alphæus, who may (Resch says) have been named Thomas—i.e., twin—because his brother Judas of James is called Twin in Syriac tradition (Lips. Apokr. Ap.-Gesch. i. 20 227, ii. 2 154 173 f.). Finally, the appearance to 'all the apostles' is, according to Resch, that mentioned in Mt. 28 16-20 and Acts 1 4-12.

(b) If one addresses oneself to the problems without harmonistic prepossessions, the safest criteria for identifying an event of which there are two accounts will be the presence of characteristic details and (next in importance) exact time-data. Unfortunately Paul supplies us with no details, and dates are gained only indirectly, so far as they can be deduced from the order in which he mentions the events. The number of persons said to have been involved in a historical event is a secure criterion of its identity only if the number is small. As soon as it becomes considerable, an error within moderate limits is not wholly inconceivable.

(c) On these principles the only identification that admits of being made without question is that of the appearance to Peter in 1 Cor. 15 5 with the appearance mentioned in Lk. 24 34. Next in Paul's account comes an appearance to the Twelve. A similar appearance is recorded by Mt. as the only one he knows. In Lk. the only appearance to the Eleven (with others) is in 24 33 36-51; Jn. 20 19-24 contains the first appearance to ten apostles; but we must identify the two on account of their exactly similar date (§ 2 r). Cp also the almost identical words in Lk. 24 36, 'stood in the midst of them' (ἔστη ἐν μέσῳ αὐτῶν) and Jn. 20 19, 'stood in the midst' (ἔστη εἰς τὸ μέσον). The diversity of the special features mentioned by Lk. and Jn. may be ignored all the more readily if we find ourselves able to regard them merely as unhistorical embellishments. Both date (evening of the resurrection day), however, and place (Jerusalem) are quite irreconcilable with those in Mt. Nevertheless it will remain open to us to recognise as kernel common to all three accounts that after the appearance to Peter there was another to the Eleven. Here also belongs the second fragment of the Gospel of the Hebrews (above, § 4 c). This, however, is the only one of Resch's identifications that can stand scrutiny, and even so Mt. must be left out.

(d) The appearance to the 500 has no parallels (the proposed parallel referred to in § 11 b cannot be accepted), that to James only in the Gospel of the Hebrews (above, § 4 a, b). As parallel to that to 'all the apostles' on the other hand we must not adduce Acts 1 4-12. The event related there is, in the intention of the author, not the sequel to the only appearance in the Third Gospel (24 33 36-51) to about the same number of persons; it aims at correcting that part (24 44-51) of the earlier narrative which ends with the Ascension. Jn. 20 26-29 admits of being cited in this connection merely as being the only repetition to be met with in any gospel, of an appearance to a company of disciples approximating this number. Since, however, this company is in Jn. supplemented only by Thomas and in Paul by quite different persons, we have no assurance that even so much as a reminiscence of one and the same occurrence underlies the two accounts. On the other hand, in Paul the appearance of the risen Jesus at the sepulchre to the two Marys (Mt.), or to Mary Magdalene alone (Jn.), is unmentioned, as also that to the two disciples at Emmaus and that reported in Jn. 21, which has some resemblance to what we find in the Gospel of Peter (above, § 5 d).

(e) It has already been shown at some length (§§ 15, 18 c) that Paul would certainly not have omitted to mention at least the appearances at the sepulchre and at Emmaus had he been aware of them. To meet this difficulty, and establish the priority of the Gospel narratives to Paul, the counter question has been asked: How could the evangelists possibly have allowed so much that is found in Paul to escape them, if they had been acquainted with his narrative or even with the tradition which underlies it? This question, however, is easily answered. For a writer who could report an instance in which Jesus had partaken of food (Lk.), or in which his wounds had been touched (Lk., Jn.), or who could speak of the empty sepulchre as all four evangelists do, or of appearances of the risen Jesus close to the sepulchre (Mt., Jn.)—for such a writer and for his readers an accumulation of instances in which Jesus had merely been seen no longer possessed any very great interest; and a case even in which he had appeared to five hundred brethren at once would, at the time when the Gospels were written, hardly have been considered so important as an appearance to the apostles, whose place in the reverence of the faithful had already come to be very exalted (see MINISTRY, § 34). Even the instance in which Jesus had been merely seen (though) by Peter is only touched on by Lk. (24 34), not described, plainly because the narrative alongside of the others would be too devoid of colour.

24. Influence of tendency on Gospels.

To this want of interest in mere visual appearances of the risen Jesus we can add, however, in the case of the evangelists a positive interest, that of serving definite purposes by their narratives. (a) It makes for confirmation of what has been laid down in preceding sections (§§ 17-22) as to the elements in the accounts of the resurrection which alone can be recognised as historical, if we are in a position to show that everything in the accounts which goes beyond such indubitably historical elements is a product of tendencies which by an inherent necessity could not fail to lead to a shaping of the accounts in the form in which they now lie before us, even where there is no substratum of actual fact. In so far as these tendencies give us the right to pronounce unhistorical everything that can be explained by their means, in the absence of sufficient testimony to historical fact, they may be appropriately considered now in the course of the investigation as to objective facts in the resurrection-narratives on which we are at present engaged. It will appear that at all points the reference to tendencies supplies an adequate explanation of all the statements which we have been unable to accept as historical.

(b) As regards the nature of these tendencies:—some are directly apologetical, having for their object to preclude the possibility of certain definite objections against the actuality of the resurrection. Others are apologetical indirectly, their aim being to round off the picture by supplying gaps so that no questions may remain open. Lastly, some have in view the needs of the church itself, tracing back, as they do, to the risen Jesus certain instructions which were not found in the reports of the period of his earthly ministry (§ 28), or seeking to compensate for the want of that direct assurance of the continued life of Jesus which later generations were no longer able to command (§ 29).

(c) That the evangelical narratives as a whole are in many ways influenced by tendency has been shown in GOSPELS, §§ 108-114 and JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, §§ 17, 20 c, 23, 35 h, and elsewhere. How close at hand apologetic interests were where the story of the resurrection was concerned is seen even in the fact that the entire statement of Paul is made with an apologetic view—only, in his case there is no justification for the conjecture that the contents of his statement were altered by this consideration (§§ 10 f.). In the Gospels, on the other hand, we have at least one point in which this is particularly clear, and recognised even by very conservative theologians.

In Mt. 28 15 it is expressly said that the report of the theft of the body by the disciples was current among the Jews in the writer's time. The writer traces it back to the false testimony of the guard at the sepulchre procured by bribery on the part of the Jewish authorities. If we find ourselves unable to regard this bribery, or indeed any part of the story as to the watch set over the sepulchre, as historical, we are shut up to supposing that the allegations arose from the desire (or tendency) to make the story of the theft of the body by the disciples seem untenable.

(d) It must at the same time be expressly emphasised that we are by no means compelled to think of this tendency as operative in such a manner that an author would produce from his own brain a quite new narrative in the apologetic direction. Precisely the same result—namely, the complete unhistoricity and the 'tendency' character of a narrative—emerges if we assume that the narrative has grown up only bit by bit, by the co-operation of several, and has reached its present form under the influence of naive and artless presuppositions and pardonable misunderstandings, in some such manner as we have sought to render probable elsewhere for a series of narratives found in the Fourth Gospel (see JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, § 35, a-f). A special reason for making the same attempt in the case of the resurrection is found in the character of the accounts themselves. If they were pure inventions it would be very difficult to understand why, for example, of the disciples at Emmaus one is nameless, and of those in Jn. 21 two are unnamed, or why the appearances to Peter as being the first, or that to the 500 as being the most imposing, should not have received detailed adornment. Cp, further, §§ 19*c*, 25*c*.

(e) To help us to realise how such a narrative could come into existence by successive steps, let us take the example referred to above—that of the watch set on the sepulchre.

A Christian who found himself confronted for the first time with the assertion that the disciples had stolen the body of Jesus naturally opposed it to the utmost. As, however, at the same time (as we must suppose, if we believe the narrative of Mt. to be unhistorical) he found himself unable to adduce any counter-evidence, he would be constrained to have recourse to conjectures, and to say something like this: 'The Jews, we may be quite certain, saw to the watching of the sepulchre; they could very well have known that Jesus had predicted his rising again for the third day.' A somewhat careless Christian by-stander received the impression that in these suggestions what he was listening to was not mere conjecture but statement of fact, and circulated it among his friends as such; that it was unhesitatingly believed by Christians is not astonishing. Next, let us suppose, another propounded the question: Did then the men of the guard actually see what happened at the resurrection of Jesus? Again the answer could only be a conjecture; but just as certainly it must have run as follows: 'Unquestionably; for they were continuously at the sepulchre, and Roman soldiers never sleep on guard.' As, further, at the time we are at present supposing, the statement that the women had found the stone rolled away had long been current, conjecture as to what the guards had observed before the arrival of the women could hardly have been other than to the effect that there had been an earthquake and that an angel had come down from heaven and rolled away the stone. That this conjecture also should have been taken up as a statement of fact is easy to suppose. Lastly, a listener perhaps would ask: 'Why then did not the soldiers tell what had happened, and why have we been left in ignorance of this until now?' Once more the answer—a conjecture merely, yet ready to be accepted as a fact—was at hand: The Jewish authorities will doubtless have bribed them to suppress the truth and to spread instead of it the rumour that the disciples had stolen the body.

Without pursuing this line of explanation further in details, let us now endeavour to see what were the conscious or unconscious apologetic tendencies at work which could have given rise to the unhistorical elements in the gospel narratives.

25. Effect of tendency: (a) on accounts of sepulchre.

(a) If Jesus was risen, his grave must have been empty. If this was disputed, the Christians asserted it as a fact, and that with the very best intention of affirming what was true. Therefore, no hesitation was felt in further declaring that (according to all reasonable conjecture) the women who had witnessed Jesus' death had wished to anoint his body and thus had come to know of the emptiness of the grave. In the fact that according to Mk. and Mt. this was not alleged regarding the male disciples we can see still a true recollection that those disciples were by that time no longer in Jerusalem (see GOSPELS, § 138 a); this feature was not first added by our canonical evangelists Mk. and Mt., for they already presuppose the presence of the disciples in Jerusalem.

(b) Why then should not these disciples themselves have gone to the sepulchre? In an earlier phase of the narratives it was, no doubt, borne in mind that these disciples, if in Jerusalem at all, had to remain in concealment, and even a writing so late as the Gospel of Peter (26) knew that very well. Lk., however (24 24), ignores it. His statement that 'certain' (τινές) disciples went to the sepulchre is still very vague. But Jn. forthwith lays hold of it and definitely names Peter and the beloved disciple, and reports upon their rivalry in a manner that betrays a conscious tendency much more strongly than most of the other narratives (cp SIMON PETER, § 22*b*).

(c) The most obvious conjecture must necessarily have been that Jesus was seen immediately at the sepulchre itself. Here also may be distinguished two stages. The earlier is the account of Mt.; Jn. recasts it (§ 19*c*). If Jn. had been a free inventor it would be hard to say why he does not assign the appearance of Jesus at the sepulchre to Peter and the beloved disciple, both of whom nevertheless he represents as examining the sepulchre. Since he names only a woman as receiving the appearance he shows himself bound by the representation which we now find in Mt., in spite of all the comparative freedom with which he departs from it. So also the Coptic account, and the Didaskalia (above, §§ 6, 7 b).

(d) In all the reports hitherto mentioned, however, Jesus was seen only after, not during, his resurrection. The possibility of filling up this blank was offered by the story of the guard at the sepulchre, which on its own merits has already been discussed (above, § 24 e). It could in point of fact fill the blank in an (apologetically) extremely effective way, inasmuch as it was by unbelievers that the actual fact of the resurrection was observed.

The timidity which restrained the other writers from touching upon this incident continued to be still operative with Mt. in so far that he does not say that the person of Jesus was actually seen, and adds that the watchers became as dead men (28 4). The Gospel of Peter has completely overcome this timidity; the watchers observe accurately each of the successive phases of the resurrection and see Jesus himself as he emerges from the tomb. The codex Bobbiensis (above, § 7 a) relates this simply as a fact without mention of the witnesses. The statement of the Gospel of the Hebrews—that Jesus gave the linen shroud to the servant of the high-priest—stands upon the same plane.

As long as there was still current knowledge that the first appearances of the risen Jesus were in Galilee, the fact could be reconciled with the presence of the disciples in Jerusalem on the morning of the resurrection only (a) on the assumption that they were then directed to go to Galilee.

26. (b) On question: Galilee or Jerusalem.

The natural media for conveying such a communication must have seemed to be the angels at the sepulchre in the first instance, and after them the women. So Mk. and Mt. So far as Mt. is concerned this direction to be given to the disciples was perhaps the reason, or a reason in addition to that suggested in § 2 d, why the women should be made to go to the grave so early as on the evening ending the Sabbath, so that the disciples might still in the course of the night have time to set out and if possible obtain a sight of Jesus within three days after his crucifixion.

(b) Yet such a combination as this was altogether too strange. Why should Jesus not have appeared forthwith in Jerusalem to the disciples? Accordingly Lk. and Jn. simply suppressed the direction to go to Galilee, finding themselves unable to accept it, and transferred the appearances to Jerusalem. Or, it was not our canonical evangelists who did both things at one and the same time, but there had sprung up, irrespective of Mk. and Mt., the feeling that Jesus must in any case have already appeared to the disciples in Jerusalem; it presented itself to Lk. and Jn. with a certain degree of authority, and these writers had not now any occasion to invent but simply to choose what seemed to them the more probable representation, and then, when in the preparation of their respective books they reached the order to go to Galilee, merely to pass over it or get round it (§ 2 k), as no longer compatible with the new view.

As against all assurances that the risen Jesus had been seen, it was always possible to raise the objection that what was seen had been merely 'a vision' (φάντασμα).

27. (c) On sensible reality of appearances.

One good way of meeting this objection was (a) the assurance that the eye-witnesses had assured themselves of the contrary with all the more care and circumspection because they themselves had at first shared this doubt. It is thus that we are to explain the care with which the disbelief of the disciples is accentuated.

So in Mt. 28 17 ('but some doubted,' οἱ δὲ ἐδίστασαν)[1] Lk.

[1] Should Brandt (355-357) be right in his conjecture that these three words are a gloss, because, in the words immediately

24 11 37 41—in vv. 37 41 we have a doubt that is hardly intelligible in the present connection, since all those present have already in v. 34 confessed their faith in the resurrection of Jesus (an unevenness that would be removed by the hypothesis of Brandt spoken of in § 16 b)—also with special emphasis in Jn. 20 25 Mk. 16 11 13 f. and in the Coptic account. The counterpart, a specially strong faith, is shown by James, in the Gospel of the Hebrews, in his oath that he would fast until Jesus had risen again.

(b) If then it was held important to be able to overcome doubts, it was always possible to produce some impression if assurance could be given that Jesus had been not only seen but also heard. As to the substance of what he said something will be found in the next section (§ 28); for the present, all that comes into consideration is the simple fact of speech. For narrators who had never themselves witnessed an appearance of Jesus it was an exceedingly natural thing to assume that Jesus had been not only seen but also heard, and it was equally easy for their hearers to take their conjecture for fact. At the same time, since it was not impossible also to hear words, as Paul reports himself to have done (2 Cor. 12 4), without the experience being more than an ecstasy, some yet stronger proof of objectivity still remained necessary.

(c) In § 17 [f] stress has already been laid on the fact that in the bodily figure of Jesus which was seen the marks of the wounds were also included; nay more, that spectators even perhaps believed themselves to see that he was showing them. Still, a real guarantee of the actuality of his return to this earth had not been received until the wounds had been touched.

Whilst, however, there is between such an 'actual' seeing and actual touching a distinction so great that it can hardly be exaggerated, it is one which is capable of being almost entirely overlooked by people who neither themselves had witnessed an appearance of Jesus nor were familiar with the principles of psychology; and thus it would not be impossible for them, without any consciousness of inaccuracy, still less of deliberate perversion of the truth, to change the statement which eye-witnesses had actually made as to having seen the wounds into the different statement that Jesus had invited the disciples to touch them. So Lk. 24 39 Jn. 20 27; also the Coptic account and the second fragment of the Gospel of the Hebrews (§ 4 c), in the last-cited case with the express addition that the disciples availed themselves of the invitation. In a naive way a touching of Jesus by the women is mentioned in Mt. 28 9.

(d) Lk. goes yet another step further in his statement (24 42 f.) that Jesus asked for food, and partook of it in the presence of the disciples. This is in v. 41 expressly characterised as a still stronger proof of the reality of his resurrection than the fact that he had been touched. Here, accordingly, the popular conceptions as to the nature of the resurrection body underlying Mk. 6 14-16, which in the earliest period were not applied to Jesus (§ 17 e), gain influence. Jn. does not follow Lk. in this; he declines to represent the risen Jesus in so strongly and frankly sensuous a manner.[1] Yet even Lk.'s representation is surpassed by the extra-canonical addition to Lk. 24 43 (§ 7 c) that Jesus gave to his disciples the remainder of the food of which he had been partaking. An eating in their presence here becomes an eating with them, which according to Acts 10 41 was, in fact, continually happening.[2]

(e) It becomes now quite easy to understand how, once narrators had ceased to shrink from such representations, the reporter passed over that particular touch in the accounts actually proceeding from eye-witnesses according to which Jesus had vanished after each appearance, and how instead of this it was unsuspectingly taken for granted that Jesus had still remained upon earth and had dealings with his disciples in every respect as a man. In the earliest stage of this way of representing matters, such a condition of things was held to have lasted for only one day; but afterwards the time was extended to forty days (§ 16 a, b).

That this second view was not met with in tradition from the beginning, but owes its existence to a transformation of the earlier view, is absolutely certain unless we assign Acts to another than the author of the Third Gospel. The cause of the transformation is very apparent; the disciples were, during all the lifetime of Jesus, very weakly, and at the end still needed much instruction 'concerning the kingdom of God' (περὶ τῆς βασιλείας τοῦ Θεοῦ: Acts 1 3).

(f) The idea of a continuous presence of Jesus upon earth, if only for a single day, necessarily carried with it the consequence that this condition terminated in an ascension.

No one needed to invent the idea; every account of eye-witnesses had closed with the more or less definite statement that Jesus had again disappeared, and disappeared into heaven (§ 17 d). At the same time the tendency to adorn a plain story shows itself at work with sufficient clearness if we compare the simple 'he parted from them and was carried up into heaven' (διέστη ἀπ' αὐτῶν καὶ ἀνεφέρετο εἰς τὸν οὐρανόν) of Lk. 24 51, or even Mk. 16 19, with the circumstantial account given in Acts 1 9-11. The original limitation of the period during which appearances of Jesus occurred to a single day will have co-operated along with the other causes mentioned in § 23 e to bring about the exclusion by Lk. of the appearance to the 500, that to James, and that to 'all the apostles.'

The belief once created that Jesus in his various appearances had also spoken, the door lay wide open for all kinds of conjecture as to what he had said.

28. (d) On words reported.

(a) In this region the most obvious conjecture was that Jesus uttered words leading up to, or explaining, the alleged facts which we have already considered.

Thus it fits the situation equally that in Mt. 28 10 Jesus repeats to the women the injunction of the angels to bid the disciples repair to Galilee, and that in Lk. 24 49 and Acts 1 4, on the other hand, he bids them remain in Jerusalem, whilst in Jn. 20 17 he merely sends them word that he is ascending to heaven, and for this reason does not suffer Mary Magdalene to touch him. It is still in accordance with the same principle that he is represented as at a later date making the request that his disciples should touch him, and asking the disciples whether they have anything to eat (§ 27 c, d).

(b) Other words of Jesus apply to situations which we have not yet discussed. Thus, in Lk. 24 38 and in the Didaskalia (§ 7 b), as well as in the speech to James in the Gospel of the Hebrews, the purpose is to prepare the way for a joyful frame of heart and mind. The words in Jn. 20 19 26, 'Peace be unto you,' as also those to Saul, 'Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?' (Acts 9 4, etc.), are singularly well chosen.

(c) What must have presented itself as the main object must have been that of instructing the disciples, before the final departure of Jesus, in everything which was still necessary for their future tasks.

To this category of instruction belongs the repeated insistence upon the uncertainty of the time of the end of the world (Acts 1 7; cp Mk. 13 32), but very specially, as new matter, the proof that the passion of Jesus had been appointed by God and foretold by the prophets (Lk. 24 25-27 44-46). If Jesus in this manner established a correct understanding of events that were past, it was natural, indeed inevitable, to think that, over and above this, he had given all the new directions for the future which were in point of fact followed in the church and therefore could not but have proceeded from its founder. Thus (it was held) it must necessarily have been Jesus who told the disciples that 'all authority had been given unto him in heaven and on earth,' and that he was with them alway, even unto the end of the world (Mt. 28 18 20); he it was who must have instituted the mission to the Gentiles (Mt. 28 19 f. Lk. 24 47 Mk. 16 15), as also baptism (Mk. 16 16, and the canonical text of Mt. 28 19; but cp § 8 c), and he too it must have been who promised the power of performing miracles (Mk. 16 17 f.), yet also demanded a faith that believed without having seen (Jn. 20 29),—this in view of the fact that he knew of, and was able to foretell, the outpouring of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost (Lk. 24 49 Acts 1 4 f. 8), if he did not himself impart the Spirit as in Jn. 20 22.

(d) This leads us to the significance which the words of the risen Jesus have, especially for the apostles; for it is only to them that in Jn. the Spirit is imparted, as also the power to forgive or to retain sins (20 23) or, indeed, a formal mission of any kind (20 21). We find, following, Jesus passes over the doubt of these disciples without remark, the insertion would still show that a reader of the oldest period found it fitting to presuppose doubts on the part of some of the disciples.

[1] The question in Jn. 21 5, quite on a level with Lk. 24 41 ('aught to eat?'), has a quite different significance; in Jn. Jesus does not intend to eat, but to give them to eat. Neither also does Lk. 24 30 f. (the scene at Emmaus) imply a representation of Jesus as eating. See § 29, b.

[2] The rendering of συναλιζόμενος in EV^mg. of Acts 1 4 'eating with them' is, however, very doubtful (EV 'being assembled together with them').

further, that in the missionary precept the disciples come first into account, just as in Acts (especially 26 16-18) it is Paul who does so. Jn. 21 15-23 has to do entirely with fixing the relative rank in the regard of the church between Peter on the one hand and the beloved disciple on the other (§ 9 c); similarly 20 3-10 (cp SIMON PETER, § 22 b). The gospel tradition has therefore made use of its accounts of the resurrection of Jesus in a very decided manner for the purpose of carrying back to Jesus the high esteem in which the apostles were held at a later time.

With other reasons (§§ 23 e 27 [f]) the purpose just referred to may have co-operated to bring it about that the evangelists recorded almost exclusively only appearances to apostles and pass over in silence those to the 500 and to James,—indeed, that Mt. contents himself with recording no more than one appearance altogether, an appearance in which B. Weiss even discerns a free fusion of all that Mt. knew by tradition regarding the appearances of Jesus.

29. (e) On a substitute for vision of risen Jesus. At last, however, the emphasis that had been laid on the literal historical fact of the resurrection of Jesus gave place to something different. (a) However firmly established the resurrection might seem to be historically, however little open to any shadow of doubt in the minds of the faithful, its value for them was nevertheless small: it was nothing more than an event of past time. What faith demands is something present, something now and always capable of being experienced afresh. The demand for a faith that could believe without having seen (Jn. 20 27 29 1 Pet. 1 8) was hard to satisfy. Thus there came to be felt a need for such a turn being given to the resurrection-narrative as should make the continued life of Jesus capable of being experienced anew at all times (Mt. 28 20: 'I am with you alway'), and thus the historical statements as to his long-past appearances—accounts which had been elaborated with such care—in great measure lost their importance.

(b) Towards this result Paul had already contributed. The risen Christ is for him identical with the Holy Spirit (2 Cor. 3 17 Rom. 8 9-11, and often). The fourth evangelist followed him in this (§ 16 c; JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, § 26 c). Therefore in the Fourth Gospel the risen Jesus having ascended to heaven bestows the Holy Spirit already on the very day of the resurrection. Only to the disciples, indeed, in 20 22, but according to 7 38 f. expressly to all believers; and therefore it is not open to doubt that 16 7 13-15 14 18 28 15 26, etc., are also to be interpreted in the latter sense. As Holy Spirit Jesus is always present.

(c) A somewhat more sensible substitute for vision of the risen Jesus is the observance of the ordinance of the Supper. This is the true meaning of the deeply significant narrative of the disciples at Emmaus (cp CLEOPAS).

The wish of Christianity—'abide with us'—did not admit of being fulfilled in a literal sense; but in every act of communion 'he went in to abide with them' (Lk. 24 29). Not with flesh and bones as in the case of the primitive disciples (24 39), but 'in another form' (ἐν ἑτέρᾳ μορφῇ: Mk. 16 12); and whilst the result of all that could be told about the empty grave was 'him they saw not,' he is now presently recognised 'in the breaking of the bread' (Lk. 24 24 30 f. 34). It is plain that the knowledge ascribed to the two disciples, so skilfully embodied in this narrative, could not have been drawn by them from the events described by Lk. even if they had literally happened to them on the resurrection day; it is naturally the product of a long growth, and that too in Gentile-Christian circles in which the corporeal element in Jesus was neither so familiar nor so important as in the primitive-apostolical. It is clearly a reminiscence of a celebration of the Lord's Supper that we have also in Jn. 21 13 and in the giving of the bread to James in the Gospel of the Hebrews; only, in Jn. it has its prototype in the feeding of the five thousand with loaves and fishes (6 9 11 = 21 9), which, however, in turn bears the most express marks of being but a clothing of the Supper (see JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, §§ 20 c, 23 e). The number 'seven' as applied to the disciples corresponds to the number of baskets which in the second 'feeding' in the Synoptists (Mk. 8 8 = Mt. 15 37) were filled with the fragments that remained over; whilst in Jn. 6 13, in agreement with the first 'feeding' in the Synoptists (Mk. 6 43 = Mt. 14 20 = Lk. 9 17), twelve baskets are filled, corresponding to the number 'twelve' as applied to the disciples. The mysterious character of the presence of the risen Jesus at the Supper appears at Emmaus in his disappearance when the two disciples recognised him (Lk. 24 31), at the Sea of Galilee in no one's asking him who he was (Jn. 21 12).

III. EXPLANATION OF THE FACTS.

30. Nature of Jesus' resurrection-body. The last problem still demanding solution, is how to explain the only fact that has emerged in the course of our examination—the fact that Jesus was seen, as we read in 1 Cor. 15 5-8. Any attempted explanation presupposes an insight into subjective experience that perhaps can never be completely attained. It demands, therefore, the greatest caution. It cannot, however, be left unattempted.

(a) The investigator who holds himself bound to accept and make intelligible as literal fact everything recorded in the resurrection narratives, even of the canonical gospels merely, cannot fulfil his task on any other condition than that he assumes a revivification of the buried body of Jesus to a new period of earthly life, hardly less earthly than when Jesus was taken for Elijah or the Baptist risen from the dead (Mk. 6 14-16 8 28 and ||, cp 9 11-13 Mt. 11 14). It only remains to be stipulated that he who does so shall fully realise that what he is assuming is a miracle in the fullest sense of the word. Many theologians are strangely wanting in clearness as to this. Even, however, after one has clearly understood what he is accepting, it is impossible to stop here; for such a view does justice only to one side—the physical and sensuous—of the resurrection-narratives; not to the other, according to which Jesus was nevertheless exalted to heaven, a thing impossible for flesh and blood (1 Cor. 15 50).

(b) In order to do justice to this second side also, recourse is often had to the theory of a gradual sublimation or spiritualisation of the resurrection-body of Jesus —at first wholly material—whereby it was gradually made fit for its ascension. Again, what has to be insisted on is that the miracle is not hereby diminished; on the contrary, to the original miracle of the revivification of the material body is added a second—that of the spiritualisation of the material body. The thing, however, is also quite inconceivable; how is one to represent to oneself the stages of the transition?

A body which is already capable of making its way through closed doors must surely have ceased to be tangible (Jn. 20 26 f.). Moreover, such a view is in direct contradiction to what we find in NT, not only in 1 Cor. 15 50-53 but also in the gospels; for the touching there referred to and (in Lk. 24 39-43) the eating happen precisely at the last appearance of Jesus which is immediately followed by the ascension; and the precept not to touch is placed in Jn. (20 17) at an earlier point. So, also, we read that Jesus is immediately recognised in his later appearances, but precisely in the earlier ones not (Lk. 24 16 Jn. 20 14).

(c) If we decide to confine ourselves to the task of explaining what we take to be the simple fact according to 1 Cor. 15, we must not suffer ourselves to forget that Paul thinks of the future resurrection-body of man—which he regards as heavenly and pneumatic—as conformed to the pattern of the resurrection-body of Jesus (so 1 Cor. 15 45-49).[1] Jesus' body also, then, in his view must have been heavenly and pneumatic; and as Paul in 1 Cor. has not yet given up the revivification of the buried body (§ 15 b), he must have thought of the pneumatic attributes possessed by it as having arisen through metamorphosis, such as, according to 1 Cor. 15 51-53, is to happen also to the bodies of those men and women who shall still be alive at the last day. According to what we have seen in § 17 e the original apostles also agree in this. Thus the explanation of the facts which proceeds on the belief of the apostles that a body of Jesus was really seen must think of that body as heavenly and pneumatic; not, however, in such a sense that it was given to Jesus at his resurrection as a new body whilst the old body remained in the grave, but in the sense that it came into existence through a change wrought on the buried body. On this explanation the resurrection has as much an entirely miraculous character as it has on either of the other two theories already considered.

In order to escape so far as may be from miracle of the character described in the preceding section, and, generally, to be rid of the question of the corporeity of the risen Jesus, recourse is often had to the view that it was only the spirit of Jesus that rose and appeared to his followers. Here opinion is divided as to whether such a thing is possible without a miracle or not. Any one who holds appearances of the spirits of the departed to be possible in the natural order will be able to dispense with assuming a miracle here. The majority, however, maintain the negative. Moreover, such persons declare that the appearances of Jesus to his disciples differ considerably from the manner in which the spiritualism of the present day holds appearances of spirits to occur. They find themselves compelled accordingly, if it was merely the spirit of Jesus that was alive and manifested itself, to postulate a miracle whereby it was made visible.

31. Resurrection of the Spirit only.

It is to be observed, moreover, that this view—that only the spirit lives on—is in no respect different from the doctrine of the immortality of the soul except in this, that in the particular case in question the continuance of the life of the spirit begins only on the third day after death. This, however, is a collocation of quite heterogeneous ideas. The essence of the doctrine of immortality lies in this, that the life of the soul is never interrupted, and thus there can be no thought at all of revivification after remaining for a time in a state of death. Revivification can occur only in the case of a subject that is capable of dying—in other words, in a body. This is a Jewish idea, that of immortality is Greek. The latter is adopted in the Book of Wisdom, and Paul comes near it in 2 Cor. 5 1-8 (§ 15 b); for the original apostles it is from the outset excluded (§ 17 e).

It is discovered to be necessary, accordingly, to go a step farther. The belief that the risen Jesus actually did appear is frankly given up.

32. Objective visions.

(a) The disciples, we are told, saw nothing real: neither the body of Jesus, clothed with earthly or heavenly attributes, nor the spirit of Jesus whether in true spirit form or in some kind of acquired visibility. What they believed they saw was in reality only a visionary image, without any real appearance of Jesus; but this visionary image was produced in their souls immediately by God in order that they might be assured that Jesus was risen. For this reason the vision is called objective.

(b) The belief is entertained that by this method of regarding the matter the assumption of a miracle is made superfluous; all that is postulated is merely a Divine act of revelation. Keim has invented for this view, which he also supports, the phrase: telegram from heaven. This act of revelation itself, however, is nothing less than a miracle. Were it not miraculous the visionary image of the risen Jesus in the minds of the disciples could only have its origin in their own subjective condition. This is exactly what is denied and must be denied; otherwise the disciples must be taken to have had their faith in the resurrection within themselves and needed no divine revelation of it. The subjective condition of the disciples must on this view be represented as one of the greatest prostration, which could be changed into its opposite only by a revelation really coming from God.

(c) It has to be remarked, further, that according to this view Jesus' continued existence must be regarded as miraculous in the full sense. If the presupposition were that his soul was immortal like the soul of any other man, his continued life would be a matter of course and did not require to be made known by a special revelation. But what is aimed at in putting forward this view is much rather to establish the complete difference between Jesus and all other men which has been from the first claimed for him by the assertion of his resurrection, but yet to be able to dispense with miracle. This can never succeed.

If a really non-miraculous explanation is desired, then apart from subjective visions (of which more hereafter) two possibilities present themselves.

33. Non-miraculous explanations (excluding visions).

(a) The hypothesis that Jesus was only apparently dead found many supporters in the days of rationalism, and it has also been espoused by a writer so modern as Hase (Gesch. Jesu, 1876, § 112).

That crucified persons taken down from the cross while still in life have been able to recover is testified by Herodotus (7 194) and Josephus (Vit. 75 end, § 420 f.). In a case of seeming death indeed it is hardly credible, and to call to one's aid the wonderful power of healing which Jesus exercised on behalf of other persons is in this connection quite fantastic. More than this: had Jesus presented himself merely as one who had all but died on the cross his appearance would have produced the impression of weakness and helplessness, not that of a conqueror of death and the grave, which nevertheless was the character he required to present if he was to inspire his followers to a world-conquering faith. Finally, what could they say, if he nevertheless in the end died after all? To escape the force of this question the assumption was that he had withdrawn himself into solitude, perhaps into some cave in order that his death might not become known. It is obvious that the theory of a seeming death is not enough; it is necessary to assume also various machinations, whether on the part of Jesus himself or on the part of his disciples, whether at the time of his leaving the sepulchre or with a view to covering the worst signs of weakness before he presented himself to larger circles of his followers. In this aspect the present hypothesis approximates—

(b) The hypothesis that, although Jesus did not recover, the disciples spread abroad, and found credence for, the rumour that he was alive. Apart from all other difficulties, such a hypothesis is from the outset untenable for two reasons: not only would the disciples immediately after the death have been unable to summon courage for so gigantic a task as the theory implies, but also at a later date they would not have had courage in persecution to surrender their lives for such a faith.

Thus subjective visions are all that remain now to be dealt with. Let us endeavour first of all to determine their nature in general so far as this is practicable, without a too minute discussion of the conditions implied in the NT narratives and statements.

34. Nature of subjective vision.

(a) In contradistinction from the so-called objective vision (see § 32 a), the image that is seen in the subjective vision is a product of the mental condition of the seer. The presupposition is, accordingly, that he is not only in a high degree of psychical excitement which is capable of producing in him the belief that he is seeing something which in point of fact has no objective existence, but also that all the elements which are requisite for the formation of a visionary image, whether it be views or ideas, are previously present in his mind and have engaged its activities. That in these circumstances the seer should behold an image for which there is no corresponding reality, can be spoken of as something abnormal only in so far as the occurrence is on the whole a rare one; as soon as a high degree of mental excitement is given, the existence of visions is by the laws of psychology just as intelligible and natural as, in a lower degree of mental excitement, is the occurrence of minor disturbances of sense perceptions, such as the hearing of noises and the like.

(b) The view that a subjective vision could never have led the disciples to the belief that Jesus was alive because they were able to distinguish a vision from a real experience is quite a mistake.[1] It is not in the least necessary that we should raise the question whether they were always able to do so; let it be at once assumed that they could. The distinction is not unknown in the NT; see, for example, Acts 12 9; indeed we may lay it down that 'was seen' (ὤφθη) with the single exception of Acts 7 26 always stands for another kind of seeing than that of ordinary sense-perception (e.g., Lk. 1 11 9 31 22 43 Acts 2 3 7 2 30 35 9 17 13 31 16 9 26 16 [1 Tim. 3 16?] Rev. 11 19 12 1 3). Nay, this is our warrant for calling in visions to our aid in explaining the appearances of Jesus. All that we have gained by this concession, however, is merely that the seers distinguished once and again the condition in which they were: whether ecstatic or normal; it by no means follows as matter of course that they held the thing seen in vision to be unreal, and only what they saw when in their ordinary condition to be real. How otherwise could the very conception of such a thing as an objective vision be possible?

(c) On the contrary, it pertains precisely to the subjective vision that the seer, if he is not a person thoroughly instructed in psychology and the natural sciences, is compelled to hold what he sees in his vision for real as long as it does not bring before him something which to his conception is impossible. Wherein otherwise would consist the delusion, which nevertheless every one knows to be connected with subjective vision, if not in this, that the visionary seeks for the cause of what he has seen in the external world, not in his own mental condition? And indeed the visionaries of the Bible had more extended powers than modern visionaries have for taking a visionary image as an objective reality; for, if they were unable to attribute to the image they saw any ordinary mundane reality because it was contrary to their ideas of mundane things, they could always attribute to it a heavenly reality, and it was only if it was contrary to their conception of things heavenly that they came to recognise it as a product of their own fantasy.

(d) We have therefore to distinguish between three experiences which were regarded as possible by the disciples and their contemporaries: (1) the seeing of an earthly person by the use of the ordinary organs of sight: (2) the seeing of a person in a real yet heavenly corporeity, not by the bodily eyes but in a vision (ὀπτασία: Lk. 1 22 24 23 Acts 26 19 2 Cor. 12 1; or ὅρασις: Acts 2 17 Rev. 9 17; or ὅραμα: Acts 9 10 12 10 3 17 19 11 5 16 9 f. 18 9), in a state of ecstasy (ἔκστασις: Acts 10 10 11 5 22 17), or, it may be, outside of the seer's own body (2 Cor. 12 2 f.); (3) the production of a false image on the mind without any corresponding outward reality. The first of these possibilities (ordinary seeing) is contemplated only by those evangelists who speak of Jesus as eating and as being touched, and who never themselves had been present at appearances of the risen Jesus. The second possibility (visionary seeing of a heavenly corporeity) is what the witnesses of such appearances intended and what Paul indicates by the word 'was seen' (ὤφθη). With the third possibility (false image) it has this in common that in both the condition of the participants is visionary; with the first (ordinary seeing), that the participants hold what they see to be absolutely real and to have an existence external to themselves (but not with a mundane reality).

(e) It was the mistake of many critics to assume that by the use of 'was seen' (ὤφθη) the purely subjective origin of what had been seen was conceded by Paul himself. The same error, however, is almost entirely shared also by apologists such as Beyschlag when they suppose that the participants, if they had held their condition to be that of visionaries, would at the same time have perceived the unreality of what they saw. This hypothetically enunciated statement of the apologists is distinguished from the categorical assertion of the critics in only one point: the apologists will have it that the participant need not necessarily attribute the origin of what he sees to the state of his own mind, but can attribute it to God—yet without the result that, in the latter case, in his view the thing seen becomes invested with reality.

Thus Beyschlag (as above, 432-435) is of opinion that Acts 16 9 does not make Paul believe that in reality a man of Macedonia stood before him, nor 10 10-16 make Peter think that in reality a sheet containing real animals was let down from heaven—not only not in mundane actuality but also not even in heavenly actuality; on the contrary, in each case neither had taken in more than this, that God was seeking to give them to understand something by means of sensible images. This way of looking at matters is utterly inconsistent with the beliefs of that time. If it is God who sends the Macedonian or the sheet containing the beasts, as a matter of course it is believed that these things are sent really (possessing of course not mundane but heavenly actuality); for where it is presupposed that God can if he chooses send them really, it would be quite unaccountable to believe that he has nevertheless not done so. That the sending is not done for its own sake merely, but has for its purpose to incite Paul or Peter to a particular course of action, is indeed true; but this does not by any means divest the thing which God has sent of its reality. Beyschlag makes it seem as if this were so merely by a reference to Acts 12 9: 'he knew not that it was true which was done by the angel, but thought he saw a vision.' It is correct to say that the same word (ὅραμα) is employed here as is used in 16 9 f. 10 17 19 11 5, and that Peter regards this vision (ὅραμα) as something unreal. Here however the distinction drawn in a preceding paragraph (above, c) falls to be applied: that a Macedonian or a sheet containing beasts endowed with a heavenly corporeality could be sent by God was regarded by Paul and by Peter respectively as thoroughly possible; on the other hand, in 12 9 it is presupposed that the liberation of Peter when it was 'not true but a vision' would have been regarded by him as impossible. In like manner, if 'vision' (ὅρασις) in Tobit 12 19 means something opposed to reality, a mere appearance (φάντασμα), that meaning is secured only by the antithesis in the sentence. The angel Raphael, who has accompanied Tobias, says here by way of after-explanation of what his real nature was: 'I have neither eaten nor drunken, but ye saw only an appearance.' The identity of the word (ὅραμα or ὅρασις) thus by no means proves identity of judgment upon the matter here in question, namely the reality or unreality of what has been seen.

(f) Equally mistaken would it be to maintain that visions are throughout the whole OT and NT regarded as an inferior form of divine revelation. Beyschlag deduces this from a single text (Nu. 12 6-8): to a prophet I reveal myself by visions or dreams, but with Moses I speak face to face. Not only is the dream placed upon a level with the vision, an equality of which there can be no thought in connection with the appearances of the risen Jesus, but also in antithesis to both is placed God's direct speaking, which undoubtedly makes known the will of God more plainly than a visual image can, the interpretation of which rests with the seer. In the case of the resurrection of Jesus, however, the situation is exactly reversed. If God had announced to the disciples by spoken words that Jesus was alive, even if they fully believed these words to have been received immediately from God, the announcement would not have been for them so clear and impressive as when they were themselves permitted to look upon the form of Jesus as of one who was alive.

(g) After what has been said in three preceding paragraphs (c, d, e) the decisive question comes to be: what sort of appearances of a person risen from the dead were regarded by the disciples as possible?

To this the answer must at once be: Not incorporeal appearances; for the idea of the immortality of the soul alone was utterly strange to them (§ 17 e). Next, we must say: they looked for a general resurrection of the terrestrial body to a terrestrial life on the last day; but in exceptional cases they regarded it as happening even in the present (Mk. 6 14-16; cp § 17 e). And as they would have felt no difficulty in regarding Jesus as an exceptional instance of this last description, they would have regarded an appearance of Jesus in this form (with a terrestrial body) as a real one. This case, however, does not come into consideration; for such an appearance of Jesus does not come within the range of what is historically authenticated.

What is alone authenticated is the appearance of Jesus in heavenly corporeality; but of that it has been shown in § 17 e that it corresponded with the conceptions of Paul and likewise with those of the original apostles.

(h) The resultant conclusion then must be that when the disciples experienced an appearance of Jesus in heavenly corporeality they were under compulsion to regard it as objectively real, and therefore to believe that Jesus was risen because they had actually seen him.

Consequently, this belief of theirs does not prove that what they saw was objectively real: it can equally well have been merely an image begotten of their own mental condition.

Having now, we believe, shown in a general way the possibility that the things related concerning the risen Jesus may rest upon subjective visions, what next remains for us to inquire is whether such visions have any probability in view of the known situation of the disciples. This question admits of an affirmative answer, very particularly in the case of Paul.

35. Situation of Paul.

It will ever remain the lasting merit of Holsten that he has carried out this research on all sides with the most penetrating analysis. The view he arrived at holds its ground alike in presence of conservative theology and in presence of the deniers of the genuineness of all the Pauline epistles, who find the change from Pharisee to apostle of Jesus freed from the law too sudden. An energetic nature could only pass from the one extreme to the other, and could not possibly hold a mediating position.[1]

(a) Paul persecuted the Christians as blasphemers, because they proclaimed as the Messiah one who by the judgment of God (Dt. 21 23, cp Gal. 3 13) had been plainly marked as a criminal. (b) If, in defending their position, they quoted passages of the OT which in their view treated of the Messiah, Paul could not gainsay this application in a general way; all that he denied was the applicability of the passages to one who had been crucified. (c) From their appeals to the appearances of Jesus, Paul certainly had come to know quite well the form in which they would have it that they had seen him. (d) Apart from this blasphemy of theirs Paul cannot but have recognised their honesty, seriousness, and blamelessness of moral character. What if they should be in the right? We may be certain that, when he entered their houses and haled them before the judgment-seat, there were not wanting heart-rending scenes, which in the case of a man not wholly hardened could not fail to raise ever anew the recurring question whether it was really at the behest of God that he had to show all this cruelty. He repressed his scruples; yet the goad had entered his soul.

(e) In his own inner life he had no satisfaction. Whatever may have been the zeal with which he followed the precepts of the fathers (Gal. 1 14), unlike the great mass of morally laxer Pharisees his contemporaries, he perceived the impossibility of fulfilling the whole of the law's requirements. And, not being able to fulfil them, he was accursed (Gal. 3 10), and all men were in the same condemnation with himself. In Rom. 7 7-25 he has impressively described this condition. (f) And yet God in the OT had promised a time of salvation, and it was inconceivable that he should not hold to his word. But how could he, if the universal fulfilment of the law—which was so clearly impossible—were held to be the indispensable condition?

(g) Here of necessity must have come about in the mind of Paul a combination of these two lines of thought which had hitherto remained apart. What if the Christians were right in their assertion that the Crucified One really was the Messiah, through whom it was God's will to bring salvation to the world without insisting on the fulfilment of the entire law? In that case the persecution of the Christians was indeed a crime; but Paul, and with him all mankind, was nevertheless delivered from the anguish of soul caused by daily transgression of the law; mercy, no longer wrath, was what he might expect from God. (h) And indeed, this being so, it could only have been through the death of Jesus that God had willed to procure salvation for men. For Saul, the Pharisee, could never get away from the thought that some kind of propitiation had to be made for the sins of men, before God could bring in his grace. Perhaps the Christians had even already begun to quote in support of their view Is. 53, which Paul in all probability has in his mind when, in 1 Cor. 15 3, he says that he has received by tradition the doctrine that Christ, according to the Scriptures, had been delivered as a propitiation for our sins.

(i) Whether, however, all this, which in one respect promised blessedness, but in another threatened him with divine punishment as a persecutor of the Christians, was really true or not, turned for Paul upon the answer to the question, whether in actuality Jesus was risen. For, in addition to the doctrine of propitiation, Saul the Pharisee was indissolubly wedded to the thought that 'every one that hangeth on a tree' is accursed, unless God himself has unmistakably pronounced otherwise—viz. that this proposition has no application to Jesus, who did not die the death of a criminal, but the death of a divine offering for sin. Such a divine declaration was involved, according to the Christians, in the resurrection of Jesus.

(k) It will not be necessary to dwell upon the deeply agitating effect which such doubts must have produced in Paul's inmost soul; the vividness with which the living figure so often described to him by Christians must, time and again, have stood before him, only to be banished as often by the opposition of his intellect; until finally, only too easily, there came a time when the image of fancy refused any longer to yield to the effort of thought. All that need be pointed out further is that on his own testimony, as well as on that of Acts, Paul was very prone to visions and other ecstatic conditions (2 Cor. 12 1-4 1 Cor. 14 18 Acts 9 12 16 9 18 9 22 17 27 23). That he does not place what he had experienced at Damascus on a level with those visions of his, but speaks of it as the last appearance of the risen Jesus (1 Cor. 15 8), is intelligible enough if he was not aware of any further appearances having been made to other persons (see § 10 h); but it in no way shows that in the journey to Damascus what befell was not a vision, but an actual meeting with the risen Jesus. The possibility, indeed the probability, of a vision here has been pointed out; it is for each reader to choose between this and a miracle.

(l) Let it be clearly understood, however, that we do not here employ the word 'was seen' (ὤφθη) as evidence that Paul himself concedes the subjective origin of the image which he saw. (To the contrary, see § 34 b, c.) Neither do we make use of the expression in Gal. 1 16, where Paul speaks of God as having revealed his son 'in me' (ἐν ἐμοί), to prove that Paul regarded the occurrence at Damascus as one that had taken place solely within himself. The words 'I have seen' (ἑόρακα) and 'was seen' (ὤφθη) in 1 Cor. 9 1 15 8 are decisive against this, for by them the apostle means to say that he has really seen (although not in earthly but in heavenly corporeality) the risen Jesus as appearing to him ab extra. Yet so far as Gal. 1 15 f. is concerned, neither is it probable that 'to reveal' (ἀποκαλύψαι) denotes a subsequent inward illumination of Paul, since 'but when' (ὅτε δέ) and 'straightway' (εὐθέως) mark the time which followed immediately upon that of 'the Jews' religion' (Ἰουδαϊσμός) (1 13 f.). 'In me' (ἐν ἐμοί), in spite of the reference of 'to reveal' (ἀποκαλύψαι) to the event on the road to Damascus, may mean 'within me,' in so far as the appearance produced effects upon the spiritual life of the apostle; but it can easily mean also 'upon me'—i.e., by changing the persecutor into a believer (not, however, 'through the success of my missionary labours,' which did not occur till later).

The situation of the earliest disciples very readily suggests the same explanation of the facts. (a) The mental struggle between despair and hope—the disaster involved in the death of Jesus, and the hope they still somehow clung to, that the kingdom of God might still be established by Jesus—can hardly have been less than had been the struggle in the mind of Paul. Perhaps there was in their case the additional circumstance that they were fasting, a condition highly favourable to the seeing of visions. Yet such a conjecture is by no means indispensable, and we need not lay stress on the indication as to this given in the Gospel of Peter and in the Didaskalia (above, §§ 5 [f], 7 b). All these psychological elements, however, will be more fully considered later (§ 37).

36. Of earliest disciples.

[1] Holsten, ZWT, 1861, pp. 223-284; Zum Evang. des Paulus u. des Petrus, 1-237 (1868); Pfleiderer, Paulinismus, 1873, (2) 1890, Einl. On the other side: Beyschlag, St. Kr., 1864, pp. 197-264; 1870, pp. 7-50, 189-263. Specially interesting is Scholz (Deutsch-Evangel. Blätter, 1881, pp. 816-841), who recognises the whole psychological preparation for the conversion, and then brings in the supernatural fact of the risen Jesus, which his previous representation has enabled him to dispense with.

(b) On the other hand, we are unable to attach weight to the view that the disciples were gradually led by a study of the OT to a conviction that Jesus was alive, and that thus in the end they came to have visions in which they beheld his form.

Visions do not arise by processes so gradual or so placid. It is certainly correct to suppose that certain passages of the OT must have had an influence on the thoughts of the disciples in those critical days; but not that they were then discovered for the first time as a result of study. Rather must they have been long familiar, when suddenly, under the impression made by the death of Jesus, they acquire a new and decisive significance as convincing the bereaved ones that the continued life of Jesus was made assured by the word of God.

(c) From our list of such passages must be excluded many which are frequently quoted as belonging to it; for example, Is. 25 8 Ps. 133 1 3 Ezek. 18 5-9, Ps. 2 7 (although it appears to be cited in Acts 13 33 in this sense), and, in particular, Ps. 16 10, although this is cited in Acts 2 27 31 13 35. What is said in the Hebrew text is that God will not suffer his pious worshipper to die (cp v. 9). When 𝔊 by a false etymology (שׁחת = 'to destroy,' instead of שׁוּחַ = 'to sink') renders šaḥath, which, as the parallelism conclusively shows, means 'grave,' by 'destruction' (διαφθορά), the mistranslation is innocuous as long as this word is taken to mean 'death,' as the translators certainly took it; it becomes misleading only on the Christian interpretation which understands the bodily corruption that follows death. Passages of the OT from which the disciples could really have drawn their conviction as to the resurrection of Jesus are Ex. 3 6 (see its employment by Jesus himself in Mk. 12 26 f.) Is. 53 9 f. Hos. 6 2 2 K. 20 5, perhaps also Ps. 118 17 Job 19 25-27, but very specially Ps. 86 13 110 1 (cp Brandt, 498-504). It must always be borne in mind, it is hardly necessary to say, that they did not interpret such passages in a critical manner and with reference to the context, but simply as they seemed to present to them a consoling thought.

(d) No weight can be given to the objection that the image of the risen Jesus which presented itself to the disciples cannot have been subjective because at first they did not recognise it. That they failed to do so is stated only in passages which must be regarded as unhistorical (Lk. 24 16 Jn. 20 14); in Lk. 24 37 41 it is not even said that he was not recognised.

(e) Another objection, that though perhaps the subjective explanation might be admissible in the case of a single individual, it wholly fails in the case of appearances to several, not to speak of the case of 500 at once, appears at first sight to have great weight. As against this it is worth mentioning that one of the most recent upholders of an objective resurrection of Jesus, Steude (St. Kr. 1887, pp. 273-275), quite gives up this argument. In point of fact there is ample evidence to prove that visions have been seen by many, in the cases of Thomas of Canterbury, Savonarola, the Spanish general Pacchi, several crusaders—days and even months after their death—and similar occurrences also in the cases of 800 French soldiers, the Camisards in 1686-1707, the followers of the Roman Catholic priest Pöschl in Upper Austria in 1812-1818, the 'Preaching-sickness' and 'Reading-sickness' in Sweden in 1841-1854, and so forth.[1] That in circumstances of general excitement and highly strung expectation visions are contagious, and that others easily perceive that which at first had been seen by only one, is, in view of the accumulated evidence, a fact not to be denied.

(f) The attempt has been made to argue from this, on the contrary, that subjective visions cannot be thought of as explaining the recorded facts of the resurrection, inasmuch as in that case we should be entitled to expect very many more recorded visions than are enumerated by Paul. That, however, would depend on the amount of predisposition to visions. It is very easily conceivable that this may very rapidly have diminished when, by means of a moderate number of reported appearances, the conviction had become established that Jesus had risen. On this account it is also best to presume that the first five appearances followed one another very quickly. All the more confidently in that case could Paul speak of that which he had himself received as being the last of all (§ 10 h).

The consideration which above all others causes the most serious misgivings, is the state of deep depression in which the disciples were left by the death of Jesus. Is it conceivable that in such circumstances subjective visions should have come to them?

37. Situation of Peter.

(a) This question, however, is essentially simplified by what has been pointed out above (§ 36 e), if we suppose in addition that it was Peter alone who received the first vision. Could he but once find himself able to say that he had seen Jesus, the others no longer needed to be able to raise themselves out of their state of prostration by their own strength; what had happened to Peter supplied what was wanting in this respect. The question thus narrows itself to this: Is the possibility of a subjective vision excluded in the case even of Peter?

(b) Undoubtedly an unusually strong faith was needed, if in Peter the thought that Jesus, notwithstanding his death, was still alive, was to become so powerful that at last it could take the form of a vision. All the requisite conditions, however, were present. We do not at all lay weight upon the consideration, that with the return to Galilee the reminiscences of Jesus associated with those localities would again take the upper hand over the impression which his death had made; for indeed this impression was indelible. But alongside of this impression there would also be recollections of the predictions of Jesus. We do not refer here primarily to the predictions of his resurrection (see § 22 a); those referring to his coming again from heaven to set up the kingdom of God upon earth—predictions which are certainly quite historical (see GOSPELS, § 145 [f])—are much more important. They also, it is true, might seem to have been decisively falsified by the death of Jesus; for with Peter also it was an infallible word of God, that every one that hangs on a tree is cursed (Dt. 21 23; cp Gal. 3 13). Precisely here, however, there is a difference between the cases of the two apostles: Paul could apply this thesis to Jesus in cold blood, because he had never personally known him (2 Cor. 5 16, when rightly interpreted); Peter could not—he owed too much to him. To speak more exactly, the reason why Peter, even after the crucifixion, did not cease wholly to have faith in the prediction of Jesus, lay partly in the deep impression of his utter trustworthiness which he had left upon his disciple, and partly also in the religious inheritance which Peter felt he owed him, in the ineradicable conviction of the truth of his cause. From this conviction of the truth of Jesus' cause the conviction of his continued personal life was inseparable in the thought of that age. In this sense Renan's saying (Apôtres, 44, ET 70) is true: 'ce qui a resuscité Jésus, c'est l'amour.'

(c) There is yet another point, which for the most part is utterly overlooked in this connection. We do not mean the lively temperament of Peter; for whether that made him specially susceptible to visions cannot be said. We refer to the fact that Peter had denied his Lord. Even if the circumstance, mentioned only in Lk. (22 61), that after his denial his eye met that of his master, be hardly historical (cp SIMON PETER, § 19 d), there still remains a delicate suggestion of what must most infallibly have happened; the form of him whom Peter had denied must have come up before him with ever renewed vividness, however he may have struggled to escape it. Though at first he may have said to himself that this was a mere creation of his fancy, it is certainly not too bold a conjecture that a moment came when he believed he saw his Lord bodily present before him, whether it was that the eye was turned upon him with reproach and rebuke, or whether it was that it already assured him of that forgiveness, for which beyond all doubt he had been praying with all the energy of his soul.

(d) If this be sound, we shall find in the denial of Peter an occasion for the occurrence of a vision as direct as we have found the persecution of the Christians by Paul to have been. If we will, we shall be able to discern in these acts of hostility against Jesus or his followers an arrangement in the providence of God, whereby chosen vessels were prepared for the furtherance of Christianity. In any case this deed of Peter, that he held fast his faith in the imperishability of the cause of Jesus and therefore also of the person of Jesus, will remain the greatest of his life, greater still than his confession at Cæsarea Philippi (Mk. 8 29 and ||), and would make to be true those two words even though in the mouth of Jesus they be not historical: 'thou art Peter (i.e., a rock) and upon this rock will I build my church' (Mt. 16 18, cp MINISTRY, § 4 f.), and 'Do thou, when once thou hast turned again, stablish thy brethren' (Lk. 22 32, cp SIMON PETER, § 15 b).

For all that has been said in the foregoing paragraphs the most that can be claimed is that it proves the possibility—the probability if you will—of the explanation from subjective visions. From the very nature of the case it would not be possible to prove more, for the visionary character of the appearances could not be established for us by the visionaries themselves—on the contrary, everything constrained them to regard what they had seen as objective and real—nor yet by the reporters, who simply repeated what the visionaries had related to them. Only scientifically trained reporters could have assured us on the point, and such reporters did not then exist. Let it be expressly observed, however, that in the vision-hypothesis it is only the judgment of the visionaries as to the objective reality of what they had seen that is set aside; every other biblical statement of fact, unless we have been compelled to set it aside as inconsistent with some other biblical statement, remains unaffected. The hypothesis, furthermore, attributes no want of uprightness either to the visionary or to the reporter. The error which it points out affects merely the husk—namely that the risen Jesus was seen in objective reality, but not the kernel of the matter, that Jesus lives in the spiritual sense; thus it is an error, only in the same relative sense as is the dogma that the Bible is inspired in every letter (a dogma without the temporary ascendancy of which the church of to-day would hardly have existed), or in the same sense in which the anthropomorphic view of God's being and his relation to nature which possesses every child is an error—an error but for which the number of grown-up persons of unshaken religious conviction would indeed be small.

38. Conclusion on vision-hypothesis.

Reverting now once more to § 1 and the ideas on account of which it is held that the belief in a literal resurrection cannot be given up, we remark that the doctrine of the government of the church by Christ is one that can give place without any religious loss to that of the leading of the church by the spirit of Christ, or, if it is desired to put it in a more personal form, that of the government of the church by God. That the cause of Jesus did not die with him on the cross we are assured by history, even if his resurrection did not occur as a literal fact. It is undeniable that the church was founded, not directly upon the fact of the resurrection of Jesus, but upon the belief in his resurrection; and this faith worked with equal power whether the resurrection was an actual fact or not. The view of Paul that, apart from the literal truth of the resurrection of Jesus, there is no forgiveness of sins, has as its necessary presupposition the dogma, not of Paul the Christian but of Paul the Pharisee, that every crucified person without exception is accursed of God; as soon as the possibility of a miscarriage of justice either in the synedrium or at Pilate's judgment seat is conceded, this view eo ipso falls to the ground. Finally, the view that unless Jesus actually rose again the hope of the final resurrection of the dead is vain would be a sound one if this hope had consisted in the expectation that all men were to rise three days after their respective deaths. In its actual form, as hope of the resurrection at the last day, it would come to be denied, in so far as an event happening in the case of Jesus is concerned, only if Jesus himself were to continue in the state of death at the last day. In so far, however, as the idea of the immortality of the soul takes the place of the hope of a final resurrection—as in modern times is very extensively the case—it ceases to be a matter of fundamental importance whether Jesus rose again on the third day, or not; for immortality consists only in a continued existence of the soul, and that from the moment of the death of the body onwards, and is just as incapable of being confirmed or made known by a resurrection of the body as of being called in question by the absence of a resurrection. If immortality could thus be confirmed or made known, that must have been possible on the first and the second day after death, for immortality was then present. For that time, however, resurrection is excluded by presupposition.

[The bulk of English work upon this subject (of which the more useful or significant portions are indicated in the subjoined paragraphs by an asterisk) falls into one or other of two classes: (a) one dealing primarily with historical and theological appreciations of the fact or truth in question; (b) the other sensitive, in the first instance, to the features of the record and the historical evidence. Owing to the backwardness and inefficiency of English criticism upon the synoptic question, and the consequent paucity of scientific work upon Mt. and Lk. especially (upon Lk. 24 note the strangely parallel story in Plutarch: Vit. Rom. 28), the latter class of writings is as yet inadequately represented, being conspicuous for open-mindedness (in its better representatives) rather than for thoroughness, and more successful in criticising the weak points of opposing theories than in constructing a satisfactory and tenable hypothesis which might do justice to the complex of facts under review. Cp Froude's Short Studies, 1 229 f.

(a) The conservative side is represented by a long series of writings, whose weakness consists mainly in the preponderance of the dogmatic over the historical element or in literalism. Of these the following are the more salient:—F. D. Maurice's Theol. Essays (8); Westcott's Introd. to Study of Gospels ((6) 1881), 333-341; The Gosp. of the Resurr., The Historic Faith (chap. 6), and The Revelation of the Risen Lord; *Milligan's exhaustive and theological The Resurr. of our Lord ((4) 1894), and The Ascension and Heavenly Priesthood of our Lord, 1892; *M'Cheyne Edgar's vigorous Gosp. of the Risen Saviour, 1892, pp. 21-135; C. A. Row's The Jesus of the Evangelists, 1868, pp. 262 f. (critique of mythical theories); J. Kennedy's survey in The Resurr. of our Lord an historical fact, with examination of naturalistic hypotheses, 1881;

Latham's curious volume The Risen Master, 1900; and Orr's Christian View of God and the World, 1893, Lect. 6, n. C. Similarly, but with special bearing upon the narratives as part of the biography of Jesus:—*Fairbairn's Studies in the Life of Christ, 1881, chap. 18; G. H. Gilbert's Students' Life of Jesus, 1898, pp. 385-405; besides the Lives of Christ by Farrar, Edersheim, and S. J. Andrews (ed. 1892, pp. 589 f.). The subject is competently handled also, though from a more strictly philosophical and doctrinal standpoint, by *Newman Smyth (Old Faiths in New Light, chap. 8); *D. W. Forrest (The Christ of Hist. and Experience, 1897, Lect. 4 critique of vision-hypothesis); R. H. Hutton (Theol. Essays,(3) 1888, pp. 131 f.); E. Griffith-Jones (The Ascent through Christ,(4) 1900, pp. 337-359); H. G. Weston (Biblioth. Sacra, 1900, pp. 356-362) and L. S. Potwin (ibid. 1890, pp. 177-190); also by *Denney (The Death of Christ, 1902, pp. 66 f. 76 f. 121-123).

At the opposite pole of radical criticism, the most noteworthy works along this line are *R. W. Macan's The Resurrection of Jesus Christ, the contributions of Dr. E. A. Abbott (cp Philochristus, Onesimus, and Through Nature to Christ, 1877, chap. 21), and Martineau's Seat of Authority in Religion ((2), 1890), 363 f., 481 f., 632 f. besides the writings to be cited below.

(b) Examinations of early Christian evidence, and particularly of the gospel narratives (with that of the ascension, Acts 1 1-11), from a fairly free but reverent standpoint may be found in A. B. Bruce's Expos. Gk. Test. vol. i. ((2), 1901), 330 f., 643 f.; G. L. Cary's scholarly Synoptic Gosp. (Internat. Handbks. to NT, vol. i., 1900), §§ 198-202; J. Estlin Carpenter's First Three Gosp. ((2), 1890), 319 f., 268 f.; A. C. McGiffert's Apost. Age, 1897, pp. 36-44, 55 f., and J. V. Bartlet's Apost. Age, 1900, pp. 1-10; see, further, Blair's Apost. Gosp. (372-385) on the conclusion of Mk., with the editions by Swete and Allan Menzies, Moffatt's Hist. New Testament ((2), 1901), pp. 550-553 (on Mk. 16 9-20), 647-649 (on Mt. and Lk.), 694-696 (on Jn. 20-21), and A. Réville's article in New World, 1894, pp. 498-527. The distinctive aim of such contributions is to investigate not simply the verbal contents of the narratives in question, but also their mental and religious presuppositions; to get behind the stories into the world of their first hearers, with their beliefs and hopes. Extreme forms of this critical hypothesis are variously represented in such works as *W. Mackintosh's Nat. Hist. of the Christian Religion, 1894, pp. 257-328 (mythical theory), Supernatural Religion*, 3, 1877, p. 398 f. (in which, as in the following book, the problem is handled drastically, but uncritically isolated), The Four Gosp. as Historical Records, 1895, pp. 451, and O. Cone, The Gosp. and its Earliest Interpretations, 1893, pp. 124 f., 200 f., none of which, however, can be pronounced entirely satisfactory, either in method or in results. See further S. Davidson's NT Introd.(3) (1894) 2 367 f. The opposite side is pleasantly but ineffectively advocated by writers like Purves (Christianity in Apostolic Age, 1900, 9-15) and Sanday (Hastings' DB 2 638-643), while it is defended with a really critical grasp of the problem and its bearings by *Swete (Apostles' Creed, 1894, p. 64 f.), *A. B. Bruce (Apologetics, 1892, pp. 383-397), Schaff (Hist. of Church, 1 172-186). *Denney (art. 'Ascension' in Hastings' DB 1 161-162), and *Prof. S. McComb (Expos.(6) 4 350-363, a critique of ET of Harnack's Wesen); see also *Knowling: The Witness of the Epistles, 1892, pp. 365-396, 397-414 (ascension); A. Hovey (Amer. Journ. Theol., 1900, pp. 536-554, a critique of Stapfer); W. F. Adeney (Expos.(4) 8 137-146, a critique of Weizsäcker); N. J. D. White ('Appearances of Risen Lord to Individuals,' Expos.(6) 10 66-74), and E. R. Bernard ('The Value of the Ascension,' Exp. T, 1900-1901, pp. 152-155, and in Hastings' DB 4 234). Despite exaggerated statements upon both sides, recent English discussions display a growing sense that there is a serious problem to be faced in the condition of the historical records, and that exegesis has a vivid if subsidiary part to play in its solution. This is a sign of health, if only that the demands of the public are becoming more exigent; but no advance can be looked for until English students are furnished with a scientific equipment in the shape of thoroughly critical editions of the gospels, as well as with monographs combining historical judgment and sound scholarship with some philosophic and religious appreciation of the subject.—J. REU (רְעוּ; ραγαυ), b. Peleg, a name occurring in the genealogical table connecting Shem and Abraham (Gen. 11 18-21 [P], 1 Ch. 1 25; cp Lk. 3 35, AV Ragau). An Aramæan tribe bearing the name Ru'ua appear in S. Babylonia in the time of Tiglath-pileser III. (Schr. KGF 105 ff.; KAT(2) 117; Del. Par. 238 ff.); but their identification with Reu is denied by Schr. (loc. cit.). The name, in common with the others in the same list, is probably Mesopotamian, and we may possibly find a trace of it in ܓܒܪܥܘ, one of the kings of Edessa, which is doubtless for 'man of Re'u,' a formation parallel to the Heb. גַּבְרִיאֵל (cp Duval, 'Hist. d'Édesse,' Journ. Asiat., 1891, 18 126). Re'u may have been an old Mesopotamian god (Mez, Gesch. der Stadt Ḥarrān, 23). Cp REUBEN, §§ 9 iii., 10. F. B.

1. Mention. Reuben[1] is repeatedly mentioned in the Hexateuch as a branch of Israel. It is often associated with Gad, and is known to each of the documents underlying the Hexateuch. The reader naturally infers that the writers of those documents had knowledge of such a community. He may indeed think it prudent to test the legitimacy of that inference, when he misses references elsewhere in the Hebrew writings. Still, the argumentum e silentio must be used with great care.[2] The facts seem to be these. Outside of the fixed tribal lists (in Chron., Ezek., and, in the NT, in Rev.) and the Chronicler's genealogies,[3] Reuben is known, apart from an at best anachronistic gloss in 2 K. 10 33 (descriptive of the district harassed by Hazael), through the mention in the enumeration in Judg. 5 (v. 15 f.). That chapter contains very old material and few will question its authority even when it stands alone. Only, however, if we are sure that the passage says what the poet meant it to say. That, however, does not appear to have been questioned, so far as the mention of Reuben is concerned.[4] Discussion has been confined to the question, where the mention appearing after 15*a* and again, in a slightly variant form, after 16*a* really belongs. Still, is not the simplest explanation of the double occurrence, that the clause is really a gloss? Other difficulties would thus be removed. It always seemed strange that so remote a community as the traditional Reuben should be mentioned by name.[5] To speak of Gilead in general, on the other hand, without naming tribes, would be natural. Later, Gilead[6] would be taken to mean Gad, whilst Machir was perhaps referred to 'half-Manasseh,' and so a reference of some kind or other would be made on the margin to Reuben. If it be thought that probability is in favour of the reference in Judg. 5 being contemporary evidence,[7] the problem before us is to determine where Reuben lived and to explain the fact that in historical times Reuben had no significance. If the other view is taken, the problem is to account for the references in the Hexateuch.

A survey of the references (in the Hexateuch) to Reuben suggests that the solid element in them all is

2. A lost tribe. the belief that there once was an important community called Reuben and that for some reason it had lost its place; it was a sort of 'Ād or Thamūd. It is usually supposed that tradition preserved the memory of a more or less definite geographical district occupied by Reubenites. It may have done so. The evidences of such a tradition, however, are far from copious. Most of what we are told about a territory of Reuben is in D (Dt. 3 12 16 4 43 Josh. 13 8-12) and P (much of Nu. 32 Josh. 13 15-23 20 8 21 36 f.) and cannot safely be used for the present purpose (see § 14). There seems to be only one passage (Nu. 32

1 On the name see below: on the form, § 8; on OT explanations, § 7; on real meaning, § 9.

2 Special caution is needed in regard to questions bearing on the tribes.

3 On the statements in 1 Ch. 5 see § 13. On 1 Ch. 11 42 see § 13 (end).

4 Winckler has suggested that 'Asher' is not a tribe name but a pronoun (אֲשֶׁר), and that 'Dan' was not mentioned originally (GI 2 134, no. 26 f.).

5 Of course Reuben may have been settled in West Palestine at the time referred to (see next note); but the pastoral character assigned to the tribe in the clause probably shows that its author thought of the East (cp GAD, § 11, first small type par.).

6 Steuernagel suggests (Einwanderung, 20) that the mention of Gilead, not Reuben, in v. 17*a* may be because Reuben was still seated in W. Palestine (see below, § 10).

7 It would not decide the question where Reuben lived (see preceding two notes).

37 f.) which can perhaps be attributed to J (see, however, Oxf. Hex.). All it has to say is that certain six (Moabite) towns were, in the Mosaic age (?) 'built' by the sons of Reuben (see below, § 14). The absence of any reference to a people called Reuben in the Mesha inscription although it mentions three of the six towns and refers to 'the men of Gad' as having 'dwelt in the land of 'Aṭāroth from of old (מעלם)' seems to require us to suppose that the statement of J, if not unhistorical, rests on a memory of days long gone. That there was a firm belief in an ancient Reuben is, indeed, clear. The point is that it need not imply a knowledge of where it had been settled. In Gen. 35 21 f. J seems to connect Reuben with West Palestine (see § 4), and even in P there seems to be a trace of a belief of the same kind (Josh. 15 6 18 1 f. § 4), which may be represented in the strange story of the 'altar' (§ 5), and in the idea that Reuben crossed into West Palestine to help the other tribes to effect a settlement (cp GAD, col. 1585).

3. First-born.

Whatever was thought of the place where Reuben had lived, a great deal of interest was felt in his fate (cp § 10). Reuben is everywhere the first-born (see end of §). In E indeed there was perhaps an interval of considerable length between him and Leah's other sons: Naphtali seems to be for E Jacob's third son (cp NAPHTALI, § 2). Whether this was so in the original J we cannot say: it would account for Reuben's being the finder of the dūdā'īm (ib.),[1] which E does not mention. In J as we have it, however, Reuben has three own brothers when he finds the dūdā'īm which lead to the birth of Joseph[2] (cp ZEBULUN). The only tale E has to tell about Reuben is of how he tried to deliver Joseph[3] (Gen. 37 22 29), and reminded his brothers of the fact (42 22; see below, § 10, end), and how he offered his own two sons (cp § 11) as a pledge of the safe return of Benjamin. The most significant point in all this is that Reuben was the first-born. On that point there seems to be complete agreement. The problem is discussed in 1 Ch. 5 1 f. The view of the writer of that passage is that Reuben forfeited his right (as first-born) to the special blessing, which fell to Joseph, who thus became two tribes, although his rival Judah[4] ultimately outdid him.[5]

The rest of the points may belong to the decking out of the story (see, however, below, § 10, end).

4. Bilhah, Bohan.

Not so in the case of what J has to tell us in Gen. 35 22. No doubt the story was once told with more detail[6] (Test. Reub. 3, and Jubilees, § 33, show how it could be done).[7] This story seems to be J's explanation of how Reuben lost his rank. What Jacob did when he heard[8] of [1] According to Stucken ('Ruben im Jakobssegen' in MVG for 1902, 4 46-72, which appeared after this article was in type) the finding of the dūdā'īm was ascribed to Reuben as a patriarchal eponym on a level with Jacob. Later syncretism made him Jacob's son.

[2] Steuernagel suggests (Einwanderung, 17) that in the original story what Reuben did was not to make over the dūdā'īm to Leah but to use them to win the favour of Rachel, or rather Bilhah, whence Bohan (cp NAPHTALI, § 1 f.). This is very ingenious, but does not explain the obvious relation of the dūdā'īm to Issachar and Joseph. According to Stucken (see preceding note) Reuben's incest was with Leah herself, who may at one time have been called Bilhah.

[3] It is probable that in Gen. 37 21 (J) 'Reuben' is redactional for Judah. See next note.

[4] In the Joseph story the leader is Judah in J, Reuben in E (cp preceding footnote); cp Steuernagel, Einwanderung, 34.

[5] According to Guthe, GVI 42, Reuben's hegemony belonged to the time preceding the settlement of the Rachel tribes (cp RACHEL, § 1 b). Those tribes which acknowledged his leadership were called Leah; the later (Rachel) tribes acknowledged the hegemony of Joseph.

[6] Against the suggestion of Dillmann and Stade (GVI 1 151) that the story implies more primitive morals in the half-nomad Reubenites, see Holzinger, ad loc.

[7] Later writers refused to believe the story (cp the case of SIMEON [§ 9 i, end; see also § 4]). In Targum (Ps.-Jon. ad loc.), Midrash (Gen. rabba 98 f.), Talmud (Shabb. 55 b), and Bk. of Jashar, Reuben only disturbed a couch (cp Charles, Jubilees, § 33, n. 2 and § 33 1 b).

[8] Through angels, according to Test. Reub.

Reuben's deed has been suppressed by R.[1] It can be inferred, however, from the 'Blessing of Jacob': [2]

> Reuben! thou wast my first-born
> My might and the first-fruits of my manhood;
> Exceeding in impetuosity,[3] exceeding in passion!
> Foaming like water . . .[4]
> For thou didst ascend thy father's couch.
> Then did I curse the bed[5] he ascended.[6]

Even without Gunkel's emendation of the last line it is plain that the sequel to Gen. 35 22 was a father's curse,[7] which brought doom on the tribe (cp BLESSINGS AND CURSINGS). The effect becomes still more clear in the 'Blessing of Moses':

> Let Reuben live (on), let him not die (out)!
> Still, let him[8] become a (mere) handful of men![9]

The story of Bohan the son of Reuben may have been connected with the same legend (cp NAPHTALI, col. 3330 foot). We ought perhaps, however, to translate the word 'bohan.' The landmark would then be the thumb-stone[10] of the son (or sons [𝔊BL in Josh. 18 17]) of Reuben. The suggestion made elsewhere (col. 535 n. 4), however, is perhaps better: the suggestion, namely, that there is a slight corruption of the text, and that we ought to read: stone of the sons of Reuben (אבן בני ראובן: reading בני for בהן בן, as בהן might be a transposed בני = בנה).

5. Josh. 22 'altar.'

The reading of 𝔊BL in Josh. 18 17 would support this view. In its favour is the ease with which it could be brought into connection with a story which is otherwise perplexing. The stone (or was it really a group of stones?) in question was near 'Gelīlōth' (Josh. 18 17: see GILGAL, § 6 b). Now it was at the 'Gelīlōth' of the Jordan that, we are told, there was erected a sacred object to which was given a name that has been lost (see ED, GALEED, 2). The present text of Josh. 22 leaves it uncertain on which side of Jordan the sacred erection stood, and it ascribes the building to Reuben and Gad (and half Manasseh!). Perhaps Gad is an addition[11] connected with the view that the stone was east of the Jordan. No doubt the object was not an 'altar,' but a maṣṣēbāh or a circle of stones (see GILGAL, § 1), and the story[12] may be connected in some way with an attempt to account for the loss of Reuben's status.[13]

The suggestion just made gains, perhaps, in plausibility from the fact that in E, and probably J, there is another story that may have served the same purpose (next §).

6. Other stories.

In the older parts of Nu. 16 the leaders of Reuben (see below, § 10) dare to challenge the authority of Moses and thus bring divine judgment on themselves. It is even possible that there was still another story of the same kind (see below, § 10 [1]). These stories, as they attribute to [1] According to Stucken (above, col. 4089, n. 1) various analogies suggest that Israel castrated Reuben for his crime ('eye for eye, etc.'), 53.

[13] Does the story in Josh. 22 contain a reference to the name Reuben: see v. 28 רְאוּ אֶת־תַּבְנִית מִזְבַּח יהוה (rĕū . . . [ta]bn[ith]) and v. 10 ויבנו מזבח גדול . . . למראה ([wayyi]bnū . . . [lema]r'ē)?

Reuben an importance which there is nothing in history to suggest, may be due to a tradition of conflict between some representative Israelitish clan and a Reubenite community. On the other hand, they may be simply popular or other stories designed to explain the supposed collapse of a Reuben people.

The real cause of Reuben's disappearance may have been the inroad of Moab, which was perhaps not so early as to prevent a vague memory of what had preceded from surviving (see GAD, § 11, col. 1585, mid. and cp MOAB, § 14, col. 3174, foot). On the other hand, there is the possibility that Reuben's abode was not really in the east. We have found several hints of a belief that Reuben had been west of the Jordan (see further, below, § 10), to which we shall return (§ 10) in the light of the considerations suggested by a study of Reuben's name.

The meaning of the name Reuben is not apparent. There seem to be traces of more than one explanation.

7. OT explanations of name. i. J (Gen. 29 32*a*) takes it to mean 'Yahwè looks at my affliction' and finds in it a reference to what Leah had had to bear as the hated wife (שְׂנוּאָה; v. 33: see Gunkel ad loc.). ii. E (Gen. 29 32*b*), on the other hand, sees a reference to some point in the conduct of Jacob: 'my husband will . . . me.'

MT reads 'will love me'; but it is difficult to believe that this is sound. The versions, indeed, agree (ἀγαπήσει, amabit; nerḥam [Pesh.]) with MT; but so slight a change would make the word chime with Reuben (יאהבני : ראובן) that it is natural to suppose that it must have done so.[1] Gunkel suggests as the original a word cognate with the Aramaic אורב, 'to praise.' The Reubenites are in the traditions so hard to distinguish from the Gadites that E may well have connected with the name Reuben a wish like that expressed in Dt. 33 20 (מַרְחִיב גָּד) with regard to Gad: 'he will make me spread forth'; or, since the subject is 'husband' not 'Yahwè,' might we give the word its Arabic meaning and render 'welcome me'?[2]

iii. Josephus explains Roubel, Ρουβηλος (Ant. i. 19 7), his form of the name (see § 8), by saying that Leah felt she had experienced the mercy of God (διότι κατ' ἔλεον αὐτῇ τοῦ θεοῦ γένοιτο).[3]

It is not certain what the last consonant of the name is.

8. Form of name. The traditional forms are רְאוּבֵן; ρουβην [BADEFL], -βειν [Gen. 42 22 37 E], -βιμ [L in 2 K. 10 33 Ch.; E in Gen. 30 14], ρουβιν 1 Ch. 5 1 3 [L], Joseph. -βηλος, 4 7 3, § 166 var. ρουβιμ; Syr. rūbīl; Vg. Ruben; gentilic Reubenite רְאוּבֵנִי, in 𝔊 not usually distinguished from the 'personal' form, but 1 Ch. 11 42 ρουβηνι [L], 26 32 ρουβην[ε]ι [BA], Josh. 22 1 ρουβηνῖται [A]; Josephus, οἱ ρουβηνιται, ἡ ρουβηλις φυλή.

The explanations adduced already (§ 7) imply that the final consonant was early pronounced as n; but Hos. 4 15 5 8 10 5 make it probable that in the case of Bethel the n which has established itself in the modern local pronunciation (Beitīn) took the place of l early.[4]

The real origin of the name is unknown. i. On the view that the final letter was n, Baethgen (Beitr. 59, 1888) connects with the Arabic Ru'ba = Rubat-is (CIL 8 2415), comparing the ending ēn in Yardēn (EV 'Jordan'), and so, before him, Land (De Gids, Oct. 1871, p. 21) who is reminded of Arab. ra'ab. The inscription, Glaser 302, from Hadaḳān, speaks of a tribe בני[5] ראבן (CIS 4 no. 37, l. 5), sons of R'bn',[6] vowels unknown. The comparison

9. Meaning.

[1] On the other hand, we must remember that the old etymologists were easily content (cp Gunkel).

[2] The most obvious derivation 'Behold! a son' is passed over: names with imperatives (Olshaus. Lehrb. 613), common in Assyrian, were probably not in use among the Hebrews (cp Gray, HPN 65 f.). Gesen. thought of רְאוּי in the sense of 'provided.' The Glossæ Colbertinæ gives Ρουβην, ὁρῶν υἱός (Lag. OS(2)).

[3] Did he think of רְאוּי בְּאֵל (בְּ of agent: cp Targ. Jon. גְּלֵי קֳדָם־יי עוּלְבּוֹנִי), or possibly רַחוּם אֵל?

[6] A name occurring several times in the Turin papyrus as borne by kings of the thirteenth Egyptian dynasty, a resemblance of the ēn in Yardēn is not necessary. Reuben might be a name on the analogy of SIMEON (§ 8 i.), GIDEON, etc.

Reuben would then be a case of the kind referred to by Barth, NB, p. xxix, n. 1, in which the termination instead of preserving its old vowel ā (as in šulḥān; not šulḥōn, to avoid concurrence of 'rounded' vowels) changed it to ē[1] (cp לוּלֵא instead of לוּלֹא, for earlier לוּלָא).

ii. Some also of the explanations assuming the last consonant to be l take the name to be simple. Ball derives it from the root r'b[2] which in Arabic means to repair,[3] comparing the noun ra'ūb which is applied metaphorically (Zamaḫšarī, Asās acc. to Lane, but not in Cairo ed.) to describe one as a rectifier of affairs.[4]

Lagarde suggested (OS(2) 367 f.) that Reuben, or rather Re'ôbēn, is to be identified with Ra'ābil shortened from Ra'ābīl, plural of Ri'bāl, a lion (or wolf).[5] According to the Tāj el-'Arūs the rayābīl of the Arabs were those 'who used to go on hostile expeditions upon their feet [and alone].'

According to Ibn Sīda the Andalusian (Moḥkam[6]) 'some say that ri'bāl means also one who is the only offspring of his mother[7] [i.e. opp. of twin: el-Bustāni].'[8] Another suggested origin is 'Jerahmeel' (JUDAH, § 3); cp REU [see Crit. Bib.].

iii. Others hold the name to be compound. (a) The first element is taken by older writers to be rĕ'ū in the sense of 'face' (Kohler, Der Segen Jacobs, 27 [1867]; Kue. Th. T 5 291 [1871]), or rĕ'ū in the sense of 'flock' (Redslob, Die ATlichen Namen, etc., 86 [1846]); by later writers to be rĕ'ū[9] in the sense of 'friend' (Kerber, Die Rel.-gesch. Bedeutung der Heb.-Eigennamen des AT, 70) or rather as a divine name[10] (see below, § 10). (b) The second half was identified by Nestle (Israel. Eigennamen, 1876) with Bin (= Bir, Bur), by others (Redslob, 1846; Köhler, 1867; Kue., 1871; Houtsma, 1876; Wi., GI 1 120 n. 2) with Bel.

The theory that Reubel contains the names Reu and Bel seems to merit consideration. A parallel formation[11] is the name Reu-el.[12] When one remembers the peculiar mystification that has occurred in connection with the names Hobal ‖ Jethro ‖ Reuel one is led to ask, May not there be some connection between Reu-el and Reu-bel?[13] There is, in fact, notwithstanding the difference in the tone of the narratives, a strange parallelism between the critical attitude adopted towards Moses by Reu-bel in the earlier story in Nu. 16 and that adopted by Moses' to which has been noticed (e.g., by C. Niebuhr, Ebr. Zeitgesch. 250 [1894], and, without approval, by Ball, SBOT [1896]), cannot plausibly be connected with Reuben: it is of course a personal name, and is doubtless to be read Wbn-rē' ('rising of Rē''), not Ra-uben.

[1] After this article was finished the writer noticed that Barth himself makes this very suggestion (NB 320, end of long note) with the same examples.

[2] Cp the personal name ראבאל in the inscription from Sūd, Hal. 353, l. 1.

[3] The advent of Reuben was to reconcile Jacob to Leah.

[4] It is to ra'b, not, as Ball seems to imply, to ra'ūb, that the metaphorical meaning of 'big, bulky, portly, or corpulent chief' is assigned in the Ḳāmūs and the Tāj el-'Arūs.

ḥôthēn (חתן; see JETHRO, second paragraph) in Ex. 18: 'What is this thing that thou doest to the people? Why sittest thou thyself alone, and all the people stand about thee from morning unto evening? . . . The thing that thou doest is not good' (Ex. 18_{14} $_{17}$).

Whatever be thought of the particular parallelism just referred to and its bearing on the question of the name Reuben, it is surely suggestive in regard to the general Reuben-problem that we should have a community of no historical importance, but held to be the first-born of Israel, into connection with which it is possible to bring a whole series of stories[1] differing altogether in details, but coinciding in the fundamental point of setting Reuben in some form in opposition to the recognised representatives of Israel:—

1. the criticism of Reuel (Ex. 18)
2. the discontent of the sons of Reubel (Nu. 16)
3. the stone[s] erected by Reubel (Josh. 22): cp stone of Bohan
4. the ambition[2] of Reubel (Gen. 35_{22})
5. the sacrilegious greed of Achar (Achan), if he was really a Reubenite (see below, § 12)
6. the disagreement between Reuben and the other sons of Israel (at Dothan?),[3] Gen. 42_{22} [E] ['ye would not listen'].[4]

We may even find a seventh story when we proceed to consider the Reubenite genealogy § (11).

These stories seem to imply a widespread conviction of the occurrence at some time of a grave event or series of events.[5] Such convictions are often due to actual reminiscence of fact. It is possible even to go further and reconstruct a history thus:—

The Nu. 16 story (on the details see DATHAN) implies, for example, that Reuben disagreed with its associates at Kadesh and led its party northwards into Palestine. The attribution of Hezron and Carmi clans both to Reuben and to Judah (see § 12) means that Reuben settled W. of Jericho in contact with Judah. The Bilhah story (§ 5) means that the Jacob-Rachel tribe spread southwards and had friendly relations with Reuben, but as Benjamin branched off, absorbing such elements as Bilhah had left (see NAPHTALI, § 1) when it migrated northwards, the relations of Reuben towards Bilhah became less friendly, which brought on Reuben a curse. The 'altar' story (Josh. 22) means that the Josephites of Shechem took umbrage at the southern Josephites (half Manasseh) for having a common sanctuary with the Reubenites, and this anger was afterwards supposed to have been against Reuben. The Dathan and Abiram story means that the Reubenites on their part rebelled against certain pretensions of the south-Josephite priests. Finally, Reuben crossed Jordan and penetrated as a wedge into Gadite territory.[6] 1 Ch. 2_{21-23} means that the Reubenite clan Hezron subsequently united with Gileadite clans to produce Segub the father of Jair (cp MANASSEH, 1 § 9, last small type).

The arguments for this reconstruction are set forth with skill by Steuernagel (Einwanderung). The result is a priori plausible. Is there adequate warrant, however, for so high an estimate of the historical character of the legends (cp B. Luther, ZATW 19_{1} ff. [1901]; Wi. OLZ 2_{117} ff., KAT(3) 213, etc.)? The questions involved are far-reaching and intricate, and are better treated comprehensively than in relation to one particular tribe (see TRIBES, and cp NAPHTALI, § 1, begin.). Here we may be content with the general conclusion that a Reuben of some importance was believed to have flourished some time, and the judgment that the belief was probably justified.[1]

It must be remembered that if Reuben really lived east of the Jordan there may have been many traditions which failed to find a place in the literature of Western Palestine (cp GAD, § 11). On the other hand, it will not be surprising if additional reasons should be found for connecting Reuben with the southern tribes (cp SIMEON, § 8 ii.).

11. Genealogies. Reuben was believed to have had two sons. In the Joseph story indeed he had only two ('my two sons' Gen. 42_{37} [E]); and even there it is the death of the two sons that is thought of. In Nu. 16 two sons of Reuben are buried alive (16_{31} $_{33a}$, J; $_{32a}$ $_{33b}$, E). They are called Dathan[2] and Abiram[3] (cp Ps. 106_{17} Dt. 11_{6}). Dathan is a strange name[4] (reminding one of Dothan, the scene of Reuben's argument: see above, § 10, 6); but Abiram we know as a first-born son who was said to have been buried (alive?) in the foundation of a city. He is said to have been a son of HIEL [q.v.] ב׳ האלי, whereas in Nu. 16 Abiram is a son of Eliab אליב; but these (ב׳ האלי and ב׳ אליאב) are not impossible variants. Abiram's brother is called Segub in MT of 1 K. 16_{34}; but in 1 Ch. 2_{21} f. the clan called Segub ben Hezron in MT is in 𝔊B called Serug, which is in Gen. 11_{20} a son of Reu (see below, § 12, end). The mention of Hezron brings us to the stock genealogy of Reuben: Gen. 46_{9} = Nu. 26_{6} = Ex. 6_{14} = 1 Ch. 5_{3}.

12. In P. In it there is, at least at first sight, no trace of the famous two sons. In their stead we find four names: Hanoch, Pallu, Hezron, and Carmi. The first appears as a Midianite clan in Gen. 25_{4} (cp GAD, § 11, last small type paragraph), the second (φαλλους generally; Jos. φαλ[α]ους) appears in Nu. 16_{1} as Peleth (φαλεθ [BAF]), which suggests the Negeb (see PELETH); but 𝔊L gives φαλεκ—i.e., Peleg.[5] The third and fourth (Hezron and Carmi) appear also, as has been mentioned (§ 10), in a genealogy of Judah. In the case of Hezron that seems certain; although whether the inferences that have been drawn from it are warranted is at least doubtful (cp MANASSEH, § 9, last small type, and above, § 10, end). The case of Carmi is less secure. In 1 Ch. 4_{1} Carmi may be a mistake for Caleb (We. Benz. ad loc.), and 26 f., or at least 2_{7}, is surely an interpolation. 2_{7} might just as well stand after 5_{3}. On the other hand, in Josh. 7, although v. 1 may not be original, it is difficult to account for Carmi in v. 18 unless there was known to be a Carmi in Judah, or the story was originally told of Reuben, not Judah, as Steuernagel suggests (Einwanderung, p. 19 [e]).

As we have seen, Dt. 11_{5} mentions a 'son' of Reuben of the name of Eliab, who in Nu. 26_{8}[6] is introduced into the genealogy as a son of Pallu.

[1] The fate of 'Ād and Thamūd seems to have appealed to the imagination of Mohammed. They are referred to in the Ḳorān, together or apart, some twenty-one times. Cp the NT references to Sodom.

[2] Cp the cases of Abner, Absalom, and Adonijah.

[3] Steuernagel supposes that some actual conflict between Joseph and the Leah tribes occurred in the neighbourhood of Dothan (Einwanderung, 97). If so, possibly Reuben sided with Joseph.

[4] It seems to be only a further illustration of the extraordinary confusion in the stories about Reuben that in the earlier reference, which appears also to be in E, the brothers did listen (Gen. 37_{22} f.).

[5] Stucken (above, col. 4089, n. 1) finds a mythological reference in the Reuben saying in Gen. 49_{3}. Reuben (‖ Adam ‖ Behemoth) was a being who once had world power but lost it. He compares the description of Behemoth in Job 40_{16} (p. 51), and connects him with the sign Aquarius (p. 69). Otherwise Wi. GI 2_{59}.

[6] On the question when this might have occurred see the suggestion of Steuernagel (Einwanderung, 20) that it may be connected with 1 Ch. 5_{10} (the Hagrites, temp. Saul).

[1] On the possibility of a connection between the Leah tribes and the Ḥabiri see NAPHTALI, § 3 (sec. par.), SIMEON, § 6 ii. ZEBULUN.

[2] Josephus (Ant. iv. 7 3, § 166) reads δαθαμ[ου].

[3] Josephus (Ant. iv. 7 3, § 166) adds Pallu [φαλαους].

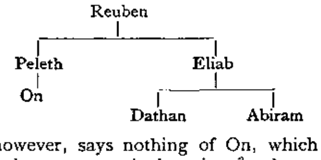
[4] Da-at-nu is a synonym of ḳarradu, 'strong' (Del. Ass. HWB 596 a, no. 36), and di-ta-nu is 'ein[starkes] Thier.' Shalmaneser's Black obelisk (l. 161) mentions receiving tribute from a certain Da-ta-na, of Ḫubuškia (towards Urmia).

[5] The passage in Judg. 5 referred to above (§ 1) accentuates a strange parallelism between the Reubenites of the genealogies and the Semites of Gen. 11_{10}:—



Gen. 11	Reuben	Judg. 5
Eber (עבר)		עבר (v. 17)
Peleg (פלג)	φαλεκ	פלגות (v. 15 b, 16*b*)
Reu (רעו)	Reu-bel	Reu-bel
Serug (שרוג)	Serug b. Hezron (above, § 11)	שרקות (v. 16*a*)
Abram	Abiram (above, § 11)

[6] NEMUEL (q.v.), who appears in Nu. 26_{9}† as a third son (the eldest) of Eliab, may come by mistake from v. 12, where he is the eldest son of Simeon.

This (with omission of Nemuel[1]) seems to be the scheme followed in Nu. 16 1, as we have it.[2] It appears indeed to be complicated by Eliab and Peleth (for Pallu) being treated as unconnected, and Peleth being given a son ON [q.v.]; and this has been supposed to represent the version of J (e.g., Oxf. Hex.).

Nu. 16 1 [as in MT]

Josephus, however, says nothing of On, which may in Nu. 16 1 be due to a marginal variant[3]: the variant represented by 𝕲 which reads as usual Abir*on* for Abir*am* (see, however, ON).

The Chronicler has attached to the Reubenite genealogy two appendices, one tracing the pedigree of a certain BEERAH to an otherwise unknown Joel[4] (1 Ch. 5 4-6), the other perhaps a variant form of the same list (v. 7 f.): thus 13. In 1 Chron.

v. 4 Joel	v. 8 Joel
Shemaiah	v. 8 Shema
Gog (גוג)	v. 8 Azaz (עזז)
Shimei
v. 5 Micah
Reaiah
Baal (בעל)	v. 8 Bela (בלע)
v. 6 Beerah	v. 7 [Ze]chariah
	v. 7 Jeiel

There is nothing to show what led the Chronicler to connect these lists with Reuben (cp Gray, HPN 257 f.), unless it be the reference to Tiglath-pileser (cp 2 K. 15 29) and the geographical references in v. 9 f.

With Shemaiah, Shimei, Shema, and Zechariah may be compared Shammua ben Zaccur, the name given to the Reubenite 'spy' (Nu. 13 4), and Eliezer ben Zichri, David's ruler (nāgīd) over the Reubenites (1 Ch. 27 16). On the natural omission of a representative of Reuben from the list of dividers of western Palestine, cp GAD, 1 § 13 (last sentence). On the list containing Adina[5] ben Shiza[6] (1 Ch. 11 42) see Gray, HPN 229 f., and cp DAVID, § 11 (a) ii.

Whether or not there was also a theory of a tribe Reuben which entered Palestine by way of the Negeb, the prevailing theory of the present Hexateuch and related passages was that Reuben arrived in E. Palestine from abroad, in close connection with Gad (q.v., § 11). The questions bearing on the real character,[7] origin, and history of the population of E. Palestine are best considered elsewhere (GAD, §§ 1-4). All that is necessary here is to supplement what is said there (GAD, § 12) with regard to the geographical details given, in indifference to each other, by the various Hexateuch writers.

14. Geographical details.

Of the nine towns asked for by Gad and Reuben in Nu. 32 3 we are told in 32 37 f. that the men of Reuben [re]built the last five: HESHBON, ELEALEH, SIBMAH (called Sebam in v. 3), NEBO, and BEON, with the addition of KIRIATHAIM.[1] As noticed above (§ 2), all these six towns are Moabite in Is. 15, Jer. 48.

This list is, however, ignored by P in his enumeration (Josh. 20 8; cp Dt. 4 43, given by Moses) of the 'cities of refuge' and (Josh. 21 36 f. = 1 Ch. 6 78 f. [63 f.]) the 'levitical' [Merari] cities 'of the tribe of Reuben' (ממטה ר׳): BEZER (city of refuge; Bozrah in Jer. 48 24), JAHAZ (Jahzah in Jer. 48 21), KEDEMOTH[2] (perhaps for Kiriathaim [קדמות for קריתם] mentioned in Jer. 48 23), and MEPHAATH (Jer. 48 21); but he confines himself to cities assigned to Moab in Jer. 48.

In Josh. 13 15-23 P endeavours to define the territory of Reuben.

He gives him, besides the levitical cities just mentioned (Jahaz, Mephaath, Kedemoth = Kiriathaim ?), two cities said in Nu. 32 34-36 to have been built by Gad (Aroer, Dibon), one assigned to Gad in Josh. 21 39, 1 Ch. 6 81 [66] (Heshbon), four assigned elsewhere to Moab (MEDEBA, BAMOTH-BAAL, BETH-BAAL-MEON, BETH-JESHIMOTH), and the following three: ZERETH-SHAHAR (only here), ASHDOTH-PISGAH (also Dt.), and BETH-PEOR (the burial-place of Moses, and scene of the Dt. discourses), but only one of the cities said in Nu. 32 37 f. to have been built by Reuben (Sibmah).

The contradictions make it impossible to construct a map. In general terms, however, what is claimed for Reuben lies within what is claimed for GAD (q.v. § 3). See the map in Stade, GVI 1, facing p. 149. Cp Steuernagel, Einwanderung, 19 (f.). H. W. H.

REUEL (רְעוּאֵל; ραγουηλ [BADEL]). 1. The personification of a clan in Edomite and Arabian territory, which, according to Winckler (GI 1 210), derived its name from a divine name Re'u (= ראי in אל ראי, Gen. 16 13 and ראו in ראובל, Reubel[3] [true form of ראובן, Reuben ?]). This explanation, however, is incomplete; both אל ראי and ראובל are, judging from numerous analogies in badly transmitted names, corruptions of ירחמאל (Jeraḥme'el), and the same origin naturally suggests itself for רעואל (Re'u'el). See, however, NAMES, § 47, and cp REUBEN, § 9. In the genealogical system Reuel is both a son of Esau by Basemath (Gen. 36 4 10 13 17 1 Ch. 1 35 37) and the father of Moses' father-in-law Hobab, Nu. 10 29 [J], where 'Midianite' should perhaps be 'Kenite'[4] (Judg. 1 16 4 11). In Ex. 2 18 (𝕲^{AL} ιοθορ), 'Reuel' their father is puzzling. On the principles of literary analysis of documents we assume that Reuel is a harmonistic insertion, Reuel being here represented by the redactor (R) as father of Zipporah, in order that HOBAB [q.v.] and JETHRO [q.v.] may both be brothers-in-law. For consistency's sake the insertion ought also to have been made in v. 16, where originally Hobab (J's name for the father-in-law of Moses) must have stood.[5]

2. Father of ELIASAPH, a Gadite chief (Nu. 2 14 [P]). In Nu. 1 14 also, 𝕲 has ραγουηλ where MT has דְּעוּאֵל (DEUEL); so too in 7 42 47 10 20.

the ρησαφα of Ptol. (5 15), and the mod. Ruṣâfa, 3½ m. SW. of Sura on the Euphrates, on the road leading to Palmyra. We have no independent notice of the destruction of Reṣeph, and this, together with certain other suspicious phenomena, has led the present writer to the supposition that, as most probably in many other passages, the editor has been busy in reconstructing the geographical and historical background; i.e., that 'Gozan' has been put for 'Cushan' (the N. Arabian Cush), 'Reṣeph' for 'Ṣarephath,' 'Telassar' for 'Tel-asshur' or 'Tel-ashḥur' (cp ASHHUR), 'Arpad' for 'Ephrath.' Of the other names, 'Haran' (cp 1 Ch. 2 46), 'Eden,' 'Hamath' (probably a popular distortion of 'Maacath') need not be corrupt; they are good N. Arabian border-names, familiar by tradition to Judahite writers. SEPHARVAIM [q.v.] is made up of Sephar (= Zarephath) and a fragment of 'and Jerahmeel'; 'Hena' and 'Ivvah' also probably represent the place-name 'Jerahmeel,' unless Ivvah has been miswritten for אַיֵּה; cp 𝔊ᴸ, 2 K. 18 34, καὶ ποῦ (אַיֵּה) εἰσὶν οἱ θεοὶ τῆς χώρας Σαμαρείας; μὴ ἐξείλαντο τὴν Σαμ. ἐκ χειρός μου; see SEPHARVAIM, and cp Crit. Bib.

The ironical remarks of Winckler (A T Unt. 40) and Benzinger (Kön. 182) on the archæological learning of the late author of 2 K. 19 12 f., which was, however, thrown away on the hearers of the supposed speech of the Assyrian envoys to Hezekiah, are natural enough, if the accuracy of MT may be assumed. It is probable, however, that even at a late date the people of Judah would be able to appreciate historical references bearing on places much nearer to them than Gozan, and Rezeph, and a Mesopotamian Tel-asshur. REZIA, RV Rizia (רִֽצְיָא, § 28; 'Yahwè is gracious' for רְצָיָה, or from some ethnic; ραс[є]ιa [BAL]), in a genealogy of ASHER (q.v., § 4, ii.), 1 Ch. 7 39.

REZIN (רְצִין; ρaaccωn, ρacєin [B in Is. 7], ρaccωn [B in Is. 8], ρacin [Aq., Sym., Th. in Qᵐᵍ· in Is. 8]; Ass. Ra-ṣun-nu). If we take the MT as it stands, it is evident that Rezin, king of Aram-damascus, in alliance with Pekah of Israel, endeavoured to overthrow Ahaz, king of Judah, and to enthrone ben-Tāb'ēl, a creature of their own, in his stead. To escape from this danger, they applied for help to the Assyrian king Tiglath-pileser (2 K. 16 5 7 ff. Is. 7 1).

To the present writer, however, it appears that there has been another of those confusions which have made it so difficult to retrace the true course of the history of Israel (see TABEAL). The Aram of which Rezin was king was possibly not the northern but a southern country of that name (see Crit. Bib.). Critics have duly noticed that Is. 7 1 is really no part of the biography of Isaiah, but borrowed from 2 K. 16 5, and have conjectured that the original opening of chap. 7 had become illegible (see Intr. Is. 31). It is possible, however, that it was omitted because it contained some definite historical statements respecting the invaders which the redactor, from his imperfect historical knowledge, could not understand. It is not even certain that the king who is mentioned in the second place was really Pekah, king of Israel. The present writer sees some reason to think that both kings were N. Arabians, and that the second king was confounded with Pekah, partly from a partial resemblance of the names and partly because the traditional father of each of them was called 'Remaliah,' which is a corrupt form of 'Jerahmeel' (Che.). It was, however, certainly to Tiglath-pileser (not to be confounded with PUL [q.v.]) that Rezin applied for help. In Is. 8 4 we should probably read, 'The riches of Cusham and the spoil of Shimron shall be carried away before the king of Assyria.' In 2 K. 16 6 there is no sufficient cause for emending 'Aram' into 'Edom.' It was a matter of great importance to the southern 'Arammites' to obtain command of a harbour. Hiram, king of Misrim (see SOLOMON, § 3 b), was content to leave Ezion-geber nominally in the hands of Solomon; but Rezin was not inclined to put any trust in the Judahites.

REZIN (רְצִין; ρacωn [BA], -aacc· [L]), the name of a post-exilic family of Nethinim, and therefore (see NETHINIM), according to Cheyne's theory, N. Arabian (cp such names as Shamlai [Ishmael], Giddel [the southern Gilead], Reaiah [Jerahmeel]); Ezra 2 48 = Neh. 7 50 (ρaєcωn [א], ρaacωn [L]) = 1 Esd. 5 31 (δaιcan [B], δєcan [A], ρacωn [L], DAISAN, EV).

REZON (רְזוֹן, 'prince?' cp Sab. רזן, רזון, רזן and רזן, 'ruler' [PRINCE, 13]; We. Heid.(2) 59, n. 1, would connect the name with the Ar. deity Ruḍā in such Palmyrene compound names as תימרצו [servant of R.]; but may it not be miswritten for רצין?), the founder of a dynasty at Damascus, and a contemporary of Solomon (1 K. 11 23, єcρωм [B], om. A, cp HEZION; razon [Vg.]). Who Rezon was, is by no means clear from our text (cp DAMASCUS, § 7). Most regard him as a northern Aramæan.

Rezon is called, however, son of Eliada, which is a Hebrew name, and Winckler's way of accounting for this (see ELIADA, 3) is improbable. Treating the subject in connection with ZOBAH, q.v.], we may venture to conjecture that he was probably a N. Arabian, and that his father's name, like 'Jedi'a'el' is a modification of 'Jerahme'el.' It was from the king not of Zobah but of Miṣṣur (Muṣri) that Rezon fled, and the capital of the realm which he founded was not Damascus, but Cusham (cp PROPHET, § 37). We may presume that he was an ally of Hadad, who was also an 'adversary' to Solomon, and appears to have been king, not of Edom, but of Aram—i.e., Jerahmeel. The geographical boundaries of these neighbouring kingdoms we cannot determine; but they were close to the Negeb, which Solomon (see SOLOMON, § 7) appears to have succeeded in retaining. Probably they were both vassals of the natural overlord of that region—the king of Miṣṣur, whose daughter became Solomon's wife. Cp, however, Winckler, GI 2 272, KAT(3) 240. T. K. C.

REGIUM (ρнгιon, Acts 28 13). A town on the Italian coast, at the southern entrance of the straits of Messina (mod. Reggio).

The name (= 'breach') was generally supposed to bear reference to the idea that earthquakes or the long-continued action of the sea had broken asunder or breached the land-bridge between Italy and Sicily (Strabo, 258; Diod. Sic. 4 85). The Latin form of the name, Regium, gave rise to an absurd alternative derivation (Strabo, l.c.).

The town was an offshoot of the Chalcidians settled on the other side of the strait, in Messana (for a sketch of its early history, see Strabo, 257 f.). Its position on the strait made it very important, for the direct distance to Messana is only about six geographical miles, and under Anaxilas (about 494 B.C.) the two cities were united under one sceptre. Although the Syracusan tyrant Dionysius I. totally destroyed the town, so important a site could not long lie desolate, and it was repeopled by his son and successor. During the Hannibalic war Rhegium remained loyal to Rome and materially contributed to Hannibal's ultimate defeat by cutting off his communications with Africa. After the Social war it became a Roman municipium like the other Greek cities of southern Italy. During the war between Octavian and Sextus Pompeius (38-36 B.C.), Rhegium was often the headquarters of Octavian's forces (Dio Cass. 48 14); and, by way of reward, its population was increased by the addition of a body of time-expired marines (Strabo, 259), and it assumed the name Rhegium Julium (Orell. Inscr. 3838). About Paul's time it was a populous and prosperous place, still preserving many traces of its Hellenic origin (Strabo, 253). It continued to exist as a considerable city throughout the period of the empire (Plin. 36). It was the terminus of the road which ran from Capua to the straits (the Via Popilia, made in 134 B.C.).

The ship in which Paul sailed had some difficulty in reaching Rhegium from Syracuse (Acts 28 13, περιελθόντες,[1] 'by tacking'; AV 'we fetched a compass,' RV, 'made a circuit'), as the wind did not lie favourably. At Rhegium she remained one day waiting for a wind for the narrow passage through which for want of sea-room a large ship could not easily work by tacking.[2] The run with the S. wind northwards to Puteoli (about 180 m. distant) would take about twenty-six hours (cp v. 13, δευτεραῖοι ἤλθομεν).

With the stages of Paul's journey as given here we may compare that of Titus, afterwards Emperor, in 70 A.D. (Suet.

RHESA (ΡΗϹΑ, Ti.WH), a name in the genealogy of Jesus; Lk. 3 27. See GENEALOGIES ii., § 3.

RHODA (ΡΟΔΗ, Ti.WH), the name[1] of the maid (ΠΑΙΔΙϹΚΗ) who answered the door when Peter knocked, Acts 12 13†. In one of the lists of 'the seventy' it is stated that Mark had a sister called Rhoda (see Lipsius, Apokr. Ap.-Gesch., Ergänzungsheft, 22).

RHODES (ΡΟΔΟϹ), a large and important island, lying in the south-eastern Ægean (the part called the Carpathian Sea), about 12 m. distant from the coast of Asia Minor; mentioned only incidentally in the NT (Acts 21 1). After leaving Cos, the ship in which Paul voyaged to Palestine from Macedonia touched at Rhodes, which was apparently her last port of call before Patara, where Paul transhipped. The same name was applied both to the island and its capital; but probably the latter is meant in this place. It stood at the northern extremity of the island, where a long point runs out towards Caria. The city possessed two chief harbours, both on the eastern side of the promontory. The foundation of the city of Rhodes (408 B.C.) was due to the joint action of the ancient Rhodian towns of Lindos, Ialysos, and Camiros (Diod. Sic. 13 75). 'The forces which, outwardly at least, had hitherto been divided, were now concentrated, and the good effects of this concentration for the island, as well as for Greece in general, were soon to appear' (Holm, Gk. Hist., ET, 4 484).

The great political importance of the new city gradually asserted itself during the fourth century, and by Alexander's time it had become the first naval power in the Ægean, and a decisive factor (Diod. Sic. 20 81, περιμάχητος τοῖς δυνάσταις καὶ βασιλεῦσιν ἦν, ἑκάστου σπεύδοντος εἰς τὴν αὐτοῦ φιλίαν προσλαμβάνεσθαι). So great was the reputation of the city that Alexander chose it as the place of deposit of his will. The commercial importance of the place is indicated by the fact of the introduction of a new (Rhodian) standard of coinage; Rhodian coins are remarkable for their beauty (see on this Holm, op. cit. 3 49, and Head, Hist. Numm., s.v.).

The commercial relations of Rhodes were principally with Egypt, but in fact the central position of the island in the mid-stream of maritime traffic between the E. and the W. assured her prosperity, and this, combined with good government at home and a wise foreign policy, lifted her to a position analogous to that of Venice in later times. The Rhodian harbours seemed to have been designed by Nature to attract the ships of Ionia, Caria, Egypt, Cyprus, and Phœnicia (Aristeid. Rhod. 341); and the consistent policy of neutrality, broken only by vigorous and decisive action when the peace and freedom of the seas were endangered, attracted foreign merchants, among whom, we may be sure, those of Jewish nationality were conspicuous (1 Macc. 15 23); young men were regularly sent to Rhodes to learn business (Plaut. Merc., prol. 11). Rhodes did in the E. what Rome did in the W. in keeping the seas clear of pirates (Strabo, 652, τὰ λῃστήρια καθεῖλε; cp Pol. 4 19). Her maritime law was largely adopted by the Romans (cp Pand. xiv. 29); and the principle of 'general average,' for example, is Rhodian in origin, with probably much else in modern naval law that cannot now be traced.

Rhodes is connected with two passages in the life of Herod the Great. When on his way to Italy he contributed liberally towards the restorations rendered necessary to repair the ravages of Cassius in 42 B.C. (App. BC 4 72; Plut. Brut. 30). It was at Rhodes also that after the battle of Actium (31 B.C.) he had the meeting with Augustus upon which so much depended for him (Jos. Ant. xv. 6 6). It was in Rhodes that Antiochus VII. Sidetes (king of Syria, 138-128 B.C.), son of Demetrius I., heard of the imprisonment of his brother (Demetrius II.), and 'sent letters from the isles of the sea unto Simon the priest and governor of the Jews,' as told in 1 Macc. 15 1 f. (cp App. Syr. 68).

The Rhodians gained a privileged position as allies of Rome in the Macedonian and Mithridatic wars, but were deprived of their political freedom by Claudius (44 A.D.) for the crucifixion of Roman citizens (Dio Cass. lx. 24 4). In 56 A.D. this was restored to them (Tac. Ann. 12 58: 'reddita Rhodiis libertas, adempta sæpe aut firmata, prout bellis externis meruerant aut domi seditione deliquerant'). The island was finally reduced to a province (i.e., made part of the province of Asia) by Vespasian (Suet. Vesp. 8). Its great importance in the early Empire was gained through its schools of rhetoric, as that of Athens through her schools of philosophy.

RHODOCUS (ΡΟΔΟΚΟϹ [AV]), a Jew who betrayed the plans of Judas the Maccabee to Antiochus Eupator (2 Macc. 13 21). On the discovery of his treachery he was imprisoned.

RHODUS (1 Macc. 15 23), RV RHODES.

RIBAI (רִיבַי), the father of ITTAI (q.v.) (2 S. 23 29, ΡΕΙΒΑ [B], ΕΡΙΒΑ [L] om. A; 1 Ch. 11 31, ΡΕΒΙΕ [B], ΡΑΒΕΙΑΙ [ℵ], ΡΗΒΑΙ [A], ΡΙΒΑΙ [L]). Comparing 𝔊L in 2 S. we may with Marquart (Fund. 20) restore יריבי; see JERIBAI.

RIBBAND (פְּתִיל), used in Nu. 15 38 AV of the 'cord' (so RV) of blue worn upon the FRINGES [q.v.].

For other usages of the Heb. pāthīl see BRACELETS, 2, CORD, RING.

RIBLAH (רִבְלָה; oftenest ΔΕΒΛΑΘΑ [BℵAFQΓL], and always 'Diblath' in Pesh.; on Nu. 34 11 see below). A city in the territory of Hamath (2 K. 23 33, αβλαα [B], δεβλαα [A];[1] 25 6 ιερδεβλαθαν [B], εις δεβλαθα [AL]; v. 21 ρεβλαθα [B]; Jer. 39 5, ρ. [Theod.; 𝔊 om.] and v. 6 δ. [Theod.; 𝔊 om.]; 52 9 δεβαθα [ℵ*]; 52 10 δεβ . . θα [Γ]). It is hardly possible in our brief space to give the reader a just idea of the new problems connected with the name of Riblah.

Whether the foreign king who dethroned Jehoahaz was really Necho, king of Egypt, has become rather uncertain (see ZEDEKIAH). For מִצְרַיִם, Mizraim (i.e., Egypt), we should perhaps in 2 K. 23 34, as in so many other passages, read מִצְרִים, Mizrim; cp MIZRAIM, § 2 b. It was possibly, or even probably, a N. Arabian king called Pir'u, not an Egyptian Pharaoh, who brought the kingdom of Judah into vassalage. If so 'Riblah' may be a popular corruption of 'Jerahmeel.' It is not less possible or probable that in the other passages where רבלה occurs 'Riblah' should be emended into 'Jerahmeel.' The accounts of geographical boundaries of Canaan in the OT have been, it would seem, systematically corrected, in good faith, but in complete misapprehension of the documents.

If we assume, however, provisionally, the data of the traditional text, how shall we explain them? In this case, 'Riblah' will be represented by the poor village of Ribleh, on the E. bank of the Nahr el-'Āṣī (Orontes), 35 m. NE. of Baalbec. It was here that Necho put Jehoahaz in chains (2 K. 23 33) and NEBUCHADREZZAR (q.v.) some twenty years later made his headquarters when he came to quell the Palestinian revolt.[2] Here Zedekiah saw his sons slain (2 K. 25 6 = Jer. 39 5 f. = 52 9 f.), and certain officers and people from Jerusalem were put to death (2 K. 25 20 f. = Jer.

[1] Another form of the name in classical literature is Rhodos (ῥόδος, fem.). It was borne by a daughter of Poseidon, and by one of the Danaids (see Smith, Dict. Gr. and Rom. Biogr., s.v.).

[1] δεβλαθα is identified by a scholiast on 2 K. 25 20 in cod. 243 with Daphne the suburb of Antioch in Syria; cp Jerome on Nu. 34 11.

[2] An inscription of Nebuchadrezzar found in the Wādy Brissa (on the E. of Lebanon) refers to the devastation wrought among the cedars of Lebanon by a foreign foe, and the flight of the inhabitants. Nebuchadrezzar's (second) visit to Riblah in 586, if historical, was to repair the damage done and to encourage the population of Lebanon which probably resisted the 'foreign foe' and suffered accordingly. The 'foreign foe' must have been Necho (Wi. AOF 504 ff.). This, however, must be accepted with some critical reserve.

52 26 f.). The occurrences of Riblah recognised by EV need some revision; the name should certainly be inserted in Ezek. 6 14, where Riblah (misread in MT as DIBLAH: AV 'Diblath'), as a boundary, takes the place of the more usual 'Hamath,' and it should as certainly be omitted in Nu. 34 11. Here, as most scholars suppose, the ideal eastern frontier of Canaan is described. The border, we are told, is to go down 'from Shepham HRBLH on the E. of Ain.' If we put aside the prejudice produced by the pointing (הָרִבְלָה), it seems probable that 'to Harbel' (הַרְבֵּלָה) is the meaning intended, and not 'to Riblah.' The right vocalisation was still known to the 𝔊 translator (ἀπὸ σεπφαμ αρβηλα; see SHEPHAM), and also to Jerome and Eusebius, who speak (OS, 86 6 214 172 232 54) of Arbela or αβηλα as a point on the eastern confines of Canaan. The Speaker's Comm. finds Harbel (more strictly הרבל) in the Har-baal-hermon of Judg. 3 3, and supposes the border to pass by the southern end of Mt. Hermon near the two best-known sources of the Jordan. If the current theory of the reference may provisionally be accepted, let us rather say that Harbel was synonymous with Har-baal-gad, since 'Baal-gad at the foot of Mt. Hermon' occurs in the parallel passage Josh. 13 5 instead of the Har-baal-hermon of Judg. 3 3. This view is at any rate more plausible than van Kasteren's identification of Hariblah with Halibnah, between the Yarmūk and the Wādy Samak (Rev. bibl., 1895, p. 33). One of the spurs of the Jebel esh-Shēkh (Mt. Hermon) is in fact called Jebel Arbel.[1] But it is much to be feared that the identification is illusory. T. K. C.

RIDDLE occurs nine times in EV (Judg. 14 12-19, προβλημα; Ezek. 17 2, διηγημα) and twice in EVmg. (Prov. 1 6, αινιγμα; Hab. 2 6, προβλημα) as the rendering of Heb. חִידָה, ḥīdāh.

The word חירה, usually explained as 'something twisted or knotty,' but more probably (see Lag. Griech. Uebersetz. der Prov. 73) 'something shut up' (cp Aram. אחד, and Bibl.-Aram. אחירה), occurs seventeen times in MT and and once in Heb. Ecclus. 47 17; in 1 K. 10 1 2 Ch. 9 1 it is rendered 'hard question' (αἴνιγμα); in Ps. 49 5 [4] 78 3 [2] 'dark saying' (πρόβλημα); in Prov. 1 6 'dark saying' (αἴνιγμα); in Hab. 2 6 'proverb' (πρόβλημα); in Nu. 12 8 'dark speech' (αἴνιγμα); in Dan. 8 23 'dark sentence' (αἴνιγμα, πρόβλημα [Th.]) and in Ecclus. 47 17 'parable' (παραβολή); αἴνιγμα also occurs in Wisd. 8 8 ('dark saying'), Ecclus. 39 3 (AV 'dark parables,' RV 'dark sayings of parables'), 47 15 (EV 'dark parables,' RVmg. 'parables of riddles,' Heb. differs).

Thanks to its frequent parallelism with the word māšāl (see PROVERB), ḥīdāh has acquired a considerable range of meaning. Thus it denotes (1) a riddle as we understand the word—e.g. that propounded by Samson to the Philistines, Judg. 14 12 ff., or those with which the Queen of Sheba is said to have proved Solomon, 1 K. 10 1 2 Ch. 9 1; (2) a sententious maxim (Prov. 30 15 f., etc.) still affecting to preserve the form of a riddle but wanting its essentials—viz., the adequate characterisation of the object, and the pause before reply. Even the riddle form may be dispensed with, ḥīdāh, as in Prov. 1 6, denoting simply any sententious maxim, or as in Ps. 49 5 (where, however, there are textual difficulties) the statement of a moral problem. (3) A parable—as in Ezek. 17 3-10, though the passage is not pure parable, but partakes of the characteristics of riddle and allegory as well. On account of the allusive and figurative character of many of the satirical lays of popular history (e.g., Nu. 21 27 ff. 1 S. 18 7, cp POETICAL LITERATURE, § 4 iii.), the term ḥīdāh is not inappropriately used to designate them in Hab. 2 6, but its use in Ps. 78 2 is probably only due to the poet's needing a parallel to מָשָׁל. (4) Lastly, ḥīdāh is used quite generally to denote any unusual or difficult and perhaps esoteric mode of expression, Nu. 12 8 Dan. 8 23.

Bochart has discoursed learnedly of the use of the riddle by the Hebrews at feasts,[1] and we could easily believe that if our sources of information were not so narrow, we should find that the Israelites had some resemblance in this department to the Arabs, with whom there was almost a separate branch of enigmatic literature, with many subdivisions. Still, we have only one example of the riddle in the OT—the famous one of Samson (Judg. 14 14—'a very bad riddle,' G. F. Moore); of those referred to in 1 K. 10 1 3 the narrator has favoured us with no specimen; nor did Josephus (Ant. viii. 5 3) find in the Phœnician history of Dius any details of the riddles said to have been sent by Solomon to Hiram of Tyre, and by Hiram to Solomon (Jos. Ant. viii. 5 3 [§ 149]). The information in post-biblical writings like the Midrash Mishlē or the 2nd Targum to Esther is certainly more curious than valuable.

In the NT 'riddle' occurs once, 1 Cor. 13 12, where, to some scholars, the combination of δι' ἐσόπτρου and ἐν αἰνίγματι appears difficult.

'Ἐν αἰν. (to which Origen, c. Cels. 7 50 and elsewhere, and the MSS LP prefix καὶ [in Orig. καὶ αἰνίγματος]) may no doubt be illustrated by Nu. 12 8 (𝔊), ἐν εἴδει καὶ οὐ δι' αἰνιγμάτων, which may perhaps have been explained 'in a well-defined form and not in indistinct blurred outlines' (for this use of αἴνιγμα see Origen on Jn. 1 9).

We do not want the additional phrase ἐν αἰνίγματι, which appears somewhat to mar the antithesis; what we look for is rather 'for now we see with the help of a mirror, but then face to face.' Preuschen would therefore omit ἐν αἰνίγματι as due to a later hand (ZNTW, 1900, p. 180 f., cp MIRROR).

RIE occurs twice in AV (Ex. 9 32 Is. 28 25) as the rendering of כֻּסֶּמֶת, for which RV has rightly 'spelt.' See FITCHES. N. M.

RIGHT, RIGHTEOUSNESS. The Hebrew words for righteousness are ṣédeḳ, ṣĕdāḳāh (צֶדֶק, צְדָקָה), connected with which we have the adjective ṣaddīḳ (צַדִּיק) 'righteous,' and the verb ṣādaḳ (צָדַק) to be in the right—in Hiphil and Pi'el, to declare a person in the right. Probably the most original form of the root appears in the noun ṣédeḳ, from which the verb, appearing first in the Hiph. form, is a denominative. It is not easy to fix precisely the primary meaning of the root. Gesenius takes it to be 'straight'; Ryssel, with less reason, 'hard.' In any case the earliest sense which can be traced in actual use appears to be conformity to a recognised norm or standard.

1. Heb. terms.

Thus Beiḍāwi on Sur. 2 21 (quoted by Kautzsch) rightly explains the corresponding form in Arabic, viz. ṣadḳ as muṭābiḳ—i.e., 'congruent,' so that things as unlike as a javelin and a date may each be described as sādiḳ, if they are as they should be. Nothing fresh can be learned from the Syriac usage, which simply repeats with less fulness that of the Hebrew and New Hebrew. 𝔊 has used great freedom in translating ṣédeḳ and its derivatives. δίκαιος, δικαιοσύνη, δικαιοῦν are their commonest renderings; but we also find, e.g., ṣĕdāḳāh represented by δικαίωμα, ἐλεημοσύνη (9 times), ἔλεος (3 times), and even by εὐφροσύνη (Is. 61 10), ṣaddīḳ, by ἀληθής, εὐσεβής, πιστός. On the other hand δίκαιος, δικαιοσύνη, δικαιοῦν stand in 𝔊 for many Hebrew words unconnected etymologically with the root צדק—e.g., for פְּתִי, שָׁלֵם, נָדִיב, נָקִיא, יָשָׁר, טָהוֹר, חֶסֶד, אֱמֶת, etc.

It will be well before examining the history of the words in the OT, to mention two facts which should be borne in mind throughout, in tracing the idea of righteousness as the Hebrews understood it. In the first place, ṣédeḳ and its derivatives seldom occur in the older documents. They are pretty common in the literary prophets; they are exceedingly frequent in the wisdom literature and in the Psalms. Next, the meaning of these words becomes gradually wider, and assumes a more strictly ethical and religious signification. We may compare the use of δικαιοσύνη which is unknown to Homer and Hesiod, and also the expansion of meaning in δίκη, δίκαιος from 'custom,' 'observant of recognised usage,'[1] till they stood for absolute justice and the man of ideal virtue. Similar analogies obviously appear in the Latin justus, and in our own terms 'right,' 'righteous,' etc.

It is doubtful whether real instances of the primitive use—viz., agreement with a physical norm—still survive in Hebrew. Lev. 19 36 Ezek. 45 10, 'exact balances,' 'exact weights,' etc., are commonly quoted as cases in point.

2. Development of meaning.

The passages, however, are late, and as the contrasted notion of iniquity occurs in the immediate context, it is by no means clear that we should not translate 'righteous balances,' etc. Similarly 'paths of ṣédeḳ' in Ps. 23 3 may mean 'paths of righteousness,' not simply 'straight paths.' Still less can Joel 2 23 be alleged as an example of ṣĕdāḳāh in its original—i.e., physical—signification, for the translation given by Kautzsch 'early rain in full measure' is more than doubtful. We may perhaps acquiesce in the translation 'early rain for your justification'—i.e., in proof that Yahwè has once more graciously accepted his people (so Wellh., Nowack, and Smend, AT Rel.-gesch. 419 ff.).

Passing from the idea of conformity to a physical standard, we have to note the use of the plu. ṣĕdāḳōth (צדקות) in the earliest fragment of Hebrew literature—viz., the so-called 'Song of Deborah.' There the poet describes the valiant deeds of the Hebrews as due to the help which Yahwè gave, and might as the tribal God be fairly expected to give, his people. This seems to be his conception of ṣĕdāḳōth. It involves little or no ethical element. Yahwè acted in accordance with the natural bond between his worshippers and himself, and the plural form indicates the various occasions on which he did so.

To the same class we may perhaps refer Dt. 33 21, where God is said to have wrought the ṣĕdāḳāh of Yahwè, because he was the instrument of the divine purpose by repelling the foes of Israel. In the same poem (the 'Blessing of Moses,' Dt. 33 19) Zebulun calls the tribes to some sacred mountain that they may offer 'sacrifices of ṣédeḳ,' and this may mean no more than sacrifices offered duly—i.e., according to the recognised form, and as a natural return for benefits conferred. Here, if this interpretation be sound, the ethical element is not wholly absent; but it is still faint and rudimentary.[2]

We have to deal next with the many cases in which the legal signification predominates. In the 'Book of the Covenant' (Ex. 23 7) we read, 'Thou shalt not put to death him who is innocent and ṣaddīḳ,' where clearly the legislator is not thinking of virtuous character, but of innocence from the charge brought before the court. This restricted use always continued long after the deeper and more universal meaning had become familiar.

3. Legal or forensic sense.

Isaiah, for example (5 23) speaks of צדקת צדיק—i.e., the plea of a man who has a good case—and in Prov. 18 17 we are told that the first comer is right (צדיק)—i.e., seems to be right in his contention till his opponent appears and puts him to the proof. See also Dt. 25 1 Prov. 17 15 18 5 24 24. Here it is necessary to note the significant fact that no feminine form of צדיק is found anywhere in the OT: indeed the use of the verb צדקה in Gen. 38 26 (the only occurrence of Ḳal in the Hexateuch) may fairly be accepted as proof that the adjective had no feminine form. This may be naturally accounted for on the ground that צדיק meant originally 'right in law,' and that a woman was not a 'person' with legal rights.

In early literature the use of the verb is almost wholly confined to the Hiphil, and the meaning of the verb corresponds to that of the adjective. In other words, the Hiphil verb means to decide in favour of a litigant, by declaring him to be in the right. So, for example,

[1] It is always assumed that the standard is external and recognised as correct. Thus, e.g., Homer speaks of Autolycus as 'good' (ἐσθλόν, Od. 19 394), adding that he excelled all men 'in knavery and the oath.' He would not have called him δίκαιον. So now we might perhaps speak of 'a good thief,' but not of a just one.

[2] The use of ἔοικε, ἐοικώς in Homer is similar.

in Ex. 23 7 (𝔊) after a warning against oppression of the poor by corrupt administration of justice, the general principle is enunciated, 'for thou shalt not decide in favour of a malefactor.' A slightly different shade of meaning is given to the verb in Absalom's exclamation (2 S. 15 4), 'O that they would make me a judge in the land: then if any man came to me with a plea and a case, I would help him to his right' (והצדקתיו).[1]

By an easy transition the idea of legal right is extended to that of being in the right on some particular occasion without any implication as to general moral character. No more is implied in Judah's admission (Gen. 36 26), 'She' (Tamar) 'is more in the right than I (צדקה ממני),' or perhaps 'She has acted within her rights and can maintain her case against me.' (For this use of מן, cp Job 32 2.) Further, ṣādaḳ is used of one who is justified in his statement. This meaning is evident in Job 33 12 where, after quoting Job's words, Elihu says, 'Lo! in this [statement] thou art not justified: I will answer thee.' In the same way the adjective is employed, Is. 41 26, 'Who announced this from the beginning that we might know it . . . and say "Right"'—i.e., 'he is right'? not, 'It is true,' for the Hebrew adjective is never used of things. Examples of this meaning in noun, adjective, and verb are numerous. See for use of the noun (ṣédeḳ) Is. 59 4 Ps. 52 5 [3] Prov. 8 8 16 13, of the verb in Hiph. Job 27 5 and in Hithpa. (perhaps), Gen. 44 16. In Arab. the use of the root for 'truth-speaking,' 'sincere,' is much more advanced and definite.

We may now turn to the idea of righteousness properly so called, of righteousness in its ethical signification; and here the investigation has its starting-point in the early literary prophets. In the reign of Jeroboam II. a capitalist class had arisen: the old tribal justice, depending on the bond of clan and still well-maintained among the Arabs of the desert, was well-nigh gone in Israel (see GOVERNMENT, § 12 ff.; LAW AND JUSTICE, § 2). Hence the passionate cry of Amos for national righteousness, for justice in the gates—i.e., for right institutions rightly administered. He reiterates his protest that external ritual is of no avail without justice, 'Take away from me' (Yahwè speaks) 'the tumult of thy songs, the music of thy lutes I will not hear. But let justice roll in like a river and righteousness like a perennial stream' (5 23). True, Amos also uses the adjective ṣaddīḳ in the old legal sense (2 6 5 12), and he has the administration of justice constantly in view. In his view, however, legal justice springs from the essential nature of God, who demands righteousness, not ritual worship from his people. The demand is made to the nation as a whole. Unless it is satisfied, Israel must perish utterly and there is no room left for difference in the fate of the righteous and the unrighteous individual. Hosea also insists on national righteousness; but his conception of it is at once wider and deeper than that of his predecessor. It is wider, for righteousness, as Hosea understood it, is more than bare justice. It includes ḥésed—i.e., merciful consideration for others.[2] It is deeper, for Hosea saw that outward amendment could not be permanent without a radical change of mind. 'Sow to yourselves in righteousness: reap according to lovingkindness: break up for yourselves fallow ground: for it is time to seek Yahwè, that the fruit of righteousness may come to you' (10 12, cp 𝔊). It is not enough to sow good seed: the ground must first be cleared and broken up: in short, the Israelites must become new men, and Yahwè's will must rule their lives. Yahwè will accept no superficial conversion (6 1-4): the only remedy is a new birth by which Israel becomes a new creature (13 13).

4. Ethical sense in prophets.

Isaiah develops the principles of Amos and Hosea. His moral code is much the same. 'Seek out justice: set right the violent man: do justice to the orphan: plead for the widow' (1 16 f. 5 7 10 2). He, no less than Hosea, makes religion a matter of the heart (29 13). Righteousness is the inexorable rule by which Yahwè governs the world (28 17), and wickedness by its own nature blasts the evildoer (9 17 [18]). Because of Israel's sin the nation as a whole is doomed hopelessly (6 13*a*). Still, those who believe in Yahwè as the eternal principle of righteousness can stand fast in the crash of ruin all around them (7 9). Meanwhile the prophet was educating a band of disciples (8 16) who were to be the germ of a 'remnant that was to be converted,' and in one of his latest prophecies (1 21-26) he passes from an ideal picture of Jerusalem in Davidic days (the idealisation of the past separates him in a very marked manner from Hosea) and expresses the great hope of better times to come. Judgment will have done its cleansing work: once more judges will give impartial decisions and Jerusalem shall be known as 'the fortress of righteousness, the faithful city.'

5. Isaiah.

[1] So δικαιοῦν in classical Greek means to give a man his due, but always in a bad sense, viz., to condemn. It is only in 𝔊 and NT that it means 'to declare righteous.'

[2] Cp τὸ ἐπιεικές, which corrects the defects of law, and is, therefore, δίκαιον καί τινος βέλτιον δικαίου, Arist. Eth. Nicom. 5 8.

A century later Jeremiah maintained the same conception of righteousness. In 22 3 he gives what almost

6. Jeremiah. amounts to a definition of righteousness: it consists negatively in abstinence from murder and oppression of the widows and orphans, positively in securing justice for those who were powerless to help themselves. The same thought appears in other passages—e.g., in chap. 7, though the word 'righteousness' is not actually used. We must not, however, forget that Jeremiah held fast to his belief in righteousness at the cost of a personal struggle more searching and severe than that which any of his precursors had to face. It was his hard fate to learn that even a law like that of Deuteronomy, embodying as it did the best results of prophetic teaching, could not of itself change the hearts of the very men who in form, and as they believed, sincerely, complied with its requirements. Moreover, Jeremiah had to contend with the organised priesthood of Jerusalem, after the priests of the high places had been removed and when those of the central shrine claimed, on grounds which Jeremiah could not altogether gainsay, a divine sanction for their authority. Moreover his sensitive nature was exposed to continual suffering from the enmity of his contemporaries and from the national ruin which he saw first in spiritual vision and then with the bodily eye. Because of all this, Jeremiah's faith in the divine righteousness had to draw its strength from the very doubt which threatened to destroy it. 'Thou art in the right (ṣaddiḳ) O Yahwè, when I contend with thee: yet would I reason the cause with thee: why does the way of the wicked prosper?' (12 1). He knows well that the best law may be perverted by the 'lying pen of the scribes' (8 8) and that Yahwè is 'a righteous judge (šōphēṭ ṣédeḳ) proving reins and heart' (11 20). More explicitly than any earlier prophet he fuses morality and religion into one by reducing all duty to the one supreme duty of knowing Yahwè's will as revealed in his government of the world.

'Thus saith Yahwè, Let not a wise man glory in his wisdom, neither let a hero glory in his valour, let not a rich man glory in his wealth. But in this let him that glories glory, that he has understanding and knows me, [knows] that I am Yahwè, who do lovingkindness, judgment, and righteousness on the earth: for in these things do I take pleasure; it is the oracle of Yahwè (9 22*f.* [23*f.*]).' Whereas Isaiah had seen that the people's heart was not in their worship, Jeremiah recognised the radical evil that the heart of man is weak and cannot be trusted (17 9), and he saw the hope of spiritual religion, not in amendment on man's part, but in the grace of Yahwè who would write his law in their hearts (31 33).

Finally, the expectation of a Messianic king, or line of Messianic kings, appears probably for the first time in Jeremiah. Yahwè will raise from the family of David 'a righteous branch.' He is to execute true justice and is to be called 'Yahwè is our righteousness' (23 5*f.*). The context interprets this name of the Messiah. By restoring Israel to its own land Yahwè the judge of all is to vindicate the just cause of his people against the heathen. 'In his (i.e., the Messiah's) days Judah will be saved' (from heathen bondage) 'and Israel will dwell in security.' The history of the world is the judgment of the world. Here, however, the idea of righteousness is modified by fresh associations, and with the consequent change in the application of the word we shall have to deal presently.

We have already given from the earlier documents of the Hexateuch instances which illustrate the more

7. Ṣédeḳ synonym of morality. restricted and primitive use of the root צדק. We also meet there, as might have been expected, with the prophetic use in which it is co-extensive with moral excellence. Yahwè, e.g., declares that he has seen how righteous Noah is (Gen. 7 1, J): he knows that Abraham will teach his descendants 'to do judgment and righteousness' (Gen. 18 19, a late stratum of JE). Only one passage in the Hexateuch calls for special notice here, both from its intrinsic interest and from the famous argument drawn from it by Paul. The words in Gen. 15 6 (J?) are 'Abraham trusted in Yahwè and he reckoned it to him as righteousness.' Paul identifies the faith of Abraham with justifying faith as he himself understood it. It would be an anachronism to suppose that the writer of the words in Genesis had risen to an idea of this kind, nor is any such exegesis supported by the context. Abraham believed, not in God's pardoning grace, but in Yahwè's fidelity to his promise. In fact Abraham's faith or trust is precisely what faith as Paul conceives it is not, an 'opus per se dignum.' See FAITH, § 1.

From the ethical we may now pass to the theocratic sense of ṣĕdāḳāh and the cognate words. We have

8. Theocratic sense. already had a glimpse of this meaning in the Messianic passage quoted from Jeremiah. It became prevalent from the time of Habakkuk. It must be remembered that Habakkuk, like Jeremiah, lived after Josiah's reform, but does not, like Jeremiah, attribute the partial failure of that reform to the depravity of the Judæan people. On the contrary, he believed that the obstacle to strict legal observance lay in the oppression of Judah by the Babylonians (1 4); for it was very hard to believe in Yahwè or his law while the Babylonian oppressor had it all his own way. The people of Judah were at least better than their oppressors; hence to Habakkuk 'the righteous' is the constant description of the Judæans, whilst 'the wicked' stands for the heathen conqueror. This terminology was adopted by subsequent writers, as may be seen from Is. 26 10 Ps. 96 17 10 2 ff. In the end, as Habakkuk holds, Yahwè will vindicate the cause of his people, and 'the righteous man'—i.e., the man of Judah, is to live by fidelity to his God and confidence in the ultimate victory of the good cause. Here we have the outline of the picture which the Second Isaiah (i.e., Is. 40-55) fills in with completer detail and added shades of meaning.[1] Whereas the earlier prophets threatened, the unknown prophet of the Exile makes it his chief endeavour to comfort Israel. No doubt the nation has sinned; but it has also been punished enough, and more than enough, and now the day of its deliverance is at hand. 'For the sake of his own faithfulness (ṣédeḳ) Yahwè has been pleased to give great and glorious revelation' of his character (42 21).[2] He is a 'truth-speaking' God (ṣaddiḳ, 45 21). He has stirred up Cyrus 'in righteousness' (45 13), i.e., as Yahwè ought to do, and therefore must do; he has supported him with 'his trusty right hand' ('right hand of ṣédeḳ,' 41 10). By a glorious restoration Yahwè 'justifies' Israel—i.e., decides in its favour (50 8). Hence in a multitude of cases ṣédeḳ and ṣĕdāḳāh mean triumph (so the verb 45 25: cp νικᾶν in Rom. 12 21) 'victory' (41 2 46 12), 'redress' (51 8),

[1] We may perhaps compare καλοὶ κἀγαθοί, optimates, prud-hommes, gute Männer, used of the aristocracy without any ethical meaning. Of course the ethical words never lost their ethical sense so utterly.

[2] There is, however, some doubt both as to the reference in this passage, and as to its authenticity. See Marti, ad loc.

'salvation' (46 13). It is significant that when ṣĕdāḳāh retains its older and ethical force, it is used of a righteousness which comes as a divine grace being 'rained down from above' (45 8). In the Second Isaiah, however, this purely ethical sense is rare, occurring only two or three times out of some twenty-five in which the Hebrew root is used.

The Second Isaiah, as we have seen, assumed that the sufferings inflicted by Babylon had sufficed to purify Israel, and hailed with joy the restoration of a righteous people. However, in the preceding generation Ezekiel had given expression to a very different view. In the latter period of his work he was a pastor of souls, a preacher addressing individuals rather than a prophet with a message to the nation. Naturally, then, he insists on individual righteousness. Each man is to be tried on his own merits; however righteous he may be, he can secure the due reward for himself and only for himself. Nay, even with the individual Yahwè deals according to his present actions, admitting no appeal to the righteousness of the past, and on the other hand forgiving iniquity in case of repentance and amendment (Ezek. 18 1 14 14 f. 33 12 f.). His ideal of righteousness in the individual conforms on the whole to the prophetic standard of individual righteousness, though it includes a larger amount of ritual observance (see esp. 18 6-8). Now, after the restoration, the view of the Second Isaiah proved untenable. The restoration itself lacked the external glory of which he had fondly dreamt, and the exile had failed to produce that righteousness of the whole nation which was still the cherished aim of religious reformers in the Jewish Church. How was it to be accomplished? Finally and completely by the judgment of the last days, which is to fall on unfaithful Jews as well as the heathen. This is the favourite theme of Apocalyptic writers (see esp. Is. 10 22 which is a late insertion: Mal. 3 3 Zech. 9 9 12 6 13 9—Joel and Daniel passim). Meanwhile the wisdom literature taught with Ezekiel that God here and now, though not immediately, recompenses the righteous and the wicked according to their deserts, a dogma constantly reiterated in Proverbs and Psalms. Here and there a distinction is made between the 'weightier matters of the law' and such as are merely ritual, since Yahwè loves 'righteousness and judgment' more than 'sacrifice' (Prov. 21 3, cp, e.g., Ps. 50). But more and more the 'righteous man' is one who studies and practises the whole law (Ps. 1 5). The righteous are really one with the ḥăsīdīm: these are to be found as a rule among the poor and afflicted Israelites (Zech. 9 9 Ps. 56-59), and possibly the author of Ps. 94, when he speaks (v. 15) of legal administration returning to 'righteousness,' may be looking forward to the triumph of the Pharisaic over the Sadducean party. Naturally those who made so much of the law laid great stress on deeds of mercy. But ṣĕdāḳāh nowhere admits, as in Mishnic Hebrew, of the rendering 'alms,' though such passages as Ps. 112 9 Dan. 4 24 [27] are not far removed from this later use.[1]

9. Individual righteousness.

We have already, in discussing the various senses of ṣĕdāḳāh, etc., answered by implication the question, How is a man justified or accepted as righteous before God? Something, however, has to be added here on the justification of sinners, the change from divine condemnation to divine favour. As we have seen, the ancient Hebrew believed that God's wrath could be appeased by sacrifice (1 S. 26 19 3 14), whereas the earliest of the literary prophets insisted that national amendment was the only way of escape from national chastisement. The idea that sin was a debt incurred and that payment was still due, however sincere the conversion might be, is altogether strange to Amos and his successors. 'Cease to do evil, learn to do well,' is the remedy which Isaiah proposes; nor does he doubt its efficacy: 'If ye be willing and obedient, ye shall eat the good of the land' (Is. 1 16-19). Ezekiel, in a passage quoted above, proposes the same rule to the individual, and combats the delusion that the merits of persons exceptionally righteous could atone for the sins of their neighbours[1] (see also Jer. 15 1 31 29, and for an opposite view Gen. 18 17 f.). On the whole this principle ruled in later Israel. To keep the law is righteousness (Dt. 6 25), and the man or church that does so receives ṣĕdāḳāh—i.e., a favourable sentence 'from the God who comes to his help' (Ps. 24 5). It is true that neither the individual Jew nor the Jewish church could always appeal with confidence to that perfect observance of the law which justified in the sight of God. On the contrary, the Psalms abound in acknowledgments of guilt (e.g., Pss. 38 4-6 40 13 69 6 [5]), and the chief motive of religion was to secure divine pardon: 'There is forgiveness with thee that thou mayest be feared' (Ps. 130 4). We must not, however, identify such misgivings with the reproach of conscience, with the sense of sin as Christians understand it. The Jews believed that God was offended with them because he withheld the rewards of righteousness and dealt with them as he deals with the wicked, they believed restoration to prosperity was the sure sign of pardon and of grace, a state of mind which finds its classical expression in Ps. 32. But was there no way of restoration except perfect righteousness, or, failing that, supplication to the divine mercy (as in Dan. 9 20)? On this point the later teaching of the OT is not consistent.

10. 'Righteousness' of sinners.

The Priestly Code limits the efficacy of the sin-offering which was introduced after the exile to venial or involuntary transgression (Nu. 15 27-31), and the mention of sacrifice in the Book of Proverbs (15 8 16 6 21 3 27) is at least in harmony with this principle. Still, even the Priestly Code had to mitigate the strictness of its theory. On the day of Atonement the high priest laid the sins of Israel on the head of the goat which was sent into the desert (Lev. 16 20-22); the āshām atoned for perjury and embezzlement (Lev. 5 21 f. [6 2 f.] Nu. 5 5 f.) when preceded by restitution to the person wronged, and incense could appease Yahwè when provoked by the rebellion of his people (Nu. 17 11 f. [16 46 f.]). At a still later period it was thought that the merits of the Patriarchs atoned for the sins of Israel (see Weber, Altsyn. Theol. 280 f.; and the essay on the 'Merits of the Fathers' in Sanday and Headlam's Commentary on Romans), and we may perhaps find the germ of this dogma in the atoning efficacy which the OT attributes to the prayers of holy men (Ex. 32 7 f. 31 f. Nu. 14 11 f. 16 22 17 10 Jos. 7 6 f. Jer. 7 16 11 14 15 1 Job 5 1 33 23) and of angels (Zech. 1 12 Job 5 1 33 23). Very naturally the doctrine that the merits of the Fathers availed for the justification of Israel culminated in the belief that the guilt of Israel was purged by the vicarious sufferings of righteous men. This no doubt was the teaching of the Rabbis. According to them, Isaac made propitiation for Israel by the willing oblation of his own life. God smote Ezekiel that Israel might go free, and martyrdom made propitiation for sin as efficaciously as the day of Atonement.[2] The OT, however, lends no real support to such a theory of justification by vicarious sacrifice. The famous passage (Is. 52 13-53 12) which describes the sufferings of Yahwè's servant is treated elsewhere (SERVANT OF THE LORD). In spite of the corruption of the text, the general sense seems to be clear.[3]

11. Atonement and propitiation.

1 In Mt. 6 1, δικαιοσύνην is certainly the true reading, and that of TR ἐλεημοσύνην is a gloss. Whether the gloss is correct is another question. Weiss, ad loc., answers this question in the affirmative; Holtzmann, NTl. Theol. 2 135, in the negative.

1 Almsdeeds also were regarded as a powerful means of atonement for past sins.

2 Reff. in Holtzmann, NTl. Theol. 1 65 f.

3 Verses 10 f. are, as they stand, quite out of place, since the context requires a reference to the resurrection, not the death of the servant. See Che. Intr. to Is. 305, n. 1, and Duhm and Marti, ad loc. [also SERVANT OF THE LORD, §§ 4 (4) 5 (4)].

Israel, the servant of Yahwè, does indeed suffer for the 'peace' and 'healing' of the nations. This, however, takes place because of the effect produced on the minds of the heathen, not because of the effect produced on the mind of God. At first the heathen regard Israel as afflicted by an angry God: they shrink from him as men shrink from a leper. But God reverses the tragic doom of his people and raises up the nation to new life. Then the heathen understand the divine purpose. They recall the meekness with which Israel endured its punishment. They acknowledge their own sinfulness and come to the knowledge of the true God who has scattered Israel abroad for a season that he may make it the light of nations and show his irresistible power in its glorious restoration.

The words δίκαιος, δικαιοσύνη, which scarcely occur in the Fourth Gospel, are exceedingly common in Mt. and Lk., and serve to express the most striking and characteristic features of Jesus' teaching. Jesus required from his disciples a righteousness better than that of the Scribes and Pharisees, and told them that otherwise they could not enter the Kingdom of Heaven (Mt. 5 20). Generally, it may be said that Jesus restored the prophetic ideal of righteousness, at the same time deepening and extending it. The popular doctrine understood, by righteousness, not so much an honest and upright life as scrupulous attention to moral and ceremonial rules, conduct legally correct. These rules were contained in the written and oral law; Jesus declared that the traditions of the elders nullified the central purpose of the law (Mk. 7 1-13), or at best were matters of indifference (ib.). Moreover, he not only distinguished between the more important and less important precepts of the Mosaic law (Mt. 23 23); he also criticised the law itself and set its most solemn commands aside.

12. Jesus' conception.

No less than this is implied in words such as these—'Moses because of the hardness of your hearts suffered you to divorce your wives' (Mt. 19 8 = Mk. 10 5); 'The Sabbath was made for man, not man for the Sabbath' (Mk. 2 27); 'Nothing that goeth into a man from without can defile a man' (Mk. 7 15 = Mt. 15 17 f.; contrast Lev. 11 Deut. 14). Again, the righteousness which Jesus taught far transcended on its positive side that of the Mosaic law: among his disciples the lex talionis was to give place to a very different rule—viz., 'Do not resist evil' (Mt. 5 39)—and that is followed by a kindred command, 'Love your enemies' (Mt. 5 44).

More clearly and more consistently than any previous teacher, Jesus demanded a righteousness of the heart, and forbade malicious and impure thoughts as sternly as the deeds of murder and lust to which they naturally tend (Mt. 5 21-28). He went deeper still, and instead of reckoning the sum of good deeds, or even good thoughts, against the opposing sum of evil deeds and thoughts, he insisted upon righteousness of character, a righteousness which is not accidental but essential, a righteousness which is one and indivisible, various as its manifestations may be: 'A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit, neither can a corrupt bring forth good fruit' (Mt. 7 18). No sacrifice was to be counted too severe when personal righteousness was in peril (Mt. 5 29) or the cause of righteousness to be advanced (Mt. 19 21 Mk. 10 21 Lk. 18 22). On the one hand, all was to be done with a single eye fixed upon God and his approval (Mt. 6 1 etc.); on the other hand, the service of God consisted in the service of man for God's sake. It is on duty to man that the 'Sermon on the Mount' dwells throughout, that practical love for man of which God himself is the supreme example, and hence an infinite vista opens up before the disciple, who can never feel that he has done enough since he is to be perfect as his Father in Heaven is perfect (Mt. 5 48). So, too, the Jewish notion of a contract with God who repays service done disappears in that relation of son to father which Jesus removed from the circumference and set in the centre of religion. True, God rewards those who do not reward themselves by ostentation and self-complacency. But the quality of reward is the same for all faithful service, long or short; it consists in admission to the kingdom in which the ideal of righteousness is realised (Mt. 20 1-16). As God bestows the powers to be used in his service, and has an absolute right to that service, no room is left for merit which does but claim its due: 'When ye shall have done all these things which are commanded you, say, We are unprofitable servants' (Lk. 17 10).

Jesus opened the Kingdom of Heaven to those who hungered and thirsted for righteousness such as this (Mt. 5 6). Whereas, however, prophets and apocalyptic writers had looked forward to a final separation of the righteous and the wicked, Jesus began his work by the great announcement that he came to call not the righteous, but sinners, to repentance (Mt. 9 13 = Mk. 2 17 = Lk. 5 32). He declared and pronounced the forgiveness of sins; he spoke of the joy in heaven over one sinner who repents; he taught men to believe in God by first teaching them to believe in himself. He invited men to believe in the good news (Mk. 1 15)—i.e., to have faith or trust in God as their Father, and to make this trust the guiding principle of their lives.

It would be impossible within the limits of this article to discuss the righteousness of faith of which Paul speaks or the connection of Christ's death with justification. It may be well, however, to indicate in conclusion the various uses of δίκαιος and the cognate words in the NT apart from righteousness in the Pauline sense and that higher righteousness demanded by Jesus from his disciples of which we have said something already. The adjective δίκαιος, 'righteous,' is applied to God especially as judge of all (Rev. 16 5), or to Christ (2 Tim. 4 8 Jn. 17 25); to men as observant of the Jewish law (Mt. 1 19).[1] It also is equivalent to 'virtuous' in the widest sense (Mt. 5 45 9 13 = Mk. 6 20 = Lk. 5 32, etc.). Once Paul distinguishes the righteous man who fulfils all his obligations from the ἀγαθός whose character is more genial and attractive (Rom. 5 7). 'Righteous' is also a title given to men eminently righteous (Mt. 13 17 Mk. 2 17), and by pre-eminence to Jesus (Acts 3 14 7 52 22 14). It is predicated, as the corresponding Hebrew adjective never is, of things (Mt. 20 4 Lk. 12 57 Acts 4 19 Rom. 7 12 Col. 4 1 Phil. 4 8 etc.).

13. Use of δίκαιος.

The noun δικαιοσύνη means 'fair dealing' between man and man (passing into the wider sense of virtuous conduct; Acts 10 35 24 25 Rom. 6 13 14 17 1 Tim. 6 11 2 Tim. 2 22). Lk. uses it once only, viz., in 1 75 where it is parallel to 'holiness,' i.e., piety. Acceptance of John's baptism is spoken of (Mt. 3 15) as included in the 'fulfilment of all righteousness'—i.e., as conformable to the divine will which the Baptist announced. So, too, the Baptist is said to have come 'in the way of righteousness' (Mt. 21 32), because he preached that course of conduct which righteousness required. The verb δικαιῶ, 'justify,' in the NT always means to pronounce just, never, either in the NT or in profane writers, to make just (the apparent exception, Rev. 22 11, in the received text arises from a false reading). It is used of men who seek to prove themselves in the right (Lk. 10 29), or to win credit for righteousness with their fellow-men (Lk. 16 15). Men are justified before God when they obtain his approval (Lk. 18 14 Mt. 12 37 = Lk. 7 35). In this sense Jesus, after his resurrection, was 'justified in the Spirit' (1 Tim. 3 16) inasmuch as he received clear tokens of divine approval. As God justifies men, so men may justify God, by confessing his righteousness (Lk. 7 29 Ps. 51 6 [4] as quoted in Rom. 3 4; cp Mt. 11 19), an application of the verb which is found in the Psalms of Solomon (2 16 3 5).

14. Literature.

See Diestel, JDT 5 173 f.; Ortloph, 'Begriff von צדק,' ZLT 1860, p. 401 f.; Ryssel, *Synonyme des Wahren u. Guten in den sem. This last accentuates the juristic element and even in so early a passage as Judg. 5 11 translates ṣidkōth, 'victories' [of Yahwè]. Wildeboer's comparison of the Syr. zèkhā to be pure, to conquer, ḥāb 'to be guilty,' 'to be defeated' is interesting and suggestive. W. E. A.

RIMMON (רִמּוֹן; ΡΕΜΜΑΝ [BL] -Θ [A]). According to the traditional text, the name of a god worshipped at Damascus (2 K. 5 18); apparently it enters into the name TAB-RIMMON [q.v.], though, as we shall see, another view of the phrase in 1 K. 15 18 is at least equally possible.

A more correct pronunciation of the name of this god would be Rammān. Both name and cultus of this deity were, it is generally held, borrowed from Assyria, and certainly Rammān was the most prevalent name of the god of thunder and lightning (ideogram IM) who plays such an important part in the Babylonian Deluge-story, and is often represented as armed with the thunderbolt. The etymological meaning is 'the roarer' (ramâmu = 'to roar')—a name well suited to a thunder god. The W. Semites appear to have had another name for this god, viz., Addu or Daddu, and Oppert (ZA 9 310 ff. [1894]) supposes that Adad was the oldest name of the deity. There is thought to be a reminiscence of the identity of Addu (or Adad) and Rammān in the compound form Hadad-rimmon (MT's reading) in Zech. 12 11; the editor of Zechariah, however, will in this case be responsible for the strange form (but see Crit. Bib.). We often find Rammān associated with Šamaš (the sun-god), like whom he is (in an inscription of the Kassite period) called 'lord of justice.' The Massoretes may have confounded Rammān with rimmōn (see POMEGRANATE); though H. Derenbourg disputes the accuracy of this representation, Rimmon, according to him, being the divinised pomegranate (Kohut Memorial Studies, 120-125 [1897].

1. Rimmon = Ass. Ramman.

See especially Jastrow, Rel. of Bab. and Ass., 156-161; and Amer. Journ. of Sem. Languages, 12 159-162; also Schrader, 'Ramman-Rimmon,' St. Kr., 1874, pp. 334 ff.; Sayce, 'the god Ramman,' ZA 2 331 f. [; Zimmern, KAT(3) 442-451].

According to Ohnefalsch-Richter (Kypros, Text, 115) the confusion between the Hebrew word for 'pomegranate' (רִמּוֹן, rimmōn) and the name of the originally Assyrian god Rammān is older than MT, and goes back possibly to the time of Ezekiel (and earlier). In this connection he notes that pomegranates were attached to the vestments of the high-priest and to the columns of the temple at Jerusalem. On Carthaginian stelæ, moreover, we find the seated figure of the boy Adonis in the very place occupied elsewhere by the column surmounted by a pomegranate. Ohnefalsch-Richter thinks that it was 'an easy step' to identify this tree-god Tammuz, to whom the 'rimmōn' was sacred, with the storm-god Rammān, and to call him 'Rimmōn.'

According to Jensen, there is a cylinder in the Hermitage at St. Petersburg inscribed with two divine names, the one Rammânum, the other Ašratum. Taking this in connection with Assyrian texts which speak of the god Amurru (i.e., the god of the land Amurru, the Amorite god) as the consort of Ašratu, he infers that the Amorite god referred to is Rammânu, i.e., the storm-god, also called by the Assyrians 'the Lord of the Mountain,' = בעל לבנן, 'the Baal of Lebanon.' The 'land of Amurru' was in fact originally the land of the Lebanon or Antilibanus (cp Wi. GI 1 52).

The present writer, however (see Crit. Bib.), suspects much misunderstanding in the traditional text of the narratives of the kings of Aram, which is specially visible in names. 'Ben-hadad,' for instance, seems to be equivalent to Bir-dadda, and Hazael to Ḥaza'ilu, which are attested as N. Arabian royal names in Assyrian inscriptions (KAT(2), 148); 'Damascus' is constantly miswritten for 'Cusham'; and Rimmon, or rather Rammān, may be regarded as a popular corruption of that famous name 'Jeraḥmeel,' which was not only an ethnic name, but also in all probability the name of a god (see Crit. Bib. on 2 K. 17 30 f.). When, therefore, we read in 2 K. 5 18 of Naaman's accompanying his royal master to the house of Rimmon, this is meant (not of the storm-god, but) of the national god of Jeraḥmeel, who may possibly have been called Jarḥam or Yarḥam (i.e., ירח, 'moon,' with the Arabic 'mimation'). It was not unnecessary to warn the Israelites that Naaman was only by a special indulgence allowed to do outward honour to Jarḥam or Jeraḥmeel, because there are several indications that the worship of Jeraḥmeel had made its way into Judah some time before the fall of the state. See, e.g., Zeph. 1 5*b*, where we should very probably read, '(I will cut off) those that prostrate themselves before the moon, that swear by Jeraḥmeel.'[1] It now becomes doubtful whether 'son of Tab-rimmon' in 1 K. 15 18 is correct. The king to whom Asa sent may have been, not 'Ben-hadad, son of Tab-rimmon, son of Hezion, king of Syria, that dwelt at Damascus,' but 'Ben-hadad [= Bir-dadda], native of Beth-jeraḥmeel[2] (or Rabbath-jeraḥmeel?), king of Aram (= Jeraḥmeel), who dwelt at (or, in) Cusham.' It should also be noticed here that Elisha, who had such close relations with a king of Aram and his general, was, the present writer suspects, a prophet of the Negeb—i.e., of a region which was originally Jeraḥmeelite. T. K. C.

1. Josh. 15 32 19 7 [AV REMMON], 1 Ch. 4 32 Zech. 14 10. See EN-RIMMON, and cp AIN, 1.

2. The name of a rock where 600 fugitive Benjamites found shelter for four months (Judg. 20 47, הָרִמּוֹן, ρεμμων [BAL]). There was a village of this name 15 R. m. N. of Jerusalem (OS 146 5 287 98), identified by Robinson (2 113) with the mod. Rammōn, rather more than 3 m. E. of Bethel, 'on and around the summit of a conical chalky hill and visible in all directions.' This would be in the wilderness of Beth-aven (Josh. 18 12). Birch (PEFQ, 1879, p. 128) objects that there are only a few small caves at Rammōn, and refers to Consul Finn, who heard of a vast cavern in the Wādy es-Suweinīṭ capable of holding many hundred men. Canon Rawnsley in consequence visited the caverns in this Wādy, which he describes in PEFQ, 1879, pp. 118-126. Birch, following Ges. Thes. 1296, identifies the Rimmon of Judg. 20 47 with the Rimmon 'under' which Saul, with his 600 men, tarried (1 S. 14 2). The latter Rimmon was 'at the limit of Geba' (so read for Gibeah). See MIGRON.

3. 'Rimmon' (rather 'Rimmonah, 'רִמּוֹנָה), also appears in RV of Josh. 19 13 (E. boundary of Zebulun), where AV again [see 1] gives 'Remmon,' with the addition of '-methoar,' (RV 'which stretcheth') as if a compound name. The RV at any rate recognises that the name is not compound; it also does justice to the article in הַמְּתֹאָר (ρεμμωνα αμαθαρ αοζα [B]; ρεμμωναμ, μαθαριμ, αννουα [A]; επι αμαθαρι νουα [L]). We may render, with Dillmann and Kau. HS, 'and (their border) extends to Rimmonah (רִמּוֹנָה), and turns round (וְתָאַר) to Neah (?).' No doubt it is the Rimmono (רִמּוֹנוֹ, AV Rimmon), or rather Rimmonah, of 1 Ch. 6 62 [77], probably also the DIMNAH (דִּמְנָה) of Josh. 21 35, corresponding to the modern Rummāneh on the SE. edge of the plain of Baṭṭauf, 4 m. N. from Gath-hepher, and 7½ m. N. from Chisloth-tabor.

Note that 'Rechab' may be also from 'Jeraḥmeel,' and that, as the story of SAUL (q.v.) shows, there was a strong Jeraḥmeelite element in Benjamin (Che.).

RING. The signet ring was called in Hebrew ḥōthām (חותם) from its use (√ to seal), and ṭabbá'ath (טבעת) from its form (√ to sink, As. ṭêbû); also in Bibl. Aram. 'izḳa' (עזקא) Dan. 6 18 [17], and in Targum for both ḥōthām and ṭabbá'ath (√ to cut, engrave).[1] See ENGRAVE. The seal was worn, as it is still by some Arabians, on a cord, pāthīl (see RIBBAND), round the neck, Gen. 38 18; later, on the right hand, Jer. 22 24. In Cant. 8 6 both customs seem combined, 'on thine arm, on thy heart.' The oldest form of signet worn by all Babylonians (Herod. 1 195) was the cylinder, a large hole being bored through the core to admit a soft woollen cord for suspension round wrist or neck.[2] The Egyptian scarabæus[3] had a smaller hole to admit a fine wire. When used, the seal was rolled over a piece of pipeclay which was laid on an object or attached by a ribbon to a document (King, Antique Gems, 1 40). It was from the Egyptian wire that the more convenient finger-ring was evolved. Such rings were among the ornaments worn by Hebrew women after the exile, Is. 3 21 (vv. 18-23 being an interpolation). The word gālīl 'ring' in Cant. 5 14 EV, for which RVmg. preferably suggests 'cylinder,' seems to be used as a simile of the fingers of the hand (BDB, Bu. ad loc.).

1. Signet.

The transference of Judah's signet to Tamar had no special significance—he simply gave her as a pledge an object which could obviously be identified with him.[4] On the signet was probably a precious stone, mostly the šōham (see ONYX), on which was engraved a figure or inscription, Ex. 28 11. Hence in an Oriental court the conveyance of the signet attested a royal message (1 K. 21 8), and in many lands was a mode of investing officers with power (Gen. 41 42 Esth. 3 10 1 Macc. 6 15 Jos. Ant. xx. 2 2). There is no indication that the wedding-ring was used in OT times; but in Egypt some such custom anciently prevailed. It should be added that a δακτύλιον was placed on the hand of the prodigal son on his restoration to his father's house (Lk. 15 22).

2. Ear-ring, nose-ring.

Nézem (נֶזֶם) conveys the meanings of both an ear-ring and a nose-ring, though usually the fuller form nézem hā-āph (נזם האף) is used for the nose-ring. In Judg. 8 24, however, where the singular is used, it is probable that nézem alone means nose-ring. The whole of this passage is, however, regarded as a late gloss by Wellhausen, Moore, Budde, and others. Neither nose-rings nor ear-rings were worn by males, though Pliny (NH 11 37 [50]) says that Oriental men wore them, and, if Judg. 8 24 be genuine Midianite soldiers did so.[5] The nose-ring was put through the nostril and hung over the mouth. Robertson Smith explains that all such ornaments were designed as amulets and protectors to the orifices, as well as for ornament (cp RS(2) 453, and n. 2). The ring put through the nose of beasts (ḥāḥ, 'hook') is sometimes associated with nézem (Ex. 35 22, AV 'bracelets,' RV 'brooches'); cp HOOK, 2.

Several forms of ear-ring are noticed in the OT. The lĕḥāšīm of Is. 3 20 were perhaps ear-rings (see AMULETS), to which some symbolic figure was attached. Other terms for ear-ring were derived from the shape. The 'āgīl (עָגִיל) was round (Ezek. 16 12, cp Bertholet on Ezek. 1 7 Nu. 31 50). Another kind, nĕṭīphōth (נְטִיפוֹת), lit. drops (RV pendants, AV collar), were probably pearls (Abulwalid compares Arab. naṭafat, a small, clear pearl), or single beads or gems attached to the lobe of the ear (נטף, to drop), Judg. 8 26 (στραγγαλὶς [B], ὁρμίσκοι ενφωθ [AL]), Is. 3 19 (𝔊 κάθεμα?) worn by Midianite men and Israelite women.

The ancient versions gave other explanations; Tg. כליליא, diadems, chaplets. Some Jewish interpreters connected nĕṭīphōth with naṭaph (Ex. 30 34, see STACTE) and render capsules of sweet-smelling gum. See, further, ORNAMENTS, and the articles there referred to. I. A.

[1] Ḥōthémeth, Gen. 38 25† is fem. coll. = 'sealing apparatus.' Ball suggests reading החתמם or החתמת; Holzinger partly approves this suggestion.

[3] The earliest dated Egyptian cylinder is as old as 3800 B.C. (Flinders Petrie, Hist. of Egypt, 1 55).

[4] Wellhausen (Ar. Held.(2), 164 f.) thinks that the cord from which the signet hung was also an amulet. This would account for the insistence on the transference of the cord in the narrative in Genesis.

[5] On these grounds Moore holds that ear-rings are probably meant. For the wearing of nose-rings by Indian boys in order to pass as girls and avert the evil-eye, see Frazer, Pausanias, 2 266.

According to the theory which finds N. Arabian influence and interests pervading the earlier chapters of Genesis (see PARADISE, § 6), 'Gomer' represents 'Jerahmeel,' 'Ashkenaz' comes from 'Kenaz' (or Asshur-Kenaz), 'Riphath' from 'Zarephath.' The transformation has been systematic. On the time-honoured theory, however, which bases itself on MT, we must look far away from N. Arabia. Josephus thought of Paphlagonia; Bochart and Lagarde of the Bithynian river ῥῆβας and the distant ῥηβαντία on the Thracian Bosporus. But if TOGARMAH [q.v.] is really Tilgarimmu, on the border of Tabal, Riphath may be identified with Bit Burutaš (or Buritiš), a district—mentioned several times with Tabali (see Schr. KGF 176)—whose king was an ally of Urartu and Musku. The syllable -aš or -iš may be regarded as a suffix (so first Hal. REJ, 17 164). The transposition of b (or p) and r is no difficulty. The suggestion is plausible, if MT may safely be followed. T. K. C.

RITUAL

[The facts and theories about Hebrew ritual are dealt with in many articles, among the most important of which are the following: SACRIFICE, TEMPLE (§§ 34 ff.), NATURE WORSHIP, ALTAR, MASSEBAH, TABERNACLE, ARK, DISPERSION, SYNAGOGUE. On the ritual of the nations contemporary with Israel the reader may consult ARAM, ASSYRIA, BABYLON, EGYPT, MOAB, AMMON, CANAAN, PHŒNICIA, HITTITES, SCYTHIANS, ZOROASTRIANISM, etc.

Of those nations, however, so great an influence on the civilisation of the whole of hither Asia was exercised by one, the Babylonian, that the facts about its ritual acquire special importance. On the other hand the amount of first-hand information on the subject is unique and, besides, not generally accessible. It is proposed, accordingly, to give here some account of the nature, and ceremonial institutions, of the Babylonian sacrificial ritual. In doing this the points in which it resembles, or differs from, the ritual of the OT will be indicated, and a brief comparison of the two systems given.]

Assyrio-Babylonian Ritual.

A short account of Babylonian sacrifices has been already given in the Supplement to Die Cultus-tafel von Sippar (Joh. Jeremias, Leipsic, 25-32 [1889]). The question of how far this system is original and how far it is related to what we find elsewhere has received little or no attention. The treatment of such questions in the difficult sphere of religious institutions being always involved in uncertainty, it appears to be more than ever appropriate in regard to sacrifice, as an institution common to all peoples, to explain the same or similar ideas not as borrowed the one from the other, but as both drawn from the same source. In justification of the common designation Assyrio-Babylonian it is to be noted that, apart from a few modifications in their Pantheon, the religion of the Assyrians agrees throughout with that of the Babylonians. Of this agreement, which was maintained in spite of all political strifes, we have a historical attestation in the fact that Ašur-bāni-pal had the MSS of the Babylonian priestly schools collected, supplied with an Assyrian interlinear translation, and preserved in his state archives (see 4 R).[1]

1. Names for sacrifice.

Sacrifices were called kirbannu or kurbannu (more rarely kurbânu, kitrubu; in ordinary usage, 'backsheesh, alms.' A much commoner word is niku, 'to be bent, show reverence, offer homage' (cp for this meaning Del. Assyr. HWB), used of drink offerings (Deluge, 147; cp מְנַקִּית patera) and also of bloody sacrifices.

The root of niḳu is naḳû 'to be empty,' II. 1 'to pour out.' It was probably the pouring out of the blood that led to the transference of niḳû from its original application 'drink offering' to the meaning 'blood offering.' A rarer word than niḳû is zibû (Khors. 172), Heb. זֶבַח, zĕbaḥ. For 'drink offering' we find also the words muḫḫuru, maḫḫûru (in contracts), ramku. To minḥāh (מִנְחָה), 'food offering,' corresponds šurḳînu (Del. HWB surḳînu), a word formerly incorrectly rendered 'altar.' The regular stated offering (tāmīd, תָּמִיד) was called sattuḳḳu (sattakam, 'constant') or ginû, properly 'right.' Both words indicate the yearly, monthly, rarely (Nabun. 144_3) daily, contribution to the temple for the support of the sacrifice and the priests. A synonymous word is guḳḳu or guḳḳânu. The freewill offering, Heb. nĕdābāh (נְדָבָה), is called nindabû (nidbu).

For 'to sacrifice' the commonest word is naḳû.

For the sake of comparison the following may be mentioned from the many other expressions in use: epêšu, Heb. עָשָׂה לְ; ṣabâtu, Heb. לָקַח; ṭabâḫu, Heb. טָבַח; riksa rakasu, 'to prepare an offering.' Of special importance, moreover, are the expressions in purification texts: ḳarâbu (הִקְרִיב; often used of pouring water, occurring with בְּ [notwithstanding Del. HWB], in Rassam 2_{168}) and kapâru (K 3245, pass.) 'to wipe,' then 'to clear, purify,' a meaning that is important in its bearing on Heb. kipper (כִּפֶּר). Cp IVR 13_{51} 17_{33}; Zimmern, Beiträge 122_{26}. The offerer of the sacrifice is called kâribu or bêl nikê (cp Marseilles Sacrificial Table, בעל זבח).

2. Objects offered.

It should be specially noted that everything that the land produced was offered to the gods without distinction. Whilst in Israel it was only the produce of a people devoted to cattle-rearing and agriculture that was offered (cp Di. Lev.(2), 379)—and this was still further narrowed by the exclusion of fruit, honey, and all sweet or fermented preparations on the one hand, and of beasts of chase and fish on the other—in the fruitful lands between the two rivers every kind of produce was freely offered to the gods. Of vegetable products we find frequent mention of wine (karānu), must (kurunnu), date wine (šikaru, prepared from corn and dates or honey and dates, cp Neb. 1035, Nabun 6_{12}, 8_{71}; שֵׁכָר, cp Nu. 28_7), honey (dišpu, דְּבַשׁ), cream (ḫimêtu, חֶמְאָה), a mixture prepared from various ingredients and containing oil and fat (invariably written GAR Ni-De-A; probably mirsu is to be read; cp Nab. 9_{12}, Cyr. 327_6, Arab. marīs, 'date-stone'), the choice produce of the meadow (sîmat appari), garlic (? šummu, שׁוּם), first-fruits (rêšêti; רֵאשִׁית; Sanh. 16_1 Kuj. 1_9).[1] Food specially prepared for the gods was called akal taknu (4 R. 6_1, $62a$), with which should be compared the analogous expression לֶחֶם הַמַּעֲרֶכֶת. Upon the table of the gods were laid 12, or 3 × 12, loaves of AŠ-AN, that is to say wheaten flour, as shewbread (cp Zimmern, Beiträge 98_{33} 104_{138}; IVR $55_{20}b$ $56_{23}a$; Craig, Relig. Texts 166; King, Magic and Sorcery 408); also akal mutḳi, that is to say, unleavened bread, is several times mentioned (cp Lev. 24_5). Special abundance and splendour characterised the vegetable offerings of the Neo-Babylonian and Neo-Assyrian kings (cp Pognon, Inscriptions de Wâdi Brissa; Neb. Grot. 1_{16} ff.; Neb. Grot. 2_{26} ff.; Neb. Grot. 3_7 ff.; Schr. KB 2_{78}). They were in the form of the daily sattukku, the state sacrifice, a sort of representation of the whole agriculture of the land. Nebuchadrezzar lays on the table of Marduk and Sarpanit the choicest produce of the meadow, fruit, herbs, honey, cream, milk, oil, must, date-wine, wine from different vineyards. Still more abundant is the offering of Sargon (KB 2_{78}), a king who offers finally not to the gods but to himself. His splendid offering is a brilliant display of his royal wealth, at which even the gods must be amazed.

The commonest bloody sacrifice mentioned is that of the lamb (written Lu niḳû or niḳu).

The expression Lu Nita, often occurring in contracts, is to be read kalûmu or šû (שֶׂה) and to be rendered 'lamb, kid.' For 'goat' we find the words buḫadu, šapparu (in contracts), urîzu az(ṣ) lu 'an old mature lamb.' Of other quadrupeds we hear of sacrificial oxen (gumaḫḫu or alap maḫḫu), bullocks (parru, פַּר), gazelles (ṣabîtu), wild kine (littu, לְאָה). The following birds were used for sacrifice; doves, geese (us-tur), cocks (kurkû, 4 R $26_{47}b$; Talm. כּוּרְגְיָא), peacocks (paspasu), pheasants (? pasnu; Nabun. 672_1; Talm. פַּסְיוֹן). Fish (nûnê) are always mentioned along with 'birds of heaven' (iṣṣûr šamê).

For a bird sacrifice see Botta, Nineveh, pl. 110; for fish offerings see Menant 2_{53}.

3a. Age and other details.

No special prescriptions as to age are known. Lu niḳū probably always indicates, like γαλαθηνά (Herod. 1_{183}), the young sucking lamb. We know from the contracts that victims a year old were preferred, as in P in Leviticus (apal or marat šatti, like בֶּן שָׁנָה or בַּת שׁ׳; cf Nabon. 196_1 265_1 272_2 699_{15} 768_1). Mention is also made of victims of two, three (Neb. 399_1), and four years of age (Cyr. 117_4).

With regard to the condition of the animals the requirements were stricter: faultless growth (tašriḫtu), large size (rabû), fatness (duššû, marû), physical purity (ebbu, ellu; 'pure, shining'), and spotlessness (šuklulu; Herod. τὰ τέλεα τῶν προβάτων). Cp Zimmern, Beiträge 100_{72}. In divination, however, the use of unsound victims was permitted; in the prayers to the sun-god (ed. Knudtzon, 73) we often read: izib ša kalumu ilûtika ša ana birî barû maṭû ḫaṭû: 'Grant that the lamb of thy divinity, which is used for inspection, may be imperfect and unsound.' It is well known that in the Israelitish cultus, thank-offerings need not be faultless (Lev. 22_{23}).

The victim was as a rule a male, yet females also were used (Sanh. Bav. 33 Cyr. 117_4 Cyr. 247_1). It was probably always female victims that were used in purification ceremonies: šarat buḫatti lâ pitêtê, 'the skin of a she-lamb still intact' (4 R 25 35*c*; cp 4 R 28 no. 3 11 5 R 51 51; Nimr. Ep. 44, 60). Compare with this the prescription of a she-goat one year old for the sin offering of the individual (Nu. 15 27).

The victim was probably seldom placed entire (kālīl, כליל) on the altar. To begin with, the remarkably small size of the altars that have been found shows that only certain parts of the victims were offered. The altar of Sargon's palace is 32 inches high; that from Nimrûd, actually only 22 inches.[1] That the flesh was boiled, as in Israel in early times, is shown by 5 R 61, 15, where the priest receives, along with other shares, a large pot of meat-broth (diḳâr mê šêri).

With regard to the details of sacrificial ritual and practice our sources tell us little; the sculptures represent as a rule only the preparatory steps (cp Menant 2 54; Layard, Monum. of Nineveh 2 24). The usual form of offering was burning by fire (ana maḳlûti aḳlu). We know nothing of special ceremonies performed with the blood in the Babylonian ritual, such as were usual in Israel and ancient Arabia (Wellh. Ar. Heid. 113). In a text published by Zimmern (Beiträge, 126), which describes the purification of the king's palace, the lintels of the palace are smeared with the blood of a lamb (ina dâmi urizi šuatum); compare for this interesting passage Ex. 12 7. It may be remarked in passing that we learn from 4 R 32 30 that there were three ways of preparing the victim: šêr ša penti bašlu ša tumri, 'baked, boiled, smoked flesh.' The offering consisting of vegetable food was probably consumed by the sacrificers. A drastic exposure of this pia fraus is given us in the apocryphal Bel and the Dragon.

3b. Parts of victim used.

The following parts are expressly mentioned in 2 R 44, 14-18*gh* 1-5*ef*: head (ḳaḳḳadu), neck (kišadu), flank (pâtu), breast (irtu), rib (ṣilû), loin (sûnu), tail (zibbatu), spine (eṣên ṣêru), heart (libbu), belly (karšu), intestines (ḫašê), kidney (kalitu), knuckles (ḳursinnâtê). In the contracts (cp especially the important texts, Strassm. Neb. 247 and 416; also Peiser, Babylonische Verträge, 107) many parts are mentioned that are still etymologically obscure (with two of them, šêr gabbu and šêr ganni ṣili, cp Talm. גּוּבְּנָא tail; and גַּנְיָא flank). Sacrificial flesh was probably not taboo as amongst the Israelites and the Phœnicians (Movers, Phön. 2 118); according to a late statement of the Epistle of Jeremiah (v. 28 [Baruch 6 28]) the Babylonian priests sold the sacrificial flesh, and their wives also cured it.

4. Time and place.

No definite prescriptions as to the times of sacrifice have reached us. The Zakmuku or New Year's feast, the Akîtu feast held in honour of Marduk (Neb. Bors. 4 8), were signalised by processions and sacrifices. Daily sacrifices are often mentioned (Neb. Grot. 1 16 2 26); an animal sacrifice, in Tigl.-pil. 7 10 (cp 1 S. 20 6). In the ritual tablet for the month Ulûlu (cp Lotz, Historia Sabbati, 1 50 ff.), published in 4 R 32 33, it is prescribed that the daily sacrifice, consisting of a 'ōlāh and a minḥāh, should be offered once at each rising of the moon and appearance of the dawn, fourteen times by night and fourteen times by day (cp Ex. 29 38 Nu. 28 3). A morning offering is mentioned in the text published by Zimmern, Beiträge 100 69. Sacrifice as a free expression of prayer and dependence (thank-offerings, tōdāh, can hardly have been known to the Babylonians), as the highest product of the religious life, is not severely confined to definite times. On the contrary, every important event of life is celebrated by a spontaneous offering of sacrifices just as in ancient Israel. If the king of the Assyrians returns victorious from a military expedition, if in repairing a temple he finds an ancient foundation stone, if he dedicates his palace, if he consecrates his weapons for the fight (kakkêia ullil), if in hunting he secures his prey, if he formally commemorates his ancestors—in each and all of these cases he offers sacrifice to the gods. It is a relief amid the annals of cruelty and pride of Assyrian rulers when we read in their boastful accounts: ana ilâni lu niḳê aḳḳi, 'I presented to the gods an offering.' For innumerable instances of this kind we may refer generally to KB.

The ordinary place of sacrifice was the temple. Mountain and spring also were, in accordance with the universal Semitic ideas (cp Baudissin, Studien, 2 143), regarded as sacred spots, specially suited for sacrifices. After the flood Xisuthros offered his sacrifice 'on the top of the mountain' (ina ziḳḳurat šadi); and so Ašur-bani-pal (3 89) on the mountain Ḫalman, and Shalmanassar (Co. 103) at the source of the Euphrates.

5. Antiquity of sacrifice.

The origin of sacrifice lies, according to Babylonian ideas, beyond the limits of human history; it existed from the time when the world was made (ultu ûm ṣât mâti). Gods and genii are often represented as sacrificing (cp Menant, PG 2 37 51 53). Sin is called the founder of free-will offerings (mukîn nindabê; 4 R 9 33); Adar, the god of offerings and drink offerings (ilu miḫri û ramkuti; 2 R 7 35 2 R 67 67). As the formation of the earth was immediately followed by the institution of places of worship, so the newly created man was charged with religious duties towards the deity (Del. Das bab. Weltschöpfungsepos, 111). Palâḫu damâḳû ullad niḳû balâtu ûtâr û taṣlîtu arni . . . 'the fear of God brings grace, sacrifice enlarges life and prayer (frees from) sin.' After the deluge (147 ff.) Xisuthros sacrifices to the gods; 'then did I turn to the four winds, poured out a drink offering, offered a cereal offering on the top of the mountain; seven incense pans I set forth, and spread under them calamus, cedar wood, and rig gir (onycha?).' In the old Babylonian Nimrod-epos (44 60) we read in the account of the Amores Veneris: taramîma amêl rê'a ša kanamma išpukakki umišamma uṭabbaḫakki unikêti; 'thou hast loved the shepherd who continually brought drink offerings to thee, daily sacrificed kids to thee.'

The inscriptions of the old Babylonian king Gudea already contain notices about sacrifices. On the New Year festival (see Schr. KB 3 26 61) he offers to the goddess Ba'u amongst other things a cow, a sheep, six lambs, seven baskets of dates, a pot of cream, palm pith (?), fifteen chickens, fishes, cucumbers, as sattukku or regular sacrifice. A rich source of information upon the sacrificial arrangements in the later Babylonian period is to be found in the thousands of Babylonian contracts in which bills and receipts connected with temple revenues and dues, as well as lists relating to the regular sacrifices, bulk very largely.[1]

6. Performance.

Sacrifice was in the hands of the priestly caste, who were held in the highest esteem and enjoyed special privileges.[2] So great indeed was the esteem in which they were held in Babylonia in earlier times that even the king needed their mediation for sacrifice and prayer (cp Menant, PG 1 128 f.). In Assyria, however, the king reserves for himself the supreme priesthood, calling himself the exalted high-priest and sacrificing to the god with his own hand (Per.-Chip. Assyria, 41 [Assyrie, 455]; Menant, PG 2 164). Just as Ezekiel in his ordering of the priesthood assigns to the king in the public worship an independent and important position, so we repeatedly read in the liturgical tablets preserved in 4 R 32 33; rê'u nišê rabâti nindabâšu ukân; 'the shepherd of the great peoples shall bring his offering.' In the contracts there is frequent mention of the king's offering and of that of the crown prince (ša apal šarri); Nabon. 265 8 332 2

[2] Diodorus Siculus (2 29) has given us a vivid and adequate account of their functions.

594 20. As in Israel, the priests had assigned to them definite portions of the offerings. According to the ritual of the Sun-temple at Sippar the priests received the loins, the skin, the ribs, the sinews, the belly, the chitterling, the knuckles of all cattle and lambs that were offered, as well as a pot of sacrificial broth (5 R 61 col. 5). In the contracts minute details are met with as to priestly dues (Neb. 247, 416; Peiser, Bab. Vertr. 107). It is interesting to observe that in Babylonia as in Israel (see Lev. 21 16 ff.) rules were laid down respecting the freedom from bodily blemish that was required in priests. In a priestly catechism of Sippar (K. 2486+4364, published by Craig, Religious Texts, Leipsic, 1895) we read as follows:—

Ummânu mudû nâṣir pirišti ilâni rabûtê apilšu ša irammu ina tuppi û ḳân tuppi ina maḫar ilu Samaš û ilu Ramman utammašûma ušaḫḫasu ênuma apil amêl barû; and farther on: amêl iššakku ša zarušu ellu û šû ina kitti û minûtišu šuklulu ana maḫar ilu Šamaš û ilu Ramman ašar birû û purûšê ṭeḫi abil amêl barê ša zarušu lâ ellu û šû ina kitti û minûti šu lâ šuklulu zaktu ênâ ḫipû sinnê nagpi ubânu ina šêpi . . . malê issubba ḫiṣgallu šupâkilu pilpilanu . . . lâ naṣir parṣê ša ilu Šamas û ilu Ramman.

'A wise man who guards the secrets of the great gods shall cause his son whom he loves, with tablet and pen to take oath before Šamaš and Rammān, and the son of a magician shall teach him when to do so. A priest who is noble in descent, and whose clothing (?) and measurement (?) are perfect, shall present himself before Šamaš and Rammān in the place of augury and oracle. The son of a priest whose descent is not noble and who is not perfect in clothing (?) and in measure, who has squint (?) eyes, broken teeth, bruised thumbs, boils or swellings on his feet . . . shall not keep the temple of Šamaš and Rammān.'

Sacrifice rests ultimately on the idea that it gives pleasure to the deity (cp Di. Lev. 376). For Israel, the conception of sacrifice as a meal for Yahwè is reflected in such expressions as Gen. 8 21 Dt. 33 10 (לֶחֶם י׳). In the Babylonian records, the gods feast in heaven (4 R 19 59: ilâni rabûti iṣṣinu kuṭrinnu akal šamê ellu kurunnu damga ša lâ ilpat ḳâti ikkalu; 'the glorious gods smell the incense, noble food of heaven; pure wine, which no hand has touched, do they enjoy'); they eat the offering (4 R 17 56: akalšu akul nigâšu muḫur; 'eat his food, accept his sacrifice'); they inhale with physical delight the savour of the offering (Deluge, 151: ilâni eṣinu erêša ilâni eṣinu erêša ṭâba kîma zumbê eli bêl niḳê iptaḫrû; 'the gods scent the savour, the gods scent the sweet savour; like flies do they gather themselves together about the offerer'; cp the analogous expression רֵיחַ נִיחֹחַ, Gen. 8 21); the gods love the offering that man brings (Asurn. I 25: nadan zêbišu ilâni rabûtê ša šamê û irṣitim iramu; 'the glorious gods of heaven and earth love the gift of his sacrifice'). What is active in the offering is the voluntary surrender of a private possession (Tigl. 7 7: ana biblat libbiia aḳḳi; 'I sacrificed as my heart enjoined'). As a subject into the presence of his king, so does man come into the presence of his god with gift and tribute. In a text, printed in 4 R 20, which describes the solemn return of the god Marduk from Elam to Babylon and the sacrificial feast then celebrated in his honour, the imperial sacrifice is described in the following terms (rev. 22 f.): šamû ḫêgallâšunu irṣitum ḫiṣibša tâmtum miḫirtašu šadû iribšu kitrubaššu šut lâ maḫrâ mala šunnâ lišânu kabitti bilatsunu nâšu ana bilbilum. Azlu ṭubbuḫu duššu alap maḫḫê zibu šurruḫu ṣêni ḳuṭrinnu armannu uštesṣi erêšê ṭâbu; 'the heaven pours out its abundance, the earth its fulness, the sea its gifts, the mountains their produce; their incomparable offerings, everything that can be named, their heavy tribute do they bring to the lord of all; lambs are slaughtered, great oxen sacrificed in herds, the sacrifice is made rich, incense is prepared, a sweet smelling savour mounts up, delicious odour.' Probably the step from the conception of the offering as a gift and a meal of the deity to that of a finer and, so to speak, spiritual, apperception of that which was brought in sacrifice was made at a comparatively early period. So much is indicated by the fact that even from ancient times prayer was associated with sacrifice. In the pictorial representations of sacrificial scenes we constantly find him who prays in close association with him who offers. The gesture of prayer was threefold: niš ḳâti, lapâtu ḳâti, labânu appi—lifting up of the hands, folding of the hands, casting down of the countenance.

7. Fundamental idea.

The purpose of sacrifice is, invariably, to influence the deity in favour of the sacrificer. Man brings gifts to the gods in order that they may be moved thereby to reciprocity—to showing a favourable disposition in return.[1] When the kings Esarhaddon and Ašur-bani-pal were seriously menaced by the inroads of the Gimirri they multiplied their offerings and prayer (see Knudtzon, l.c.). In the liturgies of that period a standing expression is as follows:—ina libbi kalumi anni izzizamma anna kêna šuknamma; 'because of this lamb offered in sacrifice arise thou and establish faithfulness and mercy.'

8. Purpose.

So, in like manner, the gods are represented as rejoicing over the sacrificial gifts brought them by their human worshippers (K. 1547, rev. 11: igdamrâ maššakkêia azlêia ina ṭub libbi ilâni igdamru; 'accomplished are my cleansing sacrifices, to the gladdening of the hearts of the gods are my sacrifices of lambs accomplished'). The feature of joy and gladness which so markedly characterised the sacrificial meals of pre-exilic Israel (שָׂמַח לִפְנֵי י׳, Dt. 12 7; SACRIFICE, § 18) is by no means absent from the Babylonian functions. Thus in 3 R 66 62 we read (akul akâlu šiti kurunnu ningutu šukun nu'id ilûti) 'eat food, drink must, make music, honour my god'. Predominant, however, over this joyous note which finds such marked expression among the peoples of classical antiquity there is found in the Babylonian ritual a feature which is common to all Semitic religions—the element of propitiation. Here, of course, we must divest ourselves of all theological preconceptions, and put aside all such notions as that of an atoning efficacy attaching to the blood as the seat of life, or of a divine wrath that expends itself upon the sacrificial animal, or even of a ratio vicaria, when we speak of the idea of propitiation as underlying Babylonian sacrifices. The similarity of the words and forms does not necessarily involve similarity in the religious conception. The Babylonians possessed the same words for sin (ḫiṭṭu), grace (annu), propitiation (pidu) as the Hebrews had; but it is certain that they did not associate with the words the same thoughts. At the same time it is significant and by no means accidental—it has its roots firmly planted in the very nature of the religious ideas involved—that every offering offered with the object of averting evil of any kind whatsoever was associated with the notion of a propitiatory, cleansing, purifying efficacy. In a hymn to Šamaš we read (4 R 17 46: amêlu apil ilišu ênun arnam emid mešritušu marṣiš ibšâ marṣiš ina murṣi ni'il ilu Šamaš ana niš kâtiia ḳûlamma akalšu akul nigâšu muḫurma ilam. Ilḳat ana idišu šukun ina kibitika ênissu lippaṭir aranšu linnasiḫ), 'man, the son of his god—sin, transgression lies upon him. His physical strength is impaired, he languishes in disease. O Šamaš, behold the uplifting of my hands, eat his food, accept his sacrifice, O God. Take off his fetters. At thy command may his sins be taken away, his transgressions blotted out.' Other passages subjoined explain themselves. 4 R 54 47: muḫur kadrašu liḳi pidêšu ina ḳakḳar šulmê maḫraka littallak; 'accept the gift he brings, receive his ransom money (פִּדְיוֹן); let him walk before them on the ground of peace.' 4 R. 55, obv. 2$_{11}$; niš ḳâtišu ilišu ana maḫâri u nindabêšu ana râmi ilânišu zênût ittišu ana šulmi; 'whereby his god accepts the lifting up of his hands and takes pleasure in his free-will offerings, whereby the angry gods turn themselves propitiously towards him.' 4 R. 57$_{7}$ (akâlê u napšaltum ša ina pânika kunnu lipsusu limnûa): 'the food and the fatness which is spread out before thy face, may it take away mine evil.'[1] The following remarkable passage, from a hymn to Marduk, stands unfortunately alone (K. 246; cp 2 R. 18$_{53}$: amêlu muttaliku ina nîḳ rêmê šulmê kima kê maššî limmaššiš), 'May the man plagued with fever be purified like shining metal through a gracious peace offering.' In contracts the expression alap tapṭîri, 'redemption ox' (Neb. 132$_{12}$ 213$_{3}$) often occurs; cp with this Lev. 4$_{3}$ (פַּר לְחַטָּאת). The idea of atonement in the OT has found its classical expression in the kappōreth of P (see MERCY-SEAT, § 2).

In this connection it is important to observe that the root כפר is attested in Babylonia also, kapâru in the rituals meaning 'to cleanse,' 'to purify.' 4 R. 16$_{40}$: amêlu muttaliku mâr ilišu kuppirma; 'Cleanse (with the water of the oath) the man plagued with fever, the son of his god.' 4 R. 27$_{54}$: akâla li'i ša amêli šuatu kuppirma; 'cleanse the unclean foods' (of the same). In K. 3245 the precept frequently recurs šarru tukappar—'do thou, O king, purify,' as also the phrase takpirtu of the ceremony of purification (kîma takpirâti tuḳtêttû—'when thou hast accomplished the rites of purification'). Whilst the phrase already alluded to—nîḳ šulmê (corresponding to the Heb. šélem, which, as we see from 1 S. 13$_{9}$ 2 S. 24$_{25}$ Ezek. 45$_{17}$, denotes a purificatory offering: cp SACRIFICE, § 11)—is of only occasional occurrence, we frequently in contracts meet with the word šalâmu, šalammu, which in accordance with the primary meaning of the root šalâmu may be rendered 'turning towards' (on the part of the deity), and taken in the sense of a propitiatory sacrifice. Cp Nabun. 214$_{9}$ 362$_{3}$ 641$_{4}$ 767$_{2}$, Cyr. 229$_{3}$ with the sattukku named in Nabun. 799$_{15\,17}$.

A few words must be said on the subjects of human sacrifice, offerings to the dead, and sacrifices of chastity.[2]

9. Human sacrifice, etc. It is a remarkable circumstance that hitherto no authentic evidence for the burning of human sacrifices has been met with in any of the cuneiform inscriptions. It would be unwise, however, to base much upon the argumentum e silentio here, for reticence with reference to such a sad and repulsive practice is only what we should expect. The passage, so often quoted in 4 R. 26$_{6}$, where the priest is bidden to offer for the life of the sick man a kid (urîšu)—head, neck, breast of the one for head, neck, breast of the other—does not come into account here. The text is a description of a magical operation such as may be compared with that given in 2 K. 4$_{34}$. The Babylonian sculptures, on the other hand, supply traces of human sacrifices that are almost unmistakable (see Menant, PG 1$_{94}$ f. 97), though it is not impossible that the representations in question are intended to figure, not human sacrifices, but ceremonies connected with circumcision. In the wider sense of the term the Babylonian ban (see BAN) has to be regarded as of the nature of human sacrifice. That the same conception is not altogether absent from the Heb. ḥêrem (against Di. Lev. 377) is proved by Is. 34$_{6}$, where the destruction of Israel's enemies at Bozrah is treated as a זֶבַח לַי׳. Sennacherib (5$_{50}$) put to death the troops of Šuzub at the command of Ašur his lord. Shalmaneser (Mo. Obv. 17) burnt the young men and maidens in his band of captives. The ban pronounced by Ašur-bâni-pal (6$_{101}$) over his enemies extends also to the lower animals (cp Judg. 20$_{48}$). A sacrificial offering of prisoners (cp 1 S. 15$_{33}$) is thus recorded by Ašur-bâni-pal (4$_{70}$): 'the remainder of the people I put to death beside the great steer, where my grandfather Sennacherib had been murdered, making lamentation for him.' In 4 R. 63$_{40}$ Ištar figures as the bloodthirsty goddess who devours human flesh: ištanatti dâmi nišbuti ša amêlûti šêr ša lâ akâli nêrpaddu ša lâ karâṣi: 'she (the daughter of Anu) has drunk the satisfying blood of men, flesh that cannot be eaten, bones that cannot be gnawed.' The probability is that the Babylonians practised human sacrifice secretly without formally taking it up into the recognised worship. In the older period (of which we have a reminiscence in Gen. 22), as well as in times of religious declension (2 K. 17$_{31}$), the Israelites doubtless borrowed the practice of human sacrifice from the peoples in their immediate neighbourhood.

As for offerings to the dead, which indeed are forbidden in the OT as relics of heathenism (Dt. 26$_{14}$), but the practice of which was not unknown even at a late date (Jer. 16$_{7}$), evidence of their use among the Babylonians and Assyrians is of frequent occurrence (see A. Jeremias, Vorstellungen vom Leben nach dem Tode, 53). The Descent of Ištar closes with the charge of the priest to the necromancer: 'if she vouchsafe not liberation to thee, then turn thy face towards her and pour out pure water with precious balsam before Tammuz the husband of her youth.' Ašur-bâni-pal (Lehmann, Šamaššumukîn, 2$_{23}$) says: adi kispi nâḳ mê ana êkimmê šarrâni alikût maḫri ša šubṭulu arkus: 'for the lament of the pourer out of water on behalf of the spirits of my ancestors, the kings, I gave orders because it had been abolished.' In the burying-places of Sirghula and Elḫibba were discovered traces of offerings to the dead: calcined date stones, bones of oxen, sheep, birds. Representations of sacrifices to the dead are given in Perrot, l.c. 361, and Menant, PG 2$_{54}$. The dirge as a Babylonian institution is attested also by Ezek. 8$_{14}$. The sacrifice of chastity, mentioned by Herodotus (1$_{199}$), is bluntly described in the Epistle of Jeremiah (v. 43 [= Baruch 6$_{43}$]). Even in the Nimrod-epos, Ištar the goddess of love already appears (49$_{1}$) surrounded by a whole troop of attendants: uptaḫḫir iltu Ištar kizirêti šamḫâti u ḫârimâti: 'there assembled the goddess Ištar, the servants, harlots, and concubines.' In the period of religious decay the worship by such hieroduli became naturalised in Jerusalem (2 K. 23$_{7}$).

The subject of lustrations stands in close connection with that of sacrifice in the Hebrew Torah, and has a large place in the Babylonian ritual.

10. Lustrations. The texts relating to it are very difficult, especially because they are often written in pure ideograms. At the foundation of these purifications lies the conception that an unclean substance can be removed by a clean, and a clean be taken up by an unclean. That which is unclean has a contagious character, that which is clean has a sympathetic power. So 4 R. 16$_{2}$: mê šunûti ana karpati têrma ana ribîti tubukma maruštu ša êmûḳi innaššaru ribîtu litbal ru'tum nadîtum ši kîma mê littabik kišpi ša ina ru'ti nadîti bullulu ana arkati litûru: 'this water pour thou into a pot, then pour out in the street; let the street carry off the sickness which deprives of strength, and let the poison poured into it be washed away like the water, let the spell which has united itself with the poison poured in be averted.' The spell (from which the sickness proceeds) is transferred to the poison, the poison is absorbed by the water, the water is carried off by the street; thus the sufferer has a threefold guarantee that he will be healed of his sickness.

As ingredients were employed such things as from their external appearance or internal qualities were fitted to be symbols of purity. Water is mentioned with special frequency. In lustrations libations of water are offered to Šamaš. Marduk and Ea the gods of pure exorcism are honoured with libations and sacrifices in the house of sprinkling (bît rimki; 5 R. 50$_{51}$). In the temple was a laver (agubbu). In an oath formula (Maqlu. 34, 47) occurs this expression: ana ilâni ša šamê mê anamdin kîma anâku ana kâšunu ulallukunûši attunu iâši ullilainni: 'I offer water to the gods of heaven. As I perform your purification for you, so do ye cleanse me.' The waters of the Euphrates and the Tigris were regarded as having special efficacy (Nimr. Ep. 49$_{19}$; Zimmern, Šurpu, 44$_{66}$, ib. $_{77}$); we have this interesting passage: 'By Marduk's command be the bowl with thy guilt, thy ban, taken away like the unclean water from thy body and thy hands and swallowed up by the earth.'

Besides water, frequent mention is made of honey (dišpu), wine (karânu), milk (širbu), cream (ḫimêtu); further, bright minerals such as salt (ṭâbtu), alum (šikkatu), alkali (? uḫulu); and, from the vegetable kingdom, corn (upuntu), the wood of various trees, such as cedar (erinu), cypress (burâšu), palm (giš-šimarru), calamus (ḳânu ṭâbu; cp קָנֶה הַטּוֹב), rig-gir (onycha?) all sorts of incense (ḳuṭrinnu, קְטֹרֶת).

As a clean place—ašru ellu, exactly corresponding to the מָקוֹם טָהוֹר of Nu. 19$_{9}$—the wilderness is frequently named.[1] 4 R. 8$_{43}$: mamit ana ṣêri ašri elli lišeṣi, 'let the ban depart to the wilderness, the clean place' (cp 4 R. 14$_{2}$), 4 R. 56$_{51}$: ana pân namaššê ša ṣêri pâniki šukni, 'to the beasts of the wilderness turn thy face.' It is on a similar conception of the wilderness as the clean place that the Israelite custom of sending the goat for Azazel into the wilderness on the day of Atonement appears to rest (but see AZAZEL). Of the other goat also which had to be burnt, Josephus remarks (Ant. iii. 10$_{3}$) that before the burning it had to be brought to a very clean place—(εἰς καθαρώτατον χωρίον).

Purity—physical cleanliness—is postulated in every sacrificial act, as in every exercise of religion (4 R. 23$_{16}$: ḳâtâ ellêti iḳḳâ maḫḫarka: 'with pure hands he sacrifices before thee.' 4 R. 19 no. 2: ḳâtîka misi kâtika ubbib, 'wash thy hand, purify thy hand.' Maqlu 108$_{69}$: itturu šêru misâ kâtâ šêrumma šêru misâ kâtâ, 'the morning dawn is past, I have washed my hands; the morning glow has shone, I have washed my hands'). All who were sick or who associated with those who were unclean became themselves unclean. (4 R. 62$_{64}$: lâ ella lâ ellita ul itamar, 'the unclean man, the unclean woman, shall he not look upon').

That contact with the dead defiled may be assumed as matter of course; of sexual defilement this is expressly stated by Herodotus (1 198); cp 4 R. 26 no. 5: zinništu ša ḳâtâša lâ damḳa uštamḫir ardatu ša ḳâtâša lâ misâ ittaplas: 'to a woman whose hand is not pure, he has joined himself; at a maid-servant whose hand is not washed, he has looked.'

Foods also were distinguished as clean and unclean. In the prayer addressed to the sun-god we often meet with such expressions as these: mimma lu'u ikulu ištu ipšušu ulappitu ukabbisu, 'if he perchance has eaten, drunken, anointed with, touched, or trodden on, aught that was unclean.' In the calendar given in 5 R. 48$_{49}$ occur food prohibitions. For the 9th of Iyyar fish is forbidden, for the 30th of Ab swine flesh (šêr šaḫê), for the 27th of Tišri swine flesh, beef (šêr alpi), for the 10th of Marḫesvan dates, for the 25th of Iyyar, 29th of Kisleu, and 6th of Ṭebet contact with women.

The Babylonian ritual of purification urgently needs systematic exhibition, especially on account of its close connection with OT views. Nowack (HA 275) remarks with truth that the biblical ideas of clean and unclean had their rise elsewhere than on the soil of Yahwism (cp Smend, Rel.-gesch. 334). In such a law of purification as that which we find in Lev. 14 unquestionably many pre-Israelitic representations are present. The cedar-wood mentioned in Lev. 14$_{4}$ is one of the cleansing media of the Babylonian ritual also (4 R. 16$_{32}$ 5 R. 51$_{15}$); the bird which in Lev. 14$_{7}$ is charged with carrying off the leprosy into space is often met with in Babylonian litanies (4 R. 4$_{26}$ 4 R. 59$_{2}$, rev. 14: 'I will rend asunder my wickedness, let the bird carry it away up to the sky'). The sevenfold sprinkling of the person to be cleansed (Lev. 14$_{7}$) recalls such passages as 4 R. 26$_{32}$: adî sibišu zumur amêli šuatu pušušma, 'seven times anoint the body of that man.' The besmearing with blood on the tip of the right ear, on the right thumb, on the great toe of the right foot, prescribed in Lev. 14$_{14}$ has its analogies in many magical texts (cp ASKT 91$_{52}$: abna ella ina ḳuḳâni ša ênišu ina ubânišu ṣiḫirti ina šumêlišu šukun, 'lay the shining stone on the lashes[?] of his eyes, on his little finger, on his left side'). An interesting parallel to the offering of purification prescribed for the poor, which follows the magical operation prescribed in Lev. 14$_{21}$, occurs in K. 8380. There the person to be purified is bidden take hold of the hands of the sacrificer who pours water upon the hand of the sufferer, lays incense upon the dish, and solemnly prepares the sacrificial meal. Then, further, we read: šumma rubû šû tu kil iṣṣûru ana maḳlûte iḳalu šumma muškînu šu libbi šu'i iḳalu, 'if he is a rich man he shall hand over a dove (?) to be burned, but if he is a pauper he shall cause the heart of a sheep to be burned.'

11. Summary.

i. Points of resemblance.—(a) A large number of expressions relating to sacrifice are common to both rituals—e.g., ḳurbannu (קָרְבָּן), zîbu (זֶבַח), šulmu (שֶׁלֶם), ḳarâbu (הִקְרִיב), ṭabâḫu (טָבַח), kapâru (כִּפֶּר). (b) In bloody sacrifices, the same species of animals are employed (ox, sheep, goat). Animals of a year old are preferred, sacrifices of a more advanced age are rare. Female animals are in the one case used for purifications, in the other (Nu. 15$_{27}$) for sin offerings. The offering of defective animals was in the one case allowed for purposes of augury, in the other for free-will offerings (Lev. 22$_{23}$). Generally speaking, both rituals required that the victim should be without blemish. As in the Babylonian ritual the sattukku—i.e., the regular and obligatory sacrifices—lies at the foundation of the worship, so also in P, and still more in Ezekiel, is the tāmīd, the regular daily offering, made statutory and the centre of the whole divine service. (c) As for unbloody sacrifices, among the Babylonians systematic use was made of various materials of which the employment in Israel was only exceptional, such as wine, water, oil. The incense offering (ḳutrinnu) was unknown to early Israel. All the more striking is the frequent and important place it takes in the ritual law of P which provides a special altar for the ḳĕṭōreth. Jeremiah (6$_{20}$) has a polemic against it as a modern and outlandish innovation. The unknown author of Is. 65$_{3}$ names Babylon as the land in which sacrifices are offered in gardens, and incense offered upon bricks (cp Chors. 172; Sarg. Ann. 434; 4 R. 49$_{53}$). The incense offering of post-exilic Israel may perhaps have been borrowed from the Babylonian ritual.

ii. Points of difference.—(a) In the vegetable offerings of the Hebrew Tōrāh only those products figure which represent a right of private ownership acquired by labour and trouble. Honey, cream, milk, fruit occur frequently as Babylonian offerings, but never amongst those of the OT. The wine libation is no longer an independent offering in P (SACRIFICE, § 35), Ezekiel prohibited it altogether—doubtless, however, only on account of abuses connected with it (1 S. 1$_{14}$). (b) As regards bloody sacrifices, offerings of fish and game were excluded from the Hebrew ritual. Both are inherently the property of Yahwè and thus not appropriate as sacrificial gifts. The fish offering, on the other hand, is frequently mentioned in Assyrian and late Babylonian inscriptions, and game offerings were in great favour. In Tigl.-pil. 7$_{4}$ ff. we read: 'herds of hinds, stags, chamois (?), wild goats, which I had taken in hunting in large numbers, I brought together like sheep, and the progeny that was born of them I offered as my heart bade me, along with pure sacrificial lambs, to the god Ašur.'

(c) As for the fundamental idea underlying sacrifice, the Hebrew sacrifice in its older form gave a special development to the conception of a sacral communion between God and the worshipper as represented in the act of offering (cp Wellh. Heid. 114); the Babylonian cultus, on the other hand, affords no trace of this. All the more strongly is the idea of the purificatory and propitiatory character of sacrifice which comes into the foreground in P and Ezekiel conspicuous in the Babylonian cultus. Singular to say, however, that shows not the faintest trace of āšām (SACRIFICE, § 27), ḥaṭṭāth (SACRIFICE, § 28); we may assume that the sin and the trespass offering of the Hebrew Tōrāh, although all that we know of their technique is wholly of post-exilic date, were entirely of Israelite growth. RIVAL (צָרָה), 1 S. 1 6 RV, AV ADVERSARY.

RIVER. For the rivers and streams mentioned in the EV, see, generally, GEOGRAPHY, § 5; PALESTINE, §§ 9, 13; EGYPT, § 6; ASSYRIA, § 4; MOAB, § 4 f.; also EUPHRATES, JORDAN, NILE, etc.

The regular word for river is 1. nāhār (נהר, N. Sem., Ar. nahr is probably a loan-word). See GEOGRAPHY, § 5, and cp ARAM-NAHARAIM. Other words occasionally so rendered are:—

2. yĕ'ōr (יאר; cp CANAL, GEOGRAPHY, § 5 [ii.]) used regularly of the NILE [q.v.] or of its arms, once of a mining-shaft (Job 28 10), and in Dan. 12 5-7 of the Tigris. The last mentioned unrestricted use of the word appears again in later Hebrew.

3. náḥal (נחל, N. Sem.) corresponds to the Ar. wādy or torrent-valley; see GEOGRAPHY, § 5 [iv.], and cp BROOK.

Two terms appear to designate primarily canals or conduits:—

4. yūbal (יוּבַל, √flow, run), Jer. 17 8† (ἰκμάς [BℵAQ]) of which 'ūbal (א[ו]בל in Dan. 8 2 f. 6† (see ULAI) seems to be a mere phonetic variation. Cp the form *yabal in plu. Is. 30 25 (EV 'streams'), 44 4 (EV 'watercourses').

5. péleg (פלג), Ps. 46 4 [5] 65 9 [10]. Cp pĕlaggōth, Job 20 17 EV 'river,' in Judg. 5 15 f., RV 'watercourses' (so Moore; cp, however, Bu., Now.).

For the sake of completeness mention may here be made of:—

6. 'āphīḳ (אפיק), see BROOK.

7. 'éšed (אשד), Nu. 21 15, AV 'stream'; on the meaning see ASHDOTH-PISGAH.

8. nōzĕlīm (נזילם, lit. 'flowing'), Ps. 78 16 Cant. 4 15, 'streams.

RIZIA (רִצְיָא), 1 Ch. 7 39 RV, AV REZIA.

RIZPAH (רִצְפָּה; § 71, 'pavement'; ρεсφα [BAL]), daughter of AIAH [q.v.], Saul's concubine, 2 S. 3 7 21 8 ff., (ρεφφαθ [A in v. 8]). According to the existing tradition 'Ishbosheth' was angry with Abner for taking possesssion of his father's concubine, and Abner indignantly repelled the accusation (on 2 S. 3 8 see NABAL). Winckler, however, plausibly holds (GI 2 196) that the original tradition interpreted this fact differently, and that in reality Abner had dethroned 'Ishbosheth,' and signified his assumption of Saul's crown by taking possession of Saul's wife (cp 12 11 16 22). The pathetic story of Rizpah's conduct when her two sons ARMONI (see SAUL, § 6) and MEPHIBOSHETH [q.v.] and the five sons of Michal or rather MERAB [q.v.] had been put to death, to remove the blood-guiltiness of the land, is also, according to Winckler (GI 2 241), unhistorical; he suspects mythological affinities, and compares the myth of Niobe (Preller, Griech. Myth. 2 269). According to 2 S. 21 11 ff., it was on hearing of the act of Rizpah, that David sent for the bones of Saul and Jonathan, that they might be buried together in the sepulchre of Kish at Zela, or rather Laish (= Shalishah). See ZELAH.

On the Rizpah-story see further RS(2) 419 ff., and on the mode of execution (הוקע) see HANGING, 2 b; on the source of the narrative, see SAMUEL (BOOKS), §§ 4 ff.; We. CH 263; Bu. Ri. Sa. 257 f. T. K. C.

ROAST. See COOKING, § 6; SACRIFICE, § 6.

ROBE, the rendering suggests an outer garment of some richness, more elaborate and elegant than an ordinary mantle.

The word occurs most frequently as the rendering of mĕ'īl (see MANTLE, § 2 [6]), occasionally, too, of addéreth, Jon. 3 6, and (for MT éder) Mi. 2 8 (see ib. 5), and of mahălāṣōth, Is. 3 22 RV (see ib. 7), στολή, Lk. 15 22 20 46 Rev. 6 11 7 9 13 f. (see ib. 16), and χλαμύς, Mt. 27 28 (see ib. 20). It is applied to the more general terms béged (1 K. 22 10 30 ‖ 2 Ch. 18 9 29; see DRESS, § 1 [1]), and ἐσθής (Lk. 23 11, RV 'apparel'), and is once used to render kuttōneth (Is. 22 21), on which see TUNIC. See DRESS, MANTLE, and cp CLOTHING, GARMENT.

ROBOAM (Mt. 1 7), RV REHOBOAM.

ROCK. 1. צוּר, ṣūr. See NAMES OF GOD, § 15, and ZUR. [Under ZUR thirty-five places are cited where ṣūr seems to have become altogether a synonym for 'God.' In twenty-one of these 𝔊 (from a dread of materialism?) has θεός, in four βοηθός, in four φύλαξ; κύριος (Is. 17 10), δίκαιος (1 S. 2 2), κτίστης (2 S. 22 32), ἀντιλήμπτωρ (Ps. 89 27 [26]) each occur once; and in Dt. 32 37 Hab. 1 12 𝔊 shows a different text.]

2. סֶלַע, séla'. See SELA. [In 2 S. 22 2 Ps. 18 3 [2], 31 4 [3] 42 10 [9], séla' is a synomyn of ṣūr, and a divine title. König (Stylistik, 100) finds séla' once used of a heathen god, but סַלְעוֹ (EV 'his rock') in Is. 31 9, if correct, is parallel to שָׂרָיו (EV 'his princes'). See Crit. Bib.]

3. מָעוֹז, mā'ōz (Judg. 6 26 RV), cp FORTRESS; 4. חַלָּמִישׁ, ḥallāmīš (Job 28 9), cp FLINT; 5. כֵּף, kēph (Jer. 4 29 Job 30 6); cp CEPHAS, SIMON PETER.

ROCKBADGER (שָׁפָן, Lev. 11 5 RVmg.), EV CONEY.

ROD. Of the following words, the first three are also rendered 'staff'; see Is. 30 32 (the staff of judgment); Ps. 23 4 (שבט, ‖ משענה, see STAFF, 1); Gen. 32 10 (Jacob's staff); for a very special sense of מטה and שבט, see SCEPTRE.

1. מַטֶּה, maṭṭeh (√נטה, to stretch out): of the staff or wand of the traveller (Gen. 38 18 25, etc.), shepherd (Ex. 4 2, etc.), wonder-worker (Ex. 7 9 12, etc.), warrior (1 S. 14 27 43), task-master (Is. 9 3 [4], etc.), ruler (Jer. 48 17, etc.); an implement of punishment (Is. 30 31), used also in beating out black cummin (ḳéṣah, Is. 28 27). The 'rods' in Nu. 17 17 ff. [17 2 ff.] are apparently 'shafts,' i.e., arrows or spears. Maṭṭeh is also rendered 'staff' (the staff of judgment), Is. 30 32. Cp the Ar. nabût, Doughty, Ar. Des. 1 147, 379.

2. שֵׁבֶט, šēbeṭ, cp Ass. šabatu, 'to beat' (whence šibtu, 'staff, as something to beat with, but also 'massacre,' Frd. Del.) (a) As an implement of punishment (Prov. 10 13 13 24); the bastinado as authorised by law is referred to in Dt. 25 1-3, and (probably) Dt. 22 18. See LAW AND JUSTICE, § 12. In 𝔊 the verbs are μαστιγοῦν, παιδεύειν; ῥαβδίζειν is used only of threshing in agriculture. (b) As used for beating cummin (kammōn, Is. 28 27). (c) Of the shepherd's staff, or club-stick (Ar. nabût), Ps. 23 4 Lev. 27 32 Ezek. 20 37. (d) Of the ruler's staff; see SCEPTRE. (e) Of a weapon, in time of stress, 2 S. 23 21. Both maṭṭeh and šēbeṭ are used also metaphorically in the sense of 'tribe' (see TRIBE).

3. מַקֵּל, maḳḳēl, literally a shoot or wand (Jer. 1 11 Gen. 30 37, etc.); of traveller's staff, Gen. 32 11; of the shepherd's, 1 S. 17 40 43 Zech. 11 7 10 14; once perhaps of a crutch, see STAFF, 3. Used in rhabdomancy, Hos. 4 12 (see DIVINATION, § 2 [1]).

4. חֹטֶר, ḥōṭer, used only metaphorically (but as representing its literal sense of 'shoot,' 'scion' or 'twig'), Is. 11 1 Prov. 14 3†.

5. ῥάβδος, 1 Cor. 4 21 Heb. 9 4 Rev. 2 27 11 1 12 5 19 15, all, except 1 Cor. (l.c.) and Rev. 11 1, influenced by OT.

The 'beating with rods' (ῥαβδίζειν) in Acts 16 22 2 Cor. 11 25 is the Roman punishment inflicted by the lictors (EV 'serjeants,' ῥαβδοῦχοι: Acts 16 35 38).

RODANIM (רוֹדָנִים), 1 Ch. 1 7 AVmg., RV; AV DODANIM.

ROE. The rendering of: 1. ṣĕbī, צְבִי (Ar. ẓaby, Aram. ṭabyā [cp TABITHA], Ass. ṣabītu; δορκάς [BℵAL]) in EV of 1 Ch. 12 8, and 2 S. 2 18 ('wild roe,' lit. 'roe that is in the field,' cp RVmg.), and, with RVmg. 'gazelle,' in EV of Cant. 2 7 (𝔊 δυνάμεσιν) 9 and 17 (𝔊 δόρκωνι) 8 5 (𝔊 δυνάμεσιν) 8 14; AV only in Ecclus. 27 20 (RV 'gazelle'); also the rendering of the fem. form ṣĕbiyyāh, צְבִיָּה, in Cant. 4 5 7 3 [4] RV (RVmg. 'gazelle,' not in AV). When mentioned as an article of food ṣĕbī is rendered Roebuck (Dt. 12 15 22 14 5 15 22 1 K. 4 23 [5 3], AV; RV 'gazelle').

2. ya'ălāh, יַעֲלָה, Prov. 5 19, RV, DOE; cp GOAT, § 2.

3. 'ōpher, עֹפֶר, Cant. 4 5 7 3 [4], AV 'young roe,' RV 'fawn,' see HART.

4. yaḥmūr, יַחְמוּר (lit. 'red'), Dt. 14 5 1 K. 4 23 [5 3]; AV FALLOW-DEER (βούβαλος [AL in Dt.]; B in Dt., and BAL in Ki. om.?).

Like the GAZELLE and HART, the roe is chiefly alluded to for its swiftness, and partly on account of its grace and beauty is a favourite image of female charms.[1] On the species in general see GOAT, § 2, and note that the name yaḥmūr (no. 4 above) is still used by the Arabs for the true Cervus capreolus (cp Dr. Deut., ad loc. and see ANTELOPE). The Capreolus capra, with which the yaḥmūr has also been identified, is a small form found distributed over Europe and W. Asia, and still occurs in Palestine; specimens of it were seen by Tristram on Lebanon, and by Conder (Tent-Work, 91 [1887]) on Mt. Carmel. The fallow-deer (cp AV), Cervus dama, is a native of N. Africa and of the countries surrounding the Mediterranean, whence it has been introduced into many civilised countries. It occurs also in N. Palestine, but is said to be scarce. A nearly allied species, C. mesopotamicus, is found in parts of W. Persia. A. E. S.—S. A. C.

ROGELIM (רֹגְלִים; ρωγελ[λ]ειμ [BA], ρακαβειν [L]); the home of 'Barzillai the Gileadite' (2 S. 17 27 19 31). The existence of such a place is questionable. Probably the passages relative to Barzillai are based on an earlier passage respecting MEPHIBOSHETH [q.v. § 2] which had already become corrupt, and רגלים (Rogelim) is a corruption of בית גלים Beth-gallim, i.e., Beth-gilgal (see GALLIM; SAUL, § 4).

The corruption arose from a scribe's lapsus oculi. In 2 S. 17 27 f. the true text probably ran (see 𝔊BAL and cp YARN) וּבַרְזִלַּי הַגִּלְעָדִי מִבֵּית־גַּלִּים מַקְרִיבִים עֲרָשׂוֹת וּמַרְבַדֵּי מִשְׁכָּב. But מקריבים was miswritten מרקבים; the consequence of which was that one scribe (followed by MT and 𝔊BA) wrote מרגלים, and another (followed by 𝔊L) wrote מרקבים, instead of מִבֵּית־גַּלִּים. The ἤνεγκαν of 𝔊BAL represents מקר[י]בים (cp Judg. 3 17 f.). 2 S. 19 31 was harmonised, as to the name of Barzillai's home, with 2 S. 17 27 in each of the texts. T. K. C.

ROHGAH (רוֹהֲגָה Kt. רָהְגָּה Ḳr.), a name in a genealogy of ASHER (q.v. § 4 ii.). In 1 Ch. 7 34 "[Ahi] and Rohghah" becomes [αχι]ουια [B], [αχι]ουρα ουγα [A], [ηειγ] και ραγουε [L.]; but roaga; Pesh. om. passage); cp AHI, 2.

ROIMUS (ροειμου [B]), 1 Esd. 5 8 = Ezra 2 2, REHUM, 1.

ROLL. 1. מְגִלָּה, mĕgillāh; χαρτίον, χάρτης, κεφαλίς), Jer. 36 2, etc. See WRITING.

2. גִּלָּיוֹן, gillāyōn; for גּ׳ גָּדוֹל 𝔊 has τόμον καινοῦ μεγάλου [BℵQ] τόμον χάρτου κ. μ. [A]; RV 'tablet.' A tablet of wood or stone is probably meant. Is. 8 1†. For the gilyōnim of Is. 3 23 cp MIRROR, end.

3. סְפַר, sᵉphar, Ezra 6 1, RV 'archives.' See WRITING and cp HISTORICAL LITERATURE.

ROLLER (חִתּוּל; μαλαγμα [BAQΓ; cp Is. 1 6]), Ezek. 30 21, one of the few references to surgical practice in the EV (see MEDICINE). Hittūl from √entwine (used in Ezek. 16 4 of swaddling, cp derivative in Job 38 9) is properly a bandage (cp Toy's rendering in SBOT) rather than a poultice (as 𝔊).

ROMAMTI-EZER (רֹמַמְתִּי עֶזֶר, § 23, according to the Chronicler a son of Heman: 1 Ch. 25 4 31 ρωμεμθι ουιοι ωδ, ρομελχει [B, superscr. ωθ Ba.b], ρωμεμθι εζερ, ρωμεθ μιεζερ [A], ραμαθιεζερ [L], romemthiezer [Vg.]), but see HEMAN.

Of Epistles to the Romans Old-Christian Literature is acquainted with two—that of Paul and that of Ignatius. As regards the latter, the reader is referred to what has been said under OLD-CHRISTIAN LITERATURE (§ 28 f.). The 'Epistle of Paul to the Romans' has come down to us from antiquity not as a separate work but as one of the most distinguished members of a group—the 'epistles of Paul' (ἐπιστολαὶ Παύλου)—in which its title in the shortest form, followed by Ti. WH among others (after ℵABC, etc.), is 'to Romans' (πρὸς Ῥωμαίους).

1. History of criticism; traditional view.

From the beginning (first by Marcion, about 140 A.D.) the work, as an integral part of the authoritative 'Apostle' (ὁ Ἀπόστολος, τὸ ἀποστολικόν)—i.e., Paul (Παῦλος)—in other words as a canonical writing, was tacitly recognised as the work of the apostle Paul. This continued without a break till 1792. Justin took no notice of Paul; Irenæus and Tertullian—the latter with a scornful 'hæreticorum apostolus' on his lips—laboured to raise the 'apostle' in the estimation of the faithful (cp PAUL, § 48); but no one ever thought of doubting the genuineness of the letters attributed to the apostle—or of defending it. During the whole of that period the question did not so much as exist.

2. Theory of compositeness.

There is indeed a very old discussion—perhaps it had already arisen even in the second century—as to the existence of the epistle in two forms, a longer and a shorter, even after omission of the two last chapters (15, 16). Origen taxes Marcion with this last omission; but Origen's older contemporary Tertullian says nothing of that, though he several times reprimands the heretic for having tampered with the text of chaps. 1-14. The probability is that Tertullian had no acquaintance with chaps. 15 f. At any rate, he made no citation from them in his polemic against Marcion (adv. Marc. 5 13-14), although in its course he leaves none of the previous chapters (1-14) unreferred to and speaks of one expression—'tribunal Christi' (14 10)—as written 'in clausula' [epistulæ]; cp van Manen, Paulus, 2 101-118.

In recent times the tradition of the text as regards chaps. 15-16 has frequently come under discussion. The conclusion is not only that the chapters in question were unknown to Marcion and probably also to other ancient witnesses, including Irenæus and Cyprian, but also that there were in circulation at an early date MSS. in which the doxology Rom. 16 25-27 either occurred alone immediately after 14 23 or was entirely wanting (cp Ti.; Sanday-Headlam, Comm. (1895), 89 f.; S. Davidson, Intr.(3), 1894, 1 120-123).

To these facts were added, at a later date, considerations based on the contents of chaps. 15-16 tending to show that they hardly fitted in with chaps. 1-14. Semler (Diss. de duplici appendice ep. Pauli ad Rom. 1767; Paraphrasis ep. ad Romanos, 1769), soon afterwards supported by Eichhorn (Einl. in das NT), held chap. 15 f. to be by Paul but not to have originally belonged to the Epistle to the Romans. Baur (Tüb. Ztschr., 1836, Paulus, 1845, cp Paulus(2), 1 [1866] 393-409), followed, in the main, among others by Schwegler (Nachap. Zeitalter), Zeller (ACL), S. Davidson (Introd.(3), 1894, 1 123-131), and controverted by Kling (St.Kr., 1837), De Wette and others, maintained the piece to be spurious. Since Baur, many scholars have endeavoured to steer a middle course by seeking—in very divergent ways, it is true—for the close of the letter supposed lost, in chaps. 15, 16. So among others, Lucht (Ueber die beiden letzten Kapp. des Römerbriefs, 1871), Volkmar (Römerbrief, 1875), Scholten (Th.T, 1876), Bruckner (Reihenfolge, 1890), Baljon (Gesch. v. d. Boeken des NVs. 1901, p. 95-6). In these various attempts an important part was always played by the conjecture, first put forth by Schulz (St.Kr., 1829), that in Rom. 16 1-20 what we really have is an epistle of Paul to the Ephesians.

In this direction—that of holding more Pauline epistles than one to have been incorporated with each other or amalgamated together to form the canonical epistle to the Romans—the way had already been led (leaving 15, 16 out of account) by Heumann in 1765.

He argued, according to Meyer (Komm.(3) [1859], etc.), for the 'strange hypothesis' that a new Epistle to the Romans begins at chap. 12, whilst chap. 16 contains two postscripts (vv. 1-24 and 25-27) to the first. Eichhorn (Einl.(2), 1827) guessed that Paul in reading over the epistle after it had been written by an amanuensis made various additions with his own hand. C. H. Weisse (Philos. Dogm. 1855) held Rom. 9-11 to be a later insertion. He found moreover a number of minor insertions in the Epistle, and finally concluded that chaps. 9-10+16 1-16, 20*b*, probably had belonged originally to an Epistle of Paul to the Ephesians (cp his Beitr. zur Kritik der paul. Br. 1867, edited by Sulze). Laurent (Neutest. Studien, 1866) supposed Paul to have written with his own hand to his Epistle to the Romans a number of notes which subsequently by accident found their way into the text. Renan (St. Paul) was of opinion that Paul had published his Epistle to the Romans in several forms—e.g., chaps. 1-11+15; chaps. 1-14+16 (part); out of these forms the epistle known to us ultimately grew. Straatman (Th. T, 1868, 38-57), controverted by Rovers (ib. 310-325), came to the conclusion that chaps. 12-14 do not fit in with what precedes; that these chapters along with chap. 16 belong to an Epistle of Paul to the Ephesians; and that the close of the Epistle to the Romans, properly so called, is found in chap. 15. Spitta (Zur Gesch. u. Litt. des Urchristentums, 1 16-30, 1893) contended, and at a later date (3 1-193, 1901) reaffirmed, though with some modifications of minor importance, that our Epistle to the Romans is the result of a fitting-together of two epistles written by Paul at separate times, one before and one after his visit to Rome, and addressed to the Christians there. The first and longer, a well rounded whole, consisted of 1 1-11 36, 15 8-33, 16 21-27; the second, partly worked into the first, has not reached us in its entirety; we recognise with certainty only the portions: 12 1-15 7 and 16 1-20.

Pierson-Naber (Verisimilia, 1886), controverted by Kuenen (Th. T, 1886, cp van Manen, Bybladvan de Hervorming, 1887, No. 4, and Bibl. mod. Theol. 1887), point to a number of joinings and sutures, traces of manipulation and compilation, in the traditional text of the Epistle to the Romans, with a view to proving its lacera conditio. Michelsen (Th. T, 1886-7) sought to distinguish in that text five or six editions of Paul's Epistle, in the course of which various far-reaching modifications may be supposed to have been made. Sulze (Prot. Kirchenztg. 1888, no. 42) pressed still further for the recognition of additions and insertions. Völter repeated his 'Votum, etc.' (recorded in Th. T, 1889) in a separate publication (Die Komposition der paulin. Hauptbriefe, 1, 1890), and sought to prove again that our canonical Epistle to the Romans is the fruit of repeated redaction and expansion of a genuine epistle of the apostle.

Thus, there has been no lack of effort on the part of scholars to satisfy themselves and each other of the composite character of the traditional text. Equally decided, however, at least with most of them, is the opinion that nevertheless the text is, for the most part, and in the main, from the hand of Paul. This conviction was for a long time tacitly assumed, rather than explicitly expressed. So even by Baur, Weisse, and Straatman, whilst it was brought to the foreground, with friendly yet polemical emphasis, as against the representatives of 'advanced criticism,' by Spitta. As regards the others mentioned above, most hesitation was to be noticed in Pierson-Naber, Michelsen, and Völter; but even these, one and all, continued to speak of an original letter, written by Paul to the Romans.

Not a few writers continued simply to maintain the prima facie character of the canonical epistle or, as occasion offered, to defend it in their notes and discussions, commentaries and introductions.

For details, pro et contra, and some guidance through the extensive literature, the student may consult Holtzmann, Einl.(3), 1892, 242-6; Sanday-Headlam, Comm. 1895, pp. 85-98; Zahn, Einl.(2), 1900, 1 268-299; for a more complete though not always accurate account of the doubts regarding the unity of the work, Clemen, Die Einheitlichkeit der paulin. Briefe, 1894, cp Th. T, 1895, 640 ff.

3. Pauline authorship questioned.

The first to break in all simplicity with the axiom of the genuineness of our canonical epistle to the Romans, though without saying so in so many words, was E. Evanson. He appended to The Dissonance of the four generally received Evangelists, 1792, some considerations against the justice of the received view which regarded Paul as author of the epistle—considerations based upon the contents themselves and a comparison between them and Acts (pp. 256-261). Controverted by Priestley and others, Evanson's arguments soon fell into oblivion.

Sixty years afterwards Bruno Bauer (Kritik der paulin. Briefe, 1852, 347-76) took up the work of Evanson, without, so far as appears, being acquainted with the writings of that scholar. He was not successful, however, in gaining a hearing—not at least until after he had repeated his doubts in more compendious form in his Christus u. die Cæsaren (1877, pp. 371-380).

Soon afterwards A. D. Loman ('Quæstiones paulinæ' in Th. T, 1882) developed the reasons which seemed to him to render necessary a revision of the criticism of the epistles of Paul which was then current. Without going into details as regarded Romans, he declared all the epistles to be the productions of a later time. Rud. Steck (Der Galaterbrief nach seiner Echtheit untersucht, nebst kritischen Bemerkungen zu den paulinischen Hauptbriefen, 1888) came to the same conclusion and took occasion to point out some peculiarities connected with the Epistle to the Romans. The same investigation was more fully carried out, and substantially with the same result, by W. C. van Manen (Paulus II. De brief aan de Romeinen, 1891; cp Handleiding voor de Oudchr. letterkunde, 1900, ch. 3, §§ 10-19), and Prof. W. B. Smith of Tulane University, Louisiana, has recently begun independently to follow the same path. The Outlook (New York) of Nov. 1900 contained a preliminary article by him, signed 'Clericus' (a misprint for 'Criticus'), and in the Journal of Biblical Literature, 1901, a series of articles bearing the author's own name was begun—the first entitled 'Address and Destination of St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans,' and the second 'Unto Romans: 15 and 16.'

The newer criticism has made itself heard and goes forward on its path in spite of much opposition and strife, applauded by some, rejected by many. For its character and aims see PAUL, §§ 34-36, and cp §§ 37-48. Its desire is to read 'the Epistle of Paul to the Romans' as well as the rest of the canonical books without any fear of the ban that lies upon aught that may perchance prove to be contrary to tradition, whether ecclesiastical or scientific; uninfluenced by any antecedent presumption as to the correctness of the current views as to contents, origin, or meaning of the text as it has come down to us, however highly esteemed be the quarter—Tübingen or any other—from which they have reached us; free, too, from the dominion of any conviction, received by faith merely, and held to be superior to any test of examination, as to the epistle being indubitably the work of Paul and of Paul alone. It seeks to read the epistle in the pure light of history, exactly as it appears after repeated examination has been made on every side, as it at last presents itself to the student who really wishes to take knowledge of the contents with as little prejudice as possible.

4. What 'Rom.' seems to be.

Coming before us, as it does, as a component part of the group known as 'the Epistles of Paul,' handed down from ancient times, Romans appears indeed to be neither more nor less than an epistle of the apostle, written probably at Corinth and addressed to the Christians at Rome, whom he hopes to visit ere long after having made a journey to Jerusalem. Both superscription and subscription, as well as tradition, indicate this, even if we leave out of account the words 'in Rome' (ἐν Ῥώμῃ) and 'to those in Rome' (τοῖς ἐν Ῥώμῃ) which are wanting in some MSS in 1 7 15. We have only, in connection with the superscription and subscription, to look at the manner in which the epistle begins and ends (1 1-15 15 14-16 27), at the way in which the writer throughout addresses his readers as brethren (1 13 7 1 4 8 12 10 1 11 25 12 1 15 14 f. 30 16 17), stirs them up, admonishes them and discusses with them, as persons with whom he stands on a friendly footing, and has opened a correspondence on all sorts of subjects. The appearance of Tertius as amanuensis (16 22) need cause no surprise, it being assumed that perhaps Paul himself may not have been very ready with the pen.

5. Contents.

If we turn for a little from a consideration of the literary form to occupy ourselves more with the contents, the first thing that strikes us is the conspicuously methodical way in which the writer has set forth his material. After an address and benediction (1 1-7), an introduction (1 8-15), and a statement of what he regards as the essential matter as regards the preaching of the gospel—a thing not to be ashamed of but to be everywhere preached as a power of God for the salvation of every believer whether Jew or Greek (1 16 f.)—come two great doctrinal sections followed by an ethical section. The first doctrinal section, 1 18-8 39, is devoted to the elucidation of the truth that the gospel is the means for the salvation of Jews and Greeks, because in it is revealed the righteousness of God from faith to faith; the other, 9-11, to an earnest discussion of what seems to be a complete rejection of the Jews by God; the third, the ethical section (12 1-15 13), to a setting forth of the conduct that befits the Christian both towards God and towards man in general, and towards the weak and their claims in particular.

In substance the doctrine is as follows. Sin has alienated all men, Jews and Gentiles alike, from God, so that neither our natural knowledge of God nor the law is able to help us (1 18-3 20). A new way of salvation is opened up, 'God's righteousness has been manifested' (δικαιοσύνη θεοῦ πεφανέρωται) for all men without distinction, by faith in relation to Jesus Christ (3 21-31). It is accordingly of no importance to be descended from Abraham according to the flesh; Abraham in the higher sense is the father of those who believe (4). Justified by faith, we have peace with God and the best hopes for the future (5). Let no one, however, suppose that the doctrine of grace, the persuasion that we are under grace, not under the law, will conduce to sin or bring the law into contempt. Such conclusions can and must be peremptorily set aside (6-7). The emancipated life of the Christian, free from the law of sin and death, is a glorious one (8). Israel, the ancient people of the promises with its great privileges, appears indeed to be rejected, yet will finally be gathered in (9-11). The life of Christians, in relation to God and man, must in every respect give evidence of complete renewal and absolute consecration (12 1-15 13). Finally, a closing word as to the apostle's vocation which he hopes to fulfil in Rome also; a commendation of Phœbe, greetings, exhortations, benedictions, and an ascription of praise to God (15 14-16 27).

6. Difficulties: not a letter; opening and close.

If, at a first inspection, the work presents itself to us as an epistle written by Paul to the Christians at Rome, on closer examination it becomes difficult to adhere to such a view. Difficulties arise on every side. To begin with—as regards the form that is assumed. We are acquainted with no letters of antiquity with any such exordium as this: 'Paul, bond-slave of Jesus Christ, called an apostle, separated unto the gospel of God . . . to all those who are in Rome . . . grace to you and peace from God our father and the Lord Jesus Christ' (Παῦλος δοῦλος Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, κλητὸς ἀπόστολος ἀφωρισμένος εἰς εὐαγγέλιον θεοῦ . . . πᾶσιν τοῖς οὖσιν ἐν Ῥώμῃ . . . χάρις ὑμῖν καὶ εἰρήνη ἀπὸ θεοῦ πατρὸς ἡμῶν καὶ κυρίου Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ); nor with any conclusion so high-sounding as the doxology of 16 25-27, or the prayer for the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ which is heard in 16 20 (or 16 24). In every other case the epistles of antiquity invariably begin plainly and simply.

Thus, for example, in the collection of Oxyrhynchus papyri (1 181) we have Εἰρήνη Ταοννώφρει καὶ Φίλωνι εὐψυχεῖν . . . and at the close εὖ πράττετε; or (1 183) Χαιρέας Διονυσίωι τῶι κυρίωι ἀδελφῷ χαίρειν and, at the close, ἐρρῶσθαί σε εὔχομαι.

Greetings are indeed conveyed both from and to various persons; but never are so many introduced as in Rom. 16 3-16, where in fact at the end all the churches salute. A letter-writer may, at the outset, seek to bring himself into closer relationship with his reader or to make himself known more exactly; but in the many examples of real letters that have come down to us from ancient times we nowhere find anything even approaching the amplitude of Rom. 1 2-6. Nor yet does any real letter, whether intended for few or for many, so far as we are in a position to judge, ever give us cause, because by its length or its elaborate method it resembles a treatise arranged in orderly sections, to regard it as a book, as our canonical epistle to the Romans does, with its great subdivisions (already taken account of under § 5).

We may, in truth, safely dispense with further comparison between our epistle and any real letters from ancient times, so impossible is it to regard it as an actual epistle, to whatever date, locality, or author we may assign it.

7. Style of address.

How could any one at the very beginning of a letter, in which, too, the first desire he writes to express is that of writing solemnly, earnestly, directly, allow himself to expatiate, as this writer does, in such a parenthesis? He speaks as a didactic expounder who, for the most part, directly and as concisely as possible, deals with a number of disputed points, with regard to which the reader may be supposed to be in doubt or uncertainty because in point of fact they have gained acceptance within certain circles. These expositions relate to nothing more or less than such points as the relation of the Pauline Gospel to the OT (v. 2), the descent of the Son of God from the house of David (v. 3), the evidence of the Messiahship of Jesus derived from his resurrection (v. 4), the origin and the legitimacy of the Pauline preaching (v. 5). At the same time the readers (who have not yet been named and are first addressed in v. 7) are assured that they belong to the Gentiles (ἔθνη), with reference to whom Paul has received his apostleship, although, according to 1 10-13, he has never as yet met them and consequently has not been the means of their conversion. All this within a single parenthesis. In such wise no letter was ever begun.

The writer addresses himself to 'all' the members of a wide circle—let us say in Rome; even if the words 'in Rome' (ἐν Ῥώμῃ) and 'those who are in Rome' (τοῖς ἐν Ῥώμῃ, 1 7 15), according to some MS authorities, do not belong to the original text, their meaning is assured by the superscription 'to Romans' (πρὸς Ῥωμαίους; cp 15 22-29) and by the unvarying tradition as to the destination of the 'epistle.' The Paul whom we meet here addresses his discourse to a wide public, and utters in lofty tones such words as these: 'O, man, whoever thou be who judgest, etc.' (ὦ ἄνθρωπε πᾶς ὁ κρίνων κ.τ.λ., 2 1), 'O, man, who judgest, etc.' (ὦ ἄνθρωπε ὁ κρίνων κ.τ.λ., 2 3), 'If thou bearest the name of a Jew, etc.' (εἰ δὲ σὺ Ἰουδαῖος ἐπονομάζῃ κ.τ.λ., 2 17), 'Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God?' (ὦ ἄνθρωπε, μενοῦνγε σὺ τίς εἶ ὁ ἀνταποκρινόμενος τῷ θεῷ, 9 20), 'But I speak to you that are Gentiles' (ὑμῖν δὲ λέγω τοῖς ἔθνεσιν, 11 13), 'I say . . . to every man that is among you, etc.' (λέγω . . . παντὶ τῷ ὄντι ἐν ὑμῖν κ.τ.λ., 12 3), 'Who art thou that judgest the servant of another?' (σὺ τίς εἶ ὁ κρίνων ἀλλότριον οἰκέτην, 14 4), 'But thou, why dost thou judge thy brother?' (σὺ δὲ τί κρίνεις τὸν ἀδελφόν σου, 14 10), 'For if because of meat thy brother is grieved, etc.' (εἰ γὰρ διὰ βρῶμα ὁ ἀδελφός σου λυπεῖται κ.τ.λ., 14 15), etc. Often the argument proceeds uninterruptedly for a long time without any indication of the existence of a definite circle of persons to whom it is addressed. Yet, on the other hand also, the abstract argumentation gives place to direct address, the word of admonition or exhortation spoken to the brethren (ἀδελφοί), whether named or unnamed—the mention of whom, however, when it occurs, is a purely oratorical form and no natural expression of the existence of any special relation between the writer and his assumed readers. Of the passages coming within the scope of this remark (some of them, already noticed in § 4), none presents any peculiarity in this respect. On the contrary, every one of them produces uniformly the same impression; in this manner no real letter is ever written.

The last chapter has nothing of the character of a postscript to a letter already completed, although the letter appears to end with 15 30-33. Strange, in the sense of being not natural but artificial, is the appearance in 16 22 of Tertius ('I, Tertius, who write the epistle': ὁ γράψας τὴν ἐπιστολήν), the secretary of Paul, who, however, seems himself to have had a hand in the letter, since we find him saying in 15 15, 'I wrote to you' (ἔγραψα ὑμῖν). Strange especially is Tertius's greeting of the readers in his own name, in the midst of the greetings which Paul seems to be transmitting through him, vv. 21 23.

The contents of the epistle, largely consisting of argument and discussions on doctrinal theses, differ as widely as possible from what one is wont to expect in a letter—so widely that many have long laboured at the task of making a suitable paraphrase of the 'text-book' while retaining their belief in its epistolary character. (See, for example, the specimen in Holtzmann, Einl.(3), 237; cp S. Davidson, Intr.(3), 1 113-116.)

In vain do we make the attempt in some degree to picture to ourselves what the relation was between the supposed author and his readers. Acts supplies no light. There we read that when Paul is approaching Rome the brethren go to meet him, not because they had previously had a letter from him, but because they have heard various things regarding his recent fortunes (28 14 f.). As for the Jews of the metropolis, they have heard nothing either good or bad concerning him (v. 21). Tradition, apart from the NT, has equally little to say about the epistle, whether as to its reception or as to what impression it may have made. The document itself says something, but only what adds to the confusion. The truth of the matter seems unattainable. Scholars lose themselves in most contradictory conjectures as to the occasion and purpose of the writing.

8. Supposed readers.

See, amongst others, Meyer-Weiss, Komm.(9), 1899, pp. 23-33; Holtzmann, Einl.(3), 236-241; Lipsius, Comm.(2), 1892, pp. 75-76; Sanday-Headlam, Comm., 1895, chaps. 38-44; van Manen, Paulus, 2 20-23.

Who the supposed readers of the epistle were can only be gathered from its contents. But these are so different in many aspects that it is possible to say with equal justice that the church in Rome was Jewish-Christian, Gentile-Christian, or a mixture of the two.

Cp the various conclusions in Meyer-Weiss, 19-22; Holtzmann, 232-236; Lipsius, 70-73; Steck, Gal. 359-363; Völter, Th. T, 1889, pp. 270-272, and Komp. 8 f.; van Manen, Paulus, 2 23-25).

It may be added here that the work is throughout addressed to 'brethren' of all kinds, and sometimes it seems also to have been intended for Jews and Gentiles who stood in no connection whatever with Christianity. Did any one ever give to a particular letter an aim so general, without realising that his letter had ceased to be a letter at all in the natural meaning of the word, and had become what we are accustomed to call an open letter, an occasional writing, a book? Everything leads to the one conclusion; the epistolary form is not real, it is merely assumed; we have here to do, not with an actual letter of Paul to the Romans, but rather with a treatise, a book, that with the outward resemblance of a letter is nevertheless something quite different. Cp EPISTOLARY LITERATURE, § 1-3; OLD CHRISTIAN LITERATURE, § 18 f.

The same conclusion results from a closer examination of the whole as it lies before us, whenever we direct our attention to the connection of its several parts. The relative unity of the book there is no reason for doubting. It is not, however, unity of the kind we are accustomed to expect in a book written after more or less careful preparation, in accordance with a more or less carefully considered and logically developed plan; not unity such as is the outcome of a free elaboration of the materials after these have been more or less diligently collected, and fully mastered by the writer. Least of all, a unity such as we look for in a letter, whether we think of it as written at one sitting or as written bit by bit and at intervals. It is rather a unity of such a sort as reminds us of that of a synoptical gospel, with regard to which no one doubts that it is the result of a characteristic process of redaction and remaniement, curtailment, correction, and supplementation by the help of older pieces drawn from other sources. It is such unity as we find in reading Acts, although we do not hesitate for a single moment to realise that Lk. has made an often very palpable use of written sources. There is unity of language and style, of thought, of feeling, of opinion; but at the same time there are, not seldom, great diversities in all these respects. The result, obviously, of the unmistakable circumstance that the writer of the canonical epistle has made continual and manifold use of words, forms of expression, arguments, derived from sources known to him, whether retained in his memory or lying before him in written form.

9. Kind of unity.

Proof of the justice of this view is supplied by the various attempts made by earlier and later exegetes to expound the epistle as a completely rounded whole—attempts in which it is found necessary at every turn to resort to the assumption of all sorts of conceivable and inconceivable figures and forms of speech, and thus conceal the existence of joints and sutures, hiatuses, and unintelligible transitions. More particularly is this seen in the scientific line taken by Heumann, Semler, Eichhorn, Weisse, Straatman, Völter, Michelsen, Spitta, and so many others (some of these names are enumerated in § 2), who have argued, and continue to argue, for the view that more than one epistle of Paul lies concealed in the apparently homogeneous canonical epistle, or for the view that there have been interpolations, more or less numerous, on an unusually large scale. In the last resort, on an (as far as possible) unprejudiced reading of the text which has come down to us—a reading no longer under the dominion of a foregone conclusion, to be maintained at all hazards, that here we have to do with the original work of the apostle Paul, sent by him to the church at Rome—we shall find that what lies before us is simply a writing from Christian antiquity presenting itself as such a work, which we must try to interpret as best we can.

10. Failures to find unity.

The traces of additions and redactions in the various sections and subsections of the epistle are innumerable. It would be superfluous, even if space allowed, to go through all the details on this head. A few examples may suffice.

11. Signs of compositeness.

Compared with the first part (1 18-8 39), the second (9-11), although now an integral portion of the work, betrays tokens of an originally different source. There is no inherent connection between them, although this can, if desired, be sought in the desire to set forth a wholly new doctrinal subject in a wholly new manner. In the second we no longer hear of the doctrine of justification by faith; the treatment of the subject enunciated in 1 16 f. is no longer continued. What takes its place is something quite different and wholly unconnected with it; a discussion, namely, of the doctrinal question, 'Why is it that the Gentiles are admitted and Israel excluded from salvation?' This discussion is directed not, like the contents of the first part, ostensibly to Christian Jews, but to Gentiles. There is nothing in the first part that anywhere suggests any such affection for Israel as is everywhere apparent throughout the second part, and especially in 9 1-3 10 1 11 1 25-36; nothing that comes into comparison with the solemn declaration of 9 1 in which the writer bears witness to his great sorrow and unceasing pain of heart concerning Israel. This exordium points to a quite different situation, in which 'Paul' requires to be cleared of the reproach of not concerning himself about God's ancient people. Hence the wish expressed by him that he might become anathema from Christ (ἀπὸ τοῦ Χριστοῦ) for his brethren's sake, his kinsmen according to the flesh (συγγενεῖς κατὰ σάρκα, 9 3). Hence his zeal here and in 11 1 to declare himself an Israelite, of the seed of Abraham, the tribe of Benjamin. Hence also the summing-up of the ancient privilege of Israel, 'whose is the adoption and the glory and the covenants' (9 4 f.), in comparison with which the simple statement that they were entrusted with the oracles of God (3 2) sinks into insignificance. In the first part a quite different tone is assumed towards the Jew (Ἰουδαῖος, 2 17), with whom the speaker appears to have nothing in common. There we find Jew and Greek placed exactly on an equality (1 16 2 9 f. 3 9); the idea of the Jews that as such they could have any advantage over the heathen is in set terms controverted (2 11-3 21), and it is declared that descent from Abraham, according to the flesh, is of no value (4). Here, on the other hand (9-11), we have earnest discussion of the question how it is possible to reconcile the actual position of Israel in comparison with the Gentile world with the divine purpose and the promise made to the fathers. Here, too, a high-pitched acknowledgment of the privileges of Israel, the one good olive-tree, the stem upon which the wild olive branches—the believing Gentiles—are grafted; Israel in the end is certain to be wholly saved, being, as touching the election, beloved for the fathers' sake (κατὰ τὴν ἐκλογὴν ἀγαπητοὶ διὰ τοὺς πατέρας, 9 4 f. 31 10 2 11 7 17 f. 26 28). In the first part, a sharp repudiation of the law in respect of its powerlessness to work anything that is good (3 20 f. 27 4 15 6 14 7 5 f., etc.); in the second a holding up of the giving of the law (νομοθεσία) as a precious gift (9 4). In the first part the earnest claim to justification by faith (5 1), to being under grace (6 14), to a walk in newness of spirit (7 6); in the second the assurance that 'if thou shalt confess with thy mouth Jesus as Lord, and shalt believe in thy heart that God raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved' (10 9).

Observe, again, the difference in respect of language. The words 'just,' 'justify,' 'be justified' (δίκαιος, δικαιοῦν, δικαιοῦσθαι), nowhere occur in chaps. 9-11, nor yet the expression 'both Jews and Greeks' (Ἰουδ. τε καὶ Ἑλλ.), except in 10 12 where apparently it is not original, or at least has no meaning after the words 'for there is no distinction' (οὐ γάρ ἐστιν διαστολή). The words 'Israelite' and 'Israel' are not met with in 1-8, whilst in 9-11 the first occurs thrice and the second eleven times. On the other hand, we have 'Jew' nine times in 1-3, but only twice in 9-11, and in both cases its occurrence seems probably due to the redactor. The 'adoption' (υἱοθεσία), which, according to 8 15 (cp Gal. 4 5 Eph. 1 5) is a privilege of all Christians, whether Jews or Greeks, recurs in 9 4 in connection with a supposed predestination of Israel as the son of God; the word is the same but it sounds quite differently. In 1-8 Christ is seven times called the son of God, and in 9-11 never. On the other hand, he is probably called God in 9 5 but nowhere in 1-8. Whilst in 1-8 we find no other form of the verb 'say' (ἐρεῖν) than 'shall we say' (ἐροῦμεν), in 9 19 f. 11 19 we also have 'thou wilt say' (ἐρεῖς) and 'shall the thing say?' (ἐρεῖ). If the occurrence of the expression 'what then shall we say' (τί οὖν ἐροῦμεν) in 9 14 30, as well as in 4 1 6 1 7 7 8 31, points to oneness of language, it has nevertheless to be noted that in 1-8 it never, as in 9 30, is followed by a question, but always by a categorical answer. A speaker who says that Israel 'following after a law of righteousness did not arrive at [that] law' (διώκων νόμον δικαιοσύνης εἰς νόμον οὐκ ἔφθασεν, 9 31) understands by 'law' (νόμος) something quite different, and at the same time is following a quite different use of language, from one who declares that the Jew sins 'under law' (ἐννόμως or ἐν νόμῳ); shall be judged 'by law' (διὰ νόμου, 2 12); doeth not 'the things of the law' (τὰ τοῦ νόμου, 2 14), is not justified 'by works of law' (ἐξ ἔργων νόμου), comes to knowledge of sin 'through law' (διὰ νόμου, 3 20) and lives 'under law' (ὑπὸ νόμον, 6 14). Only the latter is thinking of the Mosaic law, about which the former would not speak so depreciatingly. In chaps. 9-11, as Steck (Gal. 362) justly remarks, a much more superficial use is made of the proof from scripture, 'and the whole representation and language is somewhat less delicate.'

12. Third part. The third part of the epistle (12 1-15 13) seems to be closely connected with that which precedes. Observe the 'then' (οὖν: 12 1), and notice how the writer harks back to 9-11 in his declaration (15 8) that Christ has been made a minister of the circumcision with reference to the promise of God, and to 1 16 f. or 1 18-8 39 in the same declaration supplemented with the statement (15 9) that Christ appeared also that the Gentiles might glorify God for his mercy. But the connection when more closely examined will be found to be only mechanical. There is no real inward connection. No one expects a hortatory passage such as this after 11 33-36. Nor yet, where some would fain place it, after ch. 8 or ch. 6. The exhortations and instructions given in 12 1-15 13, however we put the different parts together, stand in no relation to the preceding argument; the same holds good of the exordium 12 1 f. Though usual, it is not correct to say that Paul first develops his doctrinal system 1 18-11 36, and then his ethical in 12 1-15 13; or even to say in the modified form of the statement that he follows up the doctrinal with an ethical section. Exhortations are not wanting in the first part, nor doctrines in the last. The truth is that in 1 18-11 36 the doctrinal element is prominent, just as the hortatory is in 12 1-15 13. In other words, the two pieces are of different character. They betray difference of origin. 12 1-15 13 is, originally, not a completion of 1-11, thought out and committed to writing by the same person, but rather—at least substantially—an independent composition, perhaps, it may be, as some have conjectured, brought hither from another context. It has more points of agreement with certain portions of the Epistles to the Corinthians than with Rom. 1-11. Compare, in general, the manner of writing and the nature of the subjects treated.

In detail, compare such expressions as 'beseech . . . by' (παρακαλῶ . . . διά), 12 1, with 1 Cor. 1 10 2 Cor. 10 1, whereas 'beseech' (παρακαλεῖν), however Pauline, is found neither in Rom. 1-11 nor in Gal.; the 'mercies' (οἰκτιρμοί) of God, 12 1, with the 'mercies' (οἰκτιρμοί) of the Father in 2 Cor. 1 3, but nowhere named in Rom. 1-11; 'this age' (ὁ αἰὼν οὗτος) 12 2, with 1 Cor. 1 20 2 6 8 3 18 2 Cor. 4 4, but not found in Rom. 1-11; the representation that the Christian can still be renewed by the renewing of the mind (ἀνακαίνωσις τοῦ νοός: 12 2) with the assurance that though the outer man perish, 'that which is within us is renewed day by day' (ὁ ἔσω ἡμῶν [ἄνθρωπος] ἀνακαινοῦται ἡμέρᾳ καὶ ἡμέρᾳ, 2 Cor. 4 16) whereas Rom. 1-11 knows nothing of this 'renewal,' and could hardly have introduced it alongside of its doctrine that the Christian is dead so far as sin is concerned (6 2) so that he now stands in the service of newness of spirit (7 6). Compare, again, the assurance that God gives to each a measure of faith (ἑκάστῳ μέτρον πίστεως: 12 3) with 'only, as the Lord has supplied to each' (εἰ μὴ ἑκάστῳ ὡς μεμέρικεν: 1 Cor. 7 14), 'according to the measure of the province (RVmg., or limit) which God apportioned to us as a measure' (κατὰ τὸ μέτρον τοῦ κανόνος, οὗ ἐμέρισεν ἡμῖν ὁ θεὸς μέτρου: 2 Cor. 10 13), and the declaration that not every one receives faith through the spirit (1 Cor. 12 9), as also that there is a still more excellent way than that implied in the spiritual gifts of which faith is one,—namely, love (1 Cor. 12 31),—whereas not only are the words 'apportion' (μερίζειν) and 'measure' (μέτρον) unknown to Rom. 1-11, but so also is 'love' (ἀγάπη) in the sense of love to God and one's neighbour, and (equally so) a faith (πίστις) which is not regarded as the beginning of a new life, in comparison with which love is not required simply because that and everything else that is needed is already possessed where faith is; the distinction between various spiritual gifts (12 6-8) compared with 1 Cor. 12 4-11 and 28-30; the whole attitude towards self-exaltation (12 3-8) compared with 1 Cor. 4 6 f. and 12 12-30; the exhortations to the practice of love, zeal, and purity (12 9-21 and 13 8-14) compared with 1 Cor. 13; 14 1-20 39 15 58 5 11 6 9-11 16-20, where, amongst other things, the occurrence of 'cleave' (κολλᾶσθαι) in Rom. 12 9 and 1 Cor. 6 16 f., though nowhere else to be found in the Pauline epistles, is to be noticed; the occurrence also of 'taking thought for things honourable in the sight of all men' (προνοούμενοι καλὰ ἐνώπιον πάντων ἀνθρώπων: Rom. 12 17) as compared with the only parallel expression 'for we take thought for things honourable, not only in the sight of the Lord, but also in the sight of men' (προνοοῦμεν γὰρ καλὰ οὐ μόνον ἐνώπιον κυρίου ἀλλὰ καὶ ἐνώπιον ἀνθρώπων: 2 Cor. 8 21; cp Prov. 3 4); ὀφείλειν 13 8 used several times also in 1 and 2 Cor. but never in Rom. 1-11; the special exhortations to subjection to authority and to due discharge of one's various obligations (13 1-7) indicative of a peaceful environment and hardly in keeping with the persecutions suggested by the closing verses of chap. 8, but on the other hand quite in accord with the special admonitions and exhortations of 1 Cor. 1 10 ff. 5 6 1-11 11 2-15, etc.; what is said in chap. 14 regarding the use of certain meats, the observance of sacred days, and the respect for the weak, with regard to which no word is found in 1-11, but which reminds us throughout of 1 Cor. 8-10, not only by reason of the similarity of such expressions as 'eat' (ἐσθίειν), 'food' (βρῶμα), 'cause to stumble' (σκανδαλίζειν), 'a stumbling-block to the brother' (πρόσκομμα τῷ ἀδελφῷ), 'not to eat flesh' (μὴ φαγεῖν κρέα), etc., but also very specially by reason of the agreement in the central thought that to the fully developed Christian all things are allowed, but that he must give no offence to the weak brother and therefore ought rather to act as if he were still in bondage to ancient customs and usages.

13. Chap. 15 f.

The conclusion of the canonical epistle 15 14-16 27 must be accepted, as such, notwithstanding the objections urged by Semler, and those who follow him, in rejecting chaps. 15 16 as not original constituents of the writing sent by Paul to the Romans. It nevertheless shows many evidences of compilation by the aid of various pieces at the redactor's disposal, a process to which reference has already so often been made that it seems superfluous to dwell long upon it now. Let the reader but observe the disconnected character of the five pieces of which ch. 16 consists, each of which either has no relation to the preceding, or is in contradiction with it. The recommendation of Phœbe v. 1 f. hangs in the air. The greetings of vv. 3-16 presuppose a previous residence of Paul at Rome and a circle of acquaintances formed there, notwithstanding the positive statements on the subject in 1 8-13 and 15 22 f. The warning against false teachers in vv. 17-20 finds no point of attachment in what precedes. The greetings of others in vv. 21-23 raise unanswered questions, not the least of these being those which arise in view of the existence of the already complete list in 3-16, and the mention of all the churches at the close. The detached character of the doxology in vv. 25-27 is shown by the fact that in many MSS it occurs after 14 23.

14. Improbability of traditional theory.

The examples cited, along with others which might be adduced (cp van Manen, Paulus, 2 34-101), show conclusively that the 'epistle' has been compiled with the help of previously existing documents. There are also other reasons, however, against accepting the voice of tradition regarding the origin of the work. Now and then the contents themselves reveal quite clearly that they cannot be from Paul (ob. 64 A.D.), so that we have no need to dwell upon the improbability of supposing that Paul, a tentmaker by calling and personally unknown to the Christians at Rome, addressed to that place an epistle so broad and so deep, written in so exalted and authoritative a tone; nor upon the question as to how it was possible that such an epistle should, so far as appears, have failed to make the slightest impression, whether good or bad, at the time, and was doomed to lie for more than half a century buried in the archives of the Christian church at Rome in impenetrable obscurity, until suddenly it re-emerged to light, honoured and quoted as an authority by—the gnostics! Evanson long ago (1792) pointed to the fact that the church addressed in it was apparently of long standing, and to the silent assumption in 11 12 15 21 f. that the destruction of Jerusalem in 70 A.D. was a thing of the past. As regards the first of these points, he compared what is said in Acts and called attention to the fact that nothing is there said of any project of Paul's to visit Rome before he had been compelled by Festus to make appeal to the emperor (25 10-12), nor yet anything about an Epistle to the Romans or about any Christian community of any kind met there by the apostle (28 11-31). Yet even if we leave Acts out of account as being incomplete and not in all respects wholly trustworthy, what the epistle itself says and assumes with regard to the Christian church at Rome is assuredly a good deal more than, in all probability, could have been alleged about it at so early a date as 59 A.D., the year in which it is usually held to have been written by Paul.

15. Reflection of later age.

The faith of the Roman Church is supposed to be known 'throughout the whole world'; and Paul is filled with desire to make its acquaintance in order that so he may be refreshed (1 8 12). The faith of both rests on the same foundation. The Christians of Rome are Pauline Christians.

Like him they are justified by faith (5 1); reconciled with God (5 11); free from the dominion of sin and now in the uninterrupted service of God (8 18-22); no longer under the law but under grace, so that they now live in newness of spirit and not in oldness of the letter (6 15 7 6). They are well acquainted with Paulinism. They know it as a definite form of doctrine and have fully and freely given their assent to it—'Ye were servants of sin but ye became obedient from the heart to that form of teaching whereunto ye were delivered' (ἦτε δοῦλοι τῆς ἁμαρτίας, ὑπηκούσατε δὲ ἐκ καρδίας εἰς ὃν παρεδόθητε τύπον διδαχῆς: 6 17). It is possible to speak to them without any fear of misunderstanding, about 'faith' (πίστις) and 'grace' (χάρις), 'righteousness' (δικαιοσύνη) and 'love' (ἀγάπη), 'believing' (πιστεύειν) and 'being justified' (δικαιοῦσθαι), 'being justified by faith' (δικαιοῦσθαι ἐκ πίστεως) and 'by works of law' (ἐξ ἔργων νόμου), 'sinning without law' (ἁμαρτάνειν ἀνόμως) and 'under law' (ἐννόμως or ἐν νόμῳ), 'being delivered up' (παραδοθῆναι) and 'dying for men' (ἀποθανεῖν ὑπὲρ ἀνθρώπων), 'redemption' (ἀπολύτρωσις), 'being baptized into Christ' (βαπτισθῆναι εἰς Χριστόν), 'being crucified with [Christ]' (συσταυροῦσθαι [Χριστῷ]); 'living after the flesh' (ζῆν κατὰ σάρκα), 'after the spirit' (κατὰ πνεῦμα), 'to God' (τῷ Θεῷ), 'in Christ' (ἐν Χριστῷ); to use such expressions as: 'for there is no distinction' (οὐ γάρ ἐστιν διαστολή: 3 22); 'but where there is no law neither is there transgression' (οὗ δὲ οὐκ ἔστιν νόμος οὐδὲ παράβασις: 4 15); 'but where sin abounded, grace abounded more exceedingly' (οὗ δὲ ἐπλεόνασεν ἡ ἁμαρτία, ὑπερεπερίσσευσεν ἡ χάρις: 5 20); 'to be under law,' 'under grace' (εἶναι ὑπὸ νόμον, ὑπὸ χάριν: 6 14); 'spirit of adoption,' 'Abba, Father' (πνεῦμα υἱοθεσίας, Ἀββᾶ ὁ πατήρ: 8 15); to throw out such questions as these: Whether or not there be with respect to Jews and Greeks 'respect of persons with God' (προσωπολημψία παρὰ Θεῷ 2 11)? Has the Jew as such any advantage over the Greek, when both have sinned (3 9-20)? In how far does any importance at all still attach to circumcision (2 25-29)? What value has the law (2 12-29 3 19-22 27-31 7 1-6)? Does faith ever make it void (3 31)? In what sense may we pride ourselves on having Abraham to our father (4)? Must we not think that the doctrine of grace leads to continuance in sin (6 1)? Is not the conviction that we are not under the law but under grace, conducive to sin (6 15)? Can the law be held responsible for sin because by means of the law we were brought to the knowledge of sin (7 7)?

All this is unthinkable at so early a date as the year 59 A.D. There is, moreover, the one great simple fact which overrides these considerations, and thrusts them, so to speak, into the background—this, namely, that the Paulinism with which we are made acquainted in the Pauline Epistles, and particularly in that to the Romans, is of more recent date than the historical Paul.

16. A developed faith.

Compared with what the first disciples of Jesus believed and professed, it is not merely a remarkable divergence; it is in point of fact a new and higher development from the first Christianity. It presupposes, to speak with Loman, 'a richly developed stage of theological thought.' It has learned to break with Judaism and to regard the standpoint of the law as once for all past and done with, substituting in its place that of grace as the alone true and valid one. The new life 'under grace' stands in sharp antithesis to the old one 'under the law' (6 14). It knows, and it is, a new divine revelation; it has a theology, a christology, and a soteriology, which bear witness to a more advanced thinking and to a deeper experience of life than could possibly have been looked for within the first few years after the crucifixion. It is a remarkable forward step, a rich and far-reaching reform of the most ancient type of Christianity; now, a man does not become at one and the same moment the adherent of a new religion and its great reformer. All attempts to escape the difficulty so far as Paul is concerned break down in presence of the obvious meaning of Gal. 1 11-23; as was shown years ago by Blom against Straatman (Th. T, 1875, 1-44). It is of no avail continually to hark back to the possibility—which, in fact, no one denies—of a development in Paul's mind during the years that elapsed between his conversion and the writing of his epistles. The Paulinism of the epistles in question is, on their own showing, in its main features at least (with which we are here concerned) as old as the Christian life of Paul; but such a Paulinism is even for thoughtful believers in the supernatural inconceivable as having come into existence immediately after Paul had become a Christian. Let the student read and ponder the sketch of Paulinism given by van Manen in Paulus, 2 126-140, cp 211-217; and in PAUL, § 40.

17. Kinship with gnosis.

The kinship of Paulinism (especially in the form in which it occurs in the Epistle to the Romans) with gnosis, which has been recognised and remarked both by older and by younger critics—amongst others by Basilides, Marcion, Valentinus, Irenæus, Tertullian, Holsten, Hilgenfeld, Scholten, Heinrici, Pfleiderer, Weizsäcker, Harnack (cp van Manen, Paulus, 2 154-166)—leads also to the same conclusion: that Paul cannot have written this epistle. As to the precise date at which (Christian) gnosis first made its appearance there may be some measure of uncertainty: whether in the last years of Trajan (ob. 117 A.D.), as is commonly supposed, or perhaps some decades earlier; in no event can the date be carried back very far, and certainly not so far back as to within a few years of the death of Jesus. With regard to this it is not legitimate to argue, with Baljon (Gesch. 77), that in the Pauline gnosis 'no doctrine of a demiurge, no theory of æons is found.' It is years since Harnack (DG(2) 1 196-7) rightly showed that the essence of the matter is not to be looked for in such details as these.

18. Other signs of later age.

In addition to the assumed acquaintance (already remarked on) of the readers of the epistle with the Pauline gospel, there are other peculiarities that indicate the church addressed as one of long standing. It is acquainted with various types of doctrine (6 17). It can look back upon its conversion as an event that had taken place a considerable time ago (13 11). It has need of being stirred up to a renewal of its mind (12 2) and of many other exhortations (12-14). It has in its midst high-minded persons whose thoughts exalt themselves above the measure of faith given them (12 3). It does not seem superfluous to remind them that each belongs to the other as members of one body endowed with differing gifts. There are prophets, ministers, teachers, exhorters, givers, rulers, and those who show mercy, and it appears to be necessary that each should be reminded of what he ought to do or how he ought to behave. The prophet must keep within the limits of the faith that has been received, and be careful to speak according to the proportion of that faith (κατὰ τὴν ἀναλογίαν τῆς πίστεως, 12 6); the minister, the teacher, and the exhorter must each busy himself exclusively with the work entrusted to him; the giver must discharge his task with simplicity, the ruler his with diligence; he that shows mercy is to do so with cheerfulness (12 4-8). The mutual relations must be considered anew and carefully regulated, both in general (12 9-21 13 8-10), and, in particular, with respect to the special 'necessities of the saints,' the duty of hospitality, the attitude to be maintained towards persecutors (12 12 ff.), the public authority, and the fulfilment of the duties of citizenship (13 1-7). A vigorous exhortation to vigilance and an earnest warning against revellings and drunkenness, chambering and wantonness, strife and envy, are not superfluous (13 11-14). There are weak ones in the faith, who avoid the use of wine and flesh (14 1 f. 21); others who hold one day holy above others, and as regards their food consider themselves bound by obsolete precepts regarding clean and unclean (14 5 f. 14 f. 20). Others again who regard all these things with lofty disdain, making no distinction between clean and unclean food, deeming that they are free to eat and drink as they choose, and that all days are alike; but these, just because of the freedom they rejoice in, give offence to many brethren and are the cause of their moral declension (14 5 f. 13 15 20-23). These divergent practices have already continued for so long that the writer, so far as the first two (wine and flesh, clean and unclean) are concerned, is in perplexity between them himself, and has no other plan than to raise himself above them all in order to urge a general point of view—a genuinely 'catholic' one—of 'give and take,' in which the principle of freedom is recommended and its application urged in the fine maxims: let no one give offence, let each one be fully persuaded in his own mind, all that is not of faith is sin (14 5 13 23).

The church is exposed to persecution; it suffers with Christ. It has need of comfort. What is said in this connection cannot be explained from any circumstances at Rome known to us before Nero and the time of the great fire in 64. It points rather to later days when Christians were continually exposed to bloody persecutions. See 5 3-5 8 17-39 12 12 14.

One decisive proof that in our epistle we are listening to the voice of one who lived after the death of Paul in 64 A.D. is to be found in the manner in which the question of the rejection of Israel is handled in chaps. 9-11. That question could not thus occupy the foreground or bulk so largely in the minds of Christian writers and readers as long as Jerusalem was still standing, and there was nothing to support the vague expectation of its approaching overthrow which some entertained. The allusions to the great events of the year 70, the overthrow of the Jewish commonwealth, and the expectations which connected themselves with this event are manifest. Any one who will read what is said, particularly in 11 11-22, about the downfall of the Jews (τὸ παράπτωμα αὐτῶν), about the branches that have been broken off (ἐξεκλάσθησαν κλάδοι) and the 'cutting off' (ἀποτομία) which has come upon those who are fallen (ἐπὶ τοὺς πεσόντας), can be under no misapprehension on this point.

19. Conclusion.

If we now sum up the points that have been touched on in §§ 6-18, we need have no hesitation in deciding that the arguments are convincing: our canonical Epistle to the Romans is not what it seems to be, not a letter written by the apostle and sent to a definite church; it is a tractate, a book, designed to be read aloud at Christian meetings, a piece to be read in Church (kirchliches Vorlesungsstück), or homily, as Spitta (Zur Gesch. 3 59) has phrased it. It is a book written in the form of a letter, not written after the kind of preparation with which we write our books, but compiled rather in a very peculiar manner by use of existing written materials wherein the same subjects were treated in a similar or at least not very divergent way. We can best form some conception of the method followed here by studying the text of one of the synoptical gospels with an eye to the method in which it was presumably composed; or by tracing in detail the manner in which such authors as the writer of the present epistle make use of the OT. They quote from its words alternately verbatim and freely, often, too, without any reference to the OT context, so that we can trace the question only by comparison of the text we possess which has been wholly or partly followed (cp van Manen, Paulus, 2 217-9).

The study of the 'epistle' from the point of view of its probable composition, enables us to distinguish what treatises or portions of treatises were probably made use of before the text came into existence in its present form. In this way the work as a whole makes us acquainted with underlying views then prevalent, and accepted or controverted by our author—on the universality of sin and its fatal consequences (1 18-3 20); on righteousness by faith (3 21-31); on the connection between this and Abraham as father of the faithful (4); the fruits of justification (5); three objections against Paulinism (6 1-14 6 15-7 6 7 7-25); the glories of the new life in Christ (8); the rejection of the Jews (9-11); what is the duty of Christians towards God and man generally, and towards the weak and the principles held by them in particular (12 1-15 13). Such views, however greatly they may vary in purpose and scope, all belong to one main direction, one school of thought, the Pauline. We give them this name because we gain our best and most comprehensive acquaintance with the school from the 'epistles of Paul,' just as we speak of the Johannine School and the Johannine tendency, although we know nothing about the connection between the school or tendency on the one side, and the well-known apostolic name connected with it on the other. To suppose that the school originated from the historical Paul, as was formerly maintained by Steck, is possible; but the supposition finds no support in any historical facts with which we are acquainted (cp Paulus, 2 222-227).

20. The author. What is certain, at any rate, is that the canonical epistle is not by Paul. A writing that is so called, but on closer examination is seen to be no epistle but rather a compilation, in which, moreover, are embedded pieces that plainly show their origin in a later time, cannot possibly be attributed to the 'apostle of the Gentiles.' In this connection, however, it is inappropriate to speak of deception or forgery or pious fraud. There is not the slightest reason for supposing that our author had the faintest intention of misleading his readers, whether contemporaries or belonging to remote posterity. He simply did what so many others did in his day; he wrote something in the form (freely chosen) of a tractate, a book, or an epistle, under the name of some one whom he esteemed or whose name he could most conveniently and best associate with his work, without any wrong intention or bad faith, because he belonged or wished to be thought to belong, to the party or school which was wont to rally under his master's standard. His own name remained unknown; but his nom de plume was preserved and passed from mouth to mouth wherever his work was received and read. What reason was there for inquiring and searching after his real name if the work itself was read, quoted, copied, and circulated with general approval? The work might bear evidence of the artist so far as concerned person, surroundings, sufferings. In this case, according to the epistle, he was a Christian, one of the Pauline School, a polished and educated man with a heart full of zeal for the religious needs of humanity: a Paulinist, however, of the right wing.

21. His method. He raises himself above the different shades of opinion which he knows so well by letting them find alternate expression, by letting the voice now of the one and now of the other be heard. He gives utterance to words so sharply explicit as these: 'by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified in his sight' (3 20); 'now are we delivered from the law wherein we were held' (7 6); but also to other words, so friendly in their tone as regards the very same law: 'not the hearers . . . but the doers of the law shall be justified' (2 13); 'the law is holy,' 'spiritual' (7 12 14). He asseverates that there is no distinction between Jew and Greek (3 22); that there is with God no acceptance of persons (2 11); and that the privileges of the Jew are many (3 1 f.); that Israel is in a very special way the people of God (9 4 f. 11 1). He says that to be a son of Abraham after the flesh signifies nothing (4 1 ff.), and that to be of the seed of Abraham is a specially great privilege (11 1). He recognises at one time that the wrath of God is now manifest upon the sins of men (1 18), and at another that this is yet to come (2 5-8). He speaks of it as a matter of experience that the Christian has broken with sin for good and has become a wholly new creature (5 1-7 6 and 8), and also lays down a quite different doctrine to the effect that he is still 'sold under sin,' continually doing the thing he would not, and he longs for emancipation from the body (7 7-25). He embraces the doctrine of a redemption of man from a power hostile to God on the ground of the love of the father (3 24 5 1 8 3 32), and with this he associates the thought of an atoning sacrifice on behalf of the sinner offered to God by Christ 'in his blood' (3 25). Paul is to him the called apostle of the Gentiles (1 1 5 13 f. 15 16 18); but also warmly attached to the Jews and ready to do everything for them (9 1-3 10 1 11 1); in possession of the 'first fruits of the spirit,' always working 'in the power of God's spirit,' but also in the manner of the original apostles 'in the power of signs and wonders' (15 19). He recognises Jesus as God's son, who has appeared 'in the likeness of sinful flesh' (8 3 32); but he also says that he is of Israel according to the flesh (9 5), and that he was first exalted to the dignity of divine sonship by his resurrection (1 3 f. 15 12). He speaks with the same facility of 'Jesus,' 'Jesus Christ,' and 'our Lord Jesus Christ' as he speaks of 'Christ' and 'Christ Jesus.' For him all distinction in the use of these various designations has practically disappeared. Not seldom do we find him affirming and denying on the same page. He knows how to give and take, when to evade arguments, and when to meet them. Already we perceive in him something of the 'catholic' spirit which rises above the strife of parties; which serves the truth and promotes the unity of believers, by siding now with the right wing, now with the left, by gliding over thorny points, and boldly thrusting difficulties aside.

22. His origin. As for origin, he was probably a Greek. He thinks in Greek, speaks Greek, and seems to have used no other books than those which he could have consulted in Greek (cp Paulus, 2 186-190). His home we can place equally well in the E. or in the W. In the E., and particularly in Antioch or elsewhere in Syria, because Paulinism probably had its origin there. The catholic strain, on the other hand, within the limits of the Pauline movement, seems rather to have proceeded from Rome. The possibility is not excluded that the main portions of the letter, or if you will, of a letter, to the Romans, were written in the E., and that the last touches were put to it in Rome or elsewhere in the W.; in other words, that it was there that the epistle took the final form in which we now know it. There is a considerable number of writings which passed over from the hands of the Gnostics into those of 'catholic'-minded Christians, and in the transition were here and there revised and corrected, brought into agreement, somewhat more than appeared in their original form, with the prevailing type of what was held to be orthodox (cp Lipsius, Apokr. Ap.-gesch. 1883-1887; Usener, Rel.-gesch. Unters. 1, 1889; van Manen, Paulus, 2 227-230).

23. Date. The author has not given us the date of his work, and we can guess it only approximately. Broadly speaking, we may say, not earlier than the end of the first nor later than the middle of the second century. Not before the end of the first century, because after the death of Paul (about 64 A.D.) time enough must be allowed to admit of epistles being written in his name as that of a highly placed and authoritative exponent of Christianity,—the representative, not to say the 'father,' of Paulinism, a forward-reaching spiritual movement, a deeply penetrating and largely framed reform of that oldest Christianity which embodied the faith and expectations of the first disciples of Jesus after the crucifixion. Paulinism in this sense certainly did not come into existence until after the downfall of the Jewish state in 70 A.D., and —if we consider its kinship with gnosticism, and various other features which it shows—surely not before the end of the first, or the beginning of the second, century. On the other side, we may venture to say, not later than the middle of the second century. Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, Irenæus, use the book towards the end of that century, and we may be sure did not hold it for a recent composition. So also Theophilus ad Autolycum, 3 14, who about 180 A.D. cited Rom. 13 7 f. as 'divine word' (θεῖος λόγος). Basilides (125), and Marcion, who made his appearance at Rome in 138, knew the epistle as an authoritative work of 'the apostle.' Aristides (125-126), James (130), 1 Peter (130-140) in like manner show acquaintance with the epistle. Various circumstances combined justify the supposition that it was written probably about 120 A.D., whilst some portions of it in their original form may be regarded as somewhat earlier (cp Paulus, 2 296-303 3 312-315).

24. Value. If, in conclusion, we are met by the question, 'What is the value of the writing when one can no longer regard it as an epistle of Paul to the Romans?' it must never be forgotten that the incisiveness of its dialectic, the arresting character of certain of its passages, the singular power especially of some of its briefer utterances and outpourings of the heart, the edifying nature of much of the contents, remain as they were before. The religious and ethical value, greater at all times than the æsthetic, is not diminished. The historical value, on the other hand, is considerably enhanced. True, we no longer find in it, what we were formerly supposed to find, the interesting (though in large measure not well understood) writing of the apostle, written, in the days of his activity among the Gentiles, to a church which was personally unknown to him. But what have we in its place? A book of great significance for our knowledge of the ancient Christianity that almost immediately succeeded the apostolic (the Christianity of the disciples of Jesus in the years that followed his death). There is no work from Christian antiquity that contributes more largely to our knowledge of Paulinism (whether in its first form—a form in which it has not reached us in any deliberate writing—or in its subsequent development) in its strength as an inspiring directory for conduct, and in the richness and depth of its religious thought and experience.

25. Defenders of genuineness. No serious efforts to defend the genuineness of the epistle have as yet ever been attempted. Those offered casually and in passing, as it were, rely (as for example in Meyer-Weiss, Komm.[9], 1899, 33-34, and in S. Davidson, Introd.[3], 1894, 117-119, 150-2) on the so-called external evidence. That is to say, its defenders rely on what is excellent proof of the existence of the epistle at the time when it was cited, or what clearly presupposes an acquaintance with it, but is of no significance whatever when the question is whether the work was in reality written by the individual who from the first was named as its author. This the Tübingen school have long perceived; Baur also did not rely on such arguments. Instead of doing so he thus expressed himself (Paulus 1[2], 1866, 276):

'Against these four epistles (Rom., 1 and 2 Cor., Gal.) not only has even the slightest suspicion of spuriousness never been raised, but in fact they bear on their face the mark of Pauline originality so uncontestably that it is impossible to imagine by what right any critical doubt could ever possibly assert itself regarding them.'

The utterance, it will be observed, wholly ignores Evanson, 1792, and of course also Bruno Bauer, who did not publish his criticism till 1851; but it also ignores the view taken by so many, including F. C. von Baur himself, who have vied with one another in the disintegration of the epistle, as also the possibility that yet others at a later date might perceive what Baur himself had not observed; nor yet does it take account of the unsatisfactoriness of any assertion (however plausible it may sound) as to the 'originality' of Paul, whom after all we know only by means of the picture that has been constructed with the aid of those very epistles with regard to which we wish to inquire whether they really were written by him. Nothing therefore is added to the argument when a countless host of others since Baur are never weary of repeating that 'even the Tübingen school' have raised no doubts as to the genuineness. The observation is correct, it is true. Only they forget to add: nor yet have they offered proofs that it is genuine.

Meyer-Weiss, S. Davidson, and others remain equally sparing of their arguments even after the criticism of a later date has made its voice heard. They put it aside with a single word. Weiss, with a reference to a 'Parody,' by C. Hesedamm, Der Römerbrief beurtheilt u. geviertheilt, 1891. Davidson, with the observation that the genuineness, apart from the conclusive testimony of witnesses, is fully guaranteed by internal evidence.

'The internal character of the epistle and its historical allusions coincide with the external evidence in proving it an authentic production of the apostle. It bears the marks of his vigorous mind; the language and style being remarkably characteristic.'

He omits, however, to tell us how he knows that anything is a 'production,' not to say an 'authentic production of the apostle'; nor yet how he has obtained his knowledge of the mind of Paul; nor yet why it is impossible for a pseudonymous author to have any characteristic language and style.

Harnack (ACL ii. 1 [1897] p. vii) considers himself absolved from going into the investigation until the representatives of the newer criticism 'shall have rigorously carried out the task incumbent on them of working out everything pertaining to the subject afresh.'

Jülicher (Einl., 1894, p. 17, 1901[2], p. 19) once and again resorted to a severe attack on 'hypercriticism' and 'pseudocriticism,' and subsequently proceeded, in dealing with the Epistle to the Romans, as if nobody had ever at any time argued against its genuineness.

Sanday and Headlam (Comm., 1895, pp. 85-98) discuss exhaustively the integrity of the epistle, especially as regards chaps. 15-16, but say little about the history of the question of genuineness. They cursorily dismiss some of the objections without showing that they have really grasped their proper significance. Counter-arguments are practically not heard. So also in other commentaries whose authors had heard anything about the newer criticism referred to. Holsten ('Krit. Briefe üb. die neueste paulin. Hypothese' in Prot. Kirchenztg., 1889), Pfleiderer (Paulinismus[2], 1890), Holtzmann (Einl.[3], 1892), Lipsius (HC[2], 1892, pp. 83 f.), and others, made some general observations in favour of the genuineness that had been called in question. But these discussions were little more than insignificant 'affairs of outposts'; no real battle was delivered nor even any serious attack prepared.

Then came Zahn (Einl.[2], 1900, 1 3) with his censure on his comrades in arms against the Tübingen school for their error in having defended indeed the genuineness of the epistles 'rejected' by Baur, but not that of the 'principal epistles,' 'although Baur and his disciples had never so much as even attempted any proof for the positive part of their results.' Forthwith he addressed himself to the long postponed task. He gave some half-dozen general observations (pp. 112-116) not differing in substance from those which had already been made; referred to the various particular investigations to be made in a later part of the work, including the detailed treatment of the Epistle to the Romans (pp. 251-310) where 31 full pages are devoted to the subject of the integrity and not a single word to the question of genuineness.

Baljon (Gesch., 1901) perceived that something more than this was necessary to put the newer criticism to silence, if it was wrong. But what he wrote with this end in view was neither (as might have been expected) a confutation of the objections urged, nor yet an argument for the genuineness at least as solid and good as (in intention at all events) that made on behalf of Philippians, but simply a couple of pages (pp. 97-100) devoted to the history of the newer criticism and a few observations upon the objections urged by van Manen.

So far as appears, no one has as yet addressed himself to the task of an orderly scientific discussion of the arguments on the other side, or to an effective setting forth of the arguments on behalf of the genuineness.

26. Literature. Good commentaries—though all, it may be remarked, written from the point of view of an undisputed and therefore indisputable genuineness—are those of B. Weiss [6] (=Meyer-Weiss[9]), 1899, R. A. Lipsius (HC[2], 1892), W. Sanday and A. C. Headlam (Int. Crit. Comm. 1895). They all take account of their important predecessors (see Weiss 39-43, Lipsius vii-viii, Sanday xcviii-cix), amongst whom are Origen (ob. 254), Chrysostom (ob. 407), Melanchthon (1560), Calvin (1564), Grotius (1645), Tholuck (1877), Rückert (1839)[2], J. G. Reiche (1833-34), C. F. A. Fritzsche (1836-43), van Hengel (1854-59), de Wette (1847)[4]; as also of the works of H. Alford (ob. 1871), B. Jowett (1855, 1859)[2], C. A. Vaughan (1874)[4], W. Kelly (1873), F. Godet (1879, ET 1881), G. Volkmar (1875). Cp H. J. Holtzmann, Einl.[3] (1892), 230-246; S. Davidson, Intr.[3] (1894), 1 105-152, Th. Zahn, Einl.[2] (1900), 1 251-310, J. M. S. 1. Peter-Paul tradition. The earliest period of the Christian community in Rome is wrapped in impenetrable obscurity. Tradition attributes its founding to the joint labours of the apostles Peter and Paul. This tradition, however, is unworthy of our confidence. It is comparatively recent. The oldest traces of its existence do not go back farther than to the close of the second century.

According to a notice in Eusebius (HE ii. 25 8), 'Dionysius of Corinth,' about the year 170 A.D., or somewhat later (see OLD CHRISTIAN LITERATURE, § 31), wrote to the Romans as follows: 'So also by this so weighty admonition [of yours]—the allusion is to the epistle of the Romans to the Corinthians (=1 Clem.)—ye have brought together [anew] that planting [aforetime] made by Peter and Paul, of the [churches of the] Romans and of the Corinthians. For, indeed, these two both planted us in our Corinth and likewise taught us; in like manner also after having taught together in Italy they suffered martyrdom about the same time' [not necessarily, of course, at the same hour, or on the same day, the same month, or even the same year] (ταῦτα καὶ ὑμεῖς διὰ τῆς τοσαύτης νουθεσίας τὴν ἀπὸ Πέτρου καὶ Παύλου φυτείαν γενηθεῖσαν Ῥωμαίων τε καὶ Κορινθίων συνεκεράσατε. καὶ γὰρ ἄμφω καὶ εἰς τὴν ἡμετέραν Κόρινθον φυτεύσαντες ἡμᾶς ὁμοίως ἐδίδαξαν. ὁμοίως δὲ καὶ εἰς τὴν Ἰταλίαν ὁμόσε διδάξαντες ἐμαρτύρησαν κατὰ τὸν αὐτὸν καιρόν). Here the 'planting' or founding of the churches, alike of Rome and of Corinth, is clearly recognised to have been the work of the apostles Peter and Paul. It is of no avail to say with Sanday and Headlam (Comm. p. xxix) that the 'planting' referred to (φυτεύειν; cp 1 Cor. 3 6 ff. 9 7) is not to be taken 'in the sense of first foundation.' We are not responsible for what 'Dionysius' says; but we are under obligation to understand it in the sense in which he meant it.

The same remark holds good with reference to Irenæus when he speaks of the church at Rome as having been 'founded and constituted by the two very glorious apostles Peter and Paul' ('a gloriosissimis duobus apostolis Petro et Paulo Romæ fundata et constituta,' iii. 3 1). These two, subsequently spoken of as 'the blessed apostles,' the same authority (about 180 A.D.) goes on to state, after having founded and built up the church, handed over the government to Linus (θεμελιώσαντες οὖν καὶ οἰκοδομήσαντες οἱ μακάριοι ἀπόστολοι τὴν ἐκκλησίαν Λίνῳ τὴν τῆς ἐπισκοπῆς λειτουργίαν ἐνεχείρισαν, iii. 3 2; Eus. HE v. 6 1). In Eus. HE v. 8 2 he tells us that Matthew wrote a gospel for the Hebrews in their own tongue 'whilst Peter and Paul were preaching the Gospel at Rome and founding the church' (τοῦ Πέτρου καὶ τοῦ Παύλου ἐν Ῥώμῃ εὐαγγελιζομένων καὶ θεμελιούντων τὴν ἐκκλησίαν).

2. Not trustworthy. These clear testimonies, however, to the founding of the church of Rome by Peter and Paul—however unhesitatingly they may have been accepted and built upon in later times—are one and all quite unworthy of credence. Not only are they relatively recent and obviously framed in accordance with a settled policy of glorifying the unity of the church as having been manifest even in its oldest communities; what is more to the point, they are at variance with older representations, whether we receive these with absolute confidence or not, of the course of events connected with the founding of a Christian community in Rome.

'Ignatius,' in his epistle to the Romans (4 3), written about the middle of the second century (see OLD-CHRISTIAN LITERATURE, §§ 28 f.), indeed mentions 'Peter and Paul' as known and influential teachers of the church he is addressing, but says nothing as to their having founded it. The church of Rome itself speaks by the mouth of 'Clement' in the First Epistle to the Corinthians, dating from about the year 140 A.D. (see OLD-CHRISTIAN LITERATURE, §§ 23-26), of Peter and Paul as known witnesses to the truth (1 Clem. 5 3-7), but not as founders of the church. Acts is not aware of any labours of Peter and Paul carried out in common at Rome. From 28 17-28 it might seem to be a possible inference that Paul was the first to speak about Christianity to the leading Jews there; but of Peter there is no word in this connection. Just as little is Peter mentioned in the canonical epistle to the Romans, even in conjunction with 'Paul' when this apostle is speaking of his desire to become acquainted with the Christians of the metropolis, whose faith is everywhere spoken of, and whom he hopes ere long to be able to meet (1 3-15 15 22-24 28 f. 16 19). Indeed, the arrangements between Paul on the one hand, and James, Cephas, and John on the other, according to Gal. 2 9, 'we to the Gentiles and they to the circumcision' (ἡμεῖς εἰς τὰ ἔθνη, αὐτοὶ δὲ εἰς τὴν περιτομήν), do not lead us to expect to find in epistles of Paul any word of co-operation between Peter and Paul in the founding of individual churches. What is related as to this at a later date with regard to Rome cannot hold good in presence of the assurance given us by the Epistle to the Romans, whether by Paul himself or by an anonymous author using his name, that at Rome there was a considerable Christian community before Paul could possibly have been able to speak a single word there.

3. So also Peter-tradition. Matters do not stand much better with the belief—held absolutely for many centuries, called in question at the Reformation, and again at a later period maintained by many Protestants also—according to which the church of Rome was founded by Peter alone. This tradition also deserves no credence, whether in the form which represents Peter as having been bishop of Rome for twenty-five years after the founding of the church, or in the simpler form which merely conjectures that the apostle may have contributed something to the formation and extension of the church, or at least in later years may have visited it for a shorter or longer period. The founding of the church by Peter is excluded by the silence of Ignatius and Clement on the subject, and still more by the evidence of Acts, Galatians, and Romans. Not only do they say nothing positive to this effect; they make it perfectly clear that from the point of view of their respective authors such a thing is not to be thought of. Acts closes its account of Peter in 12 17 with the words, 'and he departed, and went to another place' (καὶ ἐξελθὼν ἐπορεύθη εἰς ἕτερον τόπον), and in the rest of the book Peter's name is only once again mentioned, and in a different connection (15 6-20), where he is represented as again in Jerusalem. In view of this passage 12 17 cannot be understood as referring to a journey to Rome for any lengthened period, not to speak of a period of five and twenty years. Neither, however, can we understand a visit to Rome of shorter duration, such as Harnack (ACL 2 1 [1897], 240-244, 704-710) still, with many, regards as probable, not even with the aid of the assumption that the contents of Acts 15 were taken from another source than that from which 'Luke' derived his other statements regarding Peter in Acts 1-12. The words quoted do not 'of course' say that we are to think of a mere visit whether to Rome or to any other place. They are quite clearly intended merely to indicate that the author does not propose to follow the fortunes of Peter further: 'and going his way, he journeyed to another place.' To understand Rome as intended here becomes possible only after one has learned otherwhere, rightly or wrongly, to speak of a sojourn of the apostle in the metropolis. Acts says nothing of this, and plainly presupposes rather the exact opposite, since chap. 15 alluded to Peter as again in Jerusalem, and 28 17-28, speaking of Paul's meeting with Jews at Rome, leaves no room for the supposition that Peter had preceded him there as a preacher of Christianity. Galatians knows no residence of Peter other than Antioch (2 11-21)—apart from Jerusalem where, according to 1 18 2 1-10, he seems to have his home, an agreement that he is to address himself to 'the circumcision' being expressly mentioned. Romans knows of Christians in Rome; refers to their conversion from Judaism and heathendom, their fidelity to the Pauline type of doctrine once received (6 17), and the spiritual bond subsisting between them, or many of them, and Paul; but has not a word to say about any connection, whether of long or short duration, between them and the apostle Peter, and does not even so much as mention his name. The writer, whoever he may have been, it has been rightly remarked, has no acquaintance with any tradition which represented Peter as having been the founder of the Roman Church. His declaration made in 15 20 f. that he, 'Paul,' would not build upon another man's foundation, however inconsistent with the desire expressed in 1 8-15 and 15 22-24 29, wholly excludes it. Especially so as soon as by the word 'another' we understand, as is usually the case, an apostle—in this instance Peter.

It is, in fact, improbable that Peter ever set foot in Rome. The later traditions regarding this, including those handed down by Eusebius, have no claim to our acceptance, as has often been convincingly shown by many scholars (and recently by C. Clemen, Preuss. Jahrb., 1901, pp. 404-417, and C. Erbes, Ztschr. f. Kirchengesch., 1901, pp. 1-47, 161-231). They possess no higher value than those relating to Thomas's preaching to the Parthians, Andrew's to the Scythians, John's in Asia Minor. When Eusebius, immediately afterwards (iii. 3 2, cp ii. 25 5), gives expression to the conjecture that Peter preached to the Jews of the dispersion in Pontus, Galatia, Bithynia, Cappadocia, and Asia, before his crucifixion (head downwards) at Rome, he attributes to him, obviously with his eye on 1 Pet. 1 1, a career which he himself could not possibly reconcile with the details that he gives elsewhere. According to iii. 36 2, Peter was for some time bishop of Antioch before Ignatius; according to ii. 25 8 he was, along with Paul, founder of the churches of Corinth and Rome; according to ii. 14 6, the powerful opponent of Simon Magus at Rome in the reign of Claudius (41-54 A.D.); according to vi. 25 8, the rock upon which the church of Christ is built, and the author of two epistles.

A reference to 1 Pet. 1 1, though often made in conjunction with 5 13, is of no avail to support the view that Peter at some time or other had indeed made a stay, longer or shorter, in Rome. There need, indeed, be no hesitation, not even in presence of the objections of Erbes,[1] to see in 'she that is in Babylon, elect together with [you]' (ἡ ἐν Βαβυλῶνι συνεκλεκτή, 1 Pet. 5 13) an allusion to the church in Rome. In 1 Pet., however, it is not Peter himself who is speaking, but an unknown author writing in the first half of the second century, 130-140 A.D. (OLD-CHRISTIAN LITERATURE, § 20; PETER, EPISTLES OF, §§ 5 ff.; CHRISTIAN, § 8). He is the exponent of a tradition, not met with elsewhere, regarding Peter as apostle in a portion of the countries of Asia Minor where Paul also had laboured, and at the same time of the other widely spread tradition that Peter had his home in Rome. Acts, Galatians, and Romans, so far as we can see, are not yet acquainted with this latest tradition. Even 1 Clem., written professedly by the church of Rome, and probably, in point of fact, originating there, says nothing of a sojourn of Peter in Rome. The writer assuredly would not have passed it over in silence when speaking of Peter's glorious past in chap. 5, or treating of the life-work of the 'apostles' in chaps. 42 and 44, if he had known anything of it. Hermas and Justin, both of them witnesses belonging to the Roman circle, are similarly silent as to aught that Peter may be supposed to have done, said, or endured there.

There are, then, as regards Peter's going to Rome, and as regards his journeyings as a whole, traditions which, in part, are mutually exclusive and in no case admit of being combined together into one consistent whole. The older ones do not imply the supposed fact of the church of Rome having been founded by Peter; they have no knowledge of it, or even bear witness against it by making statements which cannot be harmonised with it. Acts, Galatians, Romans, 1 Clem., undoubtedly come chiefly into consideration here. On the same side there fall to be grouped other NT testimonies to the martyrdom of Peter, and, more precisely, his crucifixion, drawn from very old, if not the oldest, traditions relating to the careers of the apostles, though without mention of the place where this violent death occurred. See Jn. 21 18-22 (cp 13 36) Mt. 10 5 f. 16-18 22-33 23 34 39 24 9 14 Mk. 13 9-13 Lk. 24 47 Acts 1 8. Within the circle of these ancient witnesses we can safely say—apart, if you will, from 1 Pet. 1 1 5 13—of all those in the NT, to which also may be added that of the apostolic fathers, that not a single word or even the remotest hint is found in them as to a sojourn, whether of long or of short duration, of Peter in Rome, whilst, in fact, more than one of them, by implicit or explicit declaration, are irreconcilably at variance with any such supposition. Rather does everything plead for the view that Peter never visited Rome, but worked continuously in Palestine—occasionally, perhaps, outside its limits, but never very far off—and that there, it may well have been in Jerusalem, somewhere about 64 A.D. under Sabinus,[1] or, at all events, some years before the destruction of the temple and city in 70 A.D., he died a martyr's death. [See, further, SIMON PETER.]

4. Paul-tradition: in Acts.

What remains of the late tradition as to the founding of the church of Rome by Peter and Paul conjointly does not need any careful scrutiny after the name of Peter has been eliminated. We are not, in that event, shut up to the alternative: if not by Peter and Paul together, then probably by Paul alone. This is nowhere said in any tradition so far as known to us. Tradition seems rather to have followed this course: since it is impossible that Paul can have founded the church along with Peter, his name must not be thought of in connection with the founding at all. Acts and Pauline Epistles, writings frequently read in a large circle, indicated this.

Acts knows of no Christian church at Rome at a date prior to a possible foundation by Paul after he had proclaimed the glad tidings to the Jews assembled at his lodging (28 17-31). In 28 15, indeed, we read of the 'brethren' who came from Rome to Appii Forum and the Three Taverns to meet Paul, and it is no doubt usual to regard these as having been Christians, but on no adequate grounds. They are, to judge from vv. 17-28, Jews, just as Roman Jews (v. 21) call their kinsmen in Judæa 'the brethren.' They are amazed at Paul's plans, and declare as distinctly as possible in v. 22 that up to that hour they had heard nothing of 'this sect'—i.e., of the Christians—beyond the mere name. All this is in perfect agreement with the current representation in Acts, according to which Paul in his journeyings invariably first addressed himself to the Jews and thereafter to the Gentiles with a view to proceeding to the setting up of a Christian community, whether composed entirely of converted Gentiles, or partly also of former Jews (cp 13 46 and 13-28 passim). The view that by the 'brethren' of Rome, alluded to in 28 15, as also by those of Puteoli in v. 14, we are to understand Christians, rests solely upon the representation in Romans, according to which Christians are found in Rome long before Paul has ever visited that city.

[1] Op cit., below, 16-20. Erbes once more seeks to plead for a sojourn of Peter among the Jews in Babylon, unless perhaps we are to understand Jerusalem.

[1] So Erbes, 212, conjectures, relying upon Jos. Ant. xx. 9 5.

At the same time it must be remembered that the opposite representation in Acts has no historical authoritativeness, being inextricably bound up with the tendency of that book which has been already referred to. Moreover, in Acts 28_{30} f. the founding of a Christian church at Rome by Paul is rather tacitly assumed than asserted in so many words. It is possible that in the 'Acts of Paul' (which were worked over by the writer of our canonical Acts, and also made use of in the composition of the Pauline Epistles, and which themselves in turn had their origin in a redaction and expansion of the recognised We-source) the original journey record (PAUL, § 37; OLD-CHRISTIAN LITERATURE, § 9) may have given a somewhat different account of the conditions which Paul found at Rome and elsewhere in Italy. It may be that, according to that representation, there were already in more than one place at Rome Christians, 'brethren' in another and higher sense than that of mere kinship, and that their figurative designation is adopted by Acts so that the 'brethren' in Puteoli and Rome, according to Acts 28_{14} f. to be understood as Jews who were friendly disposed towards Paul, were at the same time the original Christians of these places.

However that may be, Acts nowhere contains any express statement as to the founding of a Christian church at Rome by Paul; and as little does the epistle to the Romans.

5. In Romans. What Romans implies is, clearly, rather this—that the church had already been long in existence when Paul was cherishing the hope that he might have an opportunity of personally visiting it. This view is wont to be accepted on all hands as just: by the majority, because they hold it to come from the apostle Paul; by others, the friends of advanced criticism, because, however fully convinced of the pseudepigraphical character of the epistle (see ROMANS), they have no reason for doubting it.

6. Romans versus Acts. These have this advantage over the others that they are not, like them, sorely perplexed by Acts which betrays no acquaintance with the epistle held to have been addressed to the church of Rome by Paul at least two years before he himself undertook the journey thither only to become aware on his arrival in the metropolis that no one there had ever heard anything about him or even about Christianity at all otherwise than by report merely. They set down the divergent representations in 'Luke' and 'Paul' simply to the account of the separate writers, and as regards a supposed founding of the church at Rome, can only say that according to 'Luke' it was perhaps the work of Paul, but according to 'Paul,' certainly not. According to 'Luke,' perhaps it was, since we must interpret in accordance with the general tendency of his 'historical' work; according to 'Paul,' because everyone thought so in those days nor yet had any one any knowledge of a founding of the church in Rome by Peter and Paul, or by Peter alone.

7. Other epistles. In other Pauline epistles also there is no trace of acquaintance with any tradition which sought to represent that founding as having been brought about by Paul. In Romans there is no hint, of the kind we meet with in 1 Cor. 4_{14} 2 Cor. 6_{13} 12_{14} Gal. 4_{19}, that 'Paul' can regard those whom he addresses as his 'children.' There is no suggestion of such a relation of Paul to Rome even in Philippians, Philemon, or 1 Clem. $5_{5\text{-}7}$, where there was such ample opportunity to call to mind the founding of the Roman Church by Paul had the writer been minded to refer to it. The Pauline literature says nothing at all about it, nor yet do the kindred writings, 1 Peter, 1 Clement, Hermas, Ignatius. Rather must we say that in all of them the undisputed and indisputable presupposition is that Rome was won for the gospel without the intervention of Paul, either by his epistles or by his later personal intercourse.

8. Founders unknown Jews. Whom then are we to name as founder of the Roman church? 'Not any of the apostles,' as long ago Ambrosiaster in the so-called commentary of Ambrosius in the fourth century rightly answers (cp Sanday and Headlam, pp. xxv, ci). We could almost venture to guess: one or more of those who probably at a quite early date, spread the glad tidings of salvation from Jerusalem westward. There was abundant opportunity in the constant intercourse between Rome and the east, even before the middle of the first century, for travellers from Palestine to return, or come for the first time, to the banks of the Tiber and there to discourse, as they had done in the various other ports and cities they touched on their route, of the 'things concerning Jesus' (τὰ περὶ τοῦ Ἰησοῦ; Acts 18_{25} $28_{23\,31}$), 'the kingdom of God' (ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ θεοῦ; Acts 14_{22} 19_8 20_{25} $28_{23\,31}$), 'the preaching of the gospel' (τὸ εὐαγγελίζεσθαι; Acts 13_{32} $14_{7\,15\,21}$ 15_{35} 16_{10}). It is not necessary to have recourse to the hardly historical account of the first appearance of the apostles at Jerusalem in Acts 2, where, as we read in vv. 10 f., Romans, Jews as well as proselytes, were sojourning (οἱ ἐπιδημοῦντες Ῥωμαῖοι, Ἰουδαῖοί τε καὶ προσήλυτοι). Such Jews living in Rome, as well as Gentiles who had attached themselves to them and professed their religion, may well have visited Jerusalem on other occasions and become messengers, possibly very capable ones, of what they had seen and heard there to their brethren in the metropolis.

9. Jewish settlements at Rome. We shall best picture to ourselves the subsequent course of events if we suppose that the preaching of the gospel and the establishment of the new religion made its way amongst 'Jews and proselytes' in Rome. Whoever wishes to picture to himself the nature of the field in which, now here, now there, the good seed was scattered by unknown sowers, must try to form some conception of the Jewish settlements in Rome as they then were. Very many they were, ordinarily confined within certain precisely defined limits, but within these moving with social freedom bound only in so far as they themselves chose to be so by the customs and practices received from their fathers, the law and what it was held to enjoin on the faithful children of Abraham by descent, or on the proselytes who had joined them. Alternately receiving the favours of the great and bowed down under the heavy burden laid upon them by authorities of a less friendly disposition; constantly exposed to risks of persecution, scorn, and derision, and seldom allowed to pass altogether without notice; engaged in the pursuit of trade and dependent on this for their daily bread, now envied for their wealth and now plunged into the depths of poverty or reduced to the ranks of professional beggars. Such, just before and during the opening decades of the first century, was the manner of life of the Jews in Rome: a great brotherhood, we may call it, broken up into a number of smaller communities; a band of aliens who know how to maintain their old manners and customs, their nationality, and their religion, in spite of many divergencies and divisions among themselves, in the midst of the surrounding Gentiles amongst whom their progenitors had settled. At first they had come to pay a visit there because commerce and political reasons had brought them to the world-city; so it had been already in the days of the Maccabees. Others again had been brought to Rome from their native country as slaves, but on closer acquaintance were hardly found suitable and often received their freedom or even were invested with the privileges of Roman citizens. So, in particular, shortly after the capture of Jerusalem by Pompey in 63 B.C. By Cæsar and others they were shown great favour. Under Tiberius they were expelled from Rome in the year 19 A.D. and partly employed in the war against the pirates of Sardinia. Under Claudius about 49 A.D. they were again banished. Under Nero it would seem they enjoyed no small power and influence. (For details see Schürer, GJV[3], 1898, 3 28-36 and specially the literature referred to there on p. 28, n. 70; cp EB[9], 20 727-730 [1886]).

On this Jewish soil the earliest Roman Christianity, we may safely affirm, had already come into being before the middle of the first century. The oldest distinct trace of its beginnings is found in Suetonius (Claud. 25), where he says of the emperor Claudius that he expelled the Jews from Rome on account of their persistent turbulence under the instigation of Chrestus ('Judæos impulsore Chresto assidue tumultuantes Roma expulit'; cp CHRISTIAN, § 6 iii.). The banishment of the Jews (Acts 18 2 and Dio Cassius 60 6), although probably in the event not judged expedient or perhaps even possible, and in any case not carried out on any large scale, had its occasion in troubles and disturbances which had arisen among the Jews 'impulsore Chresto'—i.e., at the instance or with the help of Chrestus. This Chrestus was, to judge by the manner of speech of those days, no other than (Jesus) Christ; his person and work, the views and expectations connected with him, and his cause were what led Claudius to seek to remove the Jews who had thus become troublesome. Now, though the exact year in which this resolution was come to by the emperor is uncertain, if we remember that at the beginning of his reign (41-54 A.D.) he was, according to Josephus (Ant. xix. 5 2-3), favourably inclined to the Jews, we are led to think of a somewhat later date—let us say with Schürer (32 f.) and others, the year 49 A.D. In that case the movement we are supposing, and its procuring cause, the first systematic preaching of Christianity in Rome, can have begun some months or years previously. We must leave open the question as to whether at a still earlier date some converts, in the course of pilgrimages to Jerusalem or through the agency of third parties in their adopted country, may not have been won for the new confession and the expectations connected with it. Rome had already for a long time been a favourite and much frequented harbour for new ideas in the sphere of religion.

10. Age.

With the date thus arrived at for the founding of the Christian church in Rome it agrees tolerably well that a writer many years later, in Acts 28 17-28, could still speak as if the new sect were known only by name in the world capital when Paul first proclaimed the tidings of salvation to the Jews there, and that another writer—the author of Romans—did not hesitate to assume throughout his work that at that very time there had already been for a long time in Rome believers belonging to various schools of Christian thought and practice. When these books were written the days of the first founding of a church in Rome were already so far removed that in different circles divergent representations were given regarding it, though there was some danger of misrepresentation. 'Luke' is wrong because he does not take account of the existence of any Christian church at Rome before the apostle Paul had made his voice heard there. The Pauline writer, on the other hand, represents the apostle of the Gentiles as knowing that before his arrival among them the faith of the Roman Christians was already 'proclaimed throughout the whole world' (Rom. 1 8), and in 6 17 it is the Pauline form of doctrine whereunto they have been delivered. Both the one view and the other may well be questioned as strict history. Both writers make it manifest that they no longer know the true position of matters so far as details are concerned. At the same time they confirm, each in his own way, the correctness of the date we have arrived at; at the beginning of the second century, the founding of the church at Rome belonged to a considerably remote past and at that distance of time could, speaking broadly, be connected with a delineation of the period when Paul was setting out for, or had arrived at, the metropolis of the empire.

11. Theory of Acts and Rom.

The nearer determination of the date is to be sought in such data as (1) the tradition regarding Paul's plans with reference to a journey to Spain, by way of Rome, where a Christian church no longer needed to be founded (Rom. 15 28 f. cp 1 Clem. 5 5-7); (2) the tradition of Paul's death at Rome, whether, as the ordinary reckoning has it, in 64, as Erbes thinks, on 23rd Feb. 63, or as yet others judge, at some date that cannot be more exactly determined, shortly before or in connection with the persecution of the Christians in the summer of 64; (3) all that relates to the fact of the persecution of the Christians at Rome by Nero; (4) the appearance of the 'Church of Rome' as the writer of Clement's first epistle to the Corinthians; (5) the activity of Marcion and Valentinus among the Christians at Rome; (6) all that tradition tells us of the establishment of a bishop's see at Rome by the apostles Peter and Paul;—a very large series of testimonies continuously assuring us, each in its own way, that the founding of a Christian church at Rome goes back to the middle of the first century of our era.

12. Further data.

The character of this church was, to begin with, no other than was to be expected from its origin within the sphere of 'Jews and proselytes' (§ 4). Ambrosiaster in speaking of Jews alone as fathers of the Christian community at Rome has here again truly said that those who believed confessed Christ and held fast by the law ('ex quibus [Judæis] hi qui crediderant, tradiderunt Romanis ut Christum profitentes legem servarent'). In this there is no 'exaggeration' as Sanday and Headlam (p. 25, n. 3) have thought. They indeed could hardly have thought otherwise as long as they were dominated by belief in the genuineness of the Epistle to the Romans. Whoever deems himself bound to maintain that belief must inevitably assume that already, before Romans was written by Paul—on the ordinary reckoning, that is to say, before 59 A.D.—there were to be met with in Rome two divergent types of Christian faith and profession, the Jewish-Christian and the Pauline. Such an one cannot avoid facing the question: What was the church of Rome at that time? Jewish-Christian? Pauline? Mixed? Yet all the while he is well aware—or the discovery is ever anew forced upon him—that no satisfactory answer to the question can be given. Some texts speak very clearly for the view that the church in question consisted of former gentiles, whilst others say the exact opposite—that it was composed of former Jews (see ROMANS, § 8; van Manen, Paulus, 2 23-25 166-7). Yet we cannot hold with Sanday-Headlam (p. xxvi) and others the theory that it was a 'mixed' church. To such a theory can be applied to the full what these scholars remark in another connection: 'there is no hint of such a state of things,' which moreover would compel us, contrary to the manifest intention of the writer, to think of 'two distinct churches in Rome, one Jewish-Christian, the other Gentile-Christian, and that St. Paul wrote only to the latter.'

13. Character of church.

Any one who, on the other hand, has been able to free himself from the axiom of the genuineness and has satisfied himself of the pseudepigraphical character of this writing of a later time (see ROMANS) no longer feels his hands tied by the various impossible attempts that have been made to answer the questions proposed. He is no longer perplexed by that other troublesome question: How are we to explain the fact that nowhere in history has there remained any trace of the existence of an important Pauline community in Rome, after the apostle's epistle had been sent thither? He takes no notice of all ideas of this sort, the pictures suggested in the epistle of the outward appearance and inward semblance of the Christian church in Rome in the days before Paul could possibly have preached there—as being not renderings of historical actuality but pictures of a past that never had been real, attempts to represent the old-Christian period after many decades had passed. Such a student holds fast by the seemingly insignificant phrase, which yet tells us so much, of the instigating 'Chrestus' by whom the Jews in Rome, according to Suetonius, in the days of Claudius (ob. 49 A.D.) were troubled; and holds by the pretty generally accepted conception as to a Christian Church at Rome which had arisen out of the faith and life, the active exertions, of 'Jews and proselytes' who had been converted to Christ; by what Ambrosiaster has said, with equal sobriety and justice—that Jews living in Rome in the days of the apostles had taught their brethren to confess Christ and to hold fast by the law.

In other words, the church in Rome was originally Jewish-Christian, and probably long remained so.

14. Jewish-Christian.

Gradually more liberal ideas crept in, thanks perhaps to the influence of more advanced preachers from abroad who had wholly or partially outgrown their Judaism, but thanks still more to the ease with which in every sphere of thought new ideas made way in Rome. Whether Paul may have had any active share in this work we are not now in a position to say. Acts leaves us in doubt. Romans testifies to good intentions but not to any work actually done. The 'epistle,' in spite of the seeming abundance of the light it sheds on the events of the years immediately preceding 59 A.D. in Rome, really draws over them all an almost impenetrable veil. It gives surprising glimpses into the history of the development of the church in the direction of greater freedom, the emancipation of Christianity from the dominion of the law, but all from a remote distance in space, probably from the East—Antioch or somewhere else in Syria, it may be, or perchance Asia Minor—at all events, a long way off and in a distinctly later time. In reality, in the more trustworthy tradition there is no trace of all this, but on the contrary, unmistakable proof that Paulinism at Rome though (i.) it struggled for a time for the victory in the days of Marcion (ob. 140 A.D.), (ii.) never really took permanent root there, and never was other than an exotic.

i. That Paulinism flourished in some degree at Rome is very certain, as we may safely infer: (a) from the way in which it is throughout presupposed in Romans (written probably about 120 A.D.; see ROMANS, § 23) that, before his first visit to the capital, Paul already had there a large circle of friends and followers, of whom a whole series is mentioned by name in 16 3-15, and who already for a long time had been instructed in his distinctive type of doctrine (6 17); (b) from the support as well as the opposition, which Marcion met with in Rome, in various capacities, and not least of all as advocate of his 'Apostle,' the Paul of the epistles; (c) from the friendly relation between Peter and Paul presupposed in '1 Peter,' probably written at Rome, in evidence of which relation we point not only to the Pauline form of the writing and to the mention, at the end, of Silvanus and of Mark (cp 2 Peter 3 15 f.), but also and chiefly to the strongly Pauline character of the contents; (d) from the liberal spirit of the gospel according to Mark, probably also written at Rome, along with which perhaps that according to Luke may also be named; (e) from the honour with which 'Clement' as spokesman of the church at Rome writes 'to the Corinthians' concerning Paul (1 Clem. 5 5-7 47 1), and more than once declares that he is influenced by the reading of his 'epistles'; (f) from the mention of Paul along with Peter as a teacher of authority by 'Ignatius' in his epistle to the Romans ('I do not command you as Peter and Paul did,' 4 3); (g) from the wide currency of the later tradition of the founding of the Christian church at Rome by 'Peter and Paul.'

ii. Paulinism was, however, only partially successful, as is no less clearly evident: (a) from the way in which in Romans Paul now admonishes the Jews (chaps. 1-8, passim, and especially 2 17-29) and now shows them the greatest deference (chaps. 9-11 passim, especially 3 1 f. 9 1-5 10 1); (b) from the opposition met with by Marcion in Rome which ended in his expulsion from the new religious community; (c) from the position of the name of Paul in the younger tradition—already in 'Clement' and 'Ignatius'—after that of Peter; (d) from the spirit of works brought out at Rome and extensively read there, the most outstanding of which is the so-called first Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians. The spirit there breathed, notwithstanding the reverence expressed for 'Paul' and the deference occasionally paid to the principles inaugurated by him, is much more of a Jewish-Christian character than one that testifies to warm sympathy with the gospel of freedom; rather one that is slowly gravitating toward the left than one that is averse to the right in principle; a conciliatory and advancing spirit, if you will, yet rather in many respects showing lingering attachment to the old than still standing with both feet upon the basis of the law, firmly rooted in Judaism, filled with the rich contents of the Old Testament; in a word, a spirit that in its inmost nature is becoming Catholic.

The Christian Church of Rome, in its beginnings a shoot from the Jewish stock, in the course of years took up and assimilated elements that were brought to it from other quarters: from the East, and particularly from Syria and Asia Minor. Its power of adaptation was of great use to it in regard to those elements in the new faith which were originally strange in it and were at home rather in the more developed circles of Paulinism, but in adapting itself the original power of the Pauline spiritual movement was in many respects taken away. In the course of years—let us say, in round numbers, between 50 and 150 A.D.—the character of the church at Rome, from being Jewish-Christian with occasional deviations towards the right and towards the left, had become, we shall not say Pauline or Gentile-Christian, but Catholic. At the later date—i.e., about the middle of the second century—it had recently been the scene of the labours of Marcion, who was excommunicated afterwards, Marcion the eager and serious advocate of 'Paul' who had already probably some years before become known to it by means of the 'epistles.' It had at the same time come into touch with, among others, that highly gifted teacher, well nigh lost in broad and deep speculations, alternately held in reverence and covered with scorn, the gnostic Valentinus. It had learned to listen to preachers of repentance like Hermas who, eminently practical, sought to win it before all things else to the urgent duty of conversion. But, however divergent may have been the paths by which it was so dissimilarly led by these and other leaders to clearer insight on many sides, and deeper experience of the fruits of faith as that translated itself into a genuine Christian life, the structure as carried out appeared always, in spite of the multifarious and manifold additions, to rest upon the old foundation—destined, as it would seem, never to become obsolete—that of the law and of Judaism, to which, as a new and indispensable element, confession of Jesus as the Christ, had been added.

How this Christian community at Rome was originally governed and organised can probably be best conjectured, in the absence of all positive information, by calling to mind once more what we know of the spirit of that religious fellowship of the Jews out of which it arose. Like this last it had no political aims, and consequently as yet knew nothing of those who at a later time were to be called rulers and leaders, charged with the care of the outward life of Christians as subjects of the state. The Jewish 'Church,' although it can be so called in respect of the religious confession of its adherents, formed no unity placed under the leadership and government of a single council or of one head. It was made up rather of a great number of separate and independent congregations (συναγωγαί), each having its own synagogue, its own council (γερουσία), its own rulers (ἄρχοντες), who also sometimes at least, were partly called 'elders' (πρεσβύτεροι), and, whether for life (διὰ βίου) or for a limited period, were chosen at the beginning of the Jewish civil year (in September). They were charged with the general leadership of the community, sometimes also with the task associated with the special office of chief of the synagogue (ἀρχισυνάγωγος). The language employed was Greek, as indeed the whole constitution with rulers (ἄρχοντες) and councils (γερουσίαι), so far as form was concerned, seems to have been borrowed from the civil organisation usual in Greek cities (see Schürer, Die Gemeindeverfassung der Juden in Rom, 1879, and GJV(3), 3, pp. 44-51 [1898]).

18. Of Christian Church.

The Christian Church also, we may safely take for granted, very soon after its members had been excommunicated, or had voluntarily withdrawn from the Jewish synagogues in Rome, had their own centres, with a government proper to themselves (modelled mainly, so far as form was concerned, on that which they had left at the call of religious principle and duty), their own places of meeting (συναγωγαί), their own rulers (ἄρχοντες), who are often called elders (πρεσβύτεροι). This was what happened elsewhere throughout the cities of the Dispersion. Why not also in Rome? Acts calls the rulers 'elders' (πρεσβύτεροι) in 11 30 14 23 20 17; whenever Jerusalem is spoken of, where the apostles are regarded as having lived and laboured, we read of 'apostles and elders' (15 2 4 6 23 16 4), just as the same writer elsewhere when referring to the rulers (ἄρχοντες) of the Jews speaks of their 'elders' (2 17 4 5 8 23 6 12 23 14 24 1 .25 15). For the rest, in Acts we find no allusion to any government of Christian communities, just as, in fact, of the community that arose after the arrival of Paul in Rome nothing more is said than that they met in Paul's own house (28 30 f.). In Romans there is no evidence as to the terms employed in this connection by the Christians at Rome, except in a single passage where allusion is made to 'him that ruleth' (ὁ προϊστάμενος: 12 8).

1 Clem., the 'epistle' of the 'church of God' at Rome to that of Corinth, has more to say. The church (ἡ ἐκκλησία) comes before us as a unity embracing all believers within the boundaries of a definite locality; so in the opening words and also in 44 3 47 6 (cp 2 Clem. 2 1 14 1 2 4 1). We are not precluded from thinking that, as in the case of the Jews, this unity was made up of various circles or congregations within the larger whole which comprehended the whole body of the faithful. The supposition finds support when we consider the manner in which the occurrence of divergent ideas and practices with regard to the choice of officials is spoken of. Some consider themselves free in their choice; but others, including the writer, hold themselves bound to tradition and obliged to adhere to the ancient holders of spiritual offices as long as they have not disqualified themselves by misconduct (cp 1 3 3 3 21 6 42 44 59 2). True, this applies, so far as form is concerned, in the first instance and especially, only to the Corinthians who are being addressed, but yet also to the Romans who are speaking of themselves in the plural number (cp 7 1; see OLD-CHRISTIAN LITERATURE, § 24). The most obvious explanation is to be found in the supposition that the divergent views and practices referred to were found in the different circles or congregations (ἐκκλησίαι) within the bounds of the one church —ἡ ἐκκλησία—whether that of Rome or that of Corinth.

However that may be, 'the church' had its rulers or leaders (ἡγούμενοι; 1 3) just as had the Jews (32 2), the Egyptians (51 5), and others (37 3 55 1 60 1). They are usually called 'elders' (πρεσβύτεροι; 1 3 3 3 21 6 44 5 47 6 54 2 57 1, cp 2 Clem. 17 3 5), but in one instance, though in no different sense, 'overseers' (ἐπίσκοποι) and 'deacons' (διάκονοι, 42 4 f., cp 44 1 50 3), charged with the sacred service (λειτουργία, 41 1 44 2 f. 6). They were 'ministering' (λειτουργοῦντες; 46 3) just as in their manner were the Jews (32 2 40), Enoch (9 2), Aaron (43 4), the angels of God (34 5 f.). In this service or ministry were included, or at least came under their superintendence, (1) the reading of scripture (ἡ γραφή or αἱ ἱεραὶ γραφαί)—the OT as we now know it and whatever other writings were at that time reckoned as belonging to it; also Christian writings such as Paul's 'Epistle to the Corinthians' and other treatises, including 1 and 2 Clem. (cp 2 Clem. 19 1 15 1 17 5 1 Clem. 47 1 63 2 7 1, OLD-CHRISTIAN LITERATURE, §§ 2-4; Herm. Vis. ii. 1 3 4 1 Eus. HE ii. 25 8 iii. 38 5)—(2) exhortation (cp 1 Clem. passim) and (3) prayer (1 Clem. 59 3-61 2 Clem. 2 2). All of these, as with the Jews, at least down to near the end of the second century, were performed in Greek.

Of a monarchical government of the Church there is as yet no trace in 1 and 2 Clem. Neither is there any in the Shepherd of Hermas which, like the Epistles of Clement, knows only of elders (Vis. ii. 4 2 3 iii. 1 8) and overseers, along with 'teachers' and 'deacons' (Vis. iii. 5 1 Sim. ix. 27 2). The oldest traces of monarchical church government in Rome are met with in the seven epistles of 'Ignatius' which were probably written there about the middle of the second century, and in the earliest lists of Roman bishops—little trustworthy though these are in their substance, and put together in the interests of the recognition of the episcopate, which was then coming into being, or had recently come to be important. They do not go farther back than to Anicetus, and were probably drawn up under his successor Soter, about 170 A.D. (see Harnack, ACL ii. 1 1897, pp. 70-231, esp. pp. 144-202. See, further, MINISTRY).

19. Importance of Rome.

If the question be asked, finally, as to the influence and importance of the Christian church at Rome, it was small and certainly for the first few decades, not to be compared with that of the church at Jerusalem nor yet with that of other churches of Palestine, Syria, and Asia Minor. It was only gradually in the course of the second century that a change in this respect came about, under the influence of great historical events such as the fall of Jerusalem in 70 A.D., the rebuilding of that city as Ælia Capitolina under Hadrian (see JERUSALEM, §§ 33 f.), and the continual process by which the West manifested its preponderance over the East. In all this there made itself felt the favourable situation of the Christian Church at Rome in the centre of Græco-Roman civilisation; the inborn inclination, and the corresponding aptitude, of what had been the Gentile element in the new church, to lead and soon to dominate believers who had their homes elsewhere, as well as unbelievers; and last, certainly not least, whatever that church was able to contribute from its own resources towards its internal growth and its external prestige. In this connection we may particularly specify: the accession not merely of slaves and people of the lower orders but also of rich and often influential persons, sometimes even from the immediate entourage of the emperor; the courage shown by martyrs there as elsewhere; the zeal of outstanding personalities such as Valentinus and Marcion; the activity of efficient men such as 'Clement' and 'Ignatius' in labouring for the establishment of the Catholic Church; the labour expended on various sides to advance far and near the cause of knowledge, of Christian practice, of edification, of consolation.

Marcion laid the foundations of a recognition of a written norm of truth, of belief (κανὼν τῆς ἀληθείας, τῆς πίστεως), one gospel and ten Pauline Epistles (τὸ Εὐαγγέλιον καὶ ὁ Ἀπόστολος [τὸ Ἀποστολικόν]), which the church as it grew Catholic soon spread far and wide and accepted—along with the older tradition—as the touchstone of truth. Into this (ecclesiastical) canon Rome, according to the list discovered and published in modern times by Muratori, introduced a larger collection of Old-Christian writings differing but slightly in extent from the NT as that was finally fixed by well-nigh the whole of Christendom. Marcion also wrote an orthodoxly conceived 'Epistle' and 'Antitheses' or 'Separation of Law and Gospel' (Antitheses or Separatio legis et evangelii); Valentinus was the author of 'Epistles,' 'Homilies,' and 'Psalms.' Some unknown writer prepared the Gospel according to Mark; 'Clement,' two 'epistles' to the Corinthians, of which the first is a 'Treatise concerning Peace and Harmony' (ἔντευξις περὶ εἰρήνης καὶ ὁμονοίας), conceived, according to its own description of itself (63 2), in the interests of peace in the churches, and especially in the matter of the election of elders, and the second is an 'Exhortation concerning continence' (Συμβουλία περὶ ἐγκρατείας, 15 1). Hermas wrote his Shepherd to stir up all to repentance; 'Ignatius' composed his 'Epistles' upon love for the promotion of martyrdom and on behalf of right views in doctrine and in life. He and others contributed largely to the upbuilding of their own as well as other churches, where their epistles were diligently read. Thus the Roman leaders exercised influence in ever-widening circles, and opened up the way, often quite unconsciously, for the spiritual predominance of their fellow-believers abroad. From the middle of the second century another element that had no small influence also was the effort after a one-man government of the church, first on the part of Rome alone, but afterwards also on that of others who afterwards associated themselves with it in this. Polycarp of Smyrna, seeking for comfort at the hands of Anicetus of Rome in the matter of orthodox observance of Easter, still knows how to maintain his freedom of thought and action in another direction than that prescribed to him. But one of his successors in the Asia Minor controversy of the Quartodecimans, Polycrates of Ephesus, was excommunicated by Victor of Rome and cut off from the fellowship of the faithful (see Baur, Das Christenthum u. d. Christl. Kirche der drei Ersten Jahrh. 1853, pp. 141-157). In this manner the preponderance and authoritativeness, and ultimately the supremacy, of the church of Rome had already come to be recognised in the East before the end of the second century.

ROME (EMPIRE). The Roman Empire has been supposed to be alluded to in Dan. 2 and 7, but the interpretation 'is one which the progress of history has shewn to be untenable' (Driver, Daniel, 98; see the whole discussion, 94-102). Rome is referred to by name in biblical writings for the first time in connection with Antiochus Epiphanes; this 'sinful root,' we are told, had been a hostage at Rome (1 Macc. 1 10, ὃς ἦν ὅμηρα ἐν τῇ Ῥώμῃ).

The topography and history of Rome and of the Roman Empire is so vast a subject and is so fully dealt with by various writers and in easily accessible works of reference, that it has been deemed sufficient, in the space at our disposal, simply to touch upon the problem of the relation of Rome to Judaism and to early Christianity.

1. Rome and the Hasmoneans.

Destined to play such an important part in the political and religious history of the Jews, the Empire came into close touch with them for the first time in the early days of the revolt against the power of Syria. About the year 161 B.C. Judas the Maccabee having heard of the great fame of the Romans, sent an embassy 'to make a league of amity and confederacy with them, and that they should take the yoke from them; for they saw that the kingdom of the Greeks did keep Israel in bondage' (1 Macc. 8 1 ff.; cp 2 Macc. 11 34, Jos. Ant. xii. 10 6 Justin 36 3). The mission was successful; but before the news arrived Judas was slain (1 Macc. 9 1-18; Jos. Ant. xii. 11 1). In 143 B.C. the alliance was renewed by the statesmanlike Jonathan (1 Macc. 12 1-4 16; Jos. Ant. xiii. 5 8). On the death of Jonathan, Simon, his brother and successor, like his predecessors, also sent to Rome to seek a renewal of friendship. The ambassador, this time Numenius, was again successful, and 'the Romans issued a decree to all the peoples of the East, announcing that they had entered into a league of friendship with the Jews' (W. D. Morrison, The Jews under Roman Rule, 13). Hyrcanus, again, Simon's son and successor, after the death of Antiochus (129 B.C.), to escape paying any more the tribute which the Syrian had exacted, sent yet another embassy to Rome, and again 'in accordance with the settled principle of Roman policy in the East, the Jewish mission was received in a friendly manner, their grievances were attentively heard, and a decree was issued, ordering the Syrians to relinquish their claims to tribute, and declaring void whatever Antiochus had done in Judæa in opposition to previous declarations of the senate [Jos. Ant. xiii. 9 2 f.]' (Morrison, op. cit. 16 f.). After this several causes combined to weaken the power of the Syrians, so that the Jews no longer had any cause to fear them.

Such were the first relations of the Jews with the Roman Empire, if we are to trust tradition; but as Morrison again observes (19), 'some of these supposed alliances rest upon very slender historical foundations.' For further details we must refer the reader to the article MACCABEES (cp ISRAEL).

2. Jewish party-spirit.

While the Roman Empire was becoming more and more imperialistic, within the Jewish nation was arising, through the play of new ideas, that spirit of faction which was to rend it asunder even in the face of a common foe (see SADDUCEES, SCRIBES AND PHARISEES; cp ISRAEL). See again on the history of the period MACCABEES, and JANNÆUS. The disputes between Pharisees and Sadducees did not end with words; in the contest between the soldiers of Alexander and the Pharisees much blood was spilt. The struggle went on throughout the reign of Alexander, though towards the end he was able to subdue the Pharisees and their allies the Syrians; it continued during the reign of Salome Alexandra (78-69 B.C.), in which John Hyrcanus, one of Alexander's sons was content to act as high priest; and into the reign of Aristobulus (69-63 B.C.), Alexander's other son. It sapped the strength of the nation so that it was ready to fall an easy prey to a power that aimed at expansion. When the Romans, who for a time had been otherwise occupied, again turned their attention to the East, having been roused to action by the revolt of Mithridates, king of Pontus, in 88 B.C., and when success had attended their arms in the very neighbourhood of this people that had wantonly reduced itself to a state of miserable weakness, it was natural and inevitable that the Roman Empire should be further extended. Another civil war in Palestine (66 B.C.) gave Pompey his opportunity. Hyrcanus, influenced by the schemer Antipater, had plotted to overthrow Aristobulus. When, however, the Pharisees, assisted by the Nabateans, were besieging Aristobulus in the temple, Marcus Scaurus, one of Pompey's lieutenants, appeared on the scene, put an end to the fight, and set Aristobulus on the throne for a time at least. The struggle between the two brothers soon broke out again. This time Aristobulus, having offended the Romans, was besieged by them in Jerusalem. With the help of the Sadducees, and in spite of the Pharisees, he was able to hold out against the besiegers; but in the end Pompey, attacking him on a Sabbath (63 B.C.), broke through and inflicted severe punishment on the Jews.

Judæa was then regarded as a conquered province. We may venture to say with Morrison that the new arrangements that resulted 'were on the whole a blessing to the peoples of the East, who were rescued from chaos and instability, and enabled, after years of anarchy, to enjoy the fruits of peace' (41). Graetz (Hist. 267) points out that 'the Judæan prisoners that had been dragged to Rome, were to become the nucleus of a community destined to carry on a new kind of warfare against long-established Roman institutions, ultimately to modify or partly to destroy them.' Certainly the war between the new and old ideas was to go on uninterruptedly until some adjustment could be effected. Under the Herods, when the Jews were again in large measure allowed to govern themselves, the adoption of Hellenic culture was encouraged by the rulers to such an extent that the people revolted against it. The Jews determined to rid themselves of their half-Jewish rulers. At the request of the people themselves they were at length put under the direct government of Rome. 'With the return of Judæa to a Roman administration begins the prelude of the destruction of Jerusalem and the Jewish people—perhaps the most shocking tragedy known to the history of the world' (Cornill, Hist. of the People of Israel, 259). The tragedy was due to the refusal of a large section amongst the people, such as the Pharisees, the Zealots, and the Sicarii, to accept the inevitable—Roman rule and the spread of Græco-Roman ideas.

3. Closer connection with Rome.

After Pompey's conquest Jewish and Roman history are closely bound up together, and the details have been sufficiently dealt with in ISRAEL, §§ 85-115, HEROD, PILATE, GOVERNMENT, JERUSALEM, SELEUCIDÆ, TRADE, and other special articles.

One of the problems of history is to discover the precise attitude adopted by the Romans towards Judaism, on the one hand, and towards Christianity on the other. We know that important concessions were made to the Jews and that on the whole they enjoyed a large measure of religious liberty. Unfortunately, however, we are unable to treat the history of Josephus or the narratives of the NT as in all respects historically accurate. As to Josephus, 'his persistent endeavour to make it apparent that his people were actually friends of the Romans, and in reality took up arms against them unwillingly, is a notable example of his colouring of the situation, and compels the acceptance of his assertions with some caution' (Riggs, Hist. of Jewish People, 145; cp De Quincey, Works, 7 131 ff.). As to the Gospels, it is admitted that their present form is due to editorial redaction. Christianity was no sudden growth. It arose gradually, and only made its way by slow degrees. It represents the result of that interplay of Eastern and Western ideas which began under the DISPERSION (q.v.). Judaism, under the influence of Greek thought, had undergone during the dispersion a striking change. Later, the transition from Græco-Judaism to Christian Judaism, and from the ideas of Philo to those accredited to Jesus, was easy and natural. Even the stricter Judaism, itself, in the person of Hillel, helped to promote the new development. The process was accelerated by contact with Rome. But the new movement at first met with no very great success. Christian Judaism appealed neither to the Jew nor to the Gentile. The Jew refused to give up his characteristic rites; the Gentile would not submit to purely oriental institutions. Christian Judaism was obliged to throw off more of its oriental trappings. Hence arose the purely Christian movement. This form of Christianity was probably represented by the primitive gospel. But the evolutionary process was still at work. The struggle of ideas was now going on with renewed vigour. The Roman empire had become a world-empire; everything was tending towards a world-religion. 'Christianity' had long been in the air, or in other words, 'the fulness of time had come.'

4. Rome and the Gospel.

This is admitted on all hands. 'If the Empire was the greatest of hindrances to the gospel, it was also the greatest of helps. . . The single fact that the Empire was universal went far to complete the fulness of time for Christ's coming. Rome put a stop to the wars of nations and the great sales of slaves resulting from them, to the civil strife of cities and their murderous revolutions. Henceforth they were glad to live quietly beneath the shelter of the Roman peace. Intercourse and trade (witness the migratory Jews) were easier and freer than ever since in Europe till quite recently. . . This was her [Rome's] work in history—to be the link between the ancient and the modern—between the heathen city states of the ancient world and the Christian nations of the modern' (H. M. Gwatkin, 'Roman Empire' in Hastings' BD). Cp Ramsay, Church in the Roman Empire, chap. 9, § 6; also Seeley, Ecce Homo, 1; J. H. Muirhead in The Hibb. Journ. 1 153 [Oct. 1902], a criticism of Kidd's Principles of W. Civilisation; J. M. Robertson, A Short Hist. of Christianity (1902).

Writing of the state of the world towards the end of the first century, Renan shows (see the references in his notes) that 'expanded ideas of universal brotherhood and a sympathy with humanity at large, derived for the most part from the Stoic philosophy, were the result of the broader system of authority and the less confined education which had now assumed control. Men dreamed of a new era and of new worlds. . . Maxims of common humanity became current, and the Stoics earnestly taught the abstract notions of equality and the rights of men. . . Love for the poor, sympathy for all, and charity, became virtues.' But at the same time, as often happens during a period of transition, 'on the whole, the middle of the first century is one of the worst epochs of ancient history.' Philosophers, however, were doing much to bring about a reformation, and 'there was as much grandeur in the struggle of philosophy in the first century as in that of Christianity' (The Apostles, ch. 17). But it was not merely a struggle of two independent forces against a common foe. A struggle of ideas was going on within and between the two reforming agencies, and between both and the popular Roman religion. The conflict resulted in the victory of neither one nor the other, but in a compromise, in the evolution of a religion adapted and adaptable to its surroundings—in other words in a paganised Christianity.

The primitive gospels seem to have been edited and amplified in view of this development. We have in our present gospels, apart from the fact that there are doubtless 'gospels' (Gnostic, Ebionitic, and even Essenic) within the gospels, on the whole not a picture of what really took place at the rise of the Christian movement, but a representation coloured and suggested by the ideas of a later age. Although therefore they may contain much correct information as to Roman administration in Palestine, we can hardly trust them as to the general conduct of the Romans. To take an instance, the Gospels suggest that the Romans were interested in the new movement from the start, but that the ruling Jews were almost persistently hostile to it (espec. Lk. [cp also Acts]; cp Ramsay, Was Christ born at Bethl.? 67 ff.). But the movement was not such as to appeal to the Roman mind in the first instance, and the name of its founder 'appears only in profane authors of a hundred years later, and then in an indirect manner . . .' (Renan, Life of Jesus, ch. 28). Writings, such as the Gospels and the Acts, written in the interest, or to explain the rise, of a religious movement, are especially liable to be influenced by bias or tendency, so that there is every reason to treat them with caution and critically to examine their statements before regarding them as strictly historical. In particular, the accounts of the betrayal, trial, and execution of the hero, whether we consider the part played by the Jews or by the Romans, are very difficult to understand. We might naturally suppose that Jesus would have been treated by the Romans as a political offender. Deliverers kept coming forward, we may be sure, in answer to the Jewish expectations. The Romans would hardly have been likely to discriminate between the new Messiah and other agitators. Each and all would be regarded equally as politically dangerous; the career of each and all would be abruptly terminated as soon as the outskirts of the cities were abandoned and an attempt was made to openly preach 'a new kingdom' in the market-place. We have examples later of the treatment which these prophets received.

For instance, to quote Cornill's graphic description (Hist. 260), 'a certain Theudas . . . had summoned the people to the Jordan where at his command the miracle of Joshua was to be repeated. Fadus sent thither a company of cavalry, who simply cut the people down and brought the head of Theudas to Jerusalem.' See THEUDAS.

It is difficult to believe that the Romans behaved as they are reported to have done at an earlier date, even when it is admitted that the circumstances at the time were rather different. It has been handed down again that the Jews themselves, or a section of them, actually anticipated Roman action, that they betrayed the author of the new movement to the Romans and were themselves allowed to play a chief part in carrying out his death-sentence. But this representation of the Jewish attitude, as well as that of the Roman procedure, looks very much like a late attempt to take the blame as far as possible off the shoulders of the Romans and lay it on the Jews. The pagan-Christian movement, and the widening gap between Jews and Christians, would give rise to a tendency to say as little as possible in disparagement of the Romans, and as much as possible to bring odium on the Jews; to adapt the teaching more and more to the mind of the Roman, to make it diverge more and more from the doctrines and practices of the Jews.

Cp GOSPELS. On the representation of Roman administration given in Acts, see ACTS. For other details see the special articles on the Roman places, governors, etc., mentioned in NT. See also CHRISTIAN (NAME OF), GOVERNMENT, ROME (CHURCH OF), ROMANS, PAUL, PILATE, PROCURATOR, PROVINCE, QUIRINIUS. M. A. C.

ROPE. For ḥĕbel, 'ăbōth, and nikpah, see CORD, and for 'agmōn, Job 41 2 [40 26] RV, AV 'hook,' see RUSH, 2, and cp FISH, § 5, n. 1, col. 1529.

ROSE. 1. (חֲבַצֶּלֶת; ανθος, Cant. 2 1; κρινον, Is. 35 1†) is now usually taken, as in RVmg., to be the autumn crocus, Colchicum autumnale, L., or some kindred species. The Heb. word, ḥăbaṣṣéleth, is closely akin to Syr. ḥamṣallāythā, the meaning of which is well assured (Löw, 174).

The rendering 'rose,' found in Ḳimhi and other Jewish writers, seems to rest on mere conjecture; 'lily' stands in 𝔊, Vg., Tg. (but only once in each), whilst 'narcissus' is in Tg. on Cant., and is upheld by Celsius (1 489 ff.) and others. Delitzsch (Prol. 82 ff.) compares Ass. ḥabaṣillatu, 'reed,' and argues for the word being a general name (cp 𝔊 and Vg. of Cant. 2 1) for a flower-stalk or a flowering plant. As Nöldeke (ZDMG 40 730) and Halévy (REJ 14 149) urge, however, the name must be specific (at all events in Cant. 2 1): and the Aramaic word provides a satisfactory parallel, though, of course, this argument is not decisive against an Assyrian connection.[1] Various species of colchicum found in Palestine are enumerated by Tristram (FFP 425).

2. The ῥόδον is referred to in Wisd. 2 8 (στεψώμεθα ῥόδων κάλυξιν), Ecclus. 24 14 [18] 39 13 (17), and 50 8 (בנץ בענפי; see Schechter and Taylor). What is commonly called the 'Rose of Jericho,' the Anastatica hieruntica, is certainly not meant by Ben Sira, when he speaks of the 'rose-plants in Jericho.' In all these passages he apparently means the rhododendron (Tristram, NHB 477; cp Schick, PEFQ, 1900, pp. 63-65). In 3 Macc. 7 17, PTOLEMAIS [q.v.] is called ῥοδοφόρον [V], or ῥοδοφόνον [A]. The roses of Egypt are celebrated by the Roman poet Martial.

Grätz even finds the Hebrew, or more strictly, New Hebrew word for roses in a passage of Canticles (4 13, ורדים for נרדים). This may be right (see col. 693); but cp Budde, ad loc. On ורד, 'rose,' in Mishna, and its Syr. and Ar. cognates, see Löw, Aram. Pflanzennamen, 131 f. N. M.

ROSH (רֹאשׁ; ρως [BAQ]), according to most, is the name of a people in Asia Minor, which, like Meshech and Tubal (confidently identified with the Moschi and the Tibareni), belonged to the empire of GOG [q.v.] (Ezek. 38 2 f. 39 1). It is very strange, however, that all the names of peoples in Ezek. 38 1-6, except Rosh and Paras (v. 5), should occur in the Table of Nations in Gen. 10, and, from the conjunction of Tiras with Meshech and Tubal in Gen. 10 2, von Hammer long ago plausibly conjectured the identity of Tiras and Rosh. It is noteworthy that in Judith 2 23 the 'sons of RASSES' (q.v., and cp TIRAS) are mentioned directly after Put and Lud, and it is natural to identify, first, Rasses with Rosh, and then, on the ground of the phenomena of the Lat. MSS.,[1] Rasses with Tiras. This would produce the reading 'prince of Tiras.'[2]

This is decidedly better than explaining נ' ראש, 'chief prince (of Meshech, etc.),' as RVmg. and Smend (after Tg., Aq., Jer.). But the whole of the prophecy of Gog appears to need reconsideration (see PROPHET, § 27). If it is true that the prophet foretells a great N. Arabian invasion, we must suppose that ראש, like תירס and תרשיש, is a corruption of Aššur (אשור), the name of one of the peoples in N. Arabia bordering on the old Judahite territory. Cp TARSHISH, TIRAS.

Winckler would omit נשיא as a gloss on ראש ('chief'); but this is too superficial a correction. נשיא is specially one of Ezek.'s words (cp PRINCE, 2). T. K. C.

ROSH (רֹאשׁ; ρως [ADL]), a Benjamite family name (Gen. 46 21). In the corresponding list in Nu. 26 38 f. for Ehi Rosh Muppim we find Ahiram Shephupham, and the three names probably grew out of the two either by a simple transposition of the letters M and Sh (cp C. J. Ball, SBOT), or in some such way as that explained by Gray (HPN 35).

The MT in Gen., indeed, requires Rosh to make up its ten 'sons' of Benjamin (i.e., fourteen 'sons' of Rachel; v. 22); but 𝔊AL, although naming ten, preserves the original summation nine (i.e., eighteen 'sons' of Rachel). 𝔊B is lacking at this point; but 𝔊D sees the discrepancy and, since it retains Rosh, changes the eighteen to nineteen.

ROSIN. 1. צֳרִי, ṣŏrī, Ezek. 27 17 AVmg. See BALM, § 1.

2. νάφθα; Song of Three Children, 23 (Dan. 𝔊 3 46) AV, RV NAPHTHA.

RUBY. In EV 'rubies' represent pĕnīnīm, פְּנִינִים, six times (Job 28 18 Lam. 4 7 Prov. 3 15 8 11 20 15 31 10); in Lamentations RVmg. has 'corals'; in Job it has 'red coral' and 'pearls.'

1. Biblical references.

[1] [The Ass. comparison is accepted by Che. (Proph. Is.(3), on 'Is.' l.c.) after discussion; it is pointed out that the same plant-name often has a different reference in different countries. See also Ges.(13) s.v., who recognises the connection.]

[1] Vet. Lat. reads Thiras et Rasis, with which Pesh. must originally have agreed: Thiras and Rasis represent different readings of the same word.

[2] נְשִׂיא תִירָס, instead of נ' רֹאשׁ; תי, as Herz has remarked, might easily fall out after שיא. Toy (Ezek. SBOT) has also combined the names Rosh and Tiras. The above was written, however, before the appearance of his work.

The renderings of 𝔊 vary and (sometimes at least) manifestly represent another text (in Job, καὶ ἕλκυσον σοφίαν ὑπὲρ τὰ ἐσώτατα [BℵC, ἐσώτα, A]; Lam., ὑπὲρ λίθους; Prov. 3 15 8 11 31 10, λίθων πολυτελῶν; Prov. 20 15, wanting?); Vg. has a different rendering in each case (Job, trahitur autem sapientia de occultis; Lam., ebore antiquo; Prov. 3 15, cunctis opibus; 8 11, cunctis pretiosissimis; 20 15, multitudo gemmarum; 31 10, de ultimis finibus).

2. In Is. 54 12 (κρύσταλλος), Ezek. 27 16 (χορχορ [BQ], κορχορυς [A]) RV has 'rubies,' but AV 'agate' and AVmg. [Ezek.] 'chrysoprase,' for כַּדְכֹּד, kadkōd. See AGATE, CHRYSOPRASE.

3. In Ex. 28 17 Ezek. 28 13 RVmg. has 'ruby' for אֹדֶם, 'ōdem.

The question whether rubies are referred to in the OT may at first sight appear rather complicated. It is not so, however, in reality. The claims of 'rubies' as a rendering of pĕnīnīm have long since passed into abeyance; the revisers of AV, it is clear, only acquiesce in certain cases in AV's rendering 'rubies' from a feeling of uncertainty as to the absolute correctness of the marginal renderings which they propose. On the correctness of their renderings we may refer to CORAL, PEARL, and with regard to Lam. 4 7 (where the strange statement, 'they were more ruddy in body than rubies,' is ventured upon in EV) to LAMENTATIONS [BOOK], § 5, SAPPHIRE. If the precious stone called 'ōdem is really from √אדם, 'to be red,' and not rather from the name of Edom,[1] it is most plausible to identify it with the carnelian (see SARDIUS). We have, therefore, only the passages Is. 54 12 Ezek. 27 16 to deal with. Here the greatest weight is due to Prof. Ridgeway's remark (CARBUNCLE, col. 702), that there is no proof that the ruby, which is found only in Ceylon and in Burmah,[2] was known to the Hebrews any more than it was to the Greeks till after the time of Theophrastus. If the nōphek is the mafkat-stone of the Egyptians (see CARBUNCLE, end), the kadkōd might conceivably be the garnet; on the possible root-meaning (to emit fire, as a fire-stick), see Ges.-Bu. and BDB. We must not, however, ignore the possibility (see CHALCEDONY, 1, end) that the true reading of the word is, not כדכד, but כרכר (r for d). Both for the stone called 'ōdem and for that called (as we now assume) כרכר, the name of a country may be surmised as the origin—viz., in the case of 'ōdem, Edom, and in that of כרכר, Jerahmeel (such corruptions of this name turn out to be common);[3] the stones so designated may in fact have reached the Hebrews from N. Arabia, and so have been called respectively the Edomite and the Jerahmeelite stone. Cp SARDIUS, TOPAZ.

2. Identification.

The true or Oriental ruby is a red variety of corundum or native alumina of great rarity and value, and to be distinguished from the spinel (an aluminate of magnesium), which is of much less estimation as a gem stone. The phraseology of ancient writers was even more confused than that now current, for they appear to have classed together under a common name, such as the carbunculus of Pliny or the ἄνθραξ of Greek writers, not only (perhaps) our two kinds of ruby, but also garnets and other inferior stones of a fiery colour. See further STONES [PRECIOUS].

RUDIMENTS (ϹΤΟΙΧΕΙΑ), Col. 2 8 20 EV, RVmg. ELEMENTS (q.v.).

RUE (ΠΗΓΑΝΟΝ [Ti. WH]) is once mentioned (Lk. 11 42†) as a small garden herb; in the parallel passage Mt. 23 23 anise and cummin are mentioned instead.

According to Tristram (NHB 478) Ruta graveolens is at this day cultivated in Palestine, whilst Ruta bracteosa is a common wild plant. Cp Löw, no. 317.

RUFUS (ΡΟΥΦΟϹ [Ti. WH]) occurs several times in Old-Christian literature.

1. Mk. 15 21, as the son of SIMON OF CYRENE and the brother of ALEXANDER (qq.v.). In the Apocryphal Acts of Peter and Andrew, and of others, Alexander and Rufus are mentioned as disciples of Andrew, who were his companions in the country of the barbarians; cp R. A. Lipsius, Apokr. Ap.-gesch. 1 533 f. 617 621; 3 77 79 83, E. 94 96.

2. Rom. 16 13, as a Roman Christian, well known to Paul and to the Christians in Rome as being 'the elect (or the chosen) in the Lord.' We do not know the force of this expression. Weizsäcker thinks that it hints at some special circumstances connected with his conversion. B. Weiss, Sanday-Headlam interpret: 'eminent as a Christian.' In any case it will be an epitheton ornans to celebrate the friend of Paul, the supposed author, who goes on to salute 'his mother and mine,' as if the Roman wife had once kindly treated him, who had not yet been in Rome. The list of greetings in Rom. 16 is not historical; the names and the additions are fanciful; cp ROMANS (EPISTLE). According to Epiphanius this Rufus was reckoned among the seventy 'others' (apostles), Lk. 10 1. A Spanish local tradition makes him the first bishop of Tortosa, consecrated by Paul. Another tells us that he was consecrated bishop of the Egyptian Thebes by Peter. His birthday is said to have been the 8th or the 19th April; cp Lipsius, 2 222 227, E 2 42.

3. Polycarp, Phil. 9 1; cp Eus. HE iii. 36 13, as a companion of the martyrs Ignatius and Zosimus, commemorated every year on 18th Dec. at Philippi, according to Martyrol. Rom.

It is difficult to say whether these three, or any two of them, originally indicate the same person.

It is the modern Rantieh in the plain N. of Diospolis (Lydda). There were, however, several places called Rumah. Arumah [q.v.] in Judg. 9 41 is at first sight excluded by its northern situation. Probably, however, the original story spoke of Abimelech as king of Cusham in the Negeb (see Shechem). If so, it is plausible to identify Arumah with the Rumah of 2 K., because of the matrimonial connections between the kings of Judah and the Negeb. Like 'Ramah' (which, indeed, Pesh. reads in 2 K. and 𝔊BA in the supplement to 2 Ch. 36 5), 'Rumah' and 'Arumah' probably come from 'Jerahmeel'; the place so designated was of Jerahmeelite origin. T. RUSH, RUSHES. 1. גֹּמֶא, gōmé (Ex. 2 3 [Syro-hex., Ald., 15 παπυροc; so Aq.[1] Sym., 𝔊 om.], Job 8 11 [παπυροc], Is. 18 2 [επιcτολαc βυβλιναc], 35 7[2] [ελοc]†) is almost certainly the papyrus (cp 𝔊 Ex. [?], Job), the Hebrew name being derived from Coptic kam. This plant (Cyperus Papyrus, L.), which was a characteristic growth along the Nile banks in ancient Egypt,[3] and still occurs in several localities in Palestine, rises to a height of about six feet, with a triangular tapering stem; see Papyri, § 1. Its stem supplied material for the making of boats, sails, mats, cloth, cords, and, above all, writing material. In particular, its use for the construction of light Nile boats is mentioned by Theophrastus, Pliny, and other ancient writers (cp Egypt, § 8, end), and explains the references in Ex. 2 3 Is. 18 2, and probably also Job 9 26 (see RVmg., but cp Reeds, Ospray).

2. אַגְמוֹן, 'agmōn (Is. 9 14 [13] 19 15[4] 58 5 (κρίκος), Job 41 2 [40 26, κρ.] 41 20[5] [12]†) is a word for 'marsh reed,' derived from 'ăgam, אֲגַם, a 'marsh' or 'pool' (Barth, NB 341), and very probably to be identified with Arundo Donax, L. (cp Tristram, NHB 436 f.). In Is. 9 14 [13] 19 15 the 'agmōn or 'reed' is contrasted with the kappāh (כִּפָּה) or 'palm-branch,' the latter indicating those in high position and the former the humbler classes in the state—so 𝔊 (below, n. 4). In Is. 58 5 among the spurious tokens of pretended piety is mentioned that of bowing the head as the head of the reed is bent by the flow of the stream in which it grows; cp 1 K. 14 15 Mt. 11 7.

In Job 41 2 [40 26] the name is transferred to the rope or cord (see RV) of reed used to noose the crocodile; and in Job 41 20 [12] the hot vaporous breath of this animal is compared to the steam of 'a seething pot' and (see RV) the smoke of '(burning) rushes.' [In both passages the text is doubtful. On Job 41 2 see Fish, § 5, and n. 1, where נֶזֶם, 'ring' is proposed as an emendation, and on Job 41 20 see Budde, who (with Bi., Du., Beer) reads וְאֹגֵם, 'and boiling.'] N. M.—W. T. T.-D.

2. βρῶσις, in Mt. 6 19 f. of 'moth and rust' (σὴς καὶ βρῶσις) which consume 'treasure.'

Through her marriage with Mahlon, and subsequent marriage-at-law with Boaz (in the name of Mahlon), she became an ancestor of David, who, according to our present text, was a native of Bethlehem in Judah. Ruth's noble unselfishness was thus rewarded (cp Ruth 2 12). Her sister, whose impulse to follow Naomi to her home in Judah was less effectual than Ruth's, was named Orpah, a name which suggests the meaning 'obstinacy.' Hence, following Pesh., it is usual (cp Geiger, Urschr. 50) to explain Ruth as a contraction of Rĕ'ūth, i.e., 'the companion,' 'one who lovingly attaches herself.' See, however, for other explanations, Ruth [Book], § 5. The account of her levirate-marriage with Boaz is given with archæological fulness as an obsolete custom. Cp Shoes (e).

[By old Hebrew law, as by the old law of Arabia, a wife who had been brought into her husband's house by contract and payment of a price to her father was not set free by the death of her husband to marry again at will. The right to her hand lay with the nearest heir of the dead. Originally we must suppose, among the Hebrews as among the Arabs, this law was all to the disadvantage of the widow, whose hand was simply part of the dead man's estate; but, while this remained so in Arabia to the time of Mohammed, among the Hebrews the law early took quite an opposite turn; the widow of a man who died childless was held to have a right to have a son begotten on her by the next kinsman, and this son was regarded as the son of the dead and succeeded to his inheritance so that his name might not be cut off from Israel. The duty of raising up a son to the dead lay upon his brother, and in Dt. 25 5 is restricted to the case when brothers live together. In old times, as appears from Gen. 38, this was not so, and the law as put in the book of Ruth appears to be that the nearest kinsman of the dead in general had a right to 'redeem for himself' the dead man's estate, but at the same time was bound to marry the widow. The son of this marriage was reckoned as the dead man's son and succeeded to his property, so that the 'redeemer' had only a temporary usufruct in it. Naomi was too old to be married in this way, but she had certain rights over her husband's estate which the next kinsman had to buy up before he could enter on the property. And this he was willing to do, but he was not willing also to marry Ruth, and beget on her a son who would take the name and estate of the dead and leave him out of pocket. He therefore withdraws and Boaz comes in his place. That this is the sense of the transaction is clear; there is, however, a little obscurity in 4 5, where (see Vg., Pesh.) one letter has fallen out and we must (with Cappellus, Geiger, Bertheau, etc.) read וגם אחדות, and translate 'What day thou buyest the field from Naomi thou must also buy Ruth,' etc. Cp vv. 9 f.—W. R. S.]

The notice in Ruth 4 7 has caused some difficulty. Kalisch (Bible Studies, 1 [1877] 61) actually suggests that לפנים (EV 'in former time') may perhaps mean 'from olden times.' Driver (Intr.(6) 455), who apparently finds 4 7 and 4 18-22 the only passages which may indicate a late date, thinks that, while 4 18-22 'forms no integral part of the book,' 4 7 'has every appearance of being an explanatory gloss,' and compares the admitted gloss in 1 S. 9 9, which begins with לפנים בישראל. This is a perfectly legitimate view, though it entails an alteration of the text in v. 8. But we may ask this question: Supposing that the custom referred to in 4 7 had become antiquated, was not such an explanatory notice called for? T. K. C.

RUTH, BOOK OF. The story of Ruth (q.v.) forms one of the OT Hagiographa, usually reckoned as the second of the five Megilloth or Festal Rolls. This position corresponds to the Jewish practice of reading the book at the Feast of Pentecost; Spanish MSS, however, place Ruth at the head of the Megilloth (see Canticles); and the Talmud, in a well-known passage of Bābā Bathrā (14*b*), gives it the first place among all the Hagiographa. On the other hand, 𝔊 and the Vulgate make Ruth follow Judges. It has sometimes been held (e.g., by Ewald, Hist. 1 156; Bertheau, Richter u. Ruth,(2) 292) that this was its original place in the Hebrew Bible also, or rather that Ruth was originally reckoned as an appendix to Judges, since it is only by doing this, and also by reckoning Lamentations to Jeremiah, that all the books of the Hebrew canon can be reduced to twenty-two, the number assigned by Josephus and other ancient authorities. It has been shown elsewhere (Canon, §§ 11-14), however, that the argument for the superior antiquity of this way of reckoning breaks down on closer examination, and, whilst it was very natural that a later rearrangement should transfer Ruth from the Hagiographa to the historical books, and place it between Judges and Samuel, no motive can be suggested for the opposite change. That the book of Ruth did not originally form part of the series of 'Former Prophets' (Judges-Kings) is further probable from the fact that it is quite untouched by the process of 'prophetic' or Deuteronomistic editing, which gave that series its present shape at a time soon after the fall of the kingdom of Judah; the narrative has no affinity with the point of view which looks on the whole history of Israel as a series of examples of divine justice and mercy in the successive rebellions and repentances of the people of God. But if the book had been known at the time when the history from Judges to Kings was edited, it could hardly have been excluded from the collection; the ancestry of David was of greater interest than that of Saul, which is given in 1 S. 9 1, whereas the old history names no ancestor of David beyond his father Jesse.

As to the date. A very early period is clearly impossible. The book does not offer itself as a document written soon after the period to which it refers; it presents itself as dealing with times far back, and takes obvious delight in depicting details of antique life and obsolete usages (on Ruth 4 1-12, see RUTH); it views the rude and stormy period before the institution of the kingship through the softening atmosphere of time, which imparts to the scene a gentle sweetness very different from the harsher colours of the old narratives of the book of Judges. [We cannot therefore very well say with Dr. C. H. H. Wright (Introd. 126) that the book 'must have been written after the time of David, and long prior to the Exile.'] Indeed, the interest taken in the pedigree of David points to a time when 'David' had become a symbol for the long-past ideal age. In the language, too, as we shall see presently (see § 3), there is a good deal that makes for and nothing that makes against a date subsequent to the captivity, and the very designation of a period of Hebrew history as 'the days when the judges judged' (Ruth 1 1) is based on the Deuteronomistic additions to the book of Judges (2 16 f.), and does not occur till the period of the Exile.

2. Date.

An inferior limit for the date of the book cannot be assigned with precision. Kuenen formerly argued (Ond.[1] 1 [1861] 212 214) that, as the author seems to take no offence at the marriage of Israelites with Moabite women, he must have lived before the time of Ezra and Nehemiah (Ezra 9 Neh. 13); but the same argument would prove that the Book of Esther was written before Ezra, and indeed, as Wellhausen (Bleek's Einl.[4], 205) points out, the singular Talmudic statements respecting the descent of eminent Jewish teachers from supposed heathen proselytes of antiquity (Sisera, Sennacherib, Nebuchadrezzar, Haman—see RAHAB) appear to imply a theory very similar to that of the Book of Ruth, which nevertheless had no polemical bearing on the practical exclusiveness of the prevalent custom. We cannot therefore assert that the Book of Ruth was not written later than about 444 B.C.

At the same time it must be admitted that the story of Ruth was written before the living impulses of Jewish literature had been choked by the growing influence of legalism. As Ewald remarks, 'we have here a narrator of a perfectly individual character,' who, 'without anxiously concealing by his language all traces of the later age in which he wrote, had obviously read himself into the spirit of the ancient works both of history and of poetry, and thus produces a very striking imitation of the older work on the kings' (Hist. 1 154 f.). The manner, however, in which he tells the story is equally remote from the legal pragmatism of Chronicles and from the prophetic pragmatism of the editor of the older histories. His work has therefore some advantage over the histories just mentioned, an advantage, it is true, of which the Targum (see 1 5 f.) endeavours to deprive it. By the tone of simple piety and graciousness which pervades it, and by its freedom from the pedantry of legal orthodoxy, the book reminds us of the prologue to the colloquies of Job and the older poetical wisdom. Legalism, then, was still far from having triumphed in the field of literature when the story of Ruth was written; even a superficial student cannot close his eyes to this important fact.

The necessity of a somewhat late date will appear also from the following stylistic and linguistic considerations.

3. Linguistic data.

That the style of the narrative lacks the freshness and popularity which distinguish the best sections of the Books of Samuel must be apparent, and upon examining closely the linguistic details, we shall probably become convinced that a pre-exilic origin is impossible. The learned Benedictine Calmet (Dictionnaire historique et critique, 1722, art. 'Ruth'), indeed, following Bābā bathrā, 14*b*, ascribes the composition to the author of the Books of Samuel, a view which he supports by referring to the phrases, 'Yahwè do so to me and more also,' Ruth 1 17 (cp 1 S. 3 17, and ten other passages in Sam. and Kings), 'to uncover the ear,' Ruth 4 4 (cp 1 S. 9 15, and six other passages in Sam.). For other points of contact between Ruth and Sam. and Kings, see 4 15 and 1 S. 1 8 (טוב מן); 1 19 and 1 S. 4 5 1 K. 1 45 (וַתֵּהֹם); 4 1 and 1 S. 21 3 2 K. 6 8 (פלני אלמני); 2 3 and 1 S. 6 9 20 26 (מקרה, 'accident'), and the second fem. sing. imperf. in ין־, 2 8 21 3 4 18 1 S. 1 14 (also Is. 45 10 Jer. 31 22). These coincidences, however, are outweighed, not only by the difference of style (in the more general sense) between Ruth and Sam., but also by certain forms and expressions found in Ruth but not found in Sam., some of which at least point distinctly to a post-exilic age.

The following forms and idioms (to which add the second fem. sing. imperf. in ין־; see above) are post-classical and mostly post-exilic or exilic in use—the second fem. sing. perf. in תי־, 3 3 f. (also in Jer. [often], Ezek. 16 Mic. 4 13 [hardly Micah's]);

מָרָא for מָרָה, Mara, 1 20 (cp parallels in Ezek. 27 31 36 5 etc.);

עָגַן, 'to shut up,' 1 13 (Mishnic, Jewish Aram., Syriac, but cp Driver);

קִיֵּם, 'to confirm,' 4 7 (also Ezek. 13 6 Esth. 9 21 27 29 31 f. Ps. 119 28 106, and in [Aram.] Dan. 6 8);

שִׂבֵּר, 'to hope,' 1 13 (Esth. 9 1 Ps. 119 166);

נָשָׂא אִשָּׁה, 'to take a wife,' 1 4 (Ezra 9 2 12 Neh. 13 25 1 Ch. 23 22 etc., but not Judg. 21 23 [Budde]);

לָהֵן, 'therefore,' 1 13 (as in Aram. Dan. 2 6 etc.); cp Driver.

It is also well worth noticing that the divine name or title שדי (exilic and post-exilic in use) occurs in Ruth 1 20 f.[1] (without אֵל), as often in Job—Ewald rightly compares Job 27 2, and (against the view that Ruth is written in a pre-exilic N. Israelitish dialect) that the relative is always אשר, never שׁ (cp König, Einl. 286).

According to König (Einl. 287), the book in its present form belongs, on linguistic grounds, to the period of Jer., Ezek., and the Second Isaiah, whilst marks of the later Hebrew are wanting. Whatever may seem to point to an earlier period (e.g., the use of the older form אנכי seven times, and of אני only twice) this eminent linguistic critic regards as conscious archaizing. It should be remarked, however, that portions of Jeremiah can be shown to be of very late date, and that the unity of the date of authorship for Is. 40-66 is doubted by an increasing number of scholars. König's dating, then, is necessarily subject to revision, and so, still more, is that of Driver (Introd.[6] 455), who embarrasses himself with the theory that Canticles and Ruth (although included in the Hagiographa) may have been written in the N. kingdom, and preserve words current there dialectically. The book, in its present form, must surely on linguistic grounds be regarded as a post-exilic work, and we shall see later that, even if it is to some extent based on an earlier folk-story, the skill of the artist has enabled him so to expand, to enrich, and to fuse his material that it is virtually all his own work, and that a later editor has only touched the proper names and appended the genealogy.

Wellhausen is of opinion that the most important sign of date is the genealogy of David (Ruth 4 18-22, cp 1 Ch. 2 10-17). The names of the ancestors of David were known as far as Boaz.

4. Genealogy.

Then memory failed, and a leap was made in 1 Ch. 2 11 Ruth 4 21 to Salma (in Ruth, Salmon), who, in 1 Ch. 2 51, is called 'the father of Bethlehem.' But Salma belongs to the same group as Caleb, Abi, and Hur, and, 'if anything is certain, it is this—that in the olden times the Calibbites dwelt in the S. and not in the N. of Judah, and that David in particular by his birth belonged, not to them, but to the older part of Israel, which gravitated in the opposite direction to Israel proper, and stood in the closest connection with Benjamin.' Wellhausen adds that 'of the other members of the genealogy Nahshon and Amminadab are princes of Judah in P, whilst Ram is the firstborn of Hezron (1 Ch. 2 25), and by the meaning of his name ('the high one') is, like Abram, qualified to be the starting-point of the princely line.' On the other hand, Sam. only knows of David's father Jesse.[1]

[The argument that Salma is a tribe foreign to old Judah, which was not 'father' of Bethlehem till after the Exile, has been very generally admitted, and seemed to Robertson Smith in 1886 to decide the post-exilic origin of the genealogy. The present writer, however, cannot see his way to follow his predecessor in this particular; the genealogy is no doubt post-exilic, but is not proved to be so by Wellhausen's criticism of the proper names, all of which appear really to refer to Jerahmeelite—i.e., N. Arabian—clans and localities.[2] But he heartily agrees with W. R. Smith that 'the genealogy in 1 Ch. 2 10 ff. is quite in the manner of other genealogies in the same book.']

That the genealogy was borrowed from Chronicles and added to Ruth by a later hand seems certain, for the author of Ruth clearly recognises that 'Obed was legally the son of Mahlon, not of Boaz' (4 5 10). [Driver, too, remarks (Introd.(6) 455) that the genealogy 'may well have been added long after the book itself was written,' and, like König (287), leaves out of the linguistic data for the solution of the problem of age, tôlĕdôth and hôlîd, which are characteristic of P in the Pentateuch (cp GENEALOGIES i., § 1). Bertheau, Kuenen, and Budde adhere to the view that the closing section is an integral portion of the book. But surely], if the author had given a genealogy, he would have traced it through Mahlon. The existence, however, of the genealogy suggests the possibility that two views of the descent of David were current, one of which traced him to Perez by Mahlon, and the other to the same Perez by Boaz.

[We have arrived at this point without having been obliged to interfere with the traditional text. It is, however, necessary to take that step if we would obtain a more complete comprehension of the narrative and of its historical origin.

5. Proper names.

That Ruth, as it now stands, is a post-exilic work is certain; we must therefore examine the text in connection with that of other not less certainly post-exilic works, in the study of which we have already reached results which, though in points of detail subject to revision, yet on the whole seem to throw considerable light on ancient editorial processes. We shall thus find reason to suspect that the personal and geographical names in the Book of Ruth (1 1-4 17) were not altogether originally as they now stand.

Bethlehem-judah, as in the strange stories appended to Judges, is a corruption or distortion of Beth-jerahmeel, the name of some place in the region called Ephrath in the south, possibly, but by no means probably, the same as the place known as Carmel.

[1] Bleek's Einl.(4) 204 f., Prol.(1) 227 [ET 217 f.]; cp De Gent. 16 f. The passage in Einl.(4) is mostly reprinted in CH 357-359, (3) 233-235.

[2] We reckon the Negeb as the N. Arabian borderland.

RUTH, BOOK OF

'Ephrath' itself (like the 'Perath' of Jer. 13 4-7) is possibly a mutilated form of ZAREPHATH [q.v.], and 'Moab' may be a substitute for 'Miṣṣur' (cp MOAB, § 14), a region to the S. of the country called Ṣarephathite or Ephrathite. Elimelech, Mahlon, and Chilion—the two latter of which have been so fatally misunderstood, as if they were symbolical names—are no doubt clan-names (or different forms of the same clan-name) derived from the great ethnic name, Jeraḥmeel. 'Orpah' has probably arisen by 'metathesis' from 'Ophrah'—i.e., 'Ephrath.' Ruth (Re'uth, cp Pesh.) is probably the fem. of Re'u (Gen. 11 18 ff.), which is surely equivalent to Re'uel; now Re'uel appears in Gen. 36 4 as a son of Esau, and his name is most probably a distortion of Jeraḥmeel, a name which in its various broken forms attached itself to different N. Arabian clans. Naomi (No'omi) is doubtless connected with the clan-names Na'ami, Na'amani.[1] 'Boaz' (בעז) is less transparent; hence Stucken and Winckler do not hesitate to identify the original Boaz with a mythological figure. But the place of the bearer of this name in the genealogy, as well as in the story of Ruth, shows that he too must have a clan-name,[2] and remembering the 'Ezbi' (אזבי) of 1 Ch. 11 37, which corresponds to ארבי (MT) or rather ארבי (cp 𝔊BA) in 2 S. 23 35—i.e., to ירחמאלי, 'Jeraḥme'eli,' we may restore as the original name ערב, 'Arāb. עבד, 'Obed,' too, is probably by metathesis from עֲרָב, Arabia.[3]

The statement of the narrator then, if the present writer's conjectures are sound, amounts to this—that a member of a Jerahmeelite clan who belonged to Beth-jeraḥmeel (in the Negeb) removed with his family, under the pressure of famine, into the land of Miṣṣur, and sojourned there for about ten years. This agrees with the original form of the story in Gen. 12 10 ff., according to which Abram (='father of Jeraḥmeel') removed from the same cause from the Jerahmeelite country to Miṣṣur or Miṣrim (see MIZRAIM, § 2*b*).

Another parallel story is that of the Shunammite woman who was warned by Elisha of the approach of a famine and went to the land of the 'Philistines' (2 K. 8 1-3); the original story, the present writer thinks (cp SHUNEM), represented her as a dweller in the Jeraḥmeelite Negeb (still in Israelitish occupation), and as going farther S. to the land of Ṣarephath (in a wide sense of the phrase).

Nor was it only famine that drove dwellers in the Negeb to the neighbouring land of Miṣṣur. The original text of 1 S. 22 3 f. seems to have represented David as placing his father and mother under the protection of the king of Miṣṣur at Ṣarephath (see MIZPEH, 3), while he was himself a wanderer in the land of Jeraḥmeel, and there is, in the present writer's opinion, hardly room for doubt that David lived in, or close to, the Jeraḥmeelite Negeb (see NEGEB, § 3, and note 3), and had strong Jeraḥmeelite (and Miṣrite) affinities. The latter passage is specially important, because the ostensible object of the writer of Ruth is to prove the descent of David from a noble-minded Miṣrite woman.[4] It was natural to represent that David's ancestor had already set the example of taking refuge in Miṣṣur.

We are not expressly told that 'Ṣarephath'—i.e., that portion of Miṣṣur which lay nearest to and included the city of Ṣarephath—was the locality to which Elimelech and his family repaired. But the connection of Ṣarephath with Moses, with the Levites, and apparently with the prophets, conjectured by the present writer (see MOSES, § 4; PROPHECY, § 6), makes it seem to him not improbable that the narrator had this place or district in his mind, and in 4 12 the kindly wish is expressed that the house of Boaz might be like the house of 'Pereṣ' (from 'Ṣarephath'?) whom Tamar (=Jeraḥmeelith?) bore to Judah.

[1] Many Benjamite clan-names appear to the present writer to be demonstrably of N. Arabian origin.

[2] Stucken's connection of the name with astral mythology (Astralmythen, 205, note) will hardly stand examination.

[3] ישׁי (Jesse), too, very possibly comes ultimately from ישמעאלי (Ishmaelite), a term which did not originally belong exclusively to nomads. The names of the ancestors of David in the genealogy are, as suggested above (§ 4), exclusively N. Arabian clan-names.

[4] Budde (ZATW 12 [1892] 44) thinks that the notice in 1 S. 22 3 does not imply a race-connection between David and the Moabite (i.e., Miṣrite) king or chieftain. David, he thinks, had to negotiate with the king, whereas if his grandmother had been a Moabite, this would have been unnecessary. But this is to press the words too strongly; and indeed (assuming the tradition to be historical) tact may have required that David should represent the desired protection as a favour.

The view here taken renders it probable that the story of Ruth as it now stands is not of very early post-exilic origin. For the feeling of bitterness towards the Miṣrites and their neighbours, on account of their long-continued oppression of Israel, apparently persisted till close on the Greek period. The date of the traditional elements, out of which, with imaginative freedom, the present story of Ruth may have been partly composed, is quite another point. As in the case of Job (see JOB [BOOK], § 4) and Jonah (see JONAH [BOOK], § 4 f.) some of these elements may have been derived from mythology or folk-lore (cp Wi. AOF 366 f.). As Stucken points out,[1] 'Ruth corresponds exactly to Tamar; she obtains Boaz by taking him unawares (Ruth 3), as Tamar obtains Judah (Gen. 38). A dim consciousness of this connection shows itself in the fact that the pedigree of Boaz is traced to Perez.' The original story of Ruth probably gave her two sons (corresponding to the two sons of Tamar), only one of whom is recorded (simply out of interest in David) by the narrator.

6. Origin.

The 'altogether peculiar' character of Ruth among the historical and quasi-historical narratives has been pointed out by Ewald, who is 'led to conclude that this story is only one taken from a larger series of similar pieces by the same author, and that through mere chance this is the only one preserved' (Hist. 1 155). More definitely, Budde suggests (ZATW 12 43 ff. [1892]) that the story of Ruth may originally have formed part of the 'Midrash of the Book of the Kings' referred to in 2 Ch. 24 27. In so far as this theory is based on the language of the genealogy in 4 18-22 (in connection with Wellhausen's view that 1 Ch. 2 10-17 is a later insertion), we must agree with König (Einl. 289, note) that it is unproven. At the same time, Ewald's impression that the narrative of Ruth did not always stand alone seems natural.

7. Objects of Ruth.

That one of the objects of Ruth was to explain the traditional descent of David from a Miṣrite woman, has been mentioned already. It was true, said the writer, that his grandmother was a Miṣrite; but what a noble woman she was! how obedient to those fundamental laws of morality which the true God values more than sacrifice! And so a second object naturally unveils itself—viz., to prepare the readers of the book to arrive at a more favourable opinion of the moral capacity of the Miṣrites than, owing to the cruel oppression of Israel by the Miṣrites, previous generations had been able to form.

Many critics (e.g., besides Winckler and most commentators, Umbreit, St. Kr., 1834, pp. 308 ff.; Geiger, Urschr. 49 ff.; and especially Kue. Rel. of Isr. 2 242 f., and Ond.(2) 1 523 527) hold that the narrator was one of those who protested against the rigour of Ezra in the matter of mixed marriages. It is not clear, however, that any such protest would have been detected by a Jewish reader of the book. The great point with the narrator is not the marriage of Mahlon but the next-of-kin marriage of Boaz. It cannot be shown that, when married to Mahlon, Ruth became in the full sense a worshipper of Yahwè. It is much more probable that the statement of Mahlon's marriage to a Miṣrite woman is simply a proof that the writer was a good historical scene painter. Like the Chronicler, he knows that in early times there was a great mixture of clans, and that Israelites often intermarried with Jeraḥmeelites and Miṣrites. Besides, in order to produce an impression on the Jews it would be necessary for the dwelling of Boaz to have been in Judah, not in a district which in post-exilic times was not in Jewish occupation. The latest editor did no doubt arrange the geographical statements accordingly; but the author himself, as we have seen, placed Boaz in the Jeraḥmeelite Negeb.

Surely no one who thoroughly appreciates the charm of this book will be satisfied with the prevalent theory of its object. There is no 'tendency' about the book; it represents in no degree any party programme. And even if the writer started with the object of illustrating the life of David, he forgot this when he began to write, and only thought of it again as he was about to lay down the pen. Justly does Robertson Smith remark, 'the marriage acquires an additional interest when we know that Ruth was David's great-grandmother, but the main interest is independent of that, and lies in the happy issue of Ruth and Naomi from their troubles through the loyal performance of the kinsman's part by Boaz. Doubtless the writer meant his story to be an example to his own age, as well as an interesting sketch of the past; but this is effected simply by describing the exemplary conduct of Naomi, Ruth, Boaz, and even Boaz's harvesters. All these act as simple, kindly, God-fearing people ought to act in Israel.' [At the same time, the writer must have shared the religious aspirations of his time, which, as we have seen, was probably the post-exilic age—i.e., perhaps that quieter period which followed after the first century of the Greek rule. Now, there is good evidence for the view that one of these aspirations was for a cessation of the bitter feeling between Israel and Jeraḥmeel. As yet the sad exclusion of Jeraḥmeelites and Miṣrites from the religious assembly had not been enacted,[1] or, if enacted, it was ignored by the noblest Jews, who held that the N. Arabian peoples were not incapable of repentance, and that it was no disgrace to David that his pedigree contained the name of a Miṣrite woman. A thorough study of certain psalms and prophecies will, it is believed, strongly confirm this view, and show that the best of the Jews looked forward to a true conversion of the Miṣrites to the religion of the God of Israel—the 'Lord of the whole earth.' Jerusalem would yet be thronged by the children of Israel's bitter foes, seeking first for instruction and then for admission into the religious community, and it is possible to see a glance at this hope in the touching words of Boaz, 'and how thou hast left thy father and thy mother, and the land of thy nativity, and art come unto a people which thou knewest not heretofore' (Ruth 2 11). And so, ultimately, the book becomes (like Jonah) a noble record of the catholic tendency of the early Judaism.]

The passage must be later than the fall of Jerusalem.

SABBATH (שַׁבָּת, ΣΑΒΒΑΤΟΝ), the day of sacred rest which among the Hebrews followed six days of labour and closed the week; see WEEK.

1. Etymology. The grammatical inflexions of the word 'Sabbath' show that it is a feminine form, properly šabbat-t for šabbāt-t, from שבת (Pi'el conjug.). The root has nothing to do with resting in the sense of enjoying repose; in transitive forms and applications it means 'to sever,' to 'put an end to,' and intransitively it means to 'desist,' to 'come to an end.' The grammatical form of šabbāth suggests a transitive sense, 'the divider,' and apparently indicates the Sabbath as dividing the month. It may mean the day which puts a stop to the week's work; but that is less likely. It certainly cannot be translated 'the day of rest.' (Cp Lag. Uebers. 113; Kö. Lehrg. ii. 1 280 f.; Hoffm. ZATW 3 121; Wellh. Prol. [1883] 117, n. 1; Jastrow's article cited in § 8.)

[According to Jensen, ZKF, 1887, p. 278, the Assyrian ša(p)bat(td)-tum = 'penitential prayer,' and hence 'day of penitence and prayer.' Hirschfeld (see § 8), however, derives שַׁבָּת from שׁבעת. Cp Benz. HA 202, 'perhaps in its oldest form it was connected with שָׁבוּעַ (week).' For Jastrow's view, see § 8.]

2. Jesus and the Sabbath. By way of preface to the present historical inquiry, and to clear away, if possible, any remnants of theological prejudice against criticism, let us consider the attitude of Jesus towards Sabbath observance. It is not too bold to say that in his opposition to the current Rabbinical views he is in harmony with the main result of modern historical criticism. This thesis will be justified at a subsequent point. The well-known and probably (see col. 1888, near foot) authentic saying, 'Think not that I am come to destroy the law' (Mt. 5 17), expresses one side of that teaching. Jesus revered the Sabbath as he revered the other religious traditions of his people; but he had also a freedom of inspiration which put a new life into his interpretation of the Sabbath law. That he was in the habit of attending the synagogue on the Sabbath, we know from Lk. 4 16 (cp v. 31). But he would not adhere to the letter of the law where works of necessity or of mercy claimed to be performed: 'the Sabbath is made for man, and not man for the Sabbath; wherefore the Son of Man is Lord also of the Sabbath' (Mk. 2 27 f.). There is a traditional saying of Jesus which may express his Janus-like habit of mind as regards the Sabbath. It ceased, indeed, to be understood when the Christian Sunday had become an institution, and so was thrust out of the canonical Church tradition; but it certainly gives us the impression of being an ancient and a genuine tradition.[1] It is the well-known addition of D (Codex Bezæ, ed. Scrivener, 173) after Lk. 6 4: 'On the same day when he saw one working on the Sabbath he said to him: Man, if thou knowest what thou art doing thou art blessed; but if thou knowest not, thou art cursed and a transgressor of the law' (τῇ αὐτῇ ἡμέρᾳ θεασάμενός τινα ἐργαζόμενον τῷ σαββάτῳ εἶπεν αὐτῷ· ἄνθρωπε, εἰ μὲν οἶδας τί ποιεῖς, μακάριος εἶ· εἰ δὲ μὴ οἶδας, ἐπικατάρατος καὶ παραβάτης εἶ τοῦ νόμου). The sense is clear—it is what we find in Rom. 14 4 14 23.[2] 'If thou knowest what thou art doing,'—in other words, if thou art doing this work on the Sabbath day with the consciousness that it is a work of necessity—if thy conscience justifies thee in it—'then blessed art thou.' 'But if thou knowest not'—in other words, if thou art acting against thy conscience, with a lurking fear that thou art doing aught amiss—'then art thou accursed, and a transgressor of the law.' The saying in the Oxyrhynchus papyrus-fragment discovered in 1897,[3] 'if you do not keep the Sabbath you will not see the Father' (ἐὰν μὴ σαββατίσητε τὸ σάββατον οὐκ ὄψεσθε τὸν πατέρα), may also very well have been actually spoken by Jesus in its literal sense, as the expression of the same conservative temper as we find in Mt. 5 17-19, and against noisy fanatics who thought to do honour to their master by showing contempt for the day. It is more probable, however, in view of the parallel clause, 'If you do not fast [to] the world you have not found the kingdom of God' (ἐὰν μὴ νηστεύσητε τὸν κόσμον οὐ μὴ εὕρητε τὴν βασιλείαν τοῦ θεοῦ), that the saying is not intended to be understood literally.

3. Early Christian attitudes. [This is not the place to discuss the relation of the Pauline teaching to that of Jesus. Without entering into the question as to the historical origin of each of the Pauline epistles referred to, we may recall that, according to the Pauline teaching, Jesus was sent in human flesh to liberate men from servitude to the law as a whole and in every particular. The conservative side of the teaching of Jesus regarding the Sabbath could not, therefore, be reproduced in the corresponding teaching of Paul.] It is clear from Rom. 14 5 ff. that Paul regarded the observance of the Sabbath as essentially an ἀδιάφορον for Christians; it is possible to serve the Lord by observance of a fixed day, and equally possible to serve him without such observance; the important thing is to have a clean conscience (cp also vv. 14 and 23). The Pauline attitude towards the Christians of Colossæ is not inconsistent with the magnanimous tolerance here expressed. The sharpness of Col. 2 16 f. (cp Gal. 4 9 f.) is due to the situation: Paul perceived that the Judaising false teachers had raised the ἀδιάφορον into an ἀναγκαῖον, and that an energetic protest against the imposition of any such yoke was urgently required. [There is no definite conflict between the attitude of Paul and that of Jesus. The position taken up by Jesus was perfectly natural to him, as a son of a pious Jewish family, and a preacher to the chosen

[1] Ropes, 'Die Sprüche Jesu,' in Texte u. Untersuchungen, xiv. 2 126 (1896) also regards this as possible.

[2] It is more probable that the ideas in these passages rest upon an utterance of Jesus known to the apostle than that the saying attributed to Jesus in D should be an invention resting on the utterance of Paul.

[3] Λόγια Ἰησοῦ (ed. Grenfell and Hunt, 1897), 10 f.

people of God. It would not have been natural to Paul, a preacher to the Gentiles and not of purely Jewish culture, who seems to have felt as free towards the earthly life of Jesus as Jesus himself did towards the letter of the Mosaic Law. There were other Christians, however, who felt and acted differently from Paul.]

That the earliest Christians in Palestine observed the Sabbath is nowhere indeed expressly said,[1] but is certainly to be assumed. The silence of Acts is not to be taken as a proof of the non-observance, but contrariwise as a proof that it was observed as matter of course.

[Eusebius (HE 3 27) remarks that the Ebionites observed both the Sabbath and the Lord's Day; and this practice obtained to some extent in much wider circles, for the Apostolical Constitutions recommend that the Sabbath shall be kept as a memorial feast of the creation, and the Lord's Day as a memorial of the resurrection.—W. R. S.]

Was the Sabbath observed in the Christian mission-churches of the Dispersion? This is not an inquiry that affects our main subject, and only a glance at it can be given. We may be certain indeed that where a mission-church consisted essentially of those who had formerly been Jews or σεβόμενοι (see PROSELYTE) the observance of the day did not forthwith cease. It is instructive, however, to note that in the decree of Jerusalem (Acts 15 23 ff.) Sabbath observance is as little imposed as binding on Gentile Christians as is that of any other holy day.[2] In estimating the historical bearing of this testimonium e silentio it matters little whether we take the decree as actually pronounced by a council of apostles at Jerusalem[3] or regard it as a later finding of the church of that city (cp COUNCIL OF JERUSALEM).

We now return to the thesis with which this article opened, viz., that the attitude of Jesus towards the Rabbinical Sabbath (see Mt. 12 1-14 Mk. 2 27) is in harmony with the main result of modern criticism. In his trenchant criticism of the scribes the general position which Jesus takes up is that 'the Sabbath is made for man, and not man for the Sabbath,' which is only a special application of the wider principle that the law is not an end in itself but a help towards the realisation in life of the great ideal of love to God and man, which is the sum of all true religion. On the other hand, the rules of the scribes enumerated thirty-nine main kinds of work forbidden on the Sabbath, and each of these prohibitions gave rise to new subtilties. Jesus' disciples, for example, who plucked ears of corn in passing through a field on the holy day, had, according to Rabbinical casuistry, violated the third of the thirty-nine rules, which forbade harvesting; and in healing the sick, Jesus himself broke the rule that a sick man should not receive medical aid on the Sabbath unless his life was in danger.[4] In fact, as Jesus put it, the Rabbinical theory seemed to be that the Sabbath was not made for man but man for the Sabbath, the observance of which was so much an end in itself that the rules prescribed for it did not require to be justified by appeal to any larger principle of religion or humanity. The precepts of the law were valuable in the eyes of the scribes because they were the seal of Jewish particularism, the barrier erected between the world at large and the exclusive community of the grace of Yahwè. For this purpose the most arbitrary precepts were the most effective, and none were more so than the complicated rules of Sabbath observance. The ideal of the Sabbath which all these rules aimed at realising was absolute rest from everything that could be called work; and even the exercise of those offices of humanity which the strictest Sabbatarians regard as a service to God, and therefore as specially appropriate to his day, was looked on as work. To save life was allowed, but only because danger to life 'superseded the Sabbath.' In like manner the special ritual at the temple prescribed for the Sabbath by the Pentateuchal law was not regarded as any part of the hallowing of the sacred day; on the contrary, the rule was that, in this regard, 'Sabbath was not kept in the sanctuary.' Strictly speaking, therefore, the Sabbath was neither a day of relief to toiling humanity nor a day appointed for public worship; the positive duties of its observance were to wear one's best clothes, eat, drink, and be glad (justified from Is. 58 13).

4 [In like manner the length of journey that could be undertaken without breach of the Sabbath came to be also strictly defined (cp Mt. 24 20). For by the thirty-ninth rule it was forbidden to carry anything from one 'place' to another—a prohibition plainly based on Ex. 16 29, 'let no man go out of his place on the Sabbath day'—in other words, 'let every one stay at home.' A definition of 'place' in this connection was found in the measurement of the 'suburbs' of a Levitical city as laid down in Nu. 35 1-8—2000 cubits square. This gave the 'Sabbath limit' (תְּחוּם הַשַּׁבָּת), and thus the 'Sabbath day's journey' (Acts 1 12; σαββάτου ὁδός) was fixed at 2000 cubits or about 1000 yards.]

A more directly religious element, it is true, was introduced by the practice of attending the synagogue service; but it is to be remembered that this service was primarily regarded not as an act of worship, but as a meeting for instruction in the law. So far, therefore, as the Sabbath existed for any end outside itself, it was an institution to help every Jew to learn the law, and from this point of view it is regarded by Philo and Josephus, who are accustomed to seek a philosophical justification for the peculiar institutions of their religion. But this certainly was not the leading point of view with the mass of the Rabbins.[1]

Such was the position of the scribes; the Sabbath was an end in itself—a mere barrier between God's people and the world at large. Jesus maintains, as we have seen, the opposite doctrine. He declares too that his view of the law as a whole, and the interpretation of the Sabbath law which it involves, can be historically justified from the Old Testament. And in this connection he introduces two of the main methods to which historical criticism of the Old Testament has recurred in modern times: he appeals to the oldest history rather than to the Pentateuchal code as proving that the later conception of the law was unknown in ancient times (Mt. 12 3 4), and to the exceptions to the Sabbath law which the scribes themselves allowed in the interests of worship (v. 5) or humanity (v. 11), as showing that the Sabbath must originally have been devoted to purposes of worship and humanity, and was not always the purposeless arbitrary thing which the schoolmen made it to be. Modern criticism of the history of Sabbath observance among the Hebrews has done nothing more than follow out these arguments in detail, and show that the result is in agreement with what is known as to the dates of the several component parts of the Pentateuch.

The historical results of criticism may be thus summarised. Of the legal passages that speak of the Sabbath all those which show affinity with the doctrine of the scribes—regarding the Sabbath as an arbitrary sign between Yahwè and Israel, entering into details as to particular acts that are forbidden, and enforcing the observance by several penalties, so that it no longer has any religious value, but appears as a mere legal constraint—are post-exilic (Ex. 16 23-30 31 12-17 35 1-3; Nu. 15 32-36); the older laws only demand such cessation from daily toil, and especially from agricultural labour, as among all ancient peoples naturally accompanied a day set apart as a religious festival, and in particular lay weight on the fact that the Sabbath is a humane institution, a holiday for the labouring classes (Ex. 23 12 Dt. 5 12-15). As it stands in these ancient laws, the Sabbath is not at all the unique thing which it was made to be by the scribes. 'The Greeks and the barbarians,' says Strabo (x. 3 9), 'have this in common, that they accompany their sacred rites by a festal remission of labour.' So it was in old Israel: the Sabbath [which the Israelites may have taken from the Canaanites—an agricultural people (see WEEK)] was one of the stated religious feasts, like the new moon and the three great agricultural sacrificial celebrations (Hos. 2 11); the new moons and the Sabbaths alike called men to the sanctuary to do sacrifice (Is. 1 13); the remission of ordinary business belonged to both alike (Am. 8 5), and for precisely the same reason.[1] Hosea even takes it for granted that in captivity the Sabbath will be suspended, like all the other feasts, because in his day a feast implied a sanctuary.

5. Pre-exilic and post-exilic Sabbath.

This conception of the Sabbath, however, necessarily underwent an important modification in the seventh century B.C., when the local sanctuaries were abolished, and those sacrificial rites and feasts which in Hosea's time formed the essence of every act of religion were limited to the central altar, which most men could visit only at rare intervals. From that time forward the new moons, which till then had been at least as important as the Sabbath, and were celebrated by sacrificial feasts as occasions of religious gladness, fell into insignificance, except in the conservative temple ritual. The Sabbath did not share the same fate; but with the abolition of local sacrifices it became for most Israelites an institution of humanity divorced from ritual. So it appears in the deuteronomic decalogue, and presumably also in Jer. 17 19-27. In this form the institution was able to survive the fall of the state and the temple, and the seventh day's rest was clung to in exile as one of the few outward ordinances by which the Israelite could still show his fidelity to Yahwè and mark his separation from the heathen. Hence we understand the importance attached to it from the period of the exile onward (Ezek. 20 12 22 8 23 38 Jer. 17 19-27 Is. 56 1-7 58 13), and the character of a sign between Yahwè and Israel ascribed to it in the post-exilic law. This attachment to the Sabbath, beautiful and touching so long as it was a spontaneous expression of continual devotion to Yahwè, acquired a less pleasing character when, after the exile, it came to be enforced by the civil arm (Neh. 13; cp Neh. 10 31), and when the later law even declared Sabbath-breaking a capital offence. It is just, however, to remember that without the stern discipline of the law the community of the second temple could hardly have escaped dissolution, and that Judaism alone preserved for Christianity the hard-won achievements of the prophets.

As the Sabbath was originally a religious feast, the question of the origin of the Sabbath resolves itself into an inquiry why and in what circle a festal cycle of seven days was first established.

6. Origin of the Sabbath.

In Gen. 2 1-3 and in Ex. 20 11 the Sabbath is declared to be a memorial of the completion of the work of creation in six days. It appears certain, however, that the decalogue as it lay before the deuteronomist did not contain any allusion to the creation (see DECALOGUE), and it is generally believed that this reference was added by the same post-exilic hand that wrote Gen. 1 1-2 4 a. The older account of the creation in Gen. 2 4 b-25 does not recognise the hexæmeron, and it is even doubtful whether the original sketch of Gen. 1 distributed creation over six days. The connection, therefore, between the seven-days week and the work of creation is now generally recognised as secondary. The week and the Sabbath were already known to the writer of Gen. 1, and he used them to give the framework for his picture of the creation, which in the nature of things could not be literal and required some framework. At the same time, there was a peculiar appropriateness in associating the Sabbath with the doctrine that Yahwè is the Creator of all things; for we see from Is. 40-55 that this doctrine was a mainstay of Jewish faith in those very days of exile which gave the Sabbath a new importance for the faithful.

But, if the week as a religious cycle is older than the idea of the week of creation, we cannot hope to find more than probable evidence of the origin of the Sabbath. At the time of the exile the Sabbath was already an institution peculiarly Jewish, otherwise it could not have served as a mark of distinction from heathenism. This, however, does not necessarily imply that in its origin it was specifically Hebrew, but only that it had acquired distinguishing features of a marked kind. What is certain is that the origin of the Sabbath must be sought within a circle that used the week as a division of time. Here again we must distinguish between the week as such and the astrological week, i.e., the week in which the seven days are named each after the planet which is held to preside over its first hour.

If the day is divided into twenty-four hours and the planets preside in turn over each hour of the week in the order of their periodic times (Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, Sun, Venus, Mercury, Moon), we get the order of days of the week with which we are familiar. For, if the Sun presides over the first hour of Sunday, and therefore also over the eighth, the fifteenth, and the twenty-second, Venus will have the twenty-third hour, Mercury the twenty-fourth, and the Moon, as the third in order from the Sun, will preside over the first hour of Monday. Mars, again, as third from the Moon, will preside over Tuesday (Dies Martis, Mardi), and so forth.

This astrological week became widely current in the Roman empire, but was still a novelty in the time of Dio Cassius (37 18). That writer believed that it came from Egypt; but the old Egyptians had a week of ten (not seven) days, and the original home of astrology and of the division of the day into twenty-four hours is Chaldæa. It is plain, however, that there is a long step between the astrological assignation of each hour of the week to a planet and the recognition of the week as an ordinary division of time by people at large. Astrology is in its nature an occult science, and there is not the slightest trace of a day of twenty-four hours among the ancient Hebrews, who had the week and the Sabbath long before they had any acquaintance with the planetary science of the Babylonian priests. Moreover, it is quite clear from extant remains of Assyrian calendars that our astrological week did not prevail in civil life even among the Babylonians and Assyrians: they did not dedicate each day in turn to its astrological planet. These facts make it safe to reject one often-repeated explanation of the Sabbath, viz., that it was in its origin what it is in the astrological week, the day sacred to Saturn, and that its observance is to be derived from an ancient Hebrew worship of that planet. In truth, there is no evidence of the worship of Saturn among the oldest Hebrews (see CHIUN AND SICCUTH).

The week, however, is found in various parts of the world in a form that has nothing to do with astrology or the seven planets, and with such a distribution as to make it pretty certain that it had no artificial origin, but suggested itself independently, and for natural reasons, to different races. In fact, the four quarters of the moon supply an obvious division of the month; and, wherever new moon and full moon are religious occasions, we get in the most natural way a sacred cycle of fourteen or fifteen days, of which the week of seven or eight days (determined by half-moon) is the half. Thus the old Hindus chose the new and the full moon as days of sacrifice; the eve of the sacrifice was called upavasatha, and in Buddhism the same word (uposatha) has come to denote a Sabbath observed on the full moon, on the day when there is no moon, and on the two days which are eighth from the full and the new moon respectively, with fasting and other religious exercises.[1]

From this point of view it is most significant that in the older parts of the Hebrew scriptures the new moon

[1] [Hence also the Sabbath was quite readily made use of for the purpose of paying a visit to a man of God (2 K. 4 23), or the like; quite the opposite of the later practice, which forbade all travelling on Sabbaths and feast-days (cp Mt. 24 20 and Jos. Ant. xiii. 8 4: οὐκ ἔστιν δὲ ἡμῖν οὔτε ἐν τοῖς σάββασιν οὔτε ἐν τῇ ἑορτῇ ὁδεύειν).—K.M.]

[1] Childers, Pali Dict. 535; Kern, Buddhismus (Germ. Transl.) 8; Mahâvagga, ii. 1 1 (ET 1 239, 291).

and the Sabbath are almost invariably mentioned together. The month is beyond question an old sacred division of time common to all the Semites; even the Arabs, who received the week at quite a late period from the Syrians (Bīrūnī, Chronology, ET 58), greeted the new moon with religious acclamations. And this must have been an old Semitic usage, for the word which properly means 'to greet the new moon' (ahalla) is, as Lagarde (Orientalia, 2 19) has shown, etymologically connected with the Hebrew words used of any festal joy. Among the Hebrews, or rather perhaps among the Canaanites, whose speech they borrowed, the joy at the new moon became the type of religious festivity in general. Nor are other traces wanting of the connection of sacrificial occasions—i.e., religious feasts—with the phases of the moon among the Semites. The Harranians had four sacrificial days in every month, and, of these, two at least were determined by the conjunction and opposition of the moon.[1]

That full moon as well as new moon had a religious significance among the ancient Hebrews seems to follow from the fact that, when the great agricultural feasts were fixed to set days, the full moon was chosen. In older times these feast-days appear to have been Sabbaths (Lev. 23 11; cp PASSOVER, NEW MOON).

A week determined by the phases of the moon has an average length of $29\frac{1}{2} \div 4 = 7\frac{3}{8}$ days—i.e., three weeks out of eight would have eight days. But there seems to be in 1 Sam. 20 27, compared with vv. 18 24, an indication that in old times the feast of the new moon lasted two days—a very natural institution, since it appears that the feast was fixed in advance, whilst the Hebrews of Saul's time cannot have been good enough astronomers to know beforehand on which of two successive days the new moon would actually be observed.[2] In that case a week of seven working days would occur only once in two months. We cannot tell when the Sabbath became dissociated from the month; but the change seems to have been made before the Book of the Covenant, which already regards the Sabbath simply as an institution of humanity and ignores the new moon. In both points it is followed by Deuteronomy.

7. The Babylonian and Assyrian Sabbath.

The word 'Sabbath' (šabattuv), with the explanation 'day of rest of the heart,' is claimed as Assyrian on the basis of a textual emendation made by Fried. Delitzsch in 2 Rawl. 32 16. The value of this isolated and uncertain testimony cannot be placed very high, and it seems to prove too much, for it is practically certain that the Babylonians at the time of the Hebrew exile cannot have had a Sabbath exactly corresponding in conception to what the Hebrew Sabbath had become under very special historical circumstances. What we do know from a calendar of the intercalary month Elūl II. is that in that month the 7th, 14th, 19th, 21st, and 28th days had a peculiar character, and that on them certain acts were forbidden to the king and others. There is the greatest uncertainty as to the details (cp the very divergent renderings in RP, 7 160 f.; Schrader, KAT$^{(2)}$ 19; Lotz, Qu. de historia Sabbati, 39 f.); but these days, which are taken to be Assyrian Sabbaths, are certainly not 'days of rest of the heart,' and to all appearance are unlucky days, and expressly designated as such.[3] If, therefore, they are 'Assyrian Sabbaths' at all, they are exactly opposite in character to the Hebrew Sabbath, which was described by Hosea as a day of gladness, and never ceased to be a day of feasting and good cheer. [Cp Jastrow, in the article mentioned below.]

8. Recent Literature.

Besides the works already mentioned, reference should be made to W. Lotz, Quæstionum de historia Sabbati libri duo (1883), which takes account of the Assyriological evidence. Hirschfeld's 'Remarks on the etymology of Sabbath' (JRAS, April 1896, pp. 353-359), according to Jastrow, misunderstands and misquotes the Babylonian material. Nowack (Hebr. Arch. [1894] 2 140 ff.) gives a lucid sketch of current theories and their grounds. See also Jensen, Sunday School Times (Philadelphia), Jan. 16, 1892, and Jastrow, Amer. J. of Theol. 1898, pp. 315-352. Jensen is cautious and reserved on the question of a Babylonian origin of the Sabbath, which, however, Gunkel (Schöpf. 14) and Jastrow (op. cit.) expressly affirm. The bridge which Gunkel fails to construct between the Babylonian atonement-Sabbath and the Hebrew rest-Sabbath, Jastrow endeavours to point out. He remarks that the Heb. šabbāthōn does in fact, like the Bab. šabattum, convey the idea of propitiation or appeasement of the divine anger, and he is of opinion that the Hebrew Sabbath was originally a šabbāthōn—i.e., a day of propitiation and appeasement, marked by atoning rites. At this stage of development it was celebrated at intervals of seven days, corresponding with changes in the moon's phases, and was identical in character with the four days in each month (7th, 14th, 21st, and 28th) that the Babylonians regarded as days which had to be converted into days of propitiation. There were also, however, other šabbāthôn days, such as the New Year's Day, the Day of Atonement, the first and eighth days of the annual pilgrimage to the chief sanctuary.

The introduction, in consequence of profound changes in religious conceptions among the Hebrews, of the custom of celebrating the Sabbath every seventh day, irrespective of the relationship of the day to the moon's phases, led to a complete separation from the ancient view of the Sabbath, whilst the introduction, at a still later period, of the doctrine that the divine work of creation was completed in six days removed the Hebrew Sabbath still further from the point at which the development of the corresponding Babylonian institution ceased. Hence the position of the Sabbath in the Priestly Code. The field, however, is still open for further investigation.

Cp also Toy, 'The earliest form of the Sabbath,' JBL 18 190 ff. (1899); and C. H. W. Johns, Assyrian Deeds and Documents (who finds that the 19th day of the month was observed by abstinence from secular business; but the deeds do not indicate that the 7th, 14th, 21st, and 28th days were Sabbaths).

[1] The others—according to the Fihrist, 319 14—are the 17th and the 28th.

[2] It appears from Judith 8 6 that even in later times there were two days at the new moon on which it was improper to fast.

[3] Lotz says they are lucky days; but the expression which he renders, dies faustus, is applied to every day in the calendar. The rest of his book does not rise above this example of acumen.

SABBATH DAY'S JOURNEY. See SABBATH, § 4 n.

SABBATHEUS (σαββαταιος [BA]), 1 Esd. 9 14 = Ezra 10 15, SHABBETHAI, 1.

SABBATICAL YEAR. The Jews under the second temple observed every seventh year as a Sabbath according to the (post-exilic) law of Lev. 25 1-7. It was a year in which all agriculture was remitted, in which the fields lay unsown, the vines grew unpruned, and even the natural produce was not gathered in. That this law was not observed before the captivity we learn from Lev. 26 34 ff.; indeed, so long as the Hebrews were an agricultural people with little trade, in a land often ravaged by severe famines, such a law could not have been observed. Even in later times it was occasionally productive of great distress (1 Macc. 6 49 53; Jos. Ant. xiv. 16 2). In the older legislation, however, we already meet with a seven years' period in more than one connection. The release of a Hebrew servant after six years' labour (Ex. 21 2 ff. Dt. 15 12 ff.) has only a remote analogy to the Sabbatical year. But in Ex. 23 10 ff. it is prescribed that the crop of every seventh year (apparently the self-sown crop) shall be left for the poor, and after them for the beasts. The difference between this and the later law is that the seventh year is not called a Sabbath, and that there is no indication that all land was to lie fallow on the same year. In this form a law prescribing one year's fallow in seven may have been anciently observed. It is extended in v. 11 to the vineyard and the olive-yard; but here the culture necessary to keep the vines and olive-trees in order is not forbidden; the precept is only that the produce is to be left to the poor. In Deuteronomy this law is not repeated; but a fixed seven years' period is ordained for the benefit of poor debtors, apparently in the sense that in the seventh year no interest is to be exacted by the creditor from a Hebrew, or that no proceedings are to be taken against the debtor in that year (Deut. 15 1 ff.). W. R. S.

SABBEUS (ϲαββαιαϲ [BA]) 1 Esd. 9 32 = Ezra 10 31, SHEMAIAH, 19.

SABEANS occurs four times in AV, representing three distinct Hebrew words in MT; (1) in Job 1 15 (שְׁבָא, RVmg. SHEBA) and Joel 3 8 (שְׁבָאִים, RV MEN OF SHEBA); (2) in Is. 45 14 (סְבָאִים), see SEBA; and (3) in Ezek. 23 42 (AVmg. and RV 'drunkards'), where, however, it is no part of the original text. The Kt. סובאים—i.e., סוֹבְאִים, the reading for which the Ḳre substitutes סָבָאִים with the same meaning (drunkards), is an obvious interpolation due simply to dittography of the preceding מוּבָאִים. On the further textual corruption of the verse see Cornill, ad loc., and Toy (SBOT). Of course none of these words has anything to do with any of the religious sects that have at one time or another been called Sabians—i.e., Baptists (see art. SABIANS in Ency. Brit. 21 128)—a name which is etymologically quite distinct.

SABI. 1. (ϲαβει [A]), 1 Esd. 5 28 RV = Ezra 2 42, SHOBAI.

2. (σαβ[ε]ιη [BA]) 1 Esd. 5 34 AV, RV Sabie = Ezra 2 57; see POCHERETH-HAZZEBAIM.

SABIAS (ϲαβιαϲ [BA]) 1 Esd. 1 9 RV = 2 Ch. 35 9, HASHABIAH, 6.

SABTA (סַבְתָּא, ϲαβατα [B], ϲαβαθα [A], ϲε. [L], 1 Ch. 1 9), or Sabtah (סַבְתָּה, ϲαβαθα [ADEL], Gen. 10 7), one of the sons of Cush. See CUSH. If 'Cush' here means the N. Arabian region of that name, we are entitled and indeed compelled to suppose that 'Sabtah' and 'Raamah' have arisen by corruption and editorial manipulation from the names of places near the S. border of Canaan. סבתא will probably come from מַעֲכָת 'Maacath' (the southern Maacah), which is also the original of SUCCOTH in the earliest story of Jacob and in Ps. 60 8, and of SOCOH in 1 S. 17 1. Cp SHABBETHAI. From the ordinary point of view Dillmann finds some plausibility in Tuch's suggestion that Sabta = Σαββαθα (Peripl. 27; also Ptolemy, Strabo), the Sabota of Pliny (6 32 12 32). This was the capital of the Chatramotitæ (see HAZARMAVETH), and was famous as the centre of the trade in incense. The name is the Sab. שבות. According to Glaser, Sabta is the Σαφθα of Ptol. vi. 7 30, and is to be placed at Sudeir or in the NE of Yemāmah; Sabta, Raamah, and Sabteca representing the districts on the coast of the Persian Gulf (Skizze, 2 252 f.).

T. K. C.

SABTECA (סַבְתְּכָא, ϲαβακαθα [ADE], ϲεβε. [L] in Gen.; ϲεβεκαθα [BL], -θαχα [A] in Ch.; 𝔊 therefore indicates rather SBKTHA), one of the sons of Cush (Gen. 10 7 1 Ch. 1 9†). AV has Sabtechah in Gen. and Sabtecha in Ch. Glaser, following Bochart, connects this with the name Samydake in Carmania, on the E. side of the Persian Gulf (Skizze, 2 252); but Dillmann calls attention to the phonetic difference. It is perhaps really a dittographed SABTA, the כ being a record of a reading סכתא (cp 𝔊 in Gen.). T. K. C.

SACAR (שָׂכָר). Probably an ethnic of the same group as ISSACHAR, ZICHRI. The name has, of course, no connection with that of the little known Egyptian god Sakar (cp ISSACHAR, col. 2292, n. 5). 1. On the name in 1 Ch. 11 35, see SHARAR and ISSACHAR, § 6 (end).

2. A son of OBED-EDOM (q.v.), 1 Ch. 26 4 (ϲωχαρ [B], ϲαχαρ [L], ϲαχιαρ [A]).

SACK. The wide diffusion of this word throughout the European languages is probably due in the first instance to Phœnician trade and commerce.[1] The word, it is true, does not happen to be found in either Phœnician or Punic; but it is vouched for in Hebrew, Syriac, Ethiopic, and possibly Assyrian. See SACKCLOTH.

1. śaḳ, שַׂק (σάκκος [but μάρσιππος, Gen. 44 1 f.], saccus), Gen. 42 25 35 (E); in v. 27*a* it is due to R (Holz.); Lev. 11 32 Josh. 9 4. See SACKCLOTH.

2. kĕlī, כְּלִי, Gen. 42 25*a* (ἀγγεῖον), RV 'vessel'; cp BAG.

3. 'amtáḥath, אַמְתַּחַת (√spread out, cp Is. 40 22), only in Gen. 41-42 J (42 25 27 f. 35 43 12 etc.). On E's term see (1) above. 𝔊 in 42 27 f. 43 12 μάρσιππος.

4. ṣiḳḳālōn, צִקְלֹן, 2 K. 4 42† RV (AV, RVmg. 'husk,' AVmg. 'scrip,' 'garment'), cp FOOD, col. 1539 n. 2. AVmg. gives a superficially plausible sense (cp SCRIP)—derived from an anonymous Greek translator's κώρυκος (Field's Hex.); but √צקל is unknown.

[It has been conjectured elsewhere (see PROPHET, § 7) that Elisha, like Elijah, was specially a prophet of the Negeb, and that כרמל is a popular corruption of ירחמאל. If so, בצקלנו probably comes from בֵּית־גַּלִּים, 'Beth-gallim,' where גלים is another corruption of ירחמאל. Elisha was at a place called Beth-gallim, or (see v. 38) Beth-gilgal, or (since Gallim and Gilgal = Jeraḥmeel) Beth-jeraḥmeel, in the Negeb formerly belonging to the Jeraḥmeelites. But Lagarde's reading קלעת, 'wallet' (?), suggested by the βακελλεθ of 𝔊A and Theod. (see BDB), is ingenious.—T. K. C.]

SACKBUT (שַׂבְּכָא), Dan. 3 5 7 10 15†. See MUSIC, § 6 (10).

SACKCLOTH (שַׂק; ϲακκοϲ; saccus, cilicium[2]). It is probable that the Heb. śaḳ was originally a coarse textile fabric made from the hair of the camel or the goat (cp the meanings of σάκκος, a borrowed word).

1. Use.

Like the śimlah it could be used also as a wrap or bag (cp MANTLE, § 2 [1]); see SACK. Referring the reader, generally, to the articles DRESS and MOURNING CUSTOMS, we propose here to indicate the nature of the garment expressed by the word śaḳ, and to endeavour to ascertain the origin of the custom of wearing it.

The usage of the word suggests that the śaḳ was nothing more than a loin-cloth, similar, no doubt, to the iḥrām[3] of Moslem pilgrims at Mecca. It was worn as a token of grief after a death (Gen. 37 34 2 S. 3 31 Joel 1 8), more commonly, however, in times of trial, to remove a calamity, or as a means of propitiation.

Thus, the śaḳ is worn after hearing bad news (2 K. 6 30 19 1 Est. 4 1-4, etc.), to avert a pestilence (1 Ch. 21 16), when one's neighbour lies in sickness (Ps. 35 13), or as a sign of general undefined grief (Ps. 30 11 [12] 69 11 [12] Is. 22 12). It is often preceded by the rending of the clothes (Gen. 37 34 1 K. 21 27—the rending alone in Job 1 20), or by the covering of one's head with ashes or (Neh. 9 1 2 Macc. 10 25) earth.[4] Like the iḥrām, the śaḳ is also worn by women (Joel 1 8, cp Judith 8 5 10 3 2 Macc. 3 19). In Jon. 3 8 it is ordered to be worn by both man and beast (bĕhēmāh)

The passages in which the śaḳ is mentioned as worn next the skin are probably not exceptional (1 K. 21 27 2 K. 6 30 Is. 32 11); Doughty has remarked the half-naked appearance of the wearers of the iḥrām—'like bathing-

2. A sacred garment.

[1] Some (e.g., Whitney, in the Cent. Dict.) have supposed this diffusion to be due to the incident in the story of Joseph, where the cup was hidden in the sack. This does not explain the various meanings of σάκκος, saccus, and, as a matter of fact, the Heb. śaḳ appears only thrice in the story, whilst the synonym 'amtáḥath occurs no fewer than fourteen times (see SACK, 3).

[2] Saccus and cilicium are about evenly distributed. For cilicium (a goat's-hair cloth used for tents), see CILICIA, § 3 end, and cp TENT, § 3.

[3] Śaḳ is frequently used with ḥāgar, 'gird on,' the reverse process being described by pittaḥ, 'loosen' (Ps. 30 11 [12] Is. 20 2). The iḥrām (on which cp Wellh. Heid.(1) 116 f. (2) 123) is a loin-cloth covering the knee, one lap of which may be cast over the shoulder (Doughty, Ar. Des. 2 479 481). In Eg. sa-g, with the determinative 'hair,' is a woollen Palestinian garment of the poor (WMM OLZ, 1901, col. 191).

[4] Jastrow JAOS 20 139 suggests that in Judith 9 1 (σποδόν), the translator mistook ăphēr (see TURBAN, § 2) for ēpher, like his predecessor in 2 S. 13 19.

men' (Ar. Des. 2 479 ff. 537), and the dress doubtless resembled the prophet's girdle which, in Job 12 18, is worn as a mark of humiliation by a king. See GIRDLE.

The sackcloth of the OT, therefore, must not be regarded as in any way akin to a sack or sackcloth in the modern sense of the word, and, in endeavouring to ascertain the origin of the custom of wearing such a garb, we must not be led away by the early Christian or the later ideas with which it is associated.[1]

That conservatism prevails longest in matters of cult is a familiar experience, and Schwally, Nowack, and Kittel (HK on 1 K. 21 27) favour the view that the śaḳ is the clothing of an earlier half-forgotten time, which, though it may long have continued to be worn—e.g., by slaves and the poorer people—was nevertheless adopted exceptionally by the ruling classes on specific occasions (cp DRESS, § 2, col. 1136, n. 4). Another view is possible.

It is to be observed (a) that the corresponding iḥrām is essentially a dress for a sacred occasion; (b) that the prophets wore a garment similar to the śaḳ; and (c) that the sacred ephod itself was probably once a mere loin-cloth (see EPHOD, § 1, and cp T. C. Foote, JBL 21 41-44 [1902]). On these grounds, therefore, it seems extremely probable that the śaḳ was pre-eminently a sacred garment, and it agrees with this interpretation that we find it worn by people of all classes on any especially solemn occasion (1 Ch. 21 16 Joel 1 13 Dan. 9 3 1 Macc. 3 47 2 Macc. 10 25 etc.).

In view of what has been said elsewhere on the bearing of ideas of holiness upon such a matter as dress,[2] a plausible explanation of the custom may be attempted.

3. Why worn. Garments that have come in contact with holy things are unfit for common use, and in early Arabia certain rites were performed either in a naked state or in clothes reserved for the purpose. There are some indications that this held good among the ancient Hebrews; and if we bear in mind that the śaḳ is worn at times of great trouble, when Yahwè's help or forgiveness is besought, we may perhaps surmise that such occasions were formerly accompanied by a sacrificial rite when a special garb (if we may judge from the Arabian evidence) would not be unnatural. It would be just at such a time as this that the individual would feel himself brought into closest contact with his deity. At all events, ideas connected with worship of the dead do not cover the whole ground.

The king of Nineveh removes his royal mantle before donning the śaḳ (Jon. 3 6),[1] the 'holy' occasion requires 'holy' clothes, and the primary object of the rending of the garments is probably to put oneself in a state of nakedness as quickly as possible (Schwally, Frey).

That the use of this special garment should have been retained long after the (ex hyp.) ritual died out is not without analogy. The gradual decay is further illustrated by the fact that sometimes even it was the custom not to wear the śaḳ but to lie upon it (2 S. 21 10 Is. 58 5), and that in later Jewish times the rending of the garments was confined to a small slit (Nowack, HA 1 193).

See the literature at the end of MOURNING CUSTOMS; also Schwally, Das Leben nach d. Tode (1892), 11 ff., Frey, Tod, Seelenglaube, etc. (1898), 34 ff.

I. HISTORY OF SACRIFICE IN OT

The term 'sacrifice' may with etymological propriety be employed of all offerings to God; in common use

1. Introductory. it denotes specifically that class of offerings in which a victim is slain, corresponding to the Heb. zĕbaḥ (lit. 'slaughter').[3] In the present article the word will be used in this more restricted sense, whilst offerings of grain, meal, bread, oil, and the like (Heb. minḥāh) are called 'oblations.' The term 'offering' will be employed as the equivalent of the comprehensive ḳorbān, as well as in such phrases as 'burnt offering' ('ōlāh, holocaust), peace offering (šĕlem), sin offering (ḥaṭṭāth), trespass offering (āšām).

For convenience, certain species of offering are made

The present article deals in its first part (§§ 1-22) with the history of sacrifice in the OT; in its second (§§ 23-40) with the developed Jewish system; the third part (§§ 41-53) discusses beliefs and ideas connected with sacrifice, its intent, significance, efficacy, and operation; the fourth part (§§ 54-61) treats of sacrifice in the NT.

2. Sacrifices of nomads.

Before the invasion of Palestine the Israelite tribes were nomads; their living and their wealth were in their flocks of small cattle.[1] These also furnished the material of their sacrifices. Offerings were doubtless made also of the spoils of war, and perhaps of animals taken in the chase (see below, § 8). Our knowledge of the character of these sacrifices is derived not so much from the stories of the patriarchs in JE as from survivals in later custom and law. The nature of these survivals, together with the permanent conditions of nomadic life in the deserts of Syria and Arabia, justify us in supplementing or interpreting our scanty material by what is known of Arab sacrifice in pre-Islamic times and among the modern Bedouins.[2]

The occasions of sacrifice are many and various. Among the modern Arabs sacrifices are offered on the birth of a son, a circumcision, marriage, the coming of a guest; for the recovery of the sick or for the health of flocks and herds; on the inception of an enterprise, such as setting out for a foray, breaking ground for tillage, opening or enlarging a well, laying the foundation of a building; on the conclusion of a compact or covenant; the return from a successful expedition; on the anniversary of a kinsman's death, and the like.

The rites of sacrifice are of primitive simplicity. The owner ordinarily slaughters his own victim. The blood is poured upon the ground, smeared upon the sacred stone, upon the tent ropes, the door-posts of houses, or upon persons or animals. The flesh makes a feast for the owner, his family, tribesmen, and guests.

3. Firstlings.[3]

A species of sacrifice which in all probability goes back to the nomadic stage is the offering of firstlings (bĕkōrōth, sg. bĕkōr) of animals, that is, the first offspring of the dam, which 'opens the womb' (péṭer rĕḥem, Ex. 34 19 13 2 12 15 Nu. 18 15; cp péṭer šĕger bĕhēmāh, Ex. 13 12). The shepherd Abel makes his offering 'of the firstlings of his flock and of their fat portions' (Gen. 4 4 J); the laws insistently claim all firstlings as God's right (Ex. 13 2 12-15 22 29 f. [28 f.] 34 19 f. Lev. 22 27 27 26 Nu. 18 15-17 Dt. 12 6 17 14 23 15 19-23, cp Neh. 10 36). The animal was primitively sacrificed shortly after its birth; the oldest rule is: 'Seven days it shall be with its dam; on the eighth day thou shalt give it to me' (Ex. 22 30 [29]).[4] A similar custom existed among the heathen Arabs; the first birth (called fara') of a she-camel, goat, or ewe was sacrificed, frequently while still so young that its flesh was gelatinous and stuck to the skin. This offering of firstlings was permitted in the earliest years of Islam, Mohammed advising, however, that the sacrifice should be deferred till the victim was a year or two old; later he prohibited the fara' as well as the sacrifices in Rajab ('atīrah, see below, § 4).[5]

The sacrifice of firstlings, like the offering of first-fruits, with which it is sometimes associated (Neh. 10 35 f., cp Ex. 22 29 f. [28 f.]; note also the connection with tithes, etc., Dt. 12 6 17 14 23), was regarded in later times as a tribute to God (Nu. 18 15 ff. Neh. 10 35 f.), and as such it has been surmised that the custom of devoting firstlings to God arose after the settlement in Canaan by 'a secondary extension of the practice of offering the fruits of the field.' (So Benzinger, PASSOVER, § 8 end.) The existence of firstling sacrifices among the Arabs shows that this inference is unwarranted. The sacrifice of firstlings, as the widespread custom of offering firstborn children indicates (see Frazer, Golden Bough(2), 2 43 ff.), was not originally conceived as a tribute to the deity (see TITHE). That there is no mention of these offerings before the invasion of Canaan is not a sufficient reason for doubting their antiquity.

4. Spring sacrifices.[1]

In the history of the exodus Moses asks the Egyptian king to let the Israelites go into the desert to sacrifice to their God Yahwè, 'lest he fall upon us with pestilence or with the sword' (Ex. 5 3 J, cp 3 18 5 8 17; 5 1 E); the presence of all the people, young and old, is requisite; and they must take with them their flocks and herds to furnish the victims (10 9 25). From 5 3 it might seem that the sacrifice in the wilderness was something unusual, demanded on this occasion by an oracle; 5 1 (E) and 10 9 (J), however, represent it as an established institution, 'the ḥāg of Yahwè.'[2] The season was the spring of the year, in the month called by the Canaanites Ābīb (Ex. 13 4), corresponding to the Syrian-Babylonian Nīsān.

It is natural to connect this ḥāg festival with the spring festivals of other Semitic peoples. The first eight days of the month Rajab, which in the old calendar fell in the spring (see Wellh. Prol.(2), viii.; Heid.(1), 94 ff.), was a great sacrificial season among the heathen Arabs. The poets compare the carnage of battle to the multitudes of victims lying around the sacred stones.[3] The victim, commonly a sheep, was called 'atīrah (pl. 'atā'ir); its blood was poured on the head of the sacred stone (Nuwairī, quoted in Ramussen, Addit. 79), the flesh consumed in a feast. Such sacrifices might be offered at home; but it was probably more common to take them to some more famous holy place (see Wellh. Heid. 74, 94). The sacrifice, like Arab sacrifices in general, was often made in fulfilment of a vow. The Rajab sacrifices were at first kept up by the Moslems; a tradition reports Mohammed to have said: 'Every Moslem is bound to offer each year an 'aḍḥāh (the sacrifice of the tenth of the month Dhū-l-Ḥijjah) and an 'atīrah' (in Rajab [Lisān vi. 211 14 f.]); subsequently, however, he prohibited the 'atīrah as well as the fara' (see above, § 3). In the time of Mohammed the month Dhū-l-Ḥijjah, in which was held the great festival in the vicinity of Mecca, fell at the beginning of spring (Wellh. Prol.(2), 105), and a comparison with the Passover naturally suggested itself;[4] but further studies in the old Arab calendar have shown that this coincidence in date is accidental.

Among the Syrians, the chief feast of the year at Hierapolis was in the spring (Lucian, Dea Syria, 49); at Ḥarrān the first half of Nisan was a season of special sacrifices (Fihrist, 322; Chwolsohn, Ssabier 2 25); evidence of the sacredness of Nisan appears in the Nabatæan inscriptions at Madāin Ṣāliḥ;[5] and at Palmyra;[6] the great festival of the modern Yezīdīs falls at the same season.[7]

A closer connection between the Hebrew spring

1 See PASSOVER, FEASTS.

2 Ḥāg is a religious gathering (Nö. ZDMG 41 719). The word is used not only of the Canaanite-Israelite agricultural festivals, but also of Arab (and Sabæan) festivals, which brought multitudes together. There is thus no ground for the assumption that the use of the term here is due merely to the later association of the Passover and the Feast of Unleavened Bread (ḥag ha-maṣṣōth).

festival ('Passover') and the Arab Rajab sacrifices has been thought to be established by evidence that both were primitively offerings of firstlings.[1] In the Pentateuch, laws prescribing the dedication of firstlings stand in juxtaposition to ordinances for the Feast of Unleavened Bread or the Passover (see Ex. 34 18 f. Dt. 15 19-23 16 1 f. Ex. 12 43-50 13 1 3-10 11-13 14-16); the slaying of the firstborn of the Egyptians has been interpreted as a reprisal upon them for withholding from Yahwè, by their refusal to let Israel go, the firstlings that were his due (see Ex. 3 18 8 1 20 10 24 ff.; Wellh. 86). It has been shown, however, under PASSOVER (§ 8), that the passages cited, though compatible with such a theory of the original character of the Passover, by no means require it; and opposing considerations of much weight are to be drawn from the peculiar ritual of the Passover (see below, § 6), in which—to name but a single point—one victim is required for each household, rich or poor, whereas the number of firstlings must have varied with the owner's possessions.

5. Firstlings at them.

Nor is it satisfactorily established that the Arab Rajab sacrifices were firstlings. It is true that the term 'atīrah, by which these victims are usually designated, is by some lexicographers made equivalent to fara', firstling.[2] This is, however, nothing more than the confusion which frequently occurs in their accounts of the religious customs of 'the times of ignorance,' and over against it must be put the fact that not only the traditionists[3] but also the lexicons generally distinguish the two clearly enough.

6. Peculiar rite.

The Passover differed conspicuously from all other Israelite sacrifices, and preserved to the last, essentially unaltered, its primitive peculiarities. In the earliest times, the carcass of the victim was probably roasted whole, either over an open fire or in a pit in the earth (as by the modern Samaritans), and the flesh sometimes eaten half raw or merely softened by fire. Dt. 16 7 prescribes that it shall be boiled, like other sacrifices. This, however, did not prevail; P preserves the primitive custom while guarding against abuse: the Passover is neither to be eaten raw nor boiled in water, but roasted in the fire (Ex. 12 9), with head, legs, and inwards. The sacrificial feast was held by night at full moon; the participants were in their everyday garb, not in ceremonial apparel; everything was done with haste; the whole victim was devoured—including, doubtless, in ancient times the exta which in later sacrificial ritual were offered to God by fire, and therefore strictly forbidden as food; only the bones must not be broken;[4] the flesh must all be consumed before daybreak; if aught remained it was to be burnt up at once; with the flesh was eaten—not originally unleavened cakes, but—a salad of bitter herbs (Ex. 12 9 f., cp Nu. 9 11 f., also Dt. 16 4*b*).[5]

With this singular ritual has been compared the description given by Nilus of the customs of the Arabs in the desert S. of Palestine and in the Sinaitic peninsula in his own time—the end of the fourth century A.D. They sacrificed a white camel to Venus, the morning star; after the chief or priest who presided at the sacrifice had slain the animal, all rushed upon the carcass with knives, hewed it to pieces, and devoured it in wild haste, hide, inwards, bones, and all, that not a scrap of it might be left for the rising sun to look upon.[6]

SACRIFICE

In Ex. 12 21-27 (ultimately from J) the elders are bidden to take sheep or goats, one for each clan (mišpāḥāh), slaughter them, and, dipping a bunch of herbs ('hyssop') into the blood, to strike it upon the lintel and door-posts; Yahwè will not suffer 'the destroyer' to enter a house on which he sees these blood-marks. This, an editor adds, is the historical origin and explanation of a custom in use in later times; with it he connects etymologically the name 'Passover' (pésaḥ), because Yahwè 'passed over' (pāsaḥ) the marked houses of the Israelites (Ex. 12 24-27). The object of the rite is to protect the inmates of the house from 'the destroyer'; that is, in primitive conception, from the demons of disease and death. Similar customs with the same motive are found among many peoples.[1]

7. Protection by blood.

Whether this rite was originally connected with the Hebrew spring feast is not clear. J, who prescribes the marking of the houses, says nothing about a feast, and, indeed, repeatedly insists that the festival of Yahwè cannot be celebrated in Egypt (Ex. 5 3 8 25-27); P orders that the blood of the lamb slain for the feast be applied to the door of every house in which it is eaten (Ex. 12 7, cp 13), a direction which Jewish tradition and practice regarded as applying only to the 'Egyptian Passover';[2] Dt. makes no mention of this use of the blood at the PASSOVER (q.v., § 13).[3] It is not unlikely that a rite originally occasional, as in the outbreak of an epidemic, came to be practised annually for the protection of the household during the coming year, and in connection with the old spring feast.[4] The name pésaḥ probably belonged, notwithstanding J's etymology, to the feast rather than to the blood marking.

8. Wild animals; spoils of war.

Some Semitic peoples, both nomadic and settled, offered in sacrifice animals taken in the chase. Gazelles were offered by the Babylonians (Jastrow, Rel. Bab.-Ass. 661) and probably by the Phœnicians (Sacrificial Tariffs, CIS 165 59 167 5; cp ISAAC, § 4, n. 2). Among the heathen Arabs, also, gazelles were sacrificed, but were regarded as an inferior offering; men who had vowed sheep or goats from their flocks sometimes substituted gazelles.[5] The nomadic forefathers of the Israelites may have made similar offerings; but there is no reminiscence of this in the OT. The requirement that the blood of animals taken in the chase be poured out and covered with earth (Lev. 17 13, cp Dt. 12 16 24) is not necessarily an attenuated survival of a sacrificial rite; the belief that the soul is in the blood (Lev. 17 14, on which see below, § 46) is reason enough.[6]

Sacrifice was doubtless offered also of the spoil of war, as in later times (1 S. 15 15 21 cp 14 34; see also Gen. 14 20). Similarly the Arabs on their return from a foray sacrificed one beast of those they had taken and feasted on it before dividing the booty.[7] The Arabs of whom Nilus wrote took by preference a human victim, a fair youth, from among their captives; in default of such, they offered a white camel.[8] The Carthaginians, after a victory, sacrificed the fairest of their captives by night as burnt offerings (Diodorus Siculus, 20 65); similar instances have been adduced from the records of Assyrian kings (Shalmaneser, Monolith, obv. 17). The slaying of Agag, whom Samuel hewed in pieces before Yahwè in Gilgal (1 S. 15 33), has sometimes been regarded as a sacrifice of this kind;[1] but it is doubtful whether this interpretation is correct (see below, § 13 end).

9. In Canaan: sources.

The many accounts of sacrifices in the books of Samuel and Kings are in large part taken from old and good sources, and give us comparatively full and trustworthy information for the period which they cover. By their side we may place the similar descriptions in Judges, and in the patriarchal story as narrated by J and E (e.g., Gen. 15 7 ff.). The laws in the same sources (especially in Ex. 34 and 21-23) dealing with feasts and offerings, with the other—not inconsiderable—remains of early collections of law preserved in Dt. and H, represent the usage of Israelite and Judæan sanctuaries in the time of the kings; the condemnation of many customs in the reform legislation of the seventh century bears witness to the prevalence of the practices so zealously prohibited. The prophets, finally, paint vivid pictures of the religion of their contemporaries, with all its abuses.

10. Agricultural civilisation.

The regions E. of the Jordan first occupied by Israelite tribes are capable of supporting enormous flocks upon their rich and extensive pastures.[2] Much of the land is very fertile and abundantly rewards cultivation; but the conditions do not constrain nomadic tribes taking possession of the country to become tillers of the soil. The case was different in Western Palestine. In the S. indeed, in the Negeb and the Wilderness of Judah, the new comers continued to be chiefly shepherds even after they adopted fixed habitations; but in the central highlands (Mt. Ephraim) and in the N. they were soon compelled to get most of their living from the soil. They learned from the older population of the country to raise crops of grain and pulse and to cultivate the fig, the olive, and the vine. With the arts of agriculture they learned also the religion of agriculture. To the sacrifices and festivals of their nomadic forefathers were now added the proper offerings for the bounty of the land and the season feasts of the husbandman's year (see FEASTS, § 4 f.). Animal sacrifice is still the most important part of worship, as we see clearly from the historical books; neat cattle, kept as plough-beasts, are added to the victims from the flock.[3] First-fruits or tithes of grain and wine and oil must be consecrated in their season according to an established ritual. The worship was offered at the 'high places,' that is, in general, the old Canaanite holy places (see HIGH PLACE, §§ 2-4).

11. Species of sacrifice: zébaḥ.

The most general term for offering, whether of animals or of other things, is minḥāh, מִנְחָה, 'gift' (𝔊 δῶρον, more frequently θυσία), a word not confined to religious uses.[4] In distinction from other offerings specifically named—such as 'ōlāh, zébaḥ—minḥāh sometimes refers particularly to oblations of bread, meal, oil, and the like (see § 14).[5] Animal sacrifices fall into two main classes: 'ōlāh, EV 'burnt offering,' in which the victim was all consumed by fire; and zébaḥ, EV ordinarily 'sacrifice,' in which, after the exta had been burnt upon the altar, the flesh was eaten. These species are often enumerated together, as in Jer. 17 26: 'they shall come . . . bringing burnt offerings and sacrifices and oblations and frankincense . . . unto the house of Yahwè.'

The Heb. zébaḥ, זֶבַח, is ordinarily rendered in 𝔊 by θυσία, the corresponding verb by θύω, less frequently θυσιάζω. The verb means properly 'slaughter,' and may be used of the killing of domestic animals for food without religious rites (e.g., Dt. 12 15 21); but since in earlier times animals were seldom if ever killed thus, it ordinarily imports sacrificial slaying. The place to which animals are brought to be killed is the mizbēaḥ, literally 'slaughter place'; in Canaan this was generally the stone or pile of stones on which the fat was burned, whence mizbēaḥ comes to be equivalent to altar (see ALTAR, MASSEBAH, § 5).

The occasions of sacrifice were of different kinds (see above, § 2, and below, § 15), and distinctive names for some of them were probably early in use; peculiarities of ritual, too, no doubt belonged to certain varieties of sacrifice, as to the Passover or the covenant sacrifice (cp Gen. 15 9 ff. Jer. 34 18 f.), but, however ancient the custom itself may be, our knowledge of the details of the sacrificial ritual comes chiefly through later sources. For this reason, as well as to avoid repetition, the species of sacrifice and their characteristic rites will be considered below in their place in the completed system (§ 23 ff.).

One term is, however, so certainly old and so frequent that it cannot be passed over here; viz. šélem, שֶׁלֶם (Am. 5 22), generally pl. šělāmīm (EV 'peace offerings'). In many passages šělāmīm are coupled with 'ōlōth (burnt offerings) in descriptions of greater sacrificial occasions, precisely as 'ōlōth and zěbāḥīm elsewhere; see, e.g., Ex. 20 24 32 6 2 S. 6 17 f. 24 25 1 K. 3 15 9 25 Ezek. 45 15 43 27 46 2 12 etc. In other instances we have the phrases זֶבַח שְׁלָמִים, זִבְחֵי שְׁלָמִים, 'sacrifices of peace offerings'—e.g., 1 S. 10 8 Jos. 22 23 Prov. 7 14. The šělāmīm appear to have been by far the most common kind of sacrifices, so that when the word zěbāḥim was used without qualification it would be understood to refer to šělāmīm; on the other hand, the name šělāmim is probably shortened from zibḥē šělāmīm.

The original significance of the word is not certain. 𝔊 translates, σωτήρια, (θυσίαι) τοῦ σωτηρίου, so also Philo, De victimis, § 4, 2 245 Mangey; 𝔊 in Samuel and Kings (θυσίαι) εἰρηνικαί or τῶν εἰρηνικῶν, so Aq. Symm. Theodot.; Vg. victima pacifica, pacificum (sc. sacrificium); hence EV, 'peace offerings.' These interpreters connect the Heb. word with the simple stem of the verb שלם, 'be whole, sound, safe,' or the noun šālōm, שָׁלוֹם, 'peace.'[1] Josephus, who renders θυσίαι χαριστήριοι (Ant. iii. 9 2), apparently associates it with the meaning of the intensive stem, šillam, 'requite, repay, pay'; so that these sacrifices would be a return to God for benefits received from him, or the payment of an obligation to him; cp Prov. 7 14: 'I had šelāmīm-sacrifices to make; to-day I have paid (šillamtī) my vows.' The word occurs also, as the name of a species of sacrifice (שלם כליל), on an inscription from a Phœnician temple at Marseilles (CIS 165 3 ff.). It is perhaps a Canaanite term adopted by the Israelites. [On Ass. šulmu see RITUAL, § 11, ia.]

The blood of the victims was poured or smeared upon the sacrificial stone as had been done by their nomadic forefathers. Besides this, portions of the animal, especially of the internal fat (1 S. 2 15 f.),[2] were now burned upon a raised altar—monolith or heap of stones or earth—as upon a hearth; and this part of the performance was so essential that the verb 'burn,' with or without an object ('the fat'), becomes equivalent to 'offer sacrifice.'

In older times the intensive stem ḳiṭṭēr, קִטֵּר, 'make smoke, burn'—rarely with the object (הַחֵלֶב, 1 S. 2 15 f.)—is used; so frequently in the prophets, of the heathenish sacrifices of their contemporaries. In later texts the causative hiḳṭīr, הִקְטִיר, prevails. See We. Prol.(4), 64 f., n. 1. The burning of the offering is probably to be regarded as a means of conveying it to God; the fragrant smoke was, at least in later times, thought of as containing the ethereal substance of the sacrifice. (WRS, Rel. Sem.(2), 236; see also below, § 41.)

The flesh of the victim was boiled (2 S. 2 15 f. 1 K. 19 21), and furnished a feast for the offerer with his family, friends, and guests (1 S. 1 4 ff. 9 12 22 ff., etc.). In Canaan, bread, wine, and oil, the products of agriculture, took their place in the feast beside the flesh of animals from the flock or herd (see e.g., 1 S. 1 24); these again were in part obligatory offerings—first-fruits,

2 From Judg. 6 19 ff. it has sometimes been inferred that in early times boiled flesh was offered (cp also Nu. 6 19); but the evidence is insufficient to sustain the conclusion.

tithes, etc.—in part occasional and voluntary. Of them also a part was given to God, probably upon the altar by fire (see Am. 4 5). The bread offered was that which the participants in the feast themselves ate; that is, in ordinary cases leavened bread;[1] unleavened cakes when, for religious reasons (as in the maṣṣōth feast) or at a meal hastily prepared for an unexpected guest, they ate their own bread unleavened. The bread offered was probably moistened with oil or dipped in it, as was the bread eaten by the worshippers (cp the later rituals, § 30). Of the wine a libation was made to God (Hos. 9 4). See below, §§ 14, 31 a.

12. Burnt offering, 'ōlāh.

The peculiarity of the 'ōlāh (עֹלָה) is that no part of the victim was used for food; the flesh as well as the sacrificial portions of the inwards and fat was burned.

The term is derived from the common verb 'ālāh (עָלָה), 'go up, ascend,' and signifies, according to the prevailing interpretation, the sacrifice which (all) 'comes up' upon the altar (Knob., Wellh., Nowack, etc.), or that which 'goes up' in smoke to the sky (Bähr, Del., Dillmann, etc.). In 𝔊 generally ὁλοκαύτωμα, ὁλοκαύτωσις, Vg. holocaustum.

Another term for the sacrifice given as a 'whole offering' to God is kālīl כָּלִיל (Dt. 33 10 1 S. 7 9 Ps. 51 21; cp Dt. 13 17 Judg. 20 40), which appears as a technical term in Phœnician also; see the sacrificial tariffs of Marseilles and Carthage, CIS i. 165 3 5, etc., 167 5.

The whole burnt offering was naturally much less frequent than the sacrifices which furnished a feast for the worshippers; it is seldom mentioned alone, and then in peculiar circumstances.[2] Ordinarily the burnt offering occurs in conjunction with other sacrifices (zĕbāḥīm or šĕlāmīm); e.g., 2 S. 6 17 f. 24 25 1 K. 9 25 2 K. 10 24, etc. It was probably originally an extraordinary offering made by great persons or on great occasions (We. Prol.(4), 70). The daily burnt offering in the temple at Jerusalem (2 K. 16 15)—and doubtless at other royal sanctuaries—was the king's daily sacrifice, and was followed by many zĕbāḥīm for the court and by private persons.

The ritual of the burnt offering is not described in any ancient account; it may be assumed that the blood was treated in the same way as that of the other sacrifices; it is supposed by both the narratives in JE and by the laws that the flesh and fat of the holocaust were consumed upon the altar.[3] The hide, according to Lev. 7 8, fell to the priest, and this is not improbably an ancient rule; it was, in fact, the only toll he could take for his services.[4]

It is possible that at an earlier time the burnt offering was burned on the ground or in a pit, rather than in a raised altar; this is said to have been done for a special reason at the dedication of Solomon's temple (1 K. 8 64).[5] The analogy of the human sacrifices at the Tophet (see MOLECH, TOPHET; cp. however, Gen. 22 9), and the burning of the carcass of certain sin offerings without the sanctuary, may also be noted. It is probable, however, that the burning of the holocaust upon the altar was the Cannanite custom, adopted by the Israelites.[6]

Whether the burnt offering was accompanied by an oblation of bread or by a libation is uncertain.[7] When it was part of a great sacrificial occasion these probably went with the other sacrifices (zĕbāḥīm). The regular daily burnt offering in the temple may have had such an accompaniment; but the earlier custom seems to have been to offer the minḥāh daily as an evening oblation corresponding to the morning 'ōlāh (see below, §§ 19, 32). In the passages which speak of the burnt offering alone (cited above, col. 4191, n. 2), there is no mention of a minḥāh. Judg. 6 20 f. 13 19 ff. cannot be alleged; in these places a meal prepared for a guest is miraculously consumed by fire; this may be called an 'ōlāh, but obviously no inference can be drawn as to the ordinary ritual of burnt offerings.

13. Victims.

The animals sacrificed were neat cattle, sheep, and goats; also, at least in certain rites, turtle doves and pigeons, clean birds easily procured by dwellers in towns and cities. The choice of victims for particular sacrifices or occasions was doubtless to some extent regulated by custom; in ordinary cases it was left to the worshipper to determine what his offering should be, in accordance with his means, his disposition, and his motive, or his previous intention or vow. It is very likely an ancient rule that the burnt offering should be a male; though 1 S. 6 14 shows that it was not always so. Sometimes very young animals were offered even as a burnt offering (1 S. 7 9, sucking lamb); but ordinarily, no doubt, a mature animal was chosen for this sacrifice.[1]

That the offering of a human victim as a holocaust was not unknown in old Israel we learn from the story of Jephthah, Judg. 11 30 f. 34-40. The narrator represents this sacrifice as extraordinary, but does not condemn it as abhorrent to the religion of Yahwè.[2] The statement in 1 K. 16 34 to the effect that Hiel, who in the days of Ahab rebuilt Jericho, 'laid its foundations with Abiram his firstborn, and set up its gates with Segub his youngest son,' hardly admits any other interpretation than that he offered them as foundation sacrifices, in accordance with a widespread and persistent custom.[3]

It does not appear, however, that human sacrifices were frequent in the early centuries of the Israelite occupation of Canaan. The offering by parents of their own sons and daughters, especially the firstborn, about which there is so much in the prophets and laws of the seventh century,[4] was not the recrudescence of ancient custom, but a new and foreign cult (see MOLECH, § 4 ff.). The lesson of Gen. 22 is that though Yahwè might claim even an only son, he does not require such sacrifice but accepts instead a victim from the flock; cp Mi. 6 7.

The expiation of Saul's massacre of the Gibeonites by the execution of seven of his sons and grandsons 'before Yahwè' at the famous sanctuary of Gibeon (2 S. 21 9), important as the story is for the idea of expiation and thus for sacrificial conceptions, is not itself to be considered as a sacrifice. Nor is the devotion of the inhabitants of a conquered city—or an Israelite city that has fallen into the worship of other gods (Dt. 13 12 ff.)—to the deity by slaughter and burning (ḥērem, see BAN) properly regarded as a form of human sacrifice.

14. Oblations.

The offerings of bread, oil, and wine which formed part of the sacrificial feast have been spoken of above in that connection (§ 11). There were also independent offerings of the products of agriculture. The deity which gave the increase to man's labour received from him portions of all; only when these had been duly rendered could the rest be used by the owner (see Frazer, Golden Bough(2), 2 318 ff. 459 ff.).

These offerings, which fall under the general head of first-fruits, were called by various names: first-fruits (bikkūrīm, Ex. 34 26 23 19), tithes (ma'ăsĕrōth), prime portions (rēšīth), portions set apart (tĕrūmāh), and others. The original distinctions are not always clear;

[1] Mi. 6 6 speaks of burnt offerings of yearling calves; the daily burnt offering in P is a yearling lamb.

[2] JEPHTHAH, § 6. Compare Mesha's sacrifice of his son, 2 K. 3 27.

[4] See Jer. 7 31 Ezek. 20 26 23 36 ff. Lev. 18 21 20 2 ff. Dt. 18 10 etc.

the definitions of P and the Mishna may sometimes be suspected of making systematic discrimination between terms once loosely equivalent. The tendency of the ritual development was to reduce to rule and measure what was once more free, and to convert into a tax, for the support of the clergy, what formerly, as a gift to the deity, had actually fallen in whole or in part to his ministers. Aparchæ were offered not only of things that were eaten, but also of flax and wool (Hos. 2 5 9 Dt. 18 4). Inasmuch as these offerings have a history of their own it has seemed best to treat them separately; see TAXATION, TITHES. Religious dedications of a different character are the 'orlāh of fruit-trees in the first three years of bearing, followed in the fourth by the consecration of the crop as ḥillūlīm (Lev. 19 23-25), which corresponds to the sacrifice of the firstlings of animals; the pē'āh, or unreaped corner of the grain-field; the gleanings of the harvest-field, orchard, and vineyard (Lev. 19 9 f.); and the spontaneous crops of the fallow year (Ex. 23 10 f.). (See NATURE WORSHIP, § 3.)

The form of presentation of first-fruits is described only in part. In Lev. 23 10 f. 14 (old laws in H) the first sheaf of barley (originally from each field, or from each village) is brought and 'waved' (hēnīph, הֵנִיף, a gesture of throwing) before Yahwè at the local sanctuary; until this is done the new crop must not be used in any form (v. 14); unleavened cakes (maṣṣōth) of the new barley meal are eaten for seven days (see FEASTS, PASSOVER). At the end of wheat harvest a corresponding ceremony is the presentation in a similar way of two loaves of leavened bread (originally from each household, Lev. 23 15-17 20*a*). Cp Frazer, Golden Bough(2), 2 319. Dt. 26 1 ff. prescribes that specimens of the choicest of the fruits of the land shall be brought by each landowner in a basket and set down before the altar with a solemn liturgy of thanksgiving; the presentation is followed by a feast (see below, § 22).

Another kind of oblation, which, though of much less primitive character than the kinds just mentioned, can be traced back to an early period in the history of Israel in Canaan, is the setting before the deity of a table spread with food and drink (see, further, below, § 34 a). Such was the custom at Nob (1 S. 21 4-6 [5-7]) as well as at Jerusalem (1 K. 7 48), and probably wherever God had a house or temple. On this table stood bread, which at certain intervals was exchanged for fresh loaves hot from the oven; the loaves that were removed were eaten as 'holy bread' by the priests, and—under exceptional circumstances—by laymen who had 'hallowed' themselves (1 S. 21 4-6). It is natural to suppose that, as among other peoples, wine too, in cups or chalices, was placed upon the table; but there is no mention of it in the OT. (On P see below, § 34 a.) In the lectisternia of other religions flesh also was thus set before the deity; it is not probable, however, that such was ever Israelite custom. Like the flesh or fat of animal sacrifices and the oblation of bread, wine, and oil with them, the loaves of 'shew bread' were 'the food of God' (לחם אלהים).

Offerings of wine in the form of libations were made at the sacrificial feasts (above, § 11); a libation of šēkār, properly any fermented drink other than wine, is spoken of in a late law (Nu. 28 7; see below, § 35), but in no ancient source; there seems to be no reason why such libations should not have been made. Honey was excluded from the preparation of sacrificial cakes (Lev. 2 11), in which it was much used in other cults;[1] it was brought with the other choicest products of the land in the ceremony described in Dt. 26 1 ff., but did not come upon the altar. Milk, often offered by other peoples in libations,[2] was not so used by the Hebrews.

[1] Libations of honey in antiquity, Theophrastus in Porphyry, De abst. 2 20 f.; reasons for the prohibition in Jewish law, Philo, De sacrificantibus, § 6, 2 255, Mangey.

[2] In Arabia, We. Heid.(1), 111 f. Milk in Abel's offering (Jos. Ant. i. 2 1) is a mistranslation of the ambiguous חלבהם.

That independent libations of oil were made is intrinsically not improbable, though not conclusively established by reference to Gen. 28 18 Judg. 9 9 Mic. 6 7. (See Now. HA 2 208; cp below, § 31 a.)

15. Seasons and occasions. Sacrifices were generally offered at home; every village had its altar (mizbēaḥ, slaughter place), where the victims were slain and feasts held; thither the firstlings and other obligatory offerings were brought (see HIGH PLACE, § 4). There were more famous holy places to which men resorted in numbers, especially at the autumn festival (see FEASTS, § 4). The times of sacrifice were in part fixed by custom, in part dependent on the occasion or on the will of the worshipper. To the former class belong the Passover at the vernal full moon (see above, §§ 4 ff.), and the agricultural season feasts at the beginning and end of the grain harvest, and at the close of the vintage (see FEASTS).[1] At the last three custom required every man to 'see the face of Yahwè,' with an offering (Ex. 23 17). The new moon was a favourite time for feasts: Saul expects all his court to be present on such an occasion (1 S. 20 4 f., cp 18 24 ff.); the annual sacrifice of David's clan at Bethlehem is held on a new moon (1 S. 20 5 f. 29). See NEW MOON. The Sabbath, apparently in a lesser degree, enjoyed the same preference. When a regular cultus became established at the greater sanctuaries, more numerous victims were offered on these days (see below, § 33). The specific occasions of sacrifice were manifold—the circumcision or weaning of a son, marriage, the coming of a traveller, the making of a compact, consultation of an oracle, the mustering of a clan for war or the return from a campaign, the accession of a king, the dedication of a temple, the staying of a plague. Many sacrifices were offered in fulfilment of vows for the obtaining of the most varied objects of human desire. Men sacrificed alike when they rejoiced in the evidence of Yahwè's favour, when they besought his bounty or his help, and when they had need to propitiate the offended God. Many kinds of uncleanness required purification by sacrifice.

16. Worshippers. The companies of worshippers for whom and by whom sacrifices were brought originally corresponded to the natural groupings of the people, the family or clan for itself (e.g., 1 S. 20 6), the village community at its own high place (e.g., 1 S. 9 12). Even at the greater holy places, which were frequented at the festival seasons by multitudes from different tribes, these groups preserved their identity. Deuteronomy assumes that this will be the case at Jerusalem when all bring their sacrifices thither; and in the Passover the 'household,' even when casually constituted, continued to the last, and, indeed, still continues, to be a distinct sacral group; the great mass of worshippers did not become one worshipping community, but remained many companies. The only body of worshippers in ancient times in which the natural groups are sunk is the army in time of war. How far the persistence of the family as a society of worship in the national religion is to be attributed to the survival of proper family cults, the worship of ancestors, it does not fall within the province of this article to discuss.[2]

The worshippers prepared themselves for participation in the sacrifice as 'holy' by 'hallowing themselves' (hithḳaddēš, 1 S. 16 5 Nu. 11 18, cp Ex. 19 10 14). An obligatory part of this 'hallowing' on solemn occasions was abstinence for a time previous to the appearance at the sacred place from sexual intercourse (cp 1 S. 21 5 f. Ex. 19 15);[3] other preparatory ceremonies were purifications, ablutions, the washing of garments. Men put on festal attire, garments and ornaments not of everyday wear (Ex. 3 22 11 2 f. 12 35 f. Hos. 2 13 [15] Ezek. 16 12 f.).[1]

For the ordinary sacrifice (zĕbaḥ) the assistance of a priest was unnecessary; the rites were simple and known to all. The older historical books abound in instances of sacrifices by laymen of all ranks; the father offered sacrifice for his household, the 'elders' for the clan or the village community, the commander for the army, the king for the people. The offerer slew and flayed his own victim—as, indeed, continued to be the rule to the latest period; doubtless he also in early times poured the blood upon the sacred stone or altar, afterwards a specifically priestly act. At the holy places which had a resident priesthood—often proprietary—the priests burnt the fat upon the altar; for this service they took toll (1 S. 2 13 ff.). The customary right of the priests may have differed at different places, as it certainly changed in course of time (cp 1 S. 2 13 ff. Dt. 18 3 Lev. 7 34).[3] The priests participated also by guest-right in the sacrificial feasts. The most important functions of the priesthood were not, however, direction or assistance at sacrifices, but the custody of the sanctuary, the consultation of the oracle, and instruction concerning purifications, piacular rites, and the like.

17. Priests.[2]

The sacrificial worship of ancient Israel had a prevailingly joyous character; to eat and drink and rejoice before Yahwè (Dt.) is a description of it which holds good to the end of the kingdom. The stated feasts in harvest-time and vintage, the new moon and sabbath, were all seasons of rejoicing; and the occasions of public and private sacrifice at other times (see above, § 15) were, in general, of a joyful nature. The banquet was accompanied by music and song (Am. 5 23, cp 6 5), not always of what we should call a religious kind; dances, also, were customary (Ex. 32 19 1 S. 18 6 Ex. 15 20 Judg. 11 34 21 19 ff.). The excesses to which such festivities are exposed did not fail to occur (1 S. 1 13 ff. 2 22 Is. 28 7 f. Am. 2 7 f. Hos. 4 14).

18. Character of worship.[4]

But while joyfulness was thus the predominant note of worship, it must not be imagined that ancient religion had no other note. In times of private distress or public calamity men set themselves to expiate the offence, known or unknown, that had provoked God's anger, to propitiate him by gifts and recover his favour (see 2 S. 21 1 ff. 24 18 ff. Dt. 21 1 ff. etc.). Such scenes as are described in 1 K. 18 26 ff. (the priests of Baal on Carmel) were probably not without parallel among the Israelites on like occasions. Fasting before Yahwè, wearing the garb of mourning, was an ancient and common means of appealing to his mercy (see FASTING). In ordinary cases propitiatory sacrifices differed from common sacrifices, not in rite, but in the spirit and mood of the worshippers. When God was manifestly perilously incensed men would hardly venture to approach him with sacrifice till they had reason to hope that his wrath was somewhat appeased (see, e.g., 2 S. 24).

Like other ancient monarchs, the kings of Judah and Israel built temples at old holy places, such as Bethel, and in their capitals, as at Jerusalem and Samaria. Worship at these royal sanctuaries was under the direction of the sovereign; on great occasions the king in person offered sacrifice in them (1 K. 8 5 64; especially 9 25 2 K. 16 12 ff.); the priests were appointed by him. It was probably in these temples that the custom of offering a daily holocaust grew up. This sacrifice was made early in the morning; in the late afternoon the oblation of bread or dough, oil, wine (the minḥāh) was presented (see 1 K. 18 29 36, cp Dan. 9 21 Ezra 9 4 f.).[1] The animals required for food by the king's great household were, no doubt, slaughtered at the temples with a sacrificial dedication; the name ṭabbāḥīm, lit. 'butchers,' applied to the palace guard, has been thought to bear witness to this custom (WRS Rel. Sem.(1), 396). At the festivals and on special occasions greater numbers of sacrifices were offered by the king and his court, as well as by the people who came together to celebrate the feast. Foreign luxuries, such as incense, came into use at these sanctuaries. The support of the regular cultus came from the king's treasury, either from imposts levied in natura (2 K. 16 15 Ezek. 45 9 ff.), or by the assignment to the temple of the revenues of a district. (See TAXATION.)

19. Effect of monarchy.

A considerable number of priests must have been attached to the greater temples, and the necessity of order and authority was doubtless early felt. In Jerusalem we read of a chief priest and a second priest. The better organisation probably in part recognised, in part created, a differentiation of functions. The same conditions were favourable to the growth of the ritual in elaborateness and splendour, and to a concomitant estimate of its importance. In a word, the ritualistic and sacerdotal tendencies in the religion of Israel had their seats at the royal temples, especially at Jerusalem. By degrees the worship at Jerusalem came to be a very different thing from that at the country high places, and thus things were preparing both for the deuteronomic reforms and for the ritual law.

The greatest change, however, which followed the establishment of the kingdom was the institution of a regular public cultus maintained by the king for himself and his people. Thus a national religion was created.

When Israel took its place among the nations, political and commercial intercourse opened the way for religious influence. Solomon's new temple was built by a Phœnician architect after Phœnician models; Ahaz exchanged the altar for a copy of one he had seen in Damascus. The more complete apparatus of worship—the bronze reservoir and portable lavers, the many utensils provided for the service of the altar, for example—suppose corresponding elaboration in the ritual. The vestments and ceremonial ornaments of the priests also were probably patterned after those in use in Phœnician temples. The influence of foreign religions was much deeper in the seventh century, during the long reign of Manasseh. Not only were many new cults, especially of Assyrian origin, introduced (see QUEEN OF HEAVEN, NATURE WORSHIP, § 5 f.), but the worship of Yahwè was enriched by new rites and offerings; the burning of costly gums and spices, for example, is first heard of in this period.[2] The sacrifice of children as burnt offerings, with peculiar rites, to Yahwè under the title 'king' (ham-mélek), which also became prevalent in this age, is probably a foreign—Phœnician or Syrian—cult adopted by worshippers of Yahwè (see MOLECH).

20. Foreign influence.

The reforms of Josiah not only suppressed for a time these foreign rites, but also made a radical change in the whole sacrificial system by destroying the high places, carrying away their priesthoods, and forbidding the offering of sacrifice at any place in the kingdom except the temple in Jerusalem.[3] A necessary corollary of this restriction of sacrifice to one altar was the slaughter of animals for food at home without sacrificial rites (Dt. 12 15 f. 20-25), contrary to the ancient rule (see Lev. 17 3 f.).[4]

20a. Reform and reaction.

A large part of the occasional private and family sacrifices thus drop out. The change is even greater on the other side; the season feasts must now all be kept at Jerusalem; thither firstlings and tithes, first-fruits—in a word, all obligatory offerings—must be brought, there all vows must be paid, and freewill offerings made. Various modifications of the ancient custom became necessary; the lustration of houses with blood at the Passover must have ceased (see above, § 7); the age at which firstlings should be offered (eight days, Ex. 22 30 [29]) is now a minimum limit—they may be brought at any time after they are a week old (Lev. 22 27). The removal to Jerusalem of the feasts in which the tithes were consumed, besides other changes (Dt. 14 24 ff.), deprived the poor of the village of the participation in these feasts which they enjoyed by ancient right of hospitality; compensation is made by the conversion of the tithes of one year in three to charity (Dt. 14 28 f.; see TAXATION, § 10, TITHES). The country priests who were transported to Jerusalem were not allowed to offer sacrifice in the temple, though they had their living from its revenues; an inferior order of ministry was thus, in fact, established.

By the centralisation of worship its natural connection with the common life of men was much loosened. The Israelite could visit the holy place to offer his sacrifices at most but thrice a year, more commonly, perhaps, but once or twice. At other times he knows that stated sacrifices are offered in the temple daily, and with greater pomp at all the festivals. The possibility of a cultus carried on for the benefit of those who are not present, of a sacerdotal religion done for the people by the priests, and operative, if correctly performed, is thus prepared. These consequences were not perceived, much less realised, in the few remaining years of Josiah's reign, nor, in their full effect, for many generations afterwards.

The spirit of the sacrificial laws in Deuteronomy is that of the older time; 'rejoice before Yahwè' is still the common expression for worship. The increased emphasis on the olden hospitality of the sacrificial feast is in accord with the prominence of motives of charity and humanity in the deuteronomic legislation, but is doubtless due in part, as has been already suggested, to the consciousness that the transfer of these feasts to a distant sanctuary imperilled this feature of them.

In the disastrous times that followed the defeat at Megiddo and death of Josiah, in the reaction from the deuteronomic reforms which not unnaturally ensued upon the disappointment of the high hopes based upon them, every trace of these reforms was swept away. Not only were the old altars at the high places rebuilt and the foreign worship restored, but men sought more efficacious means of expiating guilt and securing divine protection in private cults—in part, perhaps, revivals of old Israelite practices, in part of foreign origin, such as are described in Ezek. 8. These strange rites were celebrated as mysteries by societies of initiates. Their sacramental sacrifices were 'unclean' beasts, such as swine, dogs, mice.[1] The strong taboo of the flesh of these animals made them peculiarly potent piacula, the highest grade of 'uncleanness' being convertible with exceptional 'holiness.'

The laws in Dt. relative to sacrifice and offering represent older custom adapted to the plan of reform which made Jerusalem the sole place of worship (see above, § 20).

Species: 'ōlāh Lev. 22 18, etc., 'ōlāh and zébaḥ 17 8, zibḥē šĕlāmīm 17 5 19 5, tōdāh 22 29 f., néder and nĕdābāh 22 18 21;[2] tithes and firstlings are not named in the remains of H (nor in Ezek. 40-48); sacrifices as ḳōdāšīm 22 2 15 f., cp 19 8; offerings are 'the food of God' (léḥem ĕlōhīm), 21 6 8 17 21 22 25, cp Ezek. 44 7; animals sacrificed, bāḳār and ṣōn, šōr, kébeś, 'ēz; human sacrifice forbidden, 18 21 20 1 ff.; victims must be perfect, 22 18 ff., less strict rules for freewill offerings, 22 23; must be brought to the holy place, not slaughtered elsewhere, 17 3 f., cp 8 f.;[3] blood not to be eaten, 17 10, cp 17 13 ff. 19 26; the ritual is not described (17 6 probably secondary); the flesh of šĕlāmīm must be eaten on the day they are offered or on the following day, 19 5 ff.; of the tōdāh on the day of sacrifice itself, 22 29 f.; feasts, offerings, and ritual, 23 (the parts of the chapter derived from H).[4]

Contemporary with the laws in H, and from the same or cognate sources, is a large part of Lev. 11-15, on uncleanness and purification (see LEVITICUS, § 24 f.); cases requiring sacrifice are enumerated, 12 6 f. 15 14 f. 29 f. 14 1-7 (49-53).

In Lev. 1-7, also, the older sacrificial tōrōth, not only in 1 and 3, but also in parts of 5 ff., represent pre-exilic usage and formulation in later redaction.[5]

21a. Ezekiel.

Another source from which knowledge of the worship in the temple at Jerusalem may be gained, is Ezekiel's programme for a restored and purified cultus in 40-48. The prophet's purpose was not to create a new system of sacrifices and rites, but to introduce such safeguards as should prevent those invasions of Yahwè's holiness which had provoked him in anger to destroy his desecrated house and make an end of the polluted worship. Knowing as we do the characteristic motives of Ezekiel's reformatory zeal, and having from other sources reasonably good information about the temple worship in the last half-century before the fall of Judah, we should not find it difficult to distinguish the old from the new in Ezekiel's sketch, and thus to use 40-48 for the history of the cultus.[6] This testimony is the more valuable because Ezekiel had a priest's intimate acquaintance with the ritual and affection for it.

In comparing Ezek. 40-48 with the sources hitherto examined, it is important to observe that Ezek. deals almost exclusively with sacra publica,[7] the others with private sacrifices. As the public ceremonies had, doubtless, in all ages, a more solemn ritual, the fuller liturgical details in Ezek., as compared, for example, with Dt., signify much less than has sometimes been made of them. Besides the species of sacrifice with which we have already become acquainted ('ōlāh, zébaḥ, šĕlāmīm), Ezek. repeatedly names two others, ḥaṭṭāth and āšām (EV sin offering and trespass offering—RV guilt offering), 40 39 42 13 43 19 ff. 44 27 29 45 17 ff. 46 20 (see below, §§ 27 f.). The minḥāh is an offering of flour and oil in specified quantities (46 5 7 11, etc.); a libation (nések) is also provided for (45 17). The animals sacrificed are the same as in the other sources (birds are not named).

The public sacrifices are provided by the prince from the proceeds of a tax levied in kind (tĕrūmāh 45 13-17). A lamb is offered every morning, the regular holocaust ('ōlath tāmīd), with an accompanying oblation (minḥāh 46 13-15);[8] the sabbath burnt offering is six lambs and a ram, with their oblations (46 4 f.);[9] on the new moon, the victims are the same, with the addition of a bullock (46 6 f.). At the passover a bullock is offered on the first day as a sin offering for the prince and people; during the seven days of the feast, each day seven bullocks and seven rams as burnt offerings, and a he goat as a sin offering (45 23 f.); the feast of the seventh month has the same sacrifices (45 25); there is no summer festival (Pentecost). At the great festivals, new moons and sabbaths, the prince also provides šĕlāmīm (45 17), doubtless as a feast for the people.

6 The custom of the temple after the restoration, which frequently followed the older usage rather than Ezekiel's innovations, furnishes an additional criterion.

SACRIFICE

The number of these victims is necessarily left undetermined. A table (or altar) for the shewbread stands in the temple (41 22); but no rules are given for the presentation of offerings upon it—probably the old custom is to be followed without change.[1] An elaborate ritual is provided for the consecration of the altar (43 18-27), and for the semi-annual piacula (on the first of the first and seventh months) by which the temple and altar are purified (45 18-20).[2] The rites of sacrifice are given in some detail: the slaying and dressing of the victims (40 38-43, cp the description of the court and altar, 40 28 ff. 43 13 ff.); the dashing of the blood upon the altar (43 18), or—of the sin offering in consecration and purification ceremonies—the application to the altar and other parts of the temple and court (43 20 45 19). The fat and blood of sacrifices are the food of God (44 7). The flesh of public sin offerings is burned (43 21); that of private sin offerings and of trespass offerings belongs to the priests (44 29); there are kitchens in the inner court where they boil their meat and bake their minḥāh bread (46 19 f.), and chambers in which they eat this 'very holy' food (42 13).

Of private sacrifices the freewill offerings of the prince ('ōlāh or šĕlāmīm) are sacrificed by the priests (46 2); the private sacrifices of the people are slain for them by the Levites (degraded priests of the old high places), who wait upon the offerers and serve them (44 11); the flesh is boiled in kitchens in the four corners of the outer court by temple servants (46 21-24). The priests are supported by offerings: the flesh of the (private) sin offerings and of trespass offerings, the oblations of flour and oil, and everything that is devoted to Yahwè fall to them; besides this they have a right to all kinds of first-fruits and dedications (44 28 ff.).

Ezekiel supposes that his readers are familiar with the terms he uses and their significance; he does not deem it necessary, for example, to define the nature or occasion of the trespass offering (see below, § 27). The sacra publica, which before the fall of Judah had been maintained at the king's charges, are to be provided for by the prince from the taxes.[3] The rules prescribing the kinds and numbers of victims to be offered at the feasts, and the proportion of flour and oil with each, may perhaps make new requirements; but it may safely be assumed that there had been similar rules fixed by the custom of the temple under the kings. The periodical expiation of inadvertences or mistakes by which the holiness of the temple might have been sullied, appears to be an innovation;[4] but the rite is simple and old, and had probably been practised in earlier times when occasion required. In general, the ritual of public sacrifice does not seem to be much changed in Ezekiel's new model of temple worship.

The consequences of Ezekiel's system would doubtless have made greater changes in the sphere of private sacrifices. The tax to be paid to the prince and the assignment of all first-fruits to the priests apparently are to take the place of all the offerings (firstlings, first-fruits, tithes, sacrifice for appearance at the holy place, and the like) which in former times the Israelite had been bound to bring to God. Even the sacrificial feasts (šĕlāmīm) at the great festivals were provided from the public treasury. There would remain vows and freewill offerings, and the sin and trespass offerings, in which, as it appears, no change was intended. In the ritual of private sacrifice Ezekiel proposed a very radical departure from immemorial custom: the owner was henceforth not to offer his own victim, but to look on while one of the inferior ministry of the temple (Levites) slaughtered it for him. This innovation, however, did not prevail; in the ritual law and in the practice of the Herodian temple, the worshipper retained his old right (see below, § 26).

22. Cultus after 586.

The destruction of the temple in Jerusalem did not cause a long interruption in sacrificial worship in Judæa. Not only were there other holy places in the land (see HIGH PLACES, § 9; MIZPAH, 1), but there can be no doubt that the altar in Jerusalem was soon rebuilt and worship re-established (ISRAEL, § 45), with survivors of the old priesthood for its ministry. Probably, however, the public sacrifices—the daily holocaust and the offerings on Sabbaths and feast days—which had been supported by the king, ceased, and only private sacrifices were offered, as at other high places. With the appointment of a native governor and the rebuilding of the temple, the public services were doubtless resumed on such a scale as the poverty of the community permitted. The ritual, also, no doubt, conformed to the ancient custom and tradition of the sanctuary as far as possible under these conditions; and as the prosperity of the Jews increased, and Persian kings and governors from time to time made contributions to the support of the temple, it recovered something of its ancient splendour. The opinion that the cultus was first restored by priests returning from the exile, and afterwards thoroughly reformed by Ezra in accordance with the prescriptions of a liturgical work ('Priest's Code') which he brought with him from Babylonia, rests in both parts on the same late testimony, and greatly exaggerates the share that the Babylonian Jews bore in the development of Palestinian Judaism in the Persian period. Babylonian influence upon the terminology of the later ritual, if not upon the rites themselves, is indeed manifest; but, in view of the evidences of the same influence in other Syrian religions in the Persian and Greek period, it is not clear that we must look to the exiled priests in Babylonia for the explanation.

An important landmark in the history of the ritual is the description of a typical series of sacrifices—sin offering, burnt offering, peace offerings—at the inauguration of Aaron in Lev. 9, a chapter which is universally assigned to the original History of the Sacred Institutions, and was written probably in the fifth century B.C. (see HISTORICAL LITERATURE, § 9). The rites agree closely with the older sacrificial tōrōth; many refinements of the later laws are still unknown to the author, in particular such as are connected with the inner altar, the sprinkling of blood in consecrations and expiations, and the like.

22 a. Later.

It can hardly be questioned that the philhellenic priests of the Ptolemaic and Seleucid times introduced various ceremonies in imitation of the cults of Syrian-Greek temples, some of which were preserved till the destruction of Jerusalem. The procession at the offering of first-fruits, headed by an ox with gilded horns and crowned with an olive garland, the flute player making music before them, etc., is an example in point.[1] But such innovations were probably in matters of vestments, processions, and the like, rather than in the ancient rites of sacrifice themselves.

The two features in which the sacrificial cultus of later times differs most from the worship of old Israel are the enhanced importance of the sacra publica and the greater prominence of expiatory rites. Both are natural consequences of the conditions of the age.

The Jews were a widely scattered people; most of them could visit Jerusalem only at long intervals—perhaps but once or twice in a lifetime. But sacrifices were regularly offered for them—the daily holocausts, the burnt offerings and sin offerings on the sabbaths and new moons and at the feasts. These sacrifices were now maintained, not from the revenues of the king or prince, but by a tax collected from Jews in all parts of the world, who thus became participants in all their benefits. The cessation of the daily sacrifice was a calamity that deeply affected the whole race (Dan. 8 11 ff. 11 31 12 11, cp Jos. BJ vi. 2 2).

Piacula of various kinds were doubtless common in old Israel, as in other religions (see, e.g., Dt. 21 1-9); many of the purifications—which fall under the same head—are unquestionably ancient customs (e.g., Lev.

[1] There is no mention of incense or an altar of incense, of a candelabrum, or of anointing oil.

[2] Observe the use of the terms kipper and ḥiṭṭā; see below, § 45.

[3] On the question how far this is a change of system, see TAXATION, § 15 f.

[4] It did not establish itself in the restored temple, where in later times a corresponding, but much more elaborate, rite was celebrated annually. See ATONEMENT, DAY OF.

14 1 ff., cp Dt. 24 8 Nu. 19). Solemn public piacula, however, seem in earlier times to have been performed only on occasions when some calamity warned the people that they had offended God (e.g., 2 S. 24 18 ff.; above, §§ 18, 20). In the Persian period, they became an established institution. We have seen that Ezekiel provides for such ceremonies at the beginning of each half year (above, § 21); the oldest stratum of P in Lev. 16 seems to have had in mind a yearly expiation;[1] the Day of Atonement was in later times the most solemn of the year. All rites of consecration and inauguration are begun by piacular sacrifices. Not infrequently, as in Ezekiel, the whole cultus is regarded as expiatory. The prevalence of such a conception of God's holiness as we find in Ezekiel, inevitably led to the multiplication of expiatory rites; the depressed and unhappy state of the Jews in Palestine during a large part of these centuries may be regarded as a contributory cause.

The differences between the sacrificial worship of old Israel and that, say, of NT times must not, however, be exaggerated. The public cultus did not supersede private sacrifices. The Jews, even from the remoter parts of Palestine, frequented Jerusalem at the feasts in great numbers, bringing the prescribed offerings and paying their vows; the population of the city itself and of neighbouring Judæa alone was sufficient with their sacrifices to give employment and support at ordinary times to a great number of priests. Nor must it be thought that the worshippers were habitually oppressed by a sense of sin, or that the expiatory side of the cultus so dominated their conception of sacrifice as to exclude all others. The contrast sometimes drawn between Dt., with its rejoicing before Yahwè, and P, with all its sin offerings and trespass offerings, even if it fairly represented the spirit of two legislations, cannot legitimately be taken as evidence of a corresponding difference in the spirit of religion in two ages.[2] From our other sources it is easy to show that no such radical difference exists.

II. DEVELOPED JEWISH SYSTEM

It is proposed in the following paragraphs briefly to describe the Jewish sacrificial system in its final form, as it was in practice in the last century before the destruction of Jerusalem. In this system the rules and rites of sacrifice in the Pentateuch, of whatever age and origin, were combined, and their often conflicting requirements in some fashion harmonised. There was also a traditional usage, not wholly dependent upon the written law, and at all events much more detailed, without a knowledge of which we should often be hopelessly at a loss in our effort to reconstruct the ritual.[3] Our sources, therefore, include, besides the Pentateuch, the descriptions of the cultus in Jewish authors—Sirach, the Epistle of Aristeas, Philo, the NT, Josephus, etc.—and the school tradition embodied in the legal midrash (Mekiltā, Siphrā, Siphrē), the Mishna, and the Tosephta.[4]

23. Introductory.

The comprehensive name for offerings of all kinds, including dotations to the sanctuary, is ḳorbān (קָרְבָּן), 'present, gift' (Nu. 7 12-17, etc.; cp also Neh. 10 35 13 31).

24. Offering in general; species.

This term, which is found only in technical use, first appears in the sixth century (Ezek. 20 28 40 43, sacrificial laws in Lev. 1 3), and is probably a borrowed word, as is suggested also by the unusual form of the noun; cp Assyr. ḳurbānu (RITUAL, §§ 1, 11 1 a), Aram.-Syr. ḳurbān. The technical use of the verb hiḳrīb (הִקְרִיב), 'present' an offering to God, is of the same age. 𝔊 renders the noun by δῶρον, Vg. variously and often freely Tg. and Pesh. ḳurbān.

[1] See ATONEMENT, DAY OF, § 2; LEVITICUS, § 12.

[2] Many critics appear to be misled by the word 'sin offering.' See below, § 28*a*.

[3] It would be quite impossible, e.g., to understand the ceremonies of the Day of Atonement from Lev. 16.

[4] This tradition—carefully to be distinguished from the scholastic exegesis and casuistry in the same writings—goes back to priests who had served in the temple.

The old Hebrew minḥāh, 'gift,' which in earlier times was used more broadly (see above, § 11), is in the ritual laws specifically the oblation of flour and oil or of cakes baked therefrom.

The species of sacrifice are the same as in Ezek.: burnt offering ('ōlāh), trespass offering (āšām), sin offering (ḥaṭṭāth), and peace offerings (šĕlāmīm); some of these embrace several varieties.

The public sacrifices are either stated or occasional. The stated public sacrifices are:

25. Sacra publica et privata.[1]

1. The regular daily burnt offerings, every morning and evening (Ex. 29 38-42 Nu. 28 3-8).
2. The additional burnt offerings on the sabbaths (Nu. 28 9 f.) and the new moons (ib. 11-14), and at the annual festivals, viz., Passover (ib. 16-25), Pentecost (26-31), New Year (29 1-6), Day of Atonement (7-11), Tabernacles (12-38).
3. The sin offerings at the new moons and feasts (Nu. 28 15 22 30 29 5 11 16 19 22 25 28 31 34 38).
4. The goat of the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16 15, etc.).

Occasional piacula are:

1. The sin offering of the congregation (Nu. 15 22 ff. Lev. 4 13 ff.).
2. The sin offering of the 'anointed priest,' because his sin brings guilt upon the people (Lev. 4 3 ff.; cp Lev. 16 6. 11 14).

In this class may be included also sacrifices of consecration for the temple and altar (Lev. 8 14 f.; cp Ex. 40 1 ff.); and the sacrifices for the installation of priests, especially the high priest (Ex. 29 Lev. 8).[2]

Public sacrifices as a rule are either burnt offerings or sin offerings; the trespass offering is always a private sacrifice, and the only public peace offerings are the two lambs at Pentecost (Lev. 23 19, see below, § 40); the consecration ceremonies also include šĕlāmīm.

Private sacrifices may be of any of the four chief species, and frequently comprise more than one kind. They are either prescribed or voluntary. The prescribed sacrifices are:

1. Sin offerings, trespass offerings, and purifications of various kinds according to the occasion.
2. The sacrifices obligatory upon those who appeared at the temple at a festival season; with which may be included the Passover.

Voluntary private sacrifices were brought either in fulfilment of a vow, as freewill offerings, or as expressions of gratitude (nĕder, nĕdābāh, tōdāh).

It will be most convenient to begin with private sacrifices, since these are more fully described in the Pentateuch, and afterwards to treat of the public cultus in the temple, for the details of which we are mainly dependent upon Jewish tradition.

The victim might be from the flock or the herd (Lev. 1 2); a turtle-dove or a pigeon was also accepted.[3]

26. Burnt offering.[4]

If a quadruped, it must be a male without blemish, a bullock, ram, or he goat. A list of twelve defects which rendered an animal unfit for sacrifice is given in Lev. 22 22-25; much more minute rules are found in the Talmud.[5] If the dissection of the victim disclosed abnormal or diseased organs, this also caused its rejection. The age of the victim is sometimes prescribed; in general, animals that had attained their full growth were preferred for burnt offerings. The offerer brought the victim to the court of the temple, rested both hands heavily upon its head, slaughtered and flayed it, and cut up the carcass. The priest received the blood and carried it to the altar, and afterwards burnt the flesh and fat.

That the offerer slew his own victim is the rule in Lev. 1 5 11, and is universally assumed in Palestinian tradition (see, e.g., M. Zĕbāḥīm, 3 1; Siphrā, Par. 4; cp M. Kēlīm 1 8, etc.; so also Jos. Ant. iii. 9 1). 𝔊, indeed, in Lev. l.c. has indefinite plurals

[1] 'Publica sacra, quæ publico sumptu pro populo fiunt . . . privata, quæ pro singulis hominibus, familiis, gentibus fiunt,' Festus; the distinction is made by Josephus (Ant. iii. 9 1), Philo (e.g., De victimis offer. § 3), and in the Mishna.

[2] The installation sacrifices might from another point of view be regarded as private sacrifices, and are in fact so regarded by Jewish tradition.

[3] The offering of birds as burnt offerings is permitted as the only kind of sacrifice possible to the poor in cities.

[4] On the name see above, § 12.

[5] See M. Bĕkōrōth 6, Tos. Bĕkōrōth 4, Bĕkōrōth 37*a ff.*

(σφάζουσι), and is naturally followed by Philo, De victimis, 2 241 Mangey; but their interpretation is not to be accepted.[1] Ezekiel would have the sacrifices of laymen slain by Levites (see above, § 21); but there is no evidence that this ever became the actual practice.[2] The place for the slaughter of the burnt offering was in the Court of the Priests (see TEMPLE), on the N. side of the great altar (Lev. 1 11), where also the sin offering and the trespass offering were slain (peace offerings might be slain in any part of the court; M. Zĕbāḥīm 5 1 ff.). Here were rings in the pavement for tying the victims, posts supporting beams with hooks to hang them up on, and low marble tables for dressing the large cattle (M. Middōth 3 5 5 2 M. Tāmid 3 5 M. Shĕkālīm 6 4, etc.). The blood was caught by a priest in a bason, and thrown from the vessel against the altar in such a way that some of the blood struck each of the four faces of the altar. The carcass was then cut up according to a certain order; the inwards and shanks (with the feet) were washed; and all the parts of the animal, except the hide[3] and the contents of the intestines, were borne by priests to the sloping ascent of the altar, where they were salted; finally they were carried up to the top of the altar, flung on the great fire,[4] and burned. In later times, at least, an oblation was offered with private holocausts (Nu. 15 1 ff.).

The offering of a bird had necessarily a different ritual (Lev. 1 14-17; M. Zĕbāḥīm 6 5). The dove or pigeon, which might be of either sex, was taken by the priest to the altar; ascending the ramp and standing at one corner, he pinched off the bird's head with his thumb-nail, squeezed out the blood so that it flowed down the side of the altar, drew out the crop with the entrails through an opening in the breast, and threw these, with the feathers, on the ash heap E. of the altar. Then with his hands he rent the fowl by its wings without actually pulling it in two, rubbed it with salt, and threw it upon the fire.

In the Pentateuch, especially in Lev. 5, there is some confusion between trespass offerings and sin offerings (see LEVITICUS, § 5); the original distinction both in occasion and ritual is, however, sufficiently clear, and is in general justly observed by the Jewish tradition.

27. Trespass offering.[5]

In the ăšām the victim is regularly a ram (ảyil, אַיִל Lev. 5 15 f. 18 6 6 [5 25], Nu. 5 8 Lev. 19 21 f., cp Ezra 10 19; in two late laws kĕbeš, כֶּבֶשׂ, Lev. 14 12 21 Nu. 6 12).[6] The animal, according to the Jewish interpretation of Lev. 5 15, must be worth at least two shekels. The ritual in Lev. 7 1 ff. prescribes that the trespass offering shall be slain, like the burnt offering, on the N. side of the great altar;[7] the blood is thrown against the altar precisely as in the burnt offering (§ 26); when the animal is cut up certain parts are taken to be burned upon the altar, viz., the fat tail, the fat that covers the entrails (omentum), the two kidneys with the fat upon them, and the excrescence on the liver.[8] No oblation or libation accompanies them. The flesh of the animal falls to the priests (according to Lev. 7 7, to the officiating priest); it is 'very holy,' and may be eaten only by males in a state of ceremonial purity and in a holy place.

In the ceremonies for the purification of the leper prescribed in Lev. 14 9 ff., which have a striking—and surely not accidental—resemblance to the consecration of priests (Lev. 8), the he lamb with whose blood the leper's right ear, thumb, and great toe were anointed is called an ăšām; but the ritual—note the 'waving' of the lamb, the accompaniment of oil, the anointing with blood and oil, sprinkling of oil, etc.—has nothing in common with that of Lev. 7 (see below, § 28*b*).

In the oldest laws about the ăšām this species of sacrifice seems to have been required only in expiation of the unlawful appropriation of the property of another (conversion), or of the tribute due to Yahwè (see Lev. 6 1-7 [5 20 ff.], 5 14-16; cp Lev. 22 14-16 and Nu. 5 5-8).[1] In such cases restitution of the property with the addition of one-fifth its value must be made, and a ram offered as a 'trespass offering.' The term ăšām probably originally signified the mulct by which such an offence was punished; the application to the sacrifice is secondary. An ăšām in silver is named in 2 K. 12 16 as one of the sources of the priests' income; as a species of sacrifice ăšām is mentioned first in Ezekiel, but in a way which implies that it was well known.

In the redaction of the laws the distinctive character of the ăšām is lost, and a 'trespass offering' is prescribed in many cases in which the offence is of a different nature and restitution is impossible (see, e.g., Lev. 5 1 ff. 17 ff. 19 20 ff.); the confusion with the sin offering remarked above thus arises.

The victims required by the laws differ in different cases—a bullock, he goat, she goat, ewe lamb or kid, or a dove (see below).

28a. Sin offering.[2]

The animal is brought to the temple court, and after the imposition of hands, as in the burnt offering, is slain by the offerer (Lev. 4 29) on the N. side of the altar. The distinctive feature of the ritual is that the priest, instead of dashing (זרק) the blood against the sides of the altar from the ground, ascends the altar, and, dipping his finger into the bason, smears (נתן, 'put') blood upon each of the four horns of the altar in order; the rest of the blood is poured out at the base of the altar. The parts offered upon the altar are the same which are thus consumed in the peace offerings (§ 29) and the trespass offering (§ 27). The flesh belongs to the priests; it is, like that of the ăšām, 'very holy,' and must be eaten under the same restrictions.

The holiness of the ḥaṭṭāth is in other respects more intense than that of the ăšām; everything which comes in contact with the flesh becomes 'sacred' (cp Hag. 2 12), that is, becomes the property of God—in effect, of the temple; an earthen pot in which the flesh is boiled must be broken, a metal one scoured and rinsed; a garment upon which the blood has accidentally spirted must be washed in a 'holy' place (Lev. 6 27-29 [20-22]). The piacular character of the sacrifice accounts for this higher degree of holiness.

In offering a dove as a sin offering the priest kills it with his thumb-nail (as in the burnt offering), but does not completely sever the head from the body; sprinkles some of the blood upon the side of the altar (not on the horns), and squeezes out the rest of the blood at the base; there are no altar portions to burn;[3] the flesh goes to the priest (Lev. 5 7-9 6 26 [19]).

In cases of extreme poverty a sin offering consisting only of a tenth of an ephah of fine flour, without oil or frankincense, was accepted; the priest burned a handful of it upon the altar and took the rest for himself as in other oblations (Lev. 5 11-13).

A late law (Lev. 4; see LEVITICUS, § 5) establishes a sliding scale of sin offerings according to the station of the offerer: the common man has to bring a female goat or sheep (4 28 32), as was doubtless the older rule (cp Lev. 5 6 Nu. 15 27).[4] If too poor for such a sacrifice, he is allowed to substitute two doves or pigeons, one as a sin offering and one as a burnt offering; or, in extremity, an oblation of flour (see above);[5] a prince (נָשִׂיא) in a similar case must offer a he goat (Lev. 4 23 f., cp Nu. 7 16, etc.); the 'anointed priest' a bullock (see below, § 37 c).

The name 'sin offering' suggests to the modern

1 A man might have his sacrifice offered by another; but the other was not necessarily a priest.

2 The slaying of the paschal lambs by the priests had a particular reason in the urgent need of expedition.

3 The hide fell to the priest who conducted the sacrifice (Lev. 7 8); a different rule seems to have prevailed in the Herodian temple; see Schürer, GJV(3) 2 248.

reader a sacrifice for the expiation of sin in our sense of the word, and it is often imagined that the Jewish sacrificial system provides and requires such expiation for every sin. Both these notions are erroneous. The cases in which a ḥaṭṭāth is prescribed fall for our apprehension into two classes: first, the ignorant or inadvertent transgression of certain prohibitions ('taboos'—including some in which we see a moral character), or unintentional failure to observe the prescriptions of the law (Nu. 15 22 ff.; from the context it is clear that religious observances are primarily meant); second, in purifications of various kinds, as of a woman after childbirth, a leper, etc., or of things, such as an altar (see below, § 45). For the former class the general rule in the Mishna is that any transgression the penalty of which, if wilful, would be that the offender be cut off, requires, if committed in ignorance or through inadvertence, a ḥaṭṭāth (M. Kĕrīthōth 1 2); the catalogue of these transgressions (ib. 1 1) ranges from incest and idolatry to eating the (internal) fat of animals and imitating the composition of the sacred incense, but does not include the commonest offences against morals. In the second class (purifications) fall the ḥaṭṭāth of a woman after childbirth (Lev. 12 6); of a man who has suffered from gonorrhœa (15 14 f.), or a woman from menorrhagia (15 29 f.); of a Nazirite accidentally defiled by the proximity of a dead body (Nu. 6 10 f.)—in all these cases the victim is a dove or pigeon; of a leper (Lev. 14 10 ff.; a ewe lamb, for the poor a dove or pigeon);[1] of a Nazirite at the end of his term (Nu. 6 14; ewe lamb); a man defiled by contact with the carcass of an unclean animal, etc. (Lev. 5 2 f., ewe lamb or she goat, v. 6).

In connection with the ḥaṭṭāth brief reference may be made to certain peculiar ceremonies of similar intent and effect.

28*b*. Peculiar piacula.

The most characteristic of these is the old rite for the purification of the leper (Lev. 14 1-8); a clean bird is killed over an earthen vessel containing fresh water in such a manner that its blood mingles with the water; the priest dips cedar wood, wool dyed crimson, and 'hyssop,' together with the living bird, into the vessel, sprinkles the water upon the leper, and lets the living bird fly away.[2] The expiration of the term of the Nazirite's vow (Nu. 6 13-21) is celebrated by a complete series of sacrifices, beginning with a ewe lamb as a sin offering, a he lamb as a burnt offering, and a ram for a peace offering; the oblation consists of a basket of different kinds of cakes. The boiled shoulder (only here) of the ram with a specimen of each kind of cake is 'waved' before Yahwè (see § 29 a), and then belongs to the priest.

The Ordeal of Jealousy has been described elsewhere (see JEALOUSY, ORDEAL OF).

The best description of the peace offering ritual is in Lev. 3, corresponding to that of the burnt offering in 1; see also 7 11 ff. 28 ff. 22 21 ff., Nu. 15 1 ff.

29*a*. Peace offerings.[3]

The victim may, as the owner pleases, be from the flock or the herd, either male or female, and of any age; it is required only that it be without blemish (see above, § 26), a rule that is relaxed in the freewill offering alone. The presentation and imposition of hands occur precisely as in the burnt offering; but whereas 'ōlāh, ḥaṭṭāth, and āšām must be killed on the N. side of the altar, the šĕlāmīm may be slain in any part of the court—obviously because at certain seasons they were brought in such numbers that the space on the N. of the altar, with its apparatus, did not suffice. The slaughter of the victim and the dashing of the blood upon the altar, again, differ in no respect from the corresponding acts in the burnt offering or the trespass offering; the sin offering alone requires a peculiar application of the blood. The portions consumed upon the altar are the fat that covers the entrails (great omentum) and all the fat upon the entrails, the two kidneys with the mass of fat upon them, and the excrescence upon the liver, which is to be separated with the kidneys; if the victim was a sheep there was added to these the whole fat tail, removed close to the os sacrum.

The precise meaning of the phrase הַיּוֹתֶרֶת עַל הַכָּבֵד, or יותרת הכבד (Lev. 8 16 9 19) is disputed. 𝔊 ὁ λοβὸς ὁ ἐπὶ τοῦ ἥπατος, ὁ λοβὸς τοῦ ἥπατος, Vg. reticulum jecoris, etc., EV 'the caul upon the liver.'[1] According to Jewish tradition it was not fat (Tos. Ḥullin 9 14); in the Mishna it is called אצבע, 'finger' (M. Tāmīd 4 3); Saad. translates, ziyādat al-kabid, an Arabic anatomical term which etymologically corresponds to Heb. יותרת. The question cannot be discussed here; the view of the present writer is that the lobus caudatus is meant, which lies close against the right kidney.

Another phrase which has been variously rendered is לְעֻמַּת הֶעָצֶה, Lev. 3 9. The עצה is not the 'coccyx,' as many modern writers absurdly say, nor the vertebral column, but the os sacrum.

These parts having been removed, the carcass was cut up, and the owner proceeded to present his offering to God by taking upon his two hands the altar portions and the breast and 'waving' them before Yahwè (Lev. 7 29 f.). In conformity with the example in Ex. 29 24, the priest, in later times, put his hands beneath those of the offerer and moved them backward and forward, up and down; the right leg was also added to the breast (cp Lev. 9 21 Ex. 29 27). After this ceremony the priest salted the altar portions and burned them; the breast and leg went to the priests; the rest of the flesh made a feast for the maker of the sacrifice; women as well as men might partake of it, if only they were in a state of ceremonial purity (Lev. 7 19-21). (See CLEAN AND UNCLEAN.) It might be eaten anywhere in Jerusalem on the day on which it was offered or the following day before sunset; whatever remained after that time must be burned (Lev. 7 16-18 19 5-8). One species of šĕlāmīm, however, the tōdāh, had to be eaten on the day of sacrifice (see § 29*b*; also § 39*a*).

The increase of the tariff in 7 32 appears in the very construction of the sentence. In Dt. the priest receives a foreleg, the jowl, and the stomach (tripe); the older stratum of priestly laws gives him the breast (חָזֶה, στηθύνιον, pectusculum) instead (see Ex. 29 26 Lev. 7 31); this is presented to God ('the wave breast') and ceded by him to his priest. Lev. 7 32 adds the right leg as a tax (תְּרוּמָה) paid by the Israelites to the priest (cp Nu. 6 20). The rules of Dt. and P are harmonised in the Mishna by applying the former to ḥullīm, the latter to ḳŏdāšīm (M. Ḥullin 10 1, Siphrā on Lev. l.c.).

The priests' portions of the šĕlāmīm were not subject to the severe restrictions of the ḥaṭṭāth and the āšām; the flesh might be eaten by the priests and their families, including slaves, anywhere in Jerusalem. The same rule of time applies to the priests' part of the flesh as to the offerers

The ordinary šĕlāmīm described in the last section were offered either in fulfilment of a specific vow to sacrifice such and such victims as peace offerings (nĕder),[2] or as a 'freewill offering' (nĕdābāh)—that is to say, a sacrifice not made obligatory by the law or by the owner's engagement (vow).

29*b*. Thank-offering.

These two kinds only are named in Dt. 12 17 Lev. 22 17 ff. Nu. 15 1 ff. Lev. 7 11 ff. (see also 22 29 f.) joins with these a third species of šĕlāmīm, the tōdāh (AV 'sacrifice of thanksgiving,' 'thank offering'; on the name, see below, begin. of next col.), to which in some respects different rules apply.

The tōdāh was accompanied by a prescribed oblation of a peculiar kind, in which, besides various kinds of sacrificial cakes, leavened bread is included (see § 30). The flesh of the victim must be eaten on the day of the sacrifice, 'none of it must be left until morning' (7 15, 22 30 [H]). The cakes and bread were naturally subjected to the same restriction (Zĕbāḥīm, 36*a*). The limit of time is the same which is fixed in Ex. 23 18 34 25 for the sacrifices of Yahwè's feast (חג),[1] and in Ex. 12 10 (P) for the Passover. It is therefore evidently an old rule for at least some sacrifices.

According to the Talmud (Zĕbāḥīm, 36*a*) the limit applied also to the āšām and ḥaṭṭāth the flesh of which was eaten by the priests, and to the peace offerings of the congregation (Lev. 23 19) and the peace offering of the Nazirite (Nu. 6 17).

The offering of leavened bread, also, is doubtless an old custom (see above, § 11); the cakes of unleavened bread seem to be an accommodation to the ordinary rule, Lev. 2 11. There seems, therefore, to be no sufficient reason for regarding the tōdāh as a late development.

The name תּוֹדָה signifies 'praise, thanksgiving' (cp 𝔊 θυσία αἰνέσεως, Lev. 7 5, χαρμοσύνης 22 29, Vg. hostia pro gratiarum actione); its use in connection with sacrifice is old (Am. 4 5 קַטֵּר מֵחָמֵץ תּוֹדָה [note the conjunction with nĕdābāh], cp Jer. 17 26 33 11), and the law in Lev. 22 29 was apparently contained in H. It was perhaps, as Jewish scholars explain, a sacrifice of gratitude for some signal manifestation of God's goodness, such as deliverance from a great peril. The apparent conflict in the laws may be explained by the fact that the tōdāh was regarded by some compilers as a distinct species of sacrifice, by others as a variety of šĕlāmīm.

To the class of the šĕlāmīm belongs also the ḥăgīgāh, to which a book of the Mishna is devoted—i.e., the sacrifices made by pilgrims at the feasts, especially in the spring. The animals thus offered furnished the flesh for the sacrificial feasts which are so often commended in Dt. (e.g. 12 6 f., 11 f., etc.); they might be purchased with the proceeds of the sale of the ('second') tithe (Dt. 14 24 ff.), or be taken from the cattle tithe (Lev. 27 32). Besides the ḥăgīgāh šĕlāmīm, which were obligatory, the Rabbis distinguish šalmē simḥāh, 'joyous sacrifices,' at the feasts, which might be either votive or freewill offerings; the cattle tithe might be used for these also.

The oblation (minḥāh) consists of flour and oil either merely kneaded in a mass or baked or fried in cakes of various kinds. Salt is required in all, and a portion of frankincense accompanies many of these oblations; leaven, and honey, which in other countries was commonly used in sacrificial cakes, are prohibited (Lev. 2 11). The minḥāh is either an independent offering—voluntary or prescribed—or the obligatory concomitant of certain species of sacrifices.

The rules for the minḥāh as an offering by itself are found in Lev. 2, which corresponds to 1 (burnt offering). and 3 (peace offering). The following varieties are recognised:

(a) The oblation of fine wheat flour (סֹלֶת, σεμίδαλις),[3] Lev. 2 1-3, as a votive or freewill offering. The quantity is for the giver to determine; tradition fixes the minimum at one tenth of an ephah. For each tenth of an ephah one lōg of oil is required.[4] The offerer put the flour and part of the oil into a vessel and mixed them by stirring, transferred the mass to a liturgical vessel, poured the rest of the oil over it, and put frankincense on top of it.[5] The priest carries it to the altar, takes a handful of the mass and puts it in another vessel with all the frankincense, ascends the altar, puts salt upon the oblation, and places it upon the fire. The portion thus consumed is called the azkārāh (Lev. 2 2, 'reminder,' EV 'memorial'); the rest of the dough goes to the priests. It is 'very holy,' like the sin offering and the trespass offering, being ceded to the priesthood from the 'offerings of Yahwè made by fire'; it may not be leavened (Lev. 6 16 f. [9 f.]), but is baked, and eaten by the males of priestly families within the temple precincts.

(b) The oblation of cakes baked in the oven (תַּנּוּר), Lev. 2 4 (see BAKEMEATS, BREAD). Of these the law describes two species—unleavened cakes (ḥallōth) mixed with oil, and unleavened wafers (rĕḳīḳīm) smeared with oil. Both were made of fine flour; the ḥallōth were thicker cakes shortened with oil, the rĕḳīḳīm thin wafer bread mixed with water only and after baking smeared with oil (as we should butter it). These cakes were baked in the temple; the offerer broke them into pieces, put them into a liturgical vessel with the quantum of frankincense, and brought it to the priest, who proceeded as in the former case.

(c) Baked on a griddle or fried in a pan (Lev. 2 5 f. 7 ff.).

Heb. מִנְחָה עַל הַמַּחֲבַת, מִנְחַת מַרְחֶשֶׁת respectively. The utensils are described in Siphrā, ad loc., and in M. Mĕnāḥōth 5 8: the maḥăbath is a griddle; the marḥešeth a somewhat deep pan with a cover, in which the dough fried in its own fat; see COOKING, § 7.

The flour and part of the oil were put in a vessel and mixed by stirring, the mass was kneaded with lukewarm water, baked on the griddle or fried in the pan as the offerer chose (or as he had vowed to do); the cakes were then broken into pieces, the rest of the oil poured over them (Lev. 2 6), and frankincense placed upon them. The priest proceeded as in the previous cases. An independent oblation is prescribed by the law as the sin offering of the very poor (Lev. 5 11-13); it consisted of one tenth of an ephah of fine flour (sóleth), without oil or frankincense. The priest burned a handful of it on the altar as an azkārāh, and took the rest for himself. A similar offering of coarse barley meal, without oil or frankincense, is required in the peculiar ritual of the ordeal of jealousy, Nu. 5 11 ff. (see JEALOUSY, ORDEAL OF). The oblation at the installation of priests and the daily oblation of the high priest will be treated below under sacra publica (§ 39*a*).

The general rule for the oblation accompanying private sacrifices is laid down in Nu. 15 1-16. Every victim from the flock or the herd,[1] offered as 'ōlāh or zĕbaḥ, whether in fulfilment of a vow, as a freewill offering, or at the feasts, must be accompanied by an oblation proportioned to the value of the animal:[2] with a lamb or kid, one tenth of an ephah of fine flour mixed with one fourth of a hīn of oil; with a ram, two tenths of flour, one third of a hīn of oil; with neat cattle, three tenths of flour and one half a hīn of oil for each animal. The preparation and offering of the oblation are the same as in the independent oblation of fine flour (above, a).

The following oblations are prescribed as the accompaniment of certain sacrifices of purification:

(a) In the (secondary) ritual for the purification of the lepers (Lev. 14 10 ff. 21 ff.), with the animals to be offered, are required three tenths of an ephah of fine flour mixed with oil and one lōg of oil (v. 10); in case of poverty the flour may be reduced to one tenth, but the quantity of oil remains the same (v. 21). (b) The Nazirite, on the completion of his vow (Nu. 6 15), has to bring, with his three victims, a basket of unleavened bread of both kinds which are baked in the oven (viz. cakes mixed with oil and wafers smeared with oil; above, b; according to the Mishna, ten of each variety), 'and their [the victims'] oblation and libation'—i.e., as understood by Jewish tradition, in addition to the cakes, the oblation of fine flour and oil that according to rule should accompany every burnt offering and peace offering.[3] The purification of a woman after childbirth required a lamb as a burnt offering (Lev. 12 6); an oblation is not named in the law, but the case was brought under the general rule of Nu. 15 3-5.

1 The words 'the Passover' in the second passage are regarded by many as a gloss.

2 See above, § 14.

3 On the preparation of the wheat, see M. Mĕnāḥōth 6 5; cp FOOD, § 1.

4 Preparation of the oil, M. Mĕnāḥōth 8 3 ff.; see OIL.

5 This, it is observed, corresponds to the slaying and dressing of a victim by the owner.

1 Birds are not offered on the occasions specified, and therefore are not mentioned in the rule.

2 Sin offerings and trespass offerings have no oblations. The Mishna makes an exception of the sin offering and trespass offering of the leper, Lev. 14 10 (M. Mĕnāḥōth 9 6).

3 This is perhaps only an exegetical oblation.

31a. Libations.[1]

Nu. 15 1-16 prescribes with the oblation, and in the same cases, a libation of wine as the obligatory accompaniment of private burnt offerings and sacrifices; with a lamb or kid one fourth of a hīn; with a ram, one third; with a victim from the herd, one half. No libation is made with any oblation offered by itself without the sacrifice of an animal (see Lev. 2 6 19-23 [12-16] Nu. 5 15); nor with sin offerings or trespass offerings, for the same reason that these sacrifices have no oblation;[2] nor with birds. A libation accompanies the peace offering at the release of the Nazirite's vow (Nu. 6 15 17); it is not named with the burnt offering and oblation of the cleansed leper (Lev. 14 10 20), nor with that of the puerpera (Lev. 12 6 f.). In these cases also Jewish authorities apply the rule in Nu. 15 3 ff. No ritual directions for the libation are found in the OT; see below, § 35.

Nothing is said in the Pentateuch about an independent libation; but the Mishna recognises a votive offering or freewill offering of wine (M. Mĕnāḥōth 12 5, cp 13 5), and there is other evidence that such libations were made (cp Jubilees 7 5); the quantity is fixed at three lōgs, all of which was thrown upon the fire (Zĕbāḥīm 91*b*, cp Jubilees, l.c.). A votive offering or freewill offering of oil (without flour) is also recognised by the Rabbis, though R. 'Akībā does not allow it (M. Zĕbāḥīm 10 8); the quantity should be not less than one lōg; a handful was thrown upon the fire, the rest went to the priests for food.

31b. Frankincense; salt.

Frankincense (see INCENSE, § 1 f.) is a necessary accompaniment of every private oblation (Lev. 2 1 f. 6 14 f. [7 f.]), except of the pauper's sin offering of fine flour and in the ordeal of jealousy; the offering of first-fruits of grain—roast ears, crushed corn—also requires it (Lev. 2 14 f.). The quantity was fixed: one handful for every minḥāh, whether great or small. The frankincense was put on the dough of fine flour mixed with oil, or the broken pieces of the sacrificial cakes, in a liturgical vessel, and, with a handful of the dough or the cakes, was thrown upon the fire on the great altar and consumed. Frankincense might also be given by itself as a votive or freewill offering. Salt was used with all sacrifices and oblations (Lev. 2 13, cp Ezek. 43 24 Mk. 9 49, Jos. Ant. iii. 9 1, Mĕnāḥōth 20 a). See below, § 36

32. Sacra publica: daily holocausts.

The custom of offering a daily burnt offering and oblation probably originated in the royal temples of Judah and Israel. In the ninth century the burnt offering seems to have been in the morning and the oblation in the evening (above, § 19). Ezekiel (46 13-15) provides for both holocaust and oblation in the morning only. The rule in Nu. 28 1-8 Ex. 29 38-42 requires holocaust and oblation both morning and evening, and such was the practice of later times (Dan. 8 11-14). Similar sacrifices once or twice daily were frequent in antiquity; Nebuchadrezzar, e.g., is said to have offered six lambs daily; at Hierapolis there were regular sacrifices morning and evening, etc.

The technical name in Hebrew is עֹלַת הַתָּמִיד (מִנְחַת ,עֹלַת), 𝔊 ὁλοκαύτωμα ἐνδελεχισμοῦ, Vg. holocaustum sempiternum, holocaustum juge.

The victims were yearling lambs, perfect males; the accompanying oblation for each consisted of one tenth of an ephah of fine flour mixed with one fourth of a hīn of fine oil; the libation was one fourth of a hīn of wine. The morning sacrifice was offered between dawn and sunrise (M. Tāmīd 3 2); the evening sacrifice, 'between the two evenings' (Ex. 29 39; see DAY, § 2)—i.e., perhaps originally between sunset and dark; in the Herodian temple, however, the offering was, on ordinary days, between three and four o'clock in the afternoon (M. Pĕsāḥīm 5 1) and on the fourteenth of Nisan even earlier, in order to give time for the slaughter of the paschal lambs after the Tāmīd. The lambs for the daily holocaust, after having been duly examined, were kept (never less than six at a time) in a room in the temple, set apart for this purpose, in the NW. corner of the priests' court (M. Middōth 1 6); they had to be in readiness four days before they were offered; a second inspection preceded the slaughter.[1] No peculiarities in the ritual of these sacrifices are indicated in the laws; in the Mishna the chief difference between them and private burnt offerings (above, § 26) is the participation of a greater number of priests.

[1] Heb. נֶסֶךְ, 𝔊 σπονδή.

[2] They are not meant to be pulchra.

In addition to the proper oblation for the holocaust, there was offered at the same time the high priest's daily oblation of cakes (Lev. 6 19-23 [12-16]), made of one tenth of an ephah of fine flour baked on a griddle, broken in pieces, and soaked in oil. These were made fresh every morning in a special chamber in the temple; one half was offered in the morning, half in the evening.

In the Herodian temple the daily burnt offering formed part of a complex and minutely regulated service of which only a brief outline can be given here.

The regular duties of the temple service were distributed daily among the members of the course of priests on duty by a method of counting out. Four such drawings were held in succession in the early morning; the first designated the priest who should have charge of the removal of the ashes from the great altar and the rebuilding of two fires upon it—the third fire was kept burning night and day. By the second drawing thirteen priests were chosen for different specified parts in the sacrifice of the lamb and the offering of the oblations, and for the cleansing of the altar of incense and the lamps; the third, to which only those were admitted who had not previously enjoyed the honour, determined who should burn the incense in the temple; the fourth, who should put the parts of the victim upon the fire. As soon as dawn lighted up the E., a lamb was taken from the pen, inspected by torchlight, given a drink of water, and led to the place of slaughter on the N. side of the altar. The two priests whose duty called them into the temple, opened the great door of the temple, gathered into a vessel the ashes from the altar of incense, and trimmed and refilled the lamps, removing the old wicks and oil. The lamb was laid on the pavement with its head toward the S., its face to the W. (i.e., toward the temple), and at the sound of the opening door the sacrificing priest slew it; a second caught the blood in a vessel, carried it to the NE. corner of the great altar, and standing on the ground threw some of the blood against the angle so that it spread on both faces, repeated the ceremony at the SW. corner, and poured out the rest of the blood at the base of the altar on the S. side, where it was carried off by a drain. The carcass was then hung up, skinned, and dissected by the sacrificing priest in a particular manner and order, and the inwards cleansed and washed. Six priests, standing in order before him, received the several parts of the victim as they were separated; three others held respectively the oblation of the burnt offering, the high priest's oblation of cakes, and the wine for the libation. They now carried all these to the ramp of the altar, laid them down in order less than half way up the slope, salted them, and descended to the marble hall (לִשְׁכַּת הַגָּזִית) for the morning prayers. The offering of incense on the inner altar followed, as described under INCENSE, § 7. After this the priests took their stand on the steps of the prostyle, those who were for the day the ministers of the temple at the S. end with the vessels in their hands. The priest to whose lot this service had fallen carried the parts of the victim one by one up to the top of the altar and threw them upon the great fire; the priests upon the steps of the temple intoned the benediction; the altar priest offered the oblation, the high priest's sacrificial cakes, and last of all the wine. At the moment of the libation, upon a signal from the master of ceremonies, the cymbals clashed, two priests gave a blast upon their trumpets, and the chorus of Levites set up the song of the day; when they paused, the trumpeters blew another blast, and all who were in the court prostrated themselves—nine times in all.

The same ceremonies were repeated in the evening by the same priests—no fresh drawings were held—except the removal of the ashes from the great altar and the renewing of the fires, which took place only in the morning.

As the daily burnt offering was made for the people, the people was represented at it each morning and evening by a deputation appointed for the purpose (the anšē ha-ma'ămād, called also anšē kol-Isrā'ēl).[2] There was such a delegation of the laity for each of the twenty-four weekly courses of priests. Any members of a deputation who were not present with their fellows in the temple held a special synagogue service at home. The age of this institution is not known; it long outlived the destruction of the temple.[1]

In addition to the daily burnt offerings more numerous sacrifices were made on the sabbaths and new moons, the first of the seventh month (civil new year), the three season feasts, and the Day of Atonement. Nu. 28 f., which fixes the kind and number of the victims for these occasions, is late (see NUMBERS, § 10); but the multiplication of public as well as private sacrifices at festivals is common, and doubtless ancient among the Israelites as well as other peoples.[3]

33. Additional sabbaths and festivals.[2]

On the Sabbath the additional (mūsāph) sacrifice was a burnt offering of two yearling he lambs, with their oblation and libation according to rule (two tenths of an ephah of fine flour with one half a hin of oil, and half a hin of wine; cp Ex. 29 40 Nu. 15 4 f. etc.). The sacrifice—like all the additional sacrifices—was made immediately after the morning holocaust, by the same priests, and with the same rites. The priests of the outgoing course pronounced at the proper place an additional benediction on those of the incoming course (M. Tāmīd 5 1). For the new moon are prescribed (Nu. 28 11-15) two bullocks, a ram, and seven yearling he lambs as burnt offerings, with the oblation and libation demanded for each by the rule in Nu. 15 1-12, with the regular ritual; further, a he goat as a sin offering for the people (below, § 37). At the Passover, from the first (fifteenth of Nisan) to the seventh day of the feast inclusive, were offered daily the same additional victims as on the new moon (Nu. 28 19-24); on the second day (sixteenth of Nisan),[4] besides these, one he lamb as a burnt offering in connection with the wave sheaf (Lev. 23 10-13; see below, § 34 b). At Pentecost, the same additional offerings as on the first of the month, the oblation from the new flour ('the two loaves,' Lev. 23 15-21; see § 34 b), and with this bread, one bullock, two rams, and seven he lambs as burnt offerings and a he goat as a sin offering;[5] finally, two he lambs as peace offerings of the people (see below, § 40).

The first of the seventh month, the civil new year, was celebrated by the so-called Feast of Trumpets. Its sacrifices are, first, the daily holocaust; second, the offerings for the new moon; and third, the sacrifices proper to the season—viz., one bullock, one ram, and seven yearling he lambs as burnt offerings, with their oblations, and a he goat for a sin offering (Nu. 29 1-6). If the day was also a sabbath, the additional victims for the sabbath were offered directly after the daily sacrifice. The order of victims in each is—bullocks, rams, lambs, goats; which is to be noted, because by general rule the sin offering should precede burnt offerings. The additional offerings of the Day of Atonement (10th of the seventh month) are the same as those of the New Year's day (Nu. 29 7-11); the piacular sacrifices of Lev. 16 are distinct (see below, § 37). At Tabernacles, the greatest feast of the year, the additional sacrifices are multiplied prodigiously (Nu. 29 12 ff.). They begin on the first day (15th) with thirteen bullocks, two rams, and fourteen lambs as burnt offerings, with their respective oblations and libations severally, and a he goat as a sin offering. On the succeeding days the number of bullocks diminishes by one each day, so that on the seventh day there are seven bullocks, the other victims remaining throughout the same. On the eighth day the sacrifice consists of one bullock, one ram, and seven he lambs as a burnt offering with their oblations and libations, and a he goat as a sin offering (Nu. 29 35-38). At this feast all the twenty-four courses of priests took part, in a fixed order (M. Sukkāh 5 6). A ceremony peculiar to Tabernacles was the libation of water; see below, § 35.

Ex. 25 30 merely prescribes that bread shall always stand on the table before Yahwè; more particular directions are given in Lev. 24 5-9 (see LEVITICUS, § 21). The bread was made of fine flour, two tenths of an ephah of which was required for each loaf. Twelve such loaves were baked and set upon the table in two piles of six each; frankincense in golden urns stood beside them. The bread was changed every sabbath; the loaves that were removed were eaten by the priests within the precincts ('in a holy place').

34*a*. Shewbread.[6]

Additional details are derived from Josephus and the Mishna.[1] The loaves were unleavened; the dough was mixed with water only—not, like other oblations, with oil. They were, as we should infer from the quantity of flour, of considerable size; according to the Mishna, shaped like a brick, ten handbreadths long, five wide, and seven fingers thick. In the Chronicler's time the loaves were made by a family of Kohathite Levites (1 Ch. 9 32); in the first century of our era by a family of priests named Garmo, with whom the art was a secret.[2] They were moulded in forms, and baked in a chamber on the N. side of the temple court. The loaves were piled on two salvers, six on each. On the sabbath four priests of the outgoing course entered the temple to remove the old loaves and frankincense, followed by four of the new course, two bearing the salvers with the new bread, and two the urns of fresh frankincense. The change was so effected that there was no moment when there was not bread upon the table. The last week's oblation was carried out, the frankincense burned on the great altar (at the close of the additional sacrifices of the sabbath), and the loaves equally divided between the incoming and the outgoing course of priests; each course gave some of its loaves to the high priest.

Ex. 25 29 provides vessels for wine to stand upon the table, as well as for the bread and the frankincense; according to 1 Macc. 1 22, Antiochus Epiphanes carried off with the table its flagons and chalices.[3] It is not likely that empty cups were set before Yahwè; but there is no reference in the OT to the presentation of wine with the shewbread, and neither Josephus nor the Mishna mentions it.[4] See § 35.

Two interesting survivals of ancient agricultural rites are the presentation of the sheaf of barley at the Passover and of the two loaves at Pentecost (Lev. 23 9-14 15-20; see LEVITICUS, § 20). The old tōrāh (incorporated in H) required in the case of the Passover that at the beginning of harvest a first-fruit sheaf of barley should be brought to the priest (at the local holy place), who should wave it before Yahwè; until this has been done the new crop may not be used in any way—in bread, parched corn, or grits (see above, § 14). When this rite was made part of the public cultus of the temple in Jerusalem its character was greatly changed. The reaping of the barley (on the night preceding the sixteenth of Nisan) became a liturgical act; the sheaf itself was not waved, but the grain was threshed, winnowed, cleansed, roasted, ground, sifted, etc., in the temple precincts, mixed with oil, like the ordinary minḥāh, 'waved,' and burnt. The accompanying sacrifice was a yearling lamb as a burnt offering (Lev. 23 12 f.).

34*b*. Peculiar oblations.

The two leavened loaves of new wheat flour at Pentecost (§ 14) were also originally a local offering; in later times they were presented in the temple for the whole people. The preparation of the fine flour, and the leavening and baking of the loaves, are minutely regulated. Two yearling lambs are presented with the loaves, waved before Yahwè, and offered as peace offerings (§ 40). The bread does not come upon the altar, but is eaten by the priests. The additional burnt offerings on this day have been enumerated above (§ 33).

A libation of wine and an oblation accompany every public burnt offering: the daily holocaust (Nu. 28 7 f. Ex. 29 40 f.); the additional burnt offerings on sabbaths, new moons, and festivals (Lev. 23 18 37 Nu. 28 9 14 29 18 etc. 33 39); the lamb offered with the first sheaf (Lev. 23 13); and the bullock of burnt offering sacrificed with the sin offering of the congregation (Nu. 15 24). The manner of offering wine is referred to only in Nu. 28 7: 'in the holy place (בַּקֹּדֶשׁ, ἐν τῷ ἁγίῳ) offer a libation of strong drink (שֵׁכָר, σίκερα) to Yahwè.

4 Ex. 30 9 prohibits a libation on the inner altar.
5 See above, §§ 14 and 31 a.

The passage is difficult; šēkār is not elsewhere prescribed for libations; if 'old wine' (Tg.) or 'unmixed wine' is meant it is hard to see why the unusual term should be used (cp WINE); equally strange is a libation in the temple itself, yet the words admit no other natural explanation.

The oblation, of which the libation is a standing accessory, was offered on the great altar, and there, undoubtedly, the libation accompanying the burnt offerings also was made. Evidence that this was the custom is given by Sirach (50 15 [16*f.*]): the high priest 'stretched forth his hand to the chalice and made a libation of the blood of the grape; he poured it out at the base of the altar, a fragrance well pleasing to the Most High the universal king'; so also Jos. Ant. iii 9 4. In the same way the rite is described by Maimonides.[1] M. Mĕnāḥōth 8 6 names some places where the best wine for the temple service was produced, and forbids wine grown or prepared under certain conditions. It must be pure natural wine, not sweetened, smoked, or boiled.

One of the most striking ceremonies of the Feast of Tabernacles was the libation of water which was made every morning during the seven days of the feast at the same time as the libation of wine accompanying the morning holocaust.[2] The water was carried up from Siloam through the water-gate, and poured into a basin on the top of the altar at the SW. corner, the wine being poured into another. The bringing of the water into the precincts was accompanied by trumpet-blasts and loud jubilation.[3]

The oblation in the sacra publica was not accompanied, as was that of individuals (§ 31 b), by a portion of frankincense burned on the great altar.

36. Incense; salt.

In place of this, a costly compound incense was burned on the small altar in the temple at the morning and the evening sacrifice (see INCENSE, § 6 f.). Urns of frankincense stood on the table of shewbread; the contents were removed every sabbath and burned on the outer altar (above, § 34 a). Salt was required with all public as well as all private offerings; even the compound incense contained salt. Large quantities of salt were consumed in the temple; Josephus (Ant. xii. 3 3) records that Antiochus the Great ordered 375 medimni (annually) to be delivered to the Jews for the maintenance of the worship.[4] Rock salt ('Sodom salt') is specified in the formula for the compounding of incense, and was doubtless used for other purposes (see SALT, § 2).

37. Public piacula.

(a) Stated sin offerings at new moons and feasts. With the additional burnt offerings (Nu. 28 f.; above, § 33) it is ordered that one he goat (שָׂעִיר) shall be sacrificed as a sin offering on the new moon, on each of the seven days of Unleavened Bread, at Pentecost,[5] on the first of the seventh month, on the tenth of the same month, on the seven days of Tabernacles, and on the closing (eighth) day of that festival. No special rules for these sin offerings are given in the Pentateuch; the ritual is doubtless the same as that described in Lev. 9 15, cp 8-11; that is, identical with that of the private sin offering (§ 28 a), except that there is no imposition of hands (M. Mĕnāḥōth 9 7); the flesh was eaten by the priests under the same restrictions as that of the private sin offering.[6]

(b) The sin offerings of the Day of Atonement. Nu. 29 11 demands, with the additional burnt offerings, a he goat as a sin offering, 'beside the goat of atonement'—that is, the goat chosen by lot in the special rites of the day as a ḥaṭṭāth (Lev. 16 5 9 15). It was offered after the peculiar expiatory ceremonies of the day, with the ordinary ritual; its flesh was eaten.

The propria of the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16)[1] begin with the sacrifice by the high priest of a bull as a sin offering for himself and the priesthood in general;[2] its blood was carried by him into the 'most holy place' and sprinkled there in a minutely prescribed manner. The sin offering of the congregation, a he goat, was next offered, and its blood in like manner sprinkled in the adytum. The blood of both was then applied to the horns of the altar and sprinkled with the finger seven times upon the altar—that is, according to the later practice if not to the original intention of the law, the altar of incense (Ex. 30 10); cp Lev. 4 7 18; the rest of the blood was poured out at the base of the great altar. The usual parts of both victims were burned on the altar of burnt offerings; the rest of the flesh (cut up as for an 'ōlāh), with the head, legs, inwards, and hide, were carried out to the place where the ashes from the altar were emptied, and there consumed by fire. The general rule is that the flesh of sin offerings whose blood is brought into the temple must not be eaten (Lev. 6 30 [23], cp 4 7 11, etc. 16 27). The attendant who thus comes in contact with the holy flesh is unclean, and must bathe before again coming into the city (Lev. 16 28, cp Nu. 19 5-10).

(c) Occasional sin offerings. The sin offering of the anointed priest (Lev. 4 3-12) must be regarded as public, because the premiss is that his inadvertent transgression has brought evil consequences upon the people (4 2 f.). The victim is a bull; the blood is taken into the holy place, sprinkled seven times before the veil, and applied to the horns of the altar of incense; the subsequent procedure is the same as in the case of the high priest's bull on the Day of Atonement. The sin offering of the whole congregation (Lev. 4 13-21) for an unknown transgression, the consequences of which they suffer, is a bull; the imposition of hands is by the elders; the minister is the high priest; the ritual is the same as in his own sin offering above. An older parallel to Lev. 4 13-21 is Nu. 15 22-26.[3] The sacrifices here required are a bull as a burnt offering, with the regular oblation and libation, and a he goat as a sin offering. It is assumed that the ordinary ritual is followed; the flesh is eaten by the priests.

(d) Sin offerings in ceremonies of consecration.[4] In the consecration of priests, Ex. 29 1 ff. (cp Lev. 8 1 ff.), a bull is offered as a sin offering, with the usual ritual; the flesh, hide, and offal are destroyed by fire. Similarly in the inaugural sacrifices of Aaron, Lev. 9, he sacrifices for himself a bull-calf as a sin offering with the same rites. The disposition of the flesh is not mentioned; from v. 15 it may be inferred that it was burned; but a late passage (10 16-20) maintains that it should have been eaten, since it did not fall under the rule of 6 30. At the dedication of the Levites (Nu. 8 8) a bull is sacrificed as a sin offering without specification of the ritual.

In addition to the several sin offerings of the Day of Atonement, a goat, on whose head the sins of the people had been solemnly laid by the high priest, was sent away into the wilderness 'to Azazel' (see ATONEMENT, DAY OF; AZAZEL). This was the great expiation for the sins of the year (see below, § 51). Another

3 For an explanation of the rite see NATURE WORSHIP, § 4.

4 Cp Ezra 6 9 7 22, Jos. Ant. xiii. 2 3.

5 The sin offering of Lev. 23 19 is thought by most critics to be an interpolation from Nu. 28 27 ff.; the Jews, however, decide that it was distinct from that. See M. Mĕnāḥōth 4 2; Jos. Ant. iii. 10 6.

6 See Jos. Ant. iii. 10 5. This is the rule for all sin offerings whose blood is not brought into the holy place.

1 See ATONEMENT, DAY OF.

2 Inasmuch as the purification of the priest is an indispensable preliminary to the grand piacula of the day, this sin offering is here classed with the sacra publica.

3 Rabbinical exegesis harmonised them by interpreting Nu. 15 22 of the sin of idolatry as the violation of all the commandments. Siphrē loc., Hōrāyōth 8*b*.

4 The consecration sin offerings are not without significance for the theory of such piacula.

peculiar rite which, though widely differing from ordinary sacrifice, must be mentioned here, is the burning of the red heifer, with whose ashes is prepared a holy water that purges the uncleanness arising from contact with a dead body (Nu. 19). The rites, as described in the Mishna (Pārāh), are plainly assimilated to those of a burnt offering (see CLEAN AND UNCLEAN, § 17; NUMBERS, § 20). Another noteworthy piaculum is the slaying of a heifer to atone for a murder the perpetrator of which cannot be detected (Dt. 21 1-9).

In the directions for the consecration of Aaron and his sons (Ex. 29, cp Lev. 8), after the sacrifice of a bull as a sin offering (above, § 37) and a ram as a burnt offering, another ram, called the 'installation ram' (אֵיל מִלֻּאִים, v. 22) is offered. Its blood is rubbed on the tip of the candidate's right ear, on his right thumb, and his right great toe;[1] the blood is then dashed against the altar as in other sacrifices. To the parts usually burned upon the altar in the sacrifice of a sheep as a peace offering, is added in this case the right leg, which in a layman's sacrifice would fall to the priest. From a basket containing loaves of bread, cakes made with oil, and wafers smeared with oil—all of fine flour (cp Lev. 7 11 ff., § 30)—one of each kind is taken and placed, with the altar portions and the leg, on Aaron's hands, and 'waved' by Moses before Yahwè. They are then burned upon the altar. The breast of the ram, which Moses waves before Yahwè, is his portion; the rest of the flesh of the ram is boiled in a holy place and, with the remainder of the contents of the basket, eaten by the newly consecrated priests. Any that is left till morning must be burned; it may not be eaten after that time. It is implied in Ex. 29 29 ff. (secondary) that the same ceremony is to be performed whenever a high priest is to be inducted; cp Lev. 8 33 ff.

39a. Installation of priests.

In Ex. 29 36 f., the blood of the bull offered as the sin offering of the priests also purifies the altar ('removes its sin,' 'expiates for it'; see below, § 45); cp Ezek. 43 18 ff. Thus the altar becomes 'very holy'; whatsoever touches it is thereby made sacred (i.e., belongs to God). In a still later supplement, Ex. 30 26 ff., the holy anointing oil is applied to the tent and all its furniture, as well as to the priests.

39b. Consecration of altar.

Peace offerings were ordinarily private sacrifices; the feast of the worshippers was their characteristic feature. It is, indeed, not improbable that at the high festivals the kings furnished animals in great numbers (as their free-will offerings) for the assembled people, and Ezekiel plainly contemplates the continuance of this custom (45 17); but in P there is no recognition of offerings of this kind. In the completed sacrificial system there are, however, certain public or quasi-public sacrifices which fall under this head. The installation ram of the priests (Ex. 29) is plainly a peace offering with certain peculiar rites. The inaugural sacrifices of Aaron in Lev. 9 include an animal from the herd (šōr) and a ram as peace offerings for the people; whether the author means it to be understood that their flesh was eaten by representatives of the people or by the priests is not clear. The annual sacrifice of the two lambs offered with the two loaves of new wheat bread at Pentecost (Lev. 23 19) are public peace offerings;[2] the flesh fell to the priests and was very holy. With this exception the rule holds that all public sacrifices are either burnt offerings or sin offerings.

40. Peace offerings in sacra publica.

[1] The aspersion of blood and anointing oil on the vestments of the priest is a later addition.

[2] This results from transferring a local rite in which the lambs were real šĕlāmīm to the central sanctuary; see §§ 14 and 34*b*.

III. BELIEFS AND IDEAS

The prevailing conception of sacrifice and offering in the OT is that of a gift or present to God. The two generic terms minḥāh and ḳorbān both express this idea.[1] Minḥah applies equally to Cain's gift of the fruits of the earth and to Abel's of animals from his flock (Gen. 4 3-5, J). The same word is used of a gift to a fellow-man as a token of friendship (Is. 39 1), an act of homage (1 S. 10 27 1 K. 10 25), tribute to a suzerain (Judg. 3 15 17 f. 2 S. 8 2 6), to propitiate a powerful person who has been wronged or offended (Gen. 32 13 18 33 10 f.), or to procure favour and assistance (Gen. 43 11 ff. Hos. 10 6), etc. In the later technical language of the ritual ḳorbān, 'present,' is the comprehensive name for sacrifice and offering of every kind. The general rule that no man should come into the presence of God without a gift holds in all ages; see Ex. 23 15 34 20 Dt. 16 16, Ecclus. 35 4 M. Ḥăgīgāh 1 1. Gifts to God were made with the same variety of motive as to man. Theophrastus names three: homage, gratitude, and need (ἢ γὰρ διὰ τιμὴν ἢ διὰ χάριν ἢ διὰ χρείαν τῶν ἀγαθῶν, ap. Porphyry, De abstin. 2 24). Philo distinguishes sacrifices in which men pay to God the honour due to him with no self-regarding motive from those brought for the benefit of the offerer, either that he may obtain good things or be delivered from evils.[2]

41. Sacrifice a gift to God.

The commonest gift to God is something to eat and drink, the flesh of the domestic animals used for food by the Israelites, grain, fruit, oil and wine.[3] The phrase 'food of God' (לחם אלהים), which occurs repeatedly even in comparatively late contexts (see Lev. 21 6 8 17 21 22 25 [H], Ezek. 44 7 cp 16 19; also Lev. 3 11 16 Nu. 28 2 24), shows to what end such offerings were made; cp Dt. 32 38: the gods whom the Israelites worshipped 'eat the fat of their sacrifices and drink the wine of their libations'; see also the protest of Ps. 50 13. Doubtless those who first used the phrase 'food of God' meant it quite literally (see the end of the third tablet of the Babylonian Cosmogonic Epic), though observation and reflection may have early led men to draw the distinction which modern peoples in low planes of culture often make between the visible things offered and their subtle essence or 'soul' which the deity extracts for his enjoyment—a conception as literal, though not so crass, as the other. The mode of presentation varies. The shewbread (originally accompanied, doubtless, by wine; see above, § 34*a*) was kept standing continually on a table in the house of Yahwè (1 S. 21 6 Ex. 25 30 Lev. 24 5-9); in animal sacrifices certain parts—in the holocaust all the flesh—of the victim were consumed by fire upon the altar, as were also sacrificial cakes of various kinds and unbaked dough; other offerings, as the firstfruits, were set down before the altar with a dedicatory formula (Dt. 26 4-10), or 'waved'; that is, with one of those fictions so common in ritual, in make-believe thrown upon the fire.

The custom of burning the offerings to God upon a sacrificial fire seems to have been adopted by the Israelites after their settlement in Canaan, from the older inhabitants (see above, § 12), probably without much inquiry or reflection about the significance of the new mode or the reason for it. The verb which is commonly used, however (ḳiṭṭēr, see above, § 11), implies that the object was not so much to consume by fire as to make a savoury smoke (see INCENSE, § 1 and n. 1). In this fragrant smoke, as it arises, the finer essence of the gift, etherealised, is conveyed to the deity.[4] This is manifestly an advance upon the setting before God of food and drink just as the worshippers use them.

[1] See above, §§ 11, 24. Cp also in NT, Mt. 5 23 f. 8 4 23 18 f. (δῶρον).

The offering by fire (iššeh, אִשֶּׁה) produces a 'soothing—that is, an agreeable—odour' (rēaḥ nīḥōaḥ, רֵיחַ נִיחֹחַ, Gen. 8 21, J; often in the ritual laws). Yahwè 'smells' this odour, and is appeased or gratified by it (Gen. 8 21 1 S. 26 19); when he is angry he will not enjoy the smell of it, that is, he rejects the sacrifice (Lev. 26 31 Am. 5 21). The burning of aromatic gums and spices is a later refinement (see INCENSE, § 3); the ideas which prompt it are the same.[1]

42. Sacrificial feasts.

All common private sacrifices (zěbaḥ, šělāmīm, tōdāh), whether obligatory or voluntary, were accompanied by a feast, in which the offerer participated with his family, neighbours, and guests.[2] Since these feasts were held 'before Yahwè,' at the holy place, after God had received his portion, it is a natural surmise that a meal in which God and men join is an essential feature of ordinary sacrifice, and that the hospitality of table communion is a pledge and bond of friendship between God and his worshippers as it is among men, a bond closer than that which is established by the acceptance of a gift. It must be admitted, however, that this conception of the nature and efficacy of sacrifice is nowhere distinctly expressed in the OT, and it is difficult to say how clearly it was present in the consciousness of Israelite worshippers.[3] Much less do our sources throw any light upon the origin of such a conception. The scholars who contend that the sacrificial meal was primitively not a mere hospitable fellowship but sacramental communion in the divine life of a totem animal, do not maintain that the Israelites in OT times regarded their sacrifices in any such way; the most that would be claimed is that certain survivals in the cultus and superstitions without it point to this as the original character and significance of the sacrificial feast.

It is clear, however, that whether the feast at the sanctuary was conceived of as a table-companionship of God and men or not, it must actually have strengthened the bond of religion by the sense of God's presence and friendliness.

43. Blood of victim.

Our investigation in the first part of this article of the history of Israelite sacrifices and of the ritual has shown that from first to last the utmost importance attaches to the disposition of the victim's blood. Indeed, it may be said that this is the one universal and indispensable constituent of sacrifice. When Saul's victorious followers rushed upon the spoil of the Philistines and began to slay cattle and eat them, the king had a great stone rolled up, and commanded that they should slaughter there, and not sin against Yahwè by eating 'with the blood,' that is the flesh of animals whose blood had not been poured out at a sacrificial stone or altar (1 S. 14 32-34); cp Lev. 17 3 ff. (see LEVITICUS, § 15). We have seen that in Arab sacrifice also the pouring of the blood upon the sacred stone or anointing of it with blood was the essential rite. This use of sacrificial blood is older than the offering of part of the victim by fire, and is the necessary antecedent of the feast, its religious consecration. The offering or application of the blood cannot very well be regarded as a gift to God, or as a mere incident in the preparation for a communion meal. It is, indeed, plain in the OT itself that the ideas and beliefs that are connected with the use of sacrificial blood belong to a different and a more primitive circle of ideas.

In the application of blood to the doorposts and lintels of a house to prevent 'the DESTROYER' (q.v.) from entering to slay the inmates (see above, § 7) we have an instance of the belief that the blood of a victim serves as a protection against disease and death; that is, in primitive apprehension, against the spirits which cause these evils. To the same end the modern Arab rubs the blood of a sacrifice upon his tent-ropes, or smears it upon his camels (Doughty, Ar. Des. 1 499). It is said that in an outbreak of cholera at Hamath in 1875 Christians procured blood from the slaughter-house and made with it a cross on the door of every room in their houses (Curtiss, Primitive Semitic Religion To-day, 197 f., cp 181, 189 f.). With the same motive sacrificial blood is applied to sick persons or animals—the same power which averts evil can expel it. The use of blood in 'purifications' is similar. The leper whom the priest's inspection proves to be free from the disease is sprinkled with water mingled with the blood of a bird,[1] while another bird after being dipped in the bloody water is allowed to fly away.[2] In the later rite blood is applied to the man's ear, hand, and foot. It is not improbable that in other purifications the blood was primitively applied to the person to be cleansed, rather than to the altar only, as in the actual ritual of the 'sin offering.' The efficacy of blood in removing uncleanness is exemplified also in ceremonies of dedication for the temple or altar, and for their periodical purification from accidental and unknown defilement, as well as in the consecration of priests;[3] the removal of 'uncleanness' and the establishment or restoration of 'holiness' are effected by the same means.

Different from these uses of blood as a means of averting or removing disease and defilement is the disposition made of it in ordinary sacrifice, where it is poured, splashed, or smeared upon the sacrificial stone (maṣṣēbāh, altar).[4] The significance of this rite seems to be that by it the sacrifice is not only brought immediately to the attention of the deity to whom it is offered, but—at least in earlier conception—physically conveyed to him; in Arab sacrifice nothing else is made his. Covenant ceremonies like that in Ex. 24 4-8, in which the blood is applied both to the altar and to the people—that is, to the two contracting parties, as in blood covenants between men—are also to be noted. The profane use of blood is stringently prohibited; to taste blood, or flesh with blood in it, is one of the worst and most dangerous things a man can do. Domestic animals were in old times slaughtered at the sacrificial stone and the blood poured out there; after the abolition of the high places it must be allowed to drain into the ground, as that of beasts killed in hunting had previously been. The blood of some species of sacrifice made taboo everything it touched.

The common root of these diverse uses and restrictions is the almost universal belief that blood is a fluid in which inheres mysterious potency, no less dangerous when misused than efficacious when properly employed. In the outpouring of the blood at the sacrificial stone we may perhaps recognise the feeling that this is the safest disposition of it, as well as the belief of a somewhat more developed theology that it belongs to the deity of right. What makes the blood so powerful for good or ill is that the life is in it; the theory of Lev. 17 11 is based on a fact of the simplest observation.

Many of the practices that have been noted above manifestly originated in an animistic nature religion, in which alone they have meaning. In the national religion of Israel they become part of the worship of Yahwè or of the custom of the people under his sanction. This connection logically involves a change of apprehension: the rites are not efficacious by the inherent potency of the blood or the virtue of the operation, but as the means which God has appointed.[1] The more positive the conception of religion becomes, the less motive there is to seek any other explanation of such practices than that God has commanded them. If, finally, the irrationality of such ceremonies comes to be felt, and their incongruity with spiritual religion, allegory and symbolism will find some profound significance in them. Yet the ignorant multitude will doubtless continue to have faith in the virtue of the ceremony itself, and to understand better than their teachers its true import, because the old animism is still a reality to them.

A corresponding change is wrought in the conception of 'uncleanness.' Whereas originally it was a physical thing whose evil was in itself, it becomes in the national religion a pollution offensive to Yahwè; it is incompatible with his holiness and the holiness which he demands of all that approach him; its consequences are not only natural but penal; it requires to be not merely purged but expiated. Uncleanness is in this light a moral wrong, and involves guilt. On the other hand, a not inconsiderable class of what we regard as moral offences were included in the category of taboos requiring purifications. We have difficulty in realising that guilt was believed to have the same physically contagious quality as uncleanness—one man who had touched ḥērem (חרם) could infect and bring defeat upon a whole army (Josh. 7). Almost equally strange to us is the notion that guilt, like uncleanness, can be contracted without knowledge and intention; and that the first intimation a man may have that he has offended God is that he suffers the consequences (āšam), with its converse, that misfortune is the evidence that he has offended without knowing how. These are things, however, which must be kept in mind if we are to understand the piacular aspects of Israelite sacrifices.

44. Propitiation and expiation. A man who has offended God may seek to propitiate him by a gift, as he might an earthly ruler; so David in the time of plague offers burnt offerings in the threshing floor of Araunah (2 S. 24 18-25). More frequently, perhaps, he made a vow that if God's anger under which he was suffering were withdrawn, he would make him a specified sacrifice, either holocaust or peace offering,[2] or both together, with such and such victims. This was probably in all periods the most numerous class of votive offerings. The same means by which man in prosperity sought the continuance and increase of God's favour were employed to recover it when in any way it had been lost.

The special piacula called sin offerings have a very limited range of employment (see above, § 28*a*). They are prescribed chiefly for unintentional ceremonial faults or as purifications; the trespass offering is even more narrowly restricted (above, § 27). The great expiation for the whole people, in later times at least, was the scape-goat; not any form of sacrifice.

Sacrifices offered to propitiate the offended deity require no peculiar rites; the outpouring of the blood, the burning of the fat or of the holocaust, are precisely the same as when these species of sacrifice are made, say, in gratitude for the signal goodness of God. The blood of the sin offering is smeared upon the horns of the altar instead of being splashed against its corners; but whatever the origin of this difference may be,[3] we may, in view of the whole character of the ḥaṭṭāth, confidently affirm that it is not a purposed heightening of the application.

In the discussion of Hebrew ideas concerning the effect and operation of sacrifice the meaning of the verb kipper with its cognate words and synonyms has filled a large place; and, by a fault of method which has been fruitful of error in the study of the OT, the investigation has frequently set out from etymological assumptions instead of from the plain facts of usage.

45. Effect of sacrifice: terms.

Kōpher, a word of jural associations, is the means—payment, gift, bribe—by which a man buys himself off from the consequences of his deed: see Ex. 21 30 (=a ransom for his life), Nu. 35 31-33 Prov. 6 35 13 8 Job 33 24 Am. 5 12 1 S. 12 3 (bribe; cp Is. 47 11); Ex. 30 12 (head money). The verb kipper (denominative use of the intensive stem) means to make satisfaction by such means; see especially 2 S. 21 3 Gen. 32 20 [21]. Since the object is to avert the consequences of misdoing, the verb often signifies to seek or procure remission, without regard to a material satisfaction, to propitiate; thus Ex. 32 30 (Moses' intercession with God for forgiveness of the people's sin), cp 2 Ch. 30 18. The passives regularly mean 'be forgiven,' e.g., Is. 22 14 1 S. 3 14 Dt. 21 8; and conversely the active, frequently, 'forgive,' e.g., Ezek. 16 63 Jer. 18 23. With these senses and uses in common life and religion the uses which we should call specifically ritual connect themselves. Offences against God are not confined to moral wrong-doing; the infringement—even unwitting—of ceremonial rules or of the many laws concerning 'uncleanness' may have dire consequences unless expiated. The defilement may be contracted by things as well as by persons, and these also require to be purged in a similar way; in the consecration of a new altar it is necessary to 'remove its sin,' to 'expiate' (kipper) the altar (Ezek. 43 20 26);[1] the semi-annual purification of the temple is a removal of the sin of the sanctuary, an expiation of the house (Ezek. 45 20); cp Ex. 29 36 f. Lev. 8 15 16 16 24. The sacrifices or rites, of whatever nature, by which the consequences of unwitting or inadvertent invasion of the sphere of 'holiness' are nullified are expiatory, and the verb kipper is the technical term for their effect. Other verbs are frequently joined with it, especially ḥiṭṭā, חִטֵּא (privative), 'remove sin' (of things), ṭihar, טִהַר, 'make pure or clean' (of things and persons), ḳiddaš, קִדֵּשׁ, 'make holy,' which is the positive counterpart of the preceding terms.

The word kipper is not so common in old tōrōth as might be expected. It occurs with especial frequency in the old laws for the trespass offering in Lev. 5 and the supplements to them, the usual formula, standing after the directions for the sacrifice, being, 'and the priest shall make propitiation (כפר) in his behalf (על), and he shall be forgiven' (see Lev. 5 6 10*b* 13 16 18 6 7 [5 26] 7 7 19 22 Nu. 5 8); also in the purification of the leper (Lev. 14 18-20, cp 29 31 53), the Nazirite defiled by death (Nu. 6 11), purification after childbirth, gonorrhœa, menorrhagia (Lev. 12 7 f. 15 15 30); further, in the sin offering of the congregation or an individual for an inadvertent omission (Nu. 15 25 28, cp Lev. 4 20 26 31 35), and in the several strata of the ritual of the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16). In most of these passages, where the priest is subject, kipper (ἐξιλάσκομαι), 'make propitiation,' might equally well be translated, 'make intercession,' as in Vg. (orare, rogare, deprecari, etc.), by Saadia (istaghfara, 'beseech forgiveness'), and others.

The propitiatory or expiatory effect of sacrifice is not restricted to any particular species or class, though specific offences have prescribed piacula, not only trespass offerings and sin offerings, but also the private burnt offering (Lev. 1 4), and even peace offerings and oblations 'atone'; the whole public cultus is a means of propitiating God and obtaining remission for sin and uncleanness (Ezek. 45 15 17). Nor is the operation of propitiatory sacrifice centred exclusively, as has often been contended, in one part of the ritual, the shedding and application of the victim's blood: it is only in certain peculiar purifications that this is really the case; elsewhere the very formulation of the laws shows that the whole ceremony has atoning value (see, e.g., Lev. 4 26 31 35 5 10 13, etc.). The sin offering of the pauper, which is only a little meal, is as effectual as the bloody sacrifices of his more prosperous fellows.

The term kipper is used in relation to other than sacrificial expiations; thus when a plague broke out, Aaron went among the people with a censer of burning incense, and made expiation for the people (ויכפר על העם), and the plague was stayed (Nu. 16 46 f. [17 11 f.]); the slaughter of a guilty man by Phinehas made expiation for the Israelites (Nu. 25 13); murder profanes the land, no blood-wite (kōpher) shall be taken for it, 'the blood which has been shed shall not be expiated save by the blood of him that shed it' (Nu. 35 32 f.); an offering of

[1] The constant tendency is to assimilate ceremonies of protection or purification to the ritual of sacrifice to God.

[2] Neither sin offering nor trespass offering could be vowed.

[3] If a conjecture may be allowed, we may surmise that the presence of the polluted man requires a purification of the altar; or that the blood which in the primitive rite was applied to the person of the man to be cleansed has in the cult been transferred to the altar.

jewelry from the spoils of war serves 'to make expiation for our lives' (Nu. 31 50); cp also Nu. 8 19 Lev. 10 16 ff. 14 18 ff. 16 10.

Whether the primary meaning of the root כפר in Hebrew was 'cover up,' as in Arabic, or 'wipe, wipe off,' as in Syriac, we need not here inquire, inasmuch as it is not used in the OT in a physical sense at all, or with any reminiscent consciousness of such a sense. It is of more moment that the same verb is used in Assyrian of ritual purifications or expiations for persons and things, performed by the ašipu-priest.[1] Cp RITUAL, § 8.

On kappōreth, see MERCY SEAT.

One passage only seems to contain a more explicit theory of expiation by blood. Lev. 17 11 (R_P) gives as 46. Theory of blood atonement.

a motive for the oft-repeated prohibition of eating blood: For the life of the body is in the blood, and I have given it to you to use upon the altar to make expiation for yourselves; for the blood makes expiation by virtue of the life [in it];[2] cp v. 14. That the life or soul of the animal is in the blood, or, shortly said, the blood is the soul (cp Gen. 9 4 Dt. 12 23 Lev. 17 14), gives it the mysterious potency which is the ground both of the prohibition and of the piacular efficacy of blood (see above, § 43). The author of Lev. 17 11 merely says explicitly what is implied in the use of blood in rites of purification and expiation; it is not as a fluid like water or oil or wine that it is efficacious, but by virtue of its inherent life.[3] This beginning of reflection on the operation of sacrifice is interesting because it is reflection; it also truly expresses the conception which underlies the rites. We should err, however, if we sought in it the profounder idea of the substitution of the victim's life for the sinner's which is suggested by the Greek translation, τὸ γὰρ αἷμα αὐτοῦ ἀντὶ τῆς ψυχῆς ἐξιλάσεται, or perhaps even that the offering of a life to God is the essential thing in sacrifice.[4]

There is no doubt that the Israelites in all ages firmly believed in the efficaciousness of sacrifice to preserve and restore the favour of Yahwè. In times of prosperity they acknowledged his goodness and besought its continuance by sacrifice; in times of distress they multiplied sacrifices to appease him and make him again propitious. The worship of God by sacrifice and offering was, indeed, the central thing in their religion, we might almost say was their religion. Its rites, as they had been received from their forefathers, they believed—long before the age of the written law books—to have been ordained and sanctioned by Yahwè himself; the experience of generations had shown that he honoured the faithful observance of them; how should they not have confidence in them? That this confidence was often the sincere and earnest faith of godfearing men is beyond question; but bad men also confided in sacrifice as an effective means of placating God, and persuading him to wink at their unrighteous deeds, just as a gift might serve to turn aside the anger of a king, or to corrupt a judge. This confidence in the efficacy of sacrifice involved an immoral idea of God and of religion; it was, indeed, the very stronghold of these false conceptions. Against it, therefore, the prophets direct their attack.

The prophets of the eighth century not only denounce the abuses and corruptions of the worship at the temples and high places—the drunken revelry, the consecrated prostitution, the greed of the priests and their perversion of the tōrāh; they deny the efficacy of sacrifice altogether. What

3 See above, § 43. It may be recalled that in the temple pains were taken, by stirring it, to keep the blood from coagulating before it was brought to the altar.

4 No such theory appears in later Jewish thought.

God requires of men is not gifts and offerings but faithfulness and obedience, not cult but conduct. This was the necessary consequence of their idea of God and of religion. Yahwè is a righteous God; that is to say, his character is perfectly moral; being such, by his very nature he demands righteousness of his people, and can accept nothing in lieu of it. The sphere of righteousness is not ritual and ceremonial but social and political; it means truth, integrity, justice, goodness to fellow-men, in all the relations of life. The demand of righteousness is not something aside from religion, is not a minor part of religion; it is its fundamental law, its sum and substance. The sacrifices of unrighteous men are an insult to God, because they imply that he is like themselves. They deceive themselves fatally when they think that they can buy his favour or his forgiveness. And where there is the character in which he delights, there is the pure religion and undefiled which has no need of sacrifice. The utterances of the prophets are too familiar to need more than the briefest reference here; see Am. 4 4 5 21 ff. Hos. 4 8 13 5 6 8 11 ff. 14 3 f. Is. 1 11 ff. 22 12 f. 28 7 f. Jer. 6 20 7 21 ff., etc.

The substance of the prophetic conception of religion is summed up for all time in Mic. 6 6-8: Wherewith shall I approach Yahwè; bow to the exalted God? Shall I approach him with burnt offerings and yearling calves? Will Yahwè accept thousands of rams, myriad streams of oil? Shall I give my firstborn for my transgression, the child of my body for my own sin? He has told thee, O man; what is good, and what doth Yahwè seek of thee, save to practise justice and to love charity and to walk in humility with thy God?

It is not probable that the prophets distinctly entertained the ideal of a religion without a cultus—a purely spiritual worship; sacrifice may well have seemed to them the natural expression of homage and gratitude. But they denied with all possible emphasis that it had any value to God or any efficacy with him; he had not appointed it; his law was concerned with quite different things (Jer. 7 22 f.).

The deuteronomic reform attempted to cut off the abuses of the worship at the high places against which the prophets had inveighed by suppressing the high places themselves; and made by consequence considerable changes in the old customs, the most serious of which was that which permitted domestic animals to be slaughtered for food without any sacrificial rites; but, so far from detracting from the religious importance of sacrifice, Dt. greatly enhanced it by incorporating its ordinances in a law book of professedly Mosaic origin, divine sanction, and national authority. Ezekiel lays out a detailed plan for the sacrificial cultus of the restoration; Haggai and Zechariah zealously urge the rebuilding of the temple, in the conviction that the prosperity of the community depends upon it. The collections of tōrōth made or edited in the sixth and following centuries are largely occupied with ritual prescriptions.

It is manifest that in the Persian and Greek periods sacrifice held both in the actual worship and in the estimation of the people the same place in religion that it had had under the kings; see, e.g., Mal. 1 7 ff. 3 3 f. 8 ff. Joel 1 9 13 2 14 Dan. 8 11 ff., cp 11 31 12 11 Ecclus. 50 11 ff. 1 Macc. 4 42 ff., etc.

In the Psalms the religious spirit of sacrifice finds frequent and pious expression; e.g., 26 6 f. 27 6 66 13-15 107 22. The teaching of the prophets was, however, not forgotten: God has no delight in sacrifice and offering; what he requires is to do his will with delight and have his law in the heart, etc. (Ps. 40 6 ff.); the fault God finds with Israel is not about their sacrifices and continual burnt offerings; how absurd to imagine that he to whom belongs the world and all that is therein needs their beasts, or that he eats the flesh of bulls and drinks the blood of goats! (Ps. 50 7 ff.); he desires not sacrifice, nor is he pleased with burnt offering; the sacrifices of God are a broken spirit, a broken and contrite heart God does not spurn—repentance, not expiation (Ps. 51 16 f., cp 7 f.). The Proverbs teach that to practise uprightness and justice is preferred by God to sacrifice (Prov. 21 3; cp 1 S. 15 22); the sacrifice of wicked men is the abomination of Yahwè, but the prayer of the upright is well-pleasing to him (Prov. 15 8, cp 21 27; see also 16 6).

The teachings of the wise concerning sacrifice in the second century B.C. are well illustrated by Jesus son of Sirach.

50. Sirach; Philo.

He describes with enthusiasm the splendour of the temple service when the high priest Simon offers sacrifice (50 11 ff.), and evidently has much interest in priesthood and cultus (cp 7 31 45 14 f.). But his religious estimate of sacrifice is thoroughly ethical.

The long passage, 34 18-35 [31 21-32], is of high importance throughout. The sacrifices of the wicked are a mockery of God; he will not accept them, nor forgive men's sins for the multitude of their sacrifices (34 19); it is vain to try to bribe God by offerings (cp Jubilees 5 16), for he will not accept them, or to rely on an unrighteous sacrifice, for the Lord is an impartial judge (35 12 ff.); offerings made of goods wrung by extortion from the poor are like murder (34 20-22, cp 18). A man who fasts for his sins and then repeats them is as one who, after performing his ablution to cleanse him from contact with a dead body, goes and touches it again; who will hear his prayer, or what profit is there in his humiliation? (34 25 f.). Obedience to God and love to men take the place of sacrifice; he who observes the law makes many offerings; he who gives heed to the commandments sacrifices a peace offering. He who shows kindness offers fine flour; and he that practises charity sacrifices a thank-offering.[1] The acceptance of God is secured by avoiding wickedness, and forgiveness by abstaining from unrighteousness (35 1 ff.). Literal sacrifices are to be brought when men visit the temple, because they are enjoined by the commandment (v. 5), not because they have a moral or religious value in themselves. But the character and disposition of the worshipper is still the essential thing (v. 8 ff.). The same lessons are emphasised elsewhere in the book; see, e.g., 7 8 ff.

For a representative of Hellenistic Judaism we turn to Philo. It must suffice to quote a single passage.

There are those who think that slaughtering bulls is religiousness, and who set apart for sacrifice—inexpiable sinners that they are!—a portion of what they have got by theft or breach of trust or robbery, in order to escape punishment for their misdeeds. To such I would say: The tribunal of God is incorruptible; those who have a guilty conscience he turns away from, even if they offer a hundred bulls every day; but the blameless, even if they bring no sacrifice at all, he receives. For God delights in fireless altars surrounded by the chorus of virtues, not in altars blazing with a great fire that the impious sacrifices of unhallowed men (ἀνιέρων ἄθυτοι θυσίαι) have set aflame, which do but remind him of the ignorance and deep guilt of each who so offers (De plantat. Noe, ii. § 25, 1 345 Mangey). See also Vit. Mos. iii. § 10, 2 151; and on the character of the worshipper, especially De vict. § 5, 2 241; De sacrificantibus, § 1 ff.; De merc. meretr. § 1, 2 264 f., Frag. 34, etc.

The superiority of uprightness and goodness to sacrifice is not infrequently emphasised by Palestinian rabbis; Hos. 6 6 ('I desire mercy and not sacrifice,' cp Mt. 9 13 12 7) 10 12 Mic. 6 8 Prov. 21 3 are quoted in proof.

51. Schools of law: efficacy of sacrifice.

That God has regard, not to the magnitude and costliness of the offering but to the spirit of the worshipper, is authoritatively declared.

Without dwelling longer on this aspect of their teaching, we pass directly to the inquiry, What was taught in Palestinian schools of the first and second Christian centuries, or defined by their authority concerning—a, the efficacy of sacrifice or of particular sacrifices; b, the religious and moral conditions of their efficacy (§ 52); and c, the mode of their operation (§ 53)?

(a) The effect of sacrifice is expressed, as in the Pentateuch, by the verb kipper (see above, § 45), 'make propitiation, expiation'; in translating passages in which it occurs we shall render as consistently as possible 'atone.' The general principle is that all private sacrifices atone, except peace offerings (including thank offerings), with which no confession of sin is made.[2] Sin offerings and prescribed trespass offerings atone in the specific cases for which they are appointed in the law; for what kinds of offence the burnt offering atones (Lev. 1 4) is discussed in Tos. Mĕnāḥōth 10 12.[1] In the OT all sacra publica are sometimes regarded as atoning (propitiatory); so Ezek. 45 15 17 (above, § 45). Piacular value attached, however, especially to the sin offerings—goats—at the new moons and feasts, and on the Day of Atonement (see above, § 37). In M. Shĕbū'ōth 1 2-5 the things for which these sacrifices respectively atoned are classified. It would be profitless to enumerate them here; it must suffice to say that they are without exception cases of ignorant or unwitting intrusion of the 'unclean' into the sphere of 'holiness,' as when a man ceremonially unclean, in ignorance of the fact, enters the precincts of the temple, or eats 'holy' food without knowing that he was unclean or that the food was holy, and the like (כלן באין לכפר על טמאת מקדש וקדשיו, M. Shĕb. 1 4 end, cp 1 5 end). Even the special sin offering of the Day of Atonement, whose blood is brought into the adytum of the temple, atones for the same kind of offences, but for such as were committed presumptuously; cp Lev. 16 16 with v. 19. 'For the rest of the transgressions defined in the law, venial or heinous, presumptuous or inadvertent, conscious or unconscious, of omission or commission, including sins the penalty of which is excision from the people [by God] or death by the sentence of a court, the scapegoat atones' (ib. 16, end). This is the authoritative statement, based upon Lev. 16 21 f. Another authoritative formulation of the doctrine of sacrifice is found in M. Yōmā 8 8 f.: Sin offering and prescribed trespass offering atone;[2] death and the Day of Atonement atone if accompanied by repentance; repentance (by itself) atones for venial sins whether of omission or of commission, and in the case of heinous sins it suspends the punishment till the Day of Atonement comes around and atones. (9) If a man says, 'I will sin and repent over and over again,' no opportunity of effectual repentance is given him; if he says, 'I will sin and the Day of Atonement will atone,' the Day of Atonement does not atone for him. Transgressions which are between a man and God, the Day of Atonement atones; transgressions that are between a man and his fellows, the Day of Atonement does not atone until he has propitiated the injured party (cp Jer. Yōmā, 39 b, ed. Sitomir).

Somewhat fuller, and fortified by biblical proof texts, is the teaching of R. Ishmael concerning four kinds of sins and their atonement, which, in slightly varying forms, is repeated in many places, and may be regarded as containing the generally accepted doctrine; see Tos. Yōm Kippūrīm 5 6 [4 6]; Yōmā 86*a*; Jer. Yōmā 45*b*; Jer. Shĕbū'ōth 33*b*; Jer. Sanhedrīn 27*c*; Mekiltā, Yithro, § 7 (76*a*, Weiss), etc. Ishmael recognises the chastisements of God as expiating sin in whole or in part; see below, § 52.

(b) The Mishna and R. Ishmael include repentance among the things which obtain the remission of sins, and bring us naturally to the question whether, in general, repentance is requisite to the efficacy of piacular sacrifices, or whether they expiate sin ex opere operato, without regard to the penitence of the subject.

The latter theory was held by some eminent authorities, among them, if he be rightly understood, by R. Judah the patriarch, who maintained that the great expiation of the Day of Atonement (the scapegoat) atoned for the sins of all Israelites who had not deliberately put themselves outside its effects by breaking with the religion of their people,[3] independently of anything in the conduct or disposition of man himself, a view which might find support in a literal interpretation of Lev. 16 22. In Jer. Yōmā 8 7, where this utterance of Rabbi is recorded, it is asked with surprise whether he can have meant that repentance is not essential, and it is explained that he held that in this respect the Day of Atonement was like death, of which also he taught—contrary to the general opinion—that it expiates sin even without repentance.[1] The prevailing view, however, was that repentance is the conditio sine qua non of expiation and the forgiveness of sins, as is laid down in the Mishna quoted above (M. Yōmā 8 8), and even more sweepingly in Tos. Yōm Kippūrīm 5 9 [4 9]: Sin offering and trespass offering and death and the Day of Atonement none of them atone unless accompanied by repentance; for it is said, 'Only' (אך, Lev. 23 27); if a man repent, atonement is made for him (מתכפר לו—i.e., he is forgiven), but if not no atonement is made for him. R. Eleazar quoted, 'And clearing' (ונקה, Ex. 34 7); he clears those who repent, but not those who do not repent. R. Judah (ben 'Ilai) taught: Death and the Day of Atonement atone, with repentance; repentance atones with death, and the day of death is like repentance (another reading is, 'by means of repentance'). See also Yōmā 85*b*, and esp. 86*a*. In accordance with this doctrine the importance of repentance and its effects are much dwelt upon: see especially Yōmā 86*a b*, a collection of eulogiums on repentance from the lips of various teachers.

A fine saying may be quoted from Jer. Makkōth 2 6 (also Pesiktā, Shūbāh, 158*b*): Men asked philosophy (חכמה), What is the consequence of sin? It answered: Evil pursueth sinners (Prov. 13 21). They asked prophecy. It answered: The soul that sinneth it shall die (Ezek. 18 4). They asked the law. It answered: Let him bring a trespass offering and it shall be forgiven him (ויתכפר לו). They asked God, and he answered: Let him repent (יעשה תשובה), and it shall be forgiven him.

The nature of repentance is well defined. Who is a truly repentant man? it is asked. One, the reply is, who, having sinned and repented, does not yield to the same temptation again (Yōmā 86*b*). Genuine repentance is a resolute turning from sin; a man who commits a sin, and confesses it, but does not turn from it, is like a man who holds some crawling vermin (שרץ) in his hand; though he were to bathe in all the waters in the world it would avail him nothing; but if he throw it away, a bath of forty sĕāhs suffices to make him clean, for it is said, He who confesses and forsakes his transgressions shall obtain mercy (Prov. 28 13, Ta'ănīth 16*a*; cp Philo, De vict. § 11, 2 247 Mangey). The ethical distinction is clearly made between the repentance that springs from love to God and the counterfeit of it which is only the expression of fear inspired by chastisement (Yōmā 86*a b*).

For a wrong done to a fellow-man, we have seen that neither repentance nor the great expiation of the Day of Atonement avail to obtain of God remission, until the offender has propitiated the injured party (M. Yōmā 8 9, above). This propitiation includes the reparation of the material injury, the confession of wrongdoing and sorrow, and the obtaining of forgiveness (cp Mt. 5 23 f.). If forgiveness be not granted at the first seeking, the penitent must return with other members of the community, and in their presence confess his fault and beseech pardon (Jer. Yōmā 8 8).[2]

An expiatory character is attributed to suffering, regarded as the chastisement of God; whence R. 'Aḳībā taught that a man should praise God not merely in chastisement but for it, since through it his sins are atoned for (cp 1 Cor. 11 32); and R. Eleazar ben Jacob quoted: 'Whom the Lord loveth he correcteth, even as a father the son in whom he delighteth' (Prov. 3 12, cp Heb. 12 6). Death in a state of penitence also expiates sin (M. Yōmā 8 8); or, in the more detailed exposition of R. Ishmael, death finally wipes out (מרק) the remainder of guilt which, in certain great sins, neither repentance nor the piacula of the Day of Atonement nor the chastisements of this life suffice wholly to atone for. Hence, for example, a criminal sentenced to death was exhorted to make a penitent's confession; only then will his death be an expiation for all his crimes.

The sufferings, and especially the death, of righteous men atone for the sins of others. Is. 53 12 is interpreted of Moses, who 'poured out his soul unto death (Ex. 32 32) and was numbered with the transgressors (the generation that died in the wilderness) and bare the sin of many' that he might atone for the sin of the golden calf (Sōṭāh 14*a*). Ezekiel suffered 'that he might wipe out the transgressions of Israel' (Sanhedrīn 39*a*). The general formulation of the doctrine is, 'the death of the righteous makes atonement' (Mō'ēd ḳāṭān 28*a*, etc.); cp 4 Macc. 6 27–29 17 22.

(c) The only explicit answer to the question how sacrifice expiates in the Jewish authorities of our period is that of Lev. 17 11 (see above, § 46); what atones in sacrifice is the blood (Siphrā on Lev. l.c., cp Yōmā 5*a*, Zĕbāḥīm 6*a*). The question, How has the blood this efficacy? is not raised; and the speculations to which Lev. 17 11 seems to invite by its association of the blood with the life, and in which Christian theology has been prolific, appear not to have been started.[1] The theory that the victim's life is put in place of the owner's is nowhere hinted at, perhaps because the Jewish doctors understood better than our theologians what sin offerings and trespass offerings were, and what they were for. Nor is there any discussion of the mode in which the blood of sacrifice operates expiation. The verb kipper and its derivatives are used, precisely as in the OT, in the sense, 'make propitiation, expiation, procure remission,' without recourse to etymology and imagined 'primary meanings.' Hence we hear nothing about the 'covering' of the sin or the sinner, or the 'wiping off'—or 'out'—of guilt.[2] The ancient etymological midrash attaches itself not to the verb kipper but to the noun 'lamb.' The daily morning and evening holocaust was a lamb (kĕbeś); the school of Shammai said: It 'tramples down' (kābaš) the sins of Israel (cp Mic. 6 9); the school of Hillel replied: What is trampled down comes up again; sacrifice 'washes' (כִּבֵּס, kibbes) Israel free from sin (Pesiḳtā, ed. Buber, 61*b*).

53. How does sacrifice expiate?

Outside the ritual sphere—in the ethical sphere of religion, that is—it is repentance that atones; it is the condition of God's forgiveness; and the ultimate ground of forgiveness is God's love; love covereth all transgressions (Prov. 10 12), for God loves Israel (Wayyiḳrā R. c. 7 begin.). As a motive, the merits of the forefathers are often referred to. See also, on the nature of repentance and its relation to God's forgiveness, the fine passage in Philo, De exsecrationibus, § 8 f.

It does not fall within the scope of the present article to describe or discuss later theories of the nature and effect of sacrifice, such as the poena vicaria, or the sacramental theory, further than to say, as the result of the whole preceding investigation, that they are not derived from the OT but imported into it.

IV. SACRIFICE IN NT

It is assumed in the Gospels that Jesus throughout his life observed in the matter of sacrifice, as in other respects, the Jewish law as it was commonly practised in his time. Lk. relates that his mother offered in due time the sacrifice of purification after childbirth prescribed for the poor (Lk. 2 22 ff., cp 39, Lev. 12 2 4 6 8); at the age of twelve he first went with his parents to Jerusalem to the Passover (Lk. 2 41 ff.). He kept the Passover with his disciples the night before

[1] An attempt to harmonise the opinion of Rabbi with the Mishna is made in Yōmā 85*b*.

[2] Cp a corresponding procedure, Mt. 18 15 ff.

[1] Philo, indeed, calls the blood ψυχῆς σπονδή, but pursues the subject no farther.

[2] These senses—unknown to the ancient translators or interpreters—were discovered in the Middle Ages. If either etymology had suggested itself to the Jewish scholars in the Talmudic period it would doubtless have been the latter ('wiping off').

his death (Mk. 14 12 ff. and ||s). The Fourth Gospel tells of several other visits to Jerusalem at the annual feasts (2 13 ff. 5 1 ff. 7 2 ff.). Jesus bids the leper whom he has healed offer the sacrifices appointed in the law for his purification (Mk. 1 44 and ||s, Lev. 14). The injunction to effect the reconciliation of an injured fellow-Israelite before offering sacrifice (Mt. 5 23 f.),[1] supposes the continuance of sacrifice among those who should be his disciples; cp also 23 18 ff. 23. There is in the Gospels no such denunciation of the sacrificial worship of Jesus' contemporaries as we find in the prophets (see above, § 48); the forms of Pharisaic piety which Jesus assails are of a different kind—the ostentatious fasts, almsgiving, and prayers. He quotes Hos. 6 6, 'I desire mercy and not sacrifice' (Mt. 9 13 12 7), as proof that goodness to our fellow-men is of much higher value in the sight of God than offerings to himself; the scribe who recognises that love to God and man is worth more than all burnt offerings and sacrifices is not far from the kingdom of God (Mk. 12 32-34). Such utterances are, however, not infrequent in the words of the scribes themselves. It cannot be said that the teaching of Jesus in this respect differs from that of the Jewish masters of his time,[2] though it may be inferred from his whole attitude that he set far less value on observances of any kind than they did. Mt., indeed, represents him as declaring emphatically that not the minutest particle of the law should cease to be observed 'till all things be accomplished'—i.e., so long as the present order of things lasts (5 17); and as bidding his disciples do and observe all the things that the scribes and Pharisees, as the custodians of the law and successors of the legislator, enjoined (23 1-3); but this is rather the evangelist's attitude than the master's; cp Mk. 7 5 ff. (= Mt. 15 1 ff.).

In the accounts of the last supper Jesus calls the wine 'my covenant blood' (τὸ αἷμά μου τῆς διαθήκης),[3] in obvious allusion to the blood by which the covenant at Sinai was ratified (Ex. 24 6-8). The various additions, 'which is poured out in behalf of many' (Mk.), 'unto remission of sins' (Mt.), bring out the accessory idea of atonement through his blood; cp Mk. 10 45 Mt. 20 28 (see below, § 60). Scholars have often found in the 'new covenant' an implicit abrogation of the old, with all its institutions; it is certain, however, that the early Christians in Palestine saw nothing of the kind in it; they continued to worship in the temple like their fellow-countrymen. The inference is first explicitly drawn by the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews (chap. 10).

55. Paul. According to Acts Paul more than once plans a journey so as to bring him to Jerusalem in season for a feast (18 21 20 16; in the former passage the words are lacking in ℵAB, etc.); he declares in his defence before Felix that he came thither to worship (24 11), to bring charitable gifts to his countrymen and make offerings (προσφοράς, 24 17), and was arrested in the temple in the midst of this pious occupation (v. 18). To give the lie to reports that he persuaded Jews in the provinces to abandon the observance of the law, he consented to assume the cost of sacrifices for the release of four Jewish Christians from the Nazirite's vow (Nu. 6 13 ff.), and, after the usual purifications, accompanied them into the temple (21 20-26), where offering was made for each of them, thus proving that he himself lived in observance of the law (v. 24). That Paul really made a profession so contrary to his own precept and example it is difficult to believe (cp Gal. 2 11 ff.; also ACTS, § 7).

[1] Without this the sacrifice would be of no avail, as the Rabbis taught. See above, § 52.

[2] See above, §§ 50 ff., and Sukkāh 49*b*. To infer from Mk. 12 28-34 that Jesus himself probably offered no sacrifices is unwarranted.

[3] Mk. 14 24 Mt. 26 28, cp Lk. 22 20 1 Cor. 11 25, 'the new covenant in my blood'; cp Jer. 31 31 Heb. 9 15 ff. etc. On the original form of the saying, see EUCHARIST, §§ 1 f.

We have already referred (above, § 42) to the important passage, 1 Cor. 10 18 ff., in which Paul, in warning his readers against heathen sacrificial feasts, argues, as from something that would be understood and conceded by all, that, as among Jews (cp also Heb. 13 10) so also among Gentiles, those who eat the flesh of the sacrifices, sharing it with the altar, become commensals of the God whose altar it is—the sacrificial meal is a communion, just as the Christian eucharist is, in which men partake of the table of the Lord.

Figures drawn from sacrifice—some of them more ingenious than natural—are not infrequent in the Pauline epistles. In Rom. 15 16 Paul describes himself as a priest (λειτουργός) of Jesus Christ to the Gentiles; the ministry of the Gospel is a sacerdotal function (ἱερουργοῦντα τὸ εὐαγγέλιον τοῦ θεοῦ), which he performs in order that the offering (προσφορά) of (consisting of) the Gentiles, may be made acceptable to God, being consecrated by the Holy Spirit. In anticipation of his approaching death he speaks of his blood as a libation poured out upon the sacrifice and priestly ministry of his converts (Phil. 2 17, cp 2 Tim. 4 6); Christians are exhorted to furnish their bodies as a sacrifice, living, holy, well-pleasing to God, their rational worship (Rom. 12 1, cp 1 Pet. 2 5); the contributions of the Philippians to the apostle are 'a gratifying odour,' an acceptable sacrifice, well-pleasing to God (Phil. 4 18). The references to the death of Christ as a sacrifice will be discussed below (§ 57). It is to be noted here only that Paul does not, like the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, explicitly declare that the sacrifices of the law came to an end with the death of Christ. To draw from his silence the inference that his Jewish-Christian opponents themselves no longer regarded sacrifice as binding is most unsafe.

56. Hebrews. The argument of the Epistle to the Hebrews is developed in a running comparison between the sacrifices and priestly ministrations of the old covenant and the work of Christ, to which we shall return in a later paragraph (see § 58). Here we shall touch only upon the author's view of the intent and effect of the sacrifices of the law. Sacrifices and offerings are made for sins (5 1, cp 8 3 9 9).

In the phrase 'gifts and sacrifices' (δῶρά τε καὶ θυσίαι) the words, according to prevailing OT use, correspond to Heb. ḳorbān and minḥāh respectively, and, thus coupled, the δῶρα are by pre-eminence 'sacrifices,' the θυσίαι, 'oblations,' not vice versâ, as NT commentators frequently take them (cp EV 'gifts and sacrifices').

They do not, however, really take away sin or purge the conscience of the sinner; the blood of bulls and goats cannot possibly do that (10 4 11); they serve rather, in their stated recurrence—the author is thinking of the solemn piacula of the Day of Atonement—to bring to mind the sin which they cannot expiate (10 3). The system, indeed, contemplates only what we should call ceremonial faults. The sin offering of the Day of Atonement, whose blood is taken by the high priest into the adytum of the temple, is offered for the unwitting offences of the people (ἀγνοήματα, 9 7; cp IGNORANCE). Sacrifices and offerings cannot restore the worshipper to his integrity in the forum of conscience; they have to do only with such matters as foods and drinks and diverse ablutions[1]—prescriptions of bodily purity imposed till the time comes for making things right (9 9 f.). The blood of goats and bulls, and the ashes of a heifer sprinkling those that have contracted defilement, make them (ceremonially) 'holy,' so that their body is clean; in contrast to the purging of conscience (9 13). The application of blood is a rite of lustration or purification; at the ratification of the covenant Moses sprinkled the law book and the people with the blood of young bulls and goats, 'with water and scarlet wool and hyssop' (9 19);[1] in like manner he sprinked with blood the tent and all the utensils of worship (cp v. 23); according to the law nearly everything is purified with blood, and without outpouring of blood no remission (ἄφεσις) is effected (9 21 f.).[2]

The writer's conception of the expiatory rites of the law thus agrees entirely with the teaching of the Jewish authorities (see above, § 51). For him, however, the system was typical and prophetic of the one real and all-sufficient sacrifice of Christ. When this had been made there was no longer reason or room for the sacrifices of the law (10 18). Henceforth the only sacrifices are praise to God and goodness to men (13 15 f., alluding to Ps. 107 22 116 17 Hos. 14 2 etc.).[3]

57. Death of Christ: Pauline epistles.

That 'Christ died for (ὑπέρ) our sins according to the scriptures' is an article of the common tradition of the Christian faith which Paul delivered to his converts as he had received it from those who were before him (1 Cor. 15 3). By his death men are redeemed, justified, forgiven, reconciled to God; see Rom. 4 25 5 8 f. 8 32 2 Cor. 5 15 Gal. 1 4 1 Thess. 5 10 Col. 1 21 f. Eph. 1 7 Tit. 2 14 etc. The death of Christ, that is, was expiatory; he suffered on the cross, not for his own sins but for those of others, and by the expiation which he thus made they were delivered from the consequences of their transgressions (see further, below, § 60). The idea of expiation is, however, as we have seen, closely associated with sacrifice; one great class of sacrifices, among both Jews and Gentiles, was piacular in motive and intention; and in a looser sense the whole sacrificial worship was often thought of as atoning (see above, § 45). It was natural, therefore, that the death of Christ should be conceived as a sacrifice, or spoken of in sacrificial figures. In Paul, however, this conception is not developed as it is in some of the other NT writings.

In the much-vexed passage, Rom. 3 25, 'whom God set forth as a hilasterion through faith in his blood' (ὃν προέθετο ὁ θεὸς ἱλαστήριον διὰ πίστεως ἐν τῷ αὐτοῦ αἵματι), the interpretation 'atoning sacrifice' (after the analogy of σωτήριον, χαριστήριον, τελεστήριον, etc.) is not entirely certain, though highly probable; the more general 'means of expiation' satisfies the context, and the addition of the words 'in his blood' does not necessarily imply that this means is thought of as sacrificial. Cp MERCY SEAT, § 8.

Even if we translate Rom. 3 25 outright 'an expiatory sacrifice' the expression would still be only a passing metaphor in a context of a different tenor—Christ's death the demonstration of the righteousness of God. Christian theologians, indeed, have been so long accustomed to regard the OT sacrifices from the jural and governmental point of view—that is, in the light of their construction of the atoning work of Christ[4]—that they hardly feel the reference to an expiatory sacrifice here as even a change of figure; but Paul was not a modern theologian.

No greater emphasis is laid on the idea of sacrifice in 1 Cor. 5 7 f., where, in an exhortation to put away evil, its leaven-like working suggests the scrupulous care with which a Jewish house was purged of leaven on the eve of the Passover, and that, again, leads to the thought 'for indeed our Passover is sacrificed, Christ; so let us keep the feast not with the old leaven of malice and wickedness, but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth.'

Evidence of a more pervasive association of Christ's death with sacrifice has been sought in the references to his blood as the ground of the benefits conferred by his death (Rom. 3 25 5 9); the thought of sacrifice is so constantly associated with his death, it is said, that the one word suffices to suggest it. But in view of the infrequency, to say the least, of sacrificial metaphors in the greater epistles, it is doubtful whether αἷμα is not used merely in allusion to Jesus' violent death. Nor is the case clearer in Col. 1 20 Eph. 1 7 2 13; the really noteworthy thing is that the context contains no suggestion of sacrifice either in thought or phrase. The words 'for sin' (περὶ ἁμαρτίας) in Rom. 8 3, are often mechanically translated 'sin offering,' because in Leviticus this phrase is the common rendering of ḥaṭṭāth; even ἁμαρτίαν, 2 Cor. 5 21, has been understood in the same way—the death of Christ specifically a sin offering. The misconception of the nature of the sin offering which underlies this strained interpretation has been commented on above (§ 28 a).[1]

In conclusion, it may be noted as an indication that the idea of expiatory sacrifice was not prominent in Paul's thought of Christ's death, that he nowhere uses the characteristic terms inseparably associated in the OT with these sacrifices, ἱλάσκομαι, ἐξιλάσκομαι, and their derivatives; ἱλαστήριον, Rom. 3 25, is the only word of the family in all the Pauline literature. This group of words is, however, rare in all the NT; even in Hebrews ἱλάσκεσθαι occurs but once; ἱλασμός but twice in the NT (1 Jn. 2 2 4 10).

58. In Hebrews.

For the author of Hebrews the priesthood and sacrificial institutions of the old dispensation are but types and shadows of the heavenly reality that was to come (8 5 10 1, cp 9 9). The main thesis of the book is that the Son, the mediator of the new and better covenant (8 6-13 9 15 etc.), is the true high priest. Now every high priest must have something to offer; this is his constitutive function (8 3); Christ, therefore, brings his sacrifice. The nature and effect of this sacrifice is developed in chaps. 8-10 18, in contrast to the sacrifices of the law,[2] particularly to the sacrifice (Ex. 24 4-8) by which the old covenant was ratified (9 15 ff. 10 29, cp 12 24 13 20),[3] and to the specific piacula of the Day of Atonement, in which the Jewish system culminated.

The Jewish high priest, having human weaknesses (7 28), had first of all to offer a sacrifice for his own sins (7 27 9 7); Christ, the perfect priest, had no such need (7 26 28). In the Mosaic sacrifices was offered the blood of bulls and goats, which could not possibly take away sin (10 4 11), but effected only a purification of the body (9 9 f. 12 f.); Christ entered the holy place of the greater and more perfect sanctuary, that is, heaven itself (9 24), through his own blood, having found an eternal redemption (7 27 9 12 15 10 10). Sacrifices could not relieve men's conscience, but served rather to call sin to mind (9 9 10 1-3); the blood of Christ purges the conscience from dead works to serve the living God (9 14, cp 10 22). They had, therefore, to be perpetually repeated, just because they had no real efficacy either objective or subjective (9 6 10 3 f.); his sacrifice is made once for all, forever perfecting them that are sanctified (7 27 9 12 25 f. 28 10 12 14). The sacrifices of the law, finally, did not open to men a way of access to the holy presence of God (9 8); by the blood of Jesus a new way is made by which they may confidently approach him (10 19 ff.).

The sacrifice of Christ thus not only expiates the sins of the people (ἱλάσκεσθαι, 2 17), but also establishes the new covenant foretold by Jeremiah (31 31 ff.), under which God lays his laws upon men's hearts and inscribes them

[1] The heightening of the rite described in Ex. 24 8 by traits borrowed from Lev. 14 5 ff. (the leper) shows that the author conceives it as a lustration.

[2] Cp the use of the verb in the āšām laws (see Lev. 5 10 16 18, also 4 26 31 34 etc.): καὶ ἐξιλάσεται περὶ αὐτοῦ ὁ ἱερεύς . . . καὶ ἀφεθήσεται αὐτῷ (ונסלח לו). The remission is the consequence of the propitiation made by the priest with the sacrifice.

[3] The Rabbis also taught that the 'praise offering' (tōdāh) was the only sacrifice that would remain in the 'world to come' (cp above, col. 4223 n. 2).

[4] The assertion sometimes made that the Jewish conception of sacrifice was similarly influenced by the idea of divine justice is unsupported.

[1] There are less excusable errors in the books. In Sanday-Headlam, Romans, 193, we are told that 'the ritual of the sin-offering is fully set forth in Lev. iv. The most characteristic feature in it is the sprinkling with blood of the horns of the altar of incense.'

[2] On the author's view of the latter, see above, § 56.

[3] This parallel is suggested in the Gospel accounts of the institution of the Lord's Supper.

on their minds, and no longer remembers their sins and iniquities (10 16 ff., cp 8 8 ff.)—a real remission which makes all other sacrifice useless. Two things are especially noteworthy in the author's treatment of the subject; first, the importance attached to the subjective effect of Christ's blood in purging the conscience of man; and, second, the ultimate end, the creation of a new way of access to God by which men may confidently draw near to him. In these conceptions we see a positive ethical and religious interpretation and valuation of the death of Christ going far beyond the mere sacrificial expiation of sins or forensic justification of the sinner. How the blood of Christ has these effects the writer does not reflect, any more than he or his contemporaries reflected on the mode of operation of the blood of the OT sacrifices.

By the side of sacrificial ideas and terms, such as ῥαντίζειν 9 13 19 21 10 22, καθαρίζειν 1 3 9 14 22, ἁγιάζειν 10 10 14 29, words of different association sometimes occur: λύτρωσις 9 12, ἀπολύτρωσις 9 15, ἀπαλλάσσειν 2 15; but the characteristic Pauline 'justify' (δικαιοῦν) and cognate words and phrases are absent.

The references to the death of Christ in 1 Pet. are in the nature of allusions rather than of doctrinal statement or argument; their phraseology often suggests reminiscences of earlier NT writings. Christ died once for sins, a righteous man for unrighteous men, that he might bring us to God (3 18); he suffered for his followers, leaving them an example (2 21, cp 4 1); persecuted Christians are partakers of Christ's sufferings (4 13, cp 4 1, etc.); he carried their sins in his body on to the cross (2 24)—the whole passage, vv. 21-25, is an application of Is. 53 to Christ; they are redeemed (ἐλυτρώθητε) from the foolish way of life they learned from their fathers by costly blood as of an unblemished unspotted lamb, Christ (1 18 f.); one of the ends of Christians' election is sprinkling with the blood of Christ (1 2). The latter phrase suggests a passage in Heb. (12 24, cp 10 22 9 13 19 21), in which epistle alone the expression occurs. In 1 18 f. it is not improbable that the blameless lamb of Is. 53 7 (cp 9) is in the mind of the writer, who makes such large use of that chapter in 2 21 ff.; for the rest cp Eph. 1 7 ('redemption [ἀπολύτρωσις] through his blood, the remission of our trespasses') Rom. 3 24 f. Heb. 9 12. A direct allusion to the paschal lamb (Ex. 12 5) would probably have been more distinct.

59. 1 Pet.

The references to the sacrificial aspect of the death of Christ in the Fourth Gospel are few and of the slightest kind. The Baptist hails Jesus as the Lamb of God which takes away the sin of the world (1 29), with evident allusion to Is. 53 7, cp 4 f. 11; in 17 19 'in their behalf I hallow myself,' ἁγιάζω is a word of sacrificial associations, whether we refer it to the consecration of the victim or (with greater probability) to the preparation of the priest for his functions. In 1 Jn. the allusions are more frequent; we read not only that Christ laid down his life for us—wherefore we ought to lay down our life for the brethren (3 16)—and that our sins are remitted for his name's sake (2 12), but also that he was manifested that he might take away sin (3 5), that he is a propitiation (ἱλασμός) for our sins and for those of the whole world (2 2 4 10), and that the blood of Jesus cleanses us from every sin (1 7 9). But everywhere such expressions appear as familiar Christian phrases, rather than as part of the distinctive Johannine conception of the salvation in Christ.

60. Johannine writings.

The lamb in the Apocalypse is probably, as in Jn. 1 29, derived from Is. 53; as in 1 Pet., the idea of purchase (ἀγοράζειν, 1 Cor. 6 20 7 23) by the blood of Christ has been combined with the older conception of the expiatory suffering of the Servant of Yahwè; see 56 ff. 138 143 f. The other representation of purification by his blood appears in 7 14; cp 22 14, and note the variant in 1 5: λύσαντι . . . ἐκ, λούσαντι . . . ἀπό (τῶν ἁμαρτίων).

It does not fall within the scope of the present article to discuss the various theories which theologians have from time to time set up concerning the sacrificial death of Christ, nor even the constructions of biblical theology. Many of these, even among the most recent, rest upon profound misunderstandings of the nature of the OT sacrifices, and entirely ignore Jewish conceptions of the effect and operation of sacrifice. The task which remains to us is only to explain briefly the facts that have been set in array in the foregoing paragraphs.

61. Genesis of idea.

To begin with, it is necessary to say that in describing the death of Christ as a sacrifice the NT writers are using figurative language. Some modern theologians, indeed, still affirm that 'the apostles held it to be a sacrifice in the most literal sense of the word' (Paterson, in Hastings, DB 4 343 f.); but such writers do not expect us to take their 'literal' literally. The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, for example, regarded the death of Christ as the true sacrifice, because by it was really effected what the OT sacrifices only prefigured; but he was too good an Alexandrian to identify 'true' with 'literal.'

In the second place, it is essential to note what the problem was which confronted these early Christian thinkers, in the effort to solve which they came to conceive of the death of Christ as a sacrifice. They did not set out, as has frequently been supposed, to answer the question how God without detriment to his justice or to his moral government, could remit sin, and find the solution in the sin offerings of the law, by whose blood the sinner was 'covered' (so the common etymological metaphor) and protected from the righteous wrath of God; they had a far more urgent task, namely, to account for the death of Jesus.

The death of Jesus was a severe shock to the faith of his disciples; and though the resurrection speedily re-established this faith, they had need both for its confirmation and for its defence before their unbelieving countrymen, to whom a crucified Messiah was an insuperable stumbling block, of proof from the scriptures that his sufferings were the fulfilment of prophecy. That there were predictions they could not doubt; and as now with a new insight they searched the scriptures, it was as if the Master himself opened their mind to understand them (Lk. 24 45 ff.), and interpreted to them the prophecies concerning himself (vv. 25-27).[1]

Thus the cross, instead of being the refutation of his claims, became their most conclusive demonstration. Among the scriptures which they thus for the first time understood, Is. 53 was, with good reason, the most important. Not only did the picture of the suffering Servant of Yahwè seem to foreshadow even in minute details the experience of Jesus, but in fact the author of the chapter had undertaken to solve the same problem, viz., Why did the Servant (Israel), for no fault of his own, suffer what seemed the extremities of God's displeasure? His answer was, The sufferings of the Servant of Yahwè are an expiation for others' sins, 'the Lord laid on him the iniquity of us all and by his stripes we are healed.'[2]

The idea that sins could thus be expiated by the suffering of one who had not deserved it was not repugnant to ancient minds, in which the sense of social solidarity was stronger than that of individual rights; it seemed, in fact, most natural. The sufferings of the righteous were frequently represented as an atonement for their people. Thus, of the Maccabæan martyrs it is said: 'Having become as it were a vicarious expiation (ἀντίψυχον) for the sins of the nation, and through the blood of those godly men and their atoning death (ἱλαστηρίου θανάτου), divine providence saved Israel which had before been evil entreated' (4 Macc. 17 22, cp 6 27-29); cp also Rom. 5 7 Col. 1 24.[3]

3 See above, § 52, end.

The great influence of Is. 53 upon the early conception of the death of Christ is manifest not only in Acts 8 32-35 (Philip and the Ethiopian eunuch; cp also 3 13 26 4 27 f. 30—παῖς, 'servant,' Is. 52 13, a standing title of Jesus), and the epistles (Heb. 9 28 1 Pet. 2 21-25 1 Jn. 3 5, etc.), but also in the fact that it has worked back into the gospel tradition (Lk. 22 37 Jn. 1 29 36).

The first point established was, therefore, that the death of Christ was not for his own sins, it was not a triumph of the wicked over the good, an inexplicable tragedy; it was an expiation for the sins of others. This is the tradition which Paul had received (above, § 57). This expiation was originally thought of in relation to the punishment of sin; by virtue of it the sins whose penalty would otherwise have been visited upon the offender are remitted and he is cleared. From this side Paul works out his theory of atonement. The association of expiation with sacrifice in the law and in the common ideas of the time leads to the employment of sacrificial figures and terms in speaking of the work of Christ;[1] but even in Hebrews, where the idea of the death of Christ as a sacrifice is most elaborately developed, it is plain that the premise of the whole is that Christ by his death made a real expiation for the sins of men, by which they are redeemed. It was not, therefore, the conception of the death of Christ as a sacrifice which brought in the idea of expiation and propitiation, but the opposite. Hence the freedom and variety in comparing his death to the different species of OT sacrifices, as they suggest different aspects of his work—the covenant sacrifice, the Passover, the expiations of the Day of Atonement. Hence also the fact that there is no doctrine of the sacrifice of Christ in the NT as there may be said to be doctrines of redemption or of justification.

1 In Is. 53 10 (āšām) the connection seems to be preformed; but 𝔊 translates otherwise.

2 Of the immense literature on the various aspects of the subject only a selection can be given here. The list is intended to include works which either are of value to the modern student or hold an important place in the history of discussion.

SACRILEGE. In Rom. 2 22 the question: 'Thou that abhorrest idols, dost thou rob temples' (AV 'commit sacrilege'; ὁ βδελυσσόμενος τὰ εἴδωλα ἱεροσυλεῖς) is to be interpreted in the light of Dt. 7 25 where not only is it commanded to burn the graven images of the gods of the nations with fire, but it is also forbidden to covet the silver or gold that is on them or to 'take it unto thee; for it is an abomination (תּוֹעֵבָה) to Yahwè thy God, and thou shalt not bring an abomination into thy house so as to become an anathema like it; thou shalt utterly detest and abominate it, for it is anathema' (see ABOMINATION, 4; IDOL, § 2 d). In Jos. Ant. iv. 8 10, § 207, this law is rendered 'Let no one blaspheme those gods which other cities esteem such; nor may any one steal the sacred things of strange temples (μηδὲ συλᾶν ἱερὰ ξενικά) nor take any treasure that may be dedicated to any god.' In accordance with this, in Acts 19 37 we find the town clerk of Ephesus urging in the case of Paul and his Jewish companions that their offence has at least not been of the most aggravated kind, they being 'neither robbers of temples (ἱεροσύλους) nor blasphemers of our goddess.'

As regards sacrilege against the temple in Jerusalem, 2 Macc. 4 39-42 records the sacrileges (ἱεροσυλήματα) committed in the city by Lysimachus with the consent of Menelaus, the riot it led to, and the death of the sacrilegious person (ἱερόσυλος) beside the sanctuary. The alleged attempt of Antiochus Epiphanes to rob a temple (ἱεροσυλεῖν) in Persepolis is alluded to in 2 Macc. 9 2, and in 2 Macc. 13 3-8 the death of Menelaus by precipitation from the tower for the punishment of 'him that is guilty of sacrilege (ἱεροσυλία) or has attained any pre-eminence in any other evil deeds' is related. In Ant. xvi. 6 2 Josephus records a decree of Augustus in the course of which it is enacted that the sacred things [of the Jews] are not to be touched (τά τε ἱερὰ εἶναι ἐν ἀσυλίᾳ), and that 'if any one be caught stealing their holy books or their sacred money, whether from the synagogue (σαββατείου) or from the public school (ἀνδρῶνος), he shall be deemed a sacrilegious person (ἱερόσυλον), and his goods shall be brought into the public treasury of the Romans.' In xviii. 3 5 f. the expulsion of the Jews from Rome in Tiberius's time is said to have been due to the wickedness of four Jews who embezzled Fulvia's gift of purple and gold for the temple at Jerusalem.

SADAMIAS (SALAME), 4 Esd. 1 1 AV = SHALLUM, 6.

SADAS (ΑϹΤΑΑ [A]), 1 Esd. 5 13 AV, RV ASTAD; see AZGAD. The AV is derived from the Geneva version.

SADDEUS, RV LODDEUS (ΛΑΑΔΑΙΟϹ [B]), 1 Esd. 8 45. See IDDO (i.).

SADDLE. The word מֶרְכָּב, merkāb, is in Lev. 15 9 rendered 'saddle' in EV, but AV^mg. has 'carriage' (cp 1 K. 4 26 [5 6]). The word literally means 'place of riding'—i.e., riding seat (cp CHARIOT, § 1, begin.), and in Cant. 3 10 it clearly means the seat of Solomon's palanquin (see RV and LITTER). Not less evidently this sense will not suit in Lev. (l.c.). A suggested emendation is מַרְבַד, 'rug' (see TAPESTRY).

It is to be remarked that though riding was the most common mode of travelling in Bible days, saddles in the modern sense of the word were not used but only 'horse-cloths,' or, failing that, a garment (Mt. 21 7). Furrer (BL 5 191) compares Ezek. 27 20 as showing that costly horse-cloths were brought to market at Tyre by the Dedanites. But the text is corrupt (cp AV and RV). For the most probable reading see CLOTH, n. 1; young steeds, not cloths, are referred to. On the camels' 'furniture,' see CAMEL, § 2, end. The word for 'to saddle' (חבשׁ, ḥābaš), Nu. 22 21 etc., literally means 'to bind.'

SADDUC, RV Sadduk (ϹΑΔΔΟΥΚΟΥ [A], ϹΑΔΔΟΥΛΟΥΚΟΥ [B], ϹΕΔΔΟΥΚ [L]), 1 Esd. 8 2. See ZADOK.

SADDUCEES. The origin of the name Ṣaddūḳīm (צַדּוּקִים, so probably, rather than צְדוּקִים) has been explained in two ways:

1. Name: current explanations.

1. As if from ṣaddīḳ (צַדִּיק), the specially righteous—a most unsatisfactory derivation, although favoured by Jerome and other of the Fathers. The change from ṣaddīḳ (צדיק) to ṣaddūḳ (צדוק) is warranted by no analogy, nor is the name as explained at all appropriate. There is no evidence that the Sadducees ever made any special claim to 'righteousness,' as understood by the Jews, and certainly they were not credited with it by their opponents. Such a claim was far more likely to be made by the Pharisees.

2. From the personal name Zadok (צָדוֹק). This is not much more satisfactory than the other, for it does not account for the well-attested double d in ṣaddūḳīm (צדוקים), and besides there is no direct proof of a connection with Zadoḳ. Three persons of that name have been suggested: (a) a certain Zadoḳ, otherwise unknown, who is said to have been with a certain Boethos, a disciple of Antigonus of Socho; (b) an unknown founder of the aristocratic party; (c) Zadoḳ the priest in the time of David and Solomon.

a. For the first (disciple of Antigonus) we have only the authority of the Ābōth di R. Nāthān, a late compilation, probably of the ninth century, which carries no weight with regard to historical events earlier by 1000 years. It is likely that this represents a Talmudic tradition, since the Boethusians are sometimes confused with, and (even in the Tōseftā) put for the Sadducees. The story is, in the common Rabbinic manner, due solely to a desire to account for the supposed origin of Sadduceism from the well-known dictum of Antigonus (Pirḳê Ābōth, 1 3) that we should serve God without expectation of reward, which is then said to have been perverted by his disciples to mean that there will be no retribution after death. Apart from the unhistorical nature of the story, however, the saying refers quite as much to rewards in this life as to the future, and, in any case, accounts only for one side of Sadduceism.

b. The second Zadok (a person assumed to account for the name), although supported by Kuenen, may be dismissed as purely hypothetical.

c. The least unlikely is the third (Zadok the priest, temp. David and Solomon). Ezekiel certainly insists strongly on the 'sons of Zadok' (בְּנֵי צָדוֹק) as the only legitimate holders of the priestly office; but his prophecies were uttered in circumstances wholly different from those in which the Sadducean and Pharisaic parties became distinguished. In Ezekiel's time Israel appears to have been sunk in idolatry, and he depicts an ideal state of things which for the most part was never realised. A great gulf is fixed between his time and that of Ezra. Modern Judaism, a system quite distinct from anything pre-exilic, may be said to have begun with Ezra, and the people never again fell into idolatry. The breach of continuity is so definite that what might be true or desirable in the sixth century B.C. forms no argument for what was the fact in the third century. It must be remembered too that Ezekiel was himself a priest. A much stronger argument might be derived from the Hebrew text of Ecclus. 51 12 [9] (ed. Schechter), 'Give thanks to him who chose the sons of Zadok for priest,' if the passage is genuine, as it probably is. However, there is evidence that this view did not prevail exclusively, for in 1 Ch. 24 the sons of Ithamar share in the priesthood, and in later times the priests are designated by the wider term, 'sons of Aaron.' The form of the name is not the only difficulty; it does not appear that the Sadducees ever claimed to be, or were regarded as, sons of Zadok. Whilst they chiefly belonged to the priestly or aristocratic caste, that party was in its essence political, and the name, which denotes a certain set of doctrines, or rather the negation of them, seems to have been applied to them as a term of reproach by their opponents. That is to say, it was used as a theological, not a political term, referring not to the origin of a particular family, party, or caste, but to the special form of supposed heterodoxy which happened to be characteristic of that party, so that a man might have been described as a Sadducee on account of his views, although not necessarily being a member of the party—a case which, however, was unlikely to occur.

3. A third explanation of the name may perhaps be hazarded, though with great diffidence. In modern Persian the word zindīḳ is used in the sense of Manichæan, or, in a general sense, for infidel, one who does not believe in the resurrection or in the omnipotence of God. It has been adopted in Arabic (zindīḳᵘⁿ, plur. zanādīḳᵘ and zanādiḳatᵘⁿ) with the meaning of infidel, and also in Armenian (cp Eznik [5th cent.] against heresies, chap. 2 on the errors of Zoroastrianism). Mas'ūdī (10th cent.) says that the name arose in the time of Manes to denote his teaching, and explains that it is derived from the Zend, or explanation, of the Avesta. The original Avesta was the truly sacred book, and a person who followed only the commentary was called a Zindīḳ, as one who rejected the word of God to follow worldly tradition, irreligious. But the term cannot have originated in the time of Manes (3rd cent. A.D.), for the Zend 'commentary,' whatever view be taken of its date, was by then already becoming unintelligible. It must be much earlier and have acquired the general sense of infidel very soon. Mas'ūdī, indeed, himself implies that زندى was used long before in this sense, and makes Zoroaster the author not only of the Avesta, but of the Zend and Pāzend (super-commentary), parts of which he says were destroyed by Alexander the Great.[1] Maḳrīzī (15th cent.), who borrows largely from Mas'ūdī, confuses the Zanādiḳah with the Samaritans and Sadducees, and says that they deny the existence of angels, the resurrection, and the prophets after Moses, whence it has been suggested that Zanâdiḳah is a corruption of Ẓaddūḳīm. The reverse may, however, be the case. It is quite possible that the Persian word was used about 200 B.C. in the sense of 'Zoroastrian,'[2] and if so, it might well be applied by opponents to a party in Judæa who sympathised with foreign ideas, and rejected beliefs which were beginning to be regarded as distinctively Jewish. It would thus have been used at first in a contemptuous sense, and later, when the original meaning was forgotten, was, in the well-known Jewish manner, transformed in such a way as to bear the interpretation of 'sons of Zadok' (בני צדוק) with a suggestion of 'righteous' (צדיקים). This would explain the daghesh (for suppressed נ) with pathaḥ, and the ו for י. It may be mentioned, though perhaps as a mere coincidence, that zanādiḳa is used for Sadducees in Arabic translations of the NT. That they did not hold Zoroastrian views is no objection to this explanation. In later Jewish literature Epiḳurus (אפיקורוס) is used for a freethinker, without any idea of his holding the views of Epicurus (see EPICUREANS), and is connected, by a popular etymology, with the root פקר. In fact, after the real meaning of the name has been forgotten, Epiḳurus becomes in the Talmud doctrinally almost the exact representative of the earlier term Sadducee, the errors chiefly condemned in the 'sect' being their denial of the resurrection and the rejection of the oral law. It is very probable that Sadducee never had any more definite sense than this.

2. Another explanation.

3. History of Sadducees.

The beginning of the party naturally can not be traced. In its political aspect it must have existed actually or potentially ever since there was a Jewish state, if the view taken below is correct. Doctrinally too, if it is in essence the opposite of the Pharisaic development, its origin goes back to the first beginnings of a law which had to be interpreted. The uncertainty of the evidence and its paucity prevent our assigning any definite date for the first (Pharisaic) amplification of the Torah. We may, however, feel sure that the Law-book of Ezra enlarged the existing documents sufficiently to meet all the requirements of the time. It must have been later that the progressive school began to develop tradition. In the Mishna tractate Ābōth, after the canonical authorities, the first link in the chain of tradition (שלשלת הקבלה) is the 'Great Synagogue,'[1] and the first personal name is that of Simon the Just (probably early in the 3rd cent. B.C.). No doubt the first steps had been taken before his time; but it seems that historical record did not go farther back. We shall perhaps not be far wrong in placing the actual beginnings of the new teaching about 300 B.C., and this agrees very well with the conclusion which has been drawn from other evidence, that after the time of Alexander the Great Judaism became powerfully affected by that Persian influence to which may be traced the increasing popularity of the doctrine of a future life with rewards and punishments. The rise of the liberal party, or school of theological development, implies the formation of a conservative opposition. It is not to be supposed that the two parties were from the first sharply divided, still less that they acquired distinctive names. It is historically more probable that the divergence increased gradually, and was intensified, and at last definitely realised in the religious revival of Maccabean times. As to the first use of the name to indicate differences consciously felt, it does not occur in the OT or in Ecclus., and, in fact, the earliest documents which mention Sadducees are the Gospels (but not Jn.). There is, however, no reason to reject the testimony of Josephus that the name was used in the Maccabæan period, and if it was then well-established, we may assume that it was used, if not generally, at least sporadically, at an earlier time to denote opposition to doctrines which are afterwards known as Pharisaic. In Josephus they always appear as a definite political party, an inexact, though convenient, view which is due to the colouring of the historian. Under the earlier Maccabæans, as would be expected, they are not much in evidence; but with the Hasmonæans they again come into prominence. John Hyrcanus definitely allied himself with them. Alexander Jannæus, as being himself high priest, was supported by them (cp Sukkah, 48*b*), and his war may be regarded as a contest between the Pharisaic and the Sadducean parties. In their political relations they show a sympathy with foreign influences which was strongly reprobated by the nationalistic Pharisees. Thus we find them accused, perhaps justly, of tolerating Greek religious practices, and even of adopting them. This is the less surprising if it be considered that the Judaism which they professed can have had (to use a modern phrase) no religious hold on them. It was rather the machinery by which a certain political system was worked, and when circumstances changed, it could be adapted to the new conditions. In the Roman period their influence diminished again. The party, always in a minority, was not likely to be largely recruited. They apparently had no existence outside Jerusalem with the temple and its ritual, the centre of religious and political life. With the fall of Jerusalem they disappear from history, and a century later the Mishna knows of them only by tradition. (See, further, PHARISEES, §§ 17-20).

[1] The question of the origin of the Zoroastrian writings is extremely difficult, and very little is certain except that the Gāthas are the earliest stratum. See ZOROASTRIANISM.

[2] The meaning of 'infidel' would then be due to the later influence of Christianity and Islam.

It would seem that Sadduceeism is to be rightly regarded as negative. Wherever reference is made to 4. Doctrine: negative.

it, the suggestion is that certain views are rejected. This naturally follows from what has been said above. Phariseeism represents the tendency which ultimately resulted in modern Judaism. It was at once exclusive in that it strenuously opposed all dealings with the foreigner, and popular in that it provided for the spiritual needs of the people. The doctrines which we find the Sadducees rejecting are precisely those which had been deduced from the law and the prophets to suit the requirements of the time. If Judaism was to continue as a living system, it became necessary to adapt it to altered conditions not contemplated by the law of Moses, and hence arose the whole body of oral tradition (תורה שבעל פה). At a time, too, when theological speculation was widely cultivated, it was equally natural that Judaism should be affected by the striving after those spiritual hopes which at all times have been, rightly or wrongly, the most cherished source of comfort in human suffering. Hence arose the doctrines of a future life with rewards and punishments compensating for the apparent incompatibility between virtue and happiness in this life. How keenly this problem appealed to the Jewish mind is evident from the Psalms (e.g., Ps. 73). Perhaps to no people has it appealed, for various reasons, more poignantly. Naturally, however, it was to the poor, the weak, and their sympathisers, that the need for a future rectification in the cause of justice was most apparent. It is, therefore, only what would be expected when we find that those who reject such comfortable words are a relatively small party of the well-to-do (τοὺς εὐπόρους μόνον ἐχόντων). Whilst, however, it appears to have been generally the case that Sadducean views were held by the aristocratic (i.e., primarily, the priestly) party, we must beware, as suggested above, of regarding aristocrat, priest, and Sadducee as convertible terms. Many of the priests were Pharisees, as we see, e.g., from the names of doctors quoted in the Mishna with the title 'priest' (כהן), etc., and, moreover, the separation between the higher and the lower classes of priests was as great as between the aristocratic party and the common people. Nor again was the difference between Pharisees and Sadducees politically insuperable. They could sit together on the Sanhedrin (Acts 23 6), and priests and Pharisees could combine in a common cause (Jn. 7 32 45). That the Sadducees were, however, in an oligarchical minority is evident from the fact that they seem to have found it advisable to conform at times to the more popular Pharisaic practice—e.g., Yōmā 19*b*, 'although we are Sadducees we are afraid of the Pharisees' (א ע פ שצרוקין אנו מתיראין מן הפרושים), where the whole passage shows a strong anti-Sadducean feeling.[1] Cp also Jos. Ant. xviii. 1 4.

Taking then the view that Sadducean opinions were held mainly by members of the dominant aristocratic class, we have now to consider those opinions in detail. The data furnished by the NT, though clear, are meagre. The account in Josephus is fuller (see especially Ant. xviii. 1 2-4, BJ ii. 8 14). His statements are, however, coloured partly by his own strong Pharisaic prejudice, and still more by a desire to express himself in terms of Greek philosophy. It must be remembered that philosophical notions which appealed to the Greek mind were entirely foreign to the methods of thought underlying Sadducean belief or disbelief. In this respect Jew and Greek start from different premises, representing a racial distinction. Roughly speaking, the one founds his faith on the will of God and the revelation bound up with it, the other deduces his scheme of the universe from a metaphysical conception of the necessary conditions of being.

The distinctive Sadducean views may be classed (as by Schürer) under three heads: (1) they denied the resurrection, personal immortality, and retribution in a future life; (2) they denied angels, spirits, and demons; (3) they denied fate (εἱμαρμένη), and postulated freedom of action for every man to choose good or evil, and work out his own happiness or the reverse.

1. With regard to the first point, Sadduceeism undoubtedly represents the old Jewish standpoint. Whatever doctrines may be inferred from the Torah, it is evident that the theory of a future life and future retribution is not inculcated in it. The object of, at any rate, the earlier parts of the Torah was not spiritual teaching, apart from the edification to be derived from the historical narrative, but to set forth the practical details of the ritual of Yahwèism. Such words as 'holiness' and 'purity' had a technical religious meaning quite distinct from the moral content which has been put into them by later theology. From a law-book the poetical, the spiritual, the emotional were fittingly excluded. Into the causes of the development which we find in the other canonical books, in Phariseeism, and in later Jewish thought, we need not enter here (see PHARISEES). That development was necessary. Sadduceeism only emphasised the earlier point of view by rejecting the new doctrines with unvarying conservatism. When we consider that the Sadducees had a certain sympathy with Greek and foreign influences generally, this attitude may be thought remarkable. It is not so if we rightly understand the nature of the original Torah and the Semitic mind which is deeply interested in the problems of the present, but shows only a slight capacity or inclination for dealing with the questions of modern theology. The Jewish mind can indeed insist on the oneness of God; but how misplaced in a Midrash, nay, how impossible, would be for instance a discussion of the doctrine of homoousia, even if it could arise. Such questions have, or had, an attraction for the western mind. They have none for the Jew. Moreover, we may well suppose that in the aristocratic party a certain materialistic tendency would show itself, that practical politics would absorb attention to the exclusion of more contemplative pursuits. Whilst thus holding to primitive, formal Judaism, the Sadducees would, so far as they were disposed to be controversial, look with suspicion on Pharisaic developments, as tending, by a sort of self-contradiction, to vitiate the observance of the Law. The Pharisee was, indeed, exact in paying tithes of the mint and the cummin; but a later teacher could say, 'Whoever gives a poor man a coin attains six blessings; but he who addresses to him soothing words attains eleven blessings' (כל הנותן פרוטה לעני מתברך בששה ברכות והמפייסו בדברים מתברך בי״א ברכות). Besides the danger of such teaching in undermining the foundations on which the Sadducean position rested, there may also have been a conscientious desire to arrest the breaking up of that system by which alone the nation could rightly serve God. They accordingly rejected entirely the oral tradition (תורה שבעל פה) by which the Pharisees supplemented the written Law. According to Pharisaic doctrine this was of equal authority with the written Law, and in a sense even more binding, since it provided for what was not to be found in the Law. Later teachers claimed that the whole of tradition was revealed to Moses, who transmitted it orally to Joshua and the seventy elders. The difficulty of preserving it intact through so many centuries was evaded by the theory of a sort of apostolic succession (שלשלת הקבלה), a series of authoritative teachers. The whole of this superstructure, and therewith the doctrines deduced by it, chief among which was that of the future life, were ignored by the Sadducees.

[1] The rabbinical accounts of the great synagogue are irreconcilable with the received chronology. If Ezra's date could be put a century later, as has been suggested, many difficulties would be removed.

[1] This seems possibly true to the circumstances, though Talmudic references are not to be implicitly accepted. The Gĕmārā is not to be trusted for distant historical facts, but may represent a true traditional attitude.

6. Resurrection.

2. With regard to the second specific point—the disbelief in angels, spirits, and demons—the Sadducean position was probably in advance of the Torah, where we still find traces of the belief, common to all primitive peoples, in the existence and power of demons. How they could abandon this, still more how they could explain it (e.g., the rite connected with Azazel) we do not know. It is, however, a natural consequence of the materialistic tendency and of the attitude described above. No doubt it was also emphasised by opposition to the Pharisaic development of angelology and demonology. Already in the Book of Daniel angels have names; in the Midrāshīm and the Talmud the system is further extended, and later, in the 'practical Ḳabbālāh,' it passes all bounds.

7. Angels.

3. For the third point—the freedom of will and the denial of fate—we have only the authority of Josephus. Schürer points out that this way of stating the case is entirely un-Jewish, although the question of God's providence was undoubtedly discussed. In spite of its not being confirmed by other evidence, it is very probable that Josephus' account is substantially correct. The doctrine is in agreement with the worldly, materialistic character of Sadduceeism, noted above, and with their tendency to keep to the simplest elements of faith, rejecting all admixture of the supernatural. It also probably represents the point of view of the Pentateuch (e.g., Dt. 4 and 6). The Sadducees would not have denied that good and bad actions brought their respective consequences in this world, for a moral sanction is necessary; but they would reject any theory of predestination as well as that of future retribution. Possibly Persian influence may be traceable here.

8. Free-will.

There remains yet a fourth point to be considered. According to the church fathers (Origen, Jerome) the Sadducees accepted only the Torah, rejecting all the other canonical books. This seems to be a misconception based on Mt. 22 31 f. Why should Jesus have chosen an argument from the Pentateuch, when others more obvious were to be found in the other books, unless the Sadducees acknowledged only the authority of the Pentateuch in such matters? We have, however, no evidence for such a view, which could hardly fail to be laid to their charge if there were the least ground for it. The argument from silence is not conclusive; but it is very strong here, for nothing could have been better calculated to damage an opponent than to show that he rejected any of the canonical books. The truth is, however, that the Jews have always regarded the Torah as on a wholly different level of holiness and authority from the other books. In the time of Ezra, which may be regarded as the starting-point of Judaism, as we understand it, the Torah must have been the only sacred writing. Other documents won their way only gradually to a canonical position. The conservative Sadducees would, no doubt, hold more rigidly than others to the supreme position of the Torah, and would view with a certain suspicion any enlargement of the canon as showing a Pharisaic tendency. (Cp the attitude of the Protestant churches towards the Apocrypha.) It must be admitted too that the prophets and hagiographa generally lend more countenance to Pharisaic views than the Torah, and were, in fact, a result of the same development. Though we need not suppose, therefore, that they rejected them, the Sadducees may well have used them only 'for example of life and instruction of manners'; and the argument in Mt. 22 32 is probably chosen from the Torah in order to be above criticism. The statement of the fathers is no doubt partly due to a very common confusion with the SAMARITANS (q.v.), who did accept only the Torah (for the same reasons which caused the Sadducees to regard it with special veneration), and, curiously enough, use the very passage quoted in Mt. as an argument for the future life. SAFFRON (כַּרְכֹּם, karkōm; κροκος, Cant. 4 14†). The Hebrew word is probably identical with Syr. kurkĕmā, Ar. kurkum, both of which denote the crocus or saffron. The same word is found in Persian and Armenian (in the latter probably borrowed from Heb.; Lag. GA 58, Arm. St. 161), and the common origin seems to be Sans. kunkuma. The source of saffron is Crocus sativus, L., a plant of doubtful origin,[1] which, though found in Palestine (FFP 422), is not apparently indigenous there. D. H. Müller, on the other hand, separating karkōm from the other words mentioned above, connects it with Ar. kamkām (Sab. כמכם) and Gk. κάγκαμον,[1] and so takes it to be the resin of the ḍirw or mastic tree—i.e., ṣōrī, צְרִי (Sab. Denkm. 82). But Müller's identification of κάγκαμον with the resin of the mastic tree is a mistake: κάγκαμον is, according to Fraas (Syn. Pl. Fl. class. 87), derived from Amyris [= Balsamodendron] Kataf,[2] and is in all probability therefore the fragrant gum much esteemed in the east as 'Bissa bôl'—in fact, an inferior kind of myrrh. Mordtmann does not believe in the connection of כרכם with kamkām and κάγκαμον: and it seems best to follow ancient tradition in identifying the Heb. word with saffron.

SAINT. We have to deal, in this article, not with the subject of Christian, or rather biblical, 'perfection,' but with the use of 'saint' and 'holy' in the EV. The former word, as a rendering, either of ḳādōš or of ḥāsīd, has had the unfortunate effect of obscuring characteristic biblical ideas. Readers of the EV must therefore supply for themselves the necessary mental correction or interpretation. AV applies the term in OT:

1. Use of terms.

1. To the angels (ḳĕdōšīm, קְדשִׁים), Job 5 1 15 15 Ps. 89 5 7 [6 8] Zech. 14 5. RV, however, calls the angels 'holy ones.' Whether even this phrase conveys the right idea to a modern reader may be doubted (see c), and we may well be grateful to Budde (note on Job 5 1) for his suggestion 'heavenly ones.'

2. To persons who are 'holy'—i.e., consecrated (ḳādōš, קָדוֹשׁ, ḳaddīš, קַדִּישׁ)—e.g., Ps. 106 16 (Aaron), 34 9 [10] Dan. 7 18 21 f. 25 27 (faithful worshippers of Yahwè). So, too, RV.

3. To Israelites who fulfil the duties of piety (ḥāsīd, חָסִיד; ὅσιος, sanctus, see LOVINGKINDNESS), 1 S. 2 9 (𝔊 δίκαιος or om.) Ps. 16 10 30 4 [5] 50 5 52 9 [11] 79 2 Prov. 2 8 (𝔊, εὐλαβουμένων), etc.; so RV, except in 1 S. 2 9, where it gives (not happily) 'holy ones,' and in mg. 'godly ones.' 'Loyal ones' would give one side of the meaning (cp Ps. 50 5?). In NT (see above) the EV uses 'saints' often of Christians. It may be a convenient term; but if ideas are to be translated, 'God's people' would perhaps be a better rendering, with a marg. 'holy ones—i.e., consecrated ones.'

Two passages in Rev. deserve attention. In 15 3, AV's 'thou king of saints' (ὁ βασιλεὺς τῶν ἁγίων, TR, Ti.WH^mg. ὁ β. τ. ἐθνῶν) has become in RV 'thou king of the ages' (ὁ βασ. τῶν αἰώνων, RV, WH); and in 18 20 AV's 'ye holy apostles and prophets' has become 'ye saints, and ye apostles, and ye prophets.' Textual criticism certainly has had its rights; but the rendering 'saints' seems an unnecessary concession to a usage more honoured in the breach than in the observance. 'Ye holy ones' would surely have been adequate.

There are also great difficulties connected with EV's use of the rendering 'holy,' especially when it is used for ḥāsīd (on which cp Dr. Par. Ps. 443 f.; Kirkpatrick, Psalms, 544 f.; BDB, s.v.).

2. Meaning of ḥāsīd.

1. Ps. 86 2, 'Preserve thou my soul, for I am holy' (ḥāsīd); so AV, cp Vg. and Jer.; but RV 'godly.' AV is here even more misleading than in 50 5 ('gather my saints [ḥăsīday] together unto me'). 'Who can be the speaker of these words but the Sinless One?' asks Augustine. This of course is theology, not exegesis (cp OPs. 260), and even if we take Ps. 86 to be a psalm of the pious community (Smend, Bä., etc.), yet, like Job, the community, while maintaining its consciousness of righteousness, would abstain from calling itself subjectively 'holy' or 'sinless.' 'It is not to the state of holiness that the Psalmist lays claim, but to the overmastering affection of moral love, the same in kind as that of which he is conscious towards his brother Israelites, and in some degree towards his brother men. To a good Israelite there is no boastfulness implied in such a claim as the Psalmist's. Whom should he love but Yahwè, who has granted Israel a "covenant ordered in all things and sure," a covenant based on the presupposition that those who desire its benefits are bound by practical love to each other, and, both as individuals and as a community, by worshipping and obedient love to Jehovah' (Aids, 345 f.)? Kirkpatrick (op. cit.), however, following Hupfeld, thinks the passive sense, 'beloved'—i.e., the object of thy lovingkindness, 'far more suitable.' See LOVINGKINDNESS.

2. Ps. 16 10, 'Neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One' (ḥāsīd), etc. RV removes the capital letters; RV^mg 'Or godly; or beloved.' Any rendering would be better than 'holy one' or 'Holy One.' Perhaps 'thy loyal one' gives the most important part of the sense best. The phrase implies an argument; 'thou wilt preserve me because of the covenant-bond of lovingkindness.'

In Ps. 25 16, too, the same idea underlies the text, if Grätz is right in emending the very doubtful yāḥīd (יָחִיד) into ḥāsīd (חָסִיד), 'have mercy upon me, for I am loyal (to the covenant).' In all such passages pious Israel is the speaker, not an individual (though a Christian application can be reasonably defended). In Ps. 16 the reading of the text (Kt.) is 'thy holy ones.' EV, however, in following the Hebrew margin (Kr.) has the authority of the versions, and the best MSS and editions. The case with Ps. 89 19 [20] is somewhat similar.

3. Ps. 89 19 [20], 𝔊 υἱοῖς, AV 'Thou spakest in vision to thy Holy One' (ḥāsīd); RV 'to thy saints,' because 'Holy One' (ḳādōš) precedes in v. 18, and because the text (Kt.) and the versions have the plural, though the singular is supported by the Heb. marg. (Kr.) and by some MSS and early editions. Certainly the 'vision' of 2 S. 7 was to an individual (Nathan); though ultimately it belonged to all the ḥăsīdīm. 'Godly ones (or one),' as Driver, or 'to thy loyal ones (one),' would be an improvement on AV's rendering.

4. 1 S. 2 9, 'He will keep the feet of his holy ones,' RV^mg. 'of his godly ones' (ḥăsīdāw, Kt.; but ḥăsīdō, Kr.). EV is unfortunate.

5. and 6. 1 Tim. 2 8, EV 'holy hands'; Tit. 1 8, 'just, holy, temperate.' ὅσιος is never = ἅγιος; it comes nearer to δίκαιος, and denotes the righteousness of him who regards not chiefly the law, but the lawgiver; in short, piety. So Philo, ὁσιότης μὲν πρὸς Θεόν, δικαιοσύνη δὲ πρὸς ἀνθρώπους θεωρεῖται (Op. Mangey, 2 30).

But there are difficulties of another order—difficulties inherent in the prevalent system of translation. Are only words to be translated, or ideas also? Must not, in certain cases, a concession be made to a wider theory of translation than that which is possible in a mere revision of an old version? The names of God, at any rate, it would seem, need to be retranslated, at least in the margin. 'The Holy One of Israel' is a phrase which, taken simply as it stands, scarcely conveys any idea. Ḳĕdōšīm and Ĕlōhīm being so nearly synonymous terms, we might give as an alternative rendering 'the Majestic One whom Israel worships.' 'The Devoted One of Israel'—i.e., 'He who is devoted to Israel' (Duff, OT Theology, 1 190)—can scarcely be the meaning; Ḳādōš implies one who dwells in unapproachable light, and has no contact, save by acts of judgment or by covenant favour, with earthly things; Ezekiel once has the phrase 'the Holy One in Israel' (Ezek. 39 7; see Davidson, ad loc.). Israel is 'holy (i.e., devoted, dedicated) to Yahwè,' no doubt; but this phrase implies a secondary sense of the word 'holy.' The rendering 'Majestic One' (majesty and dazzling purity are connected ideas) will suit also in Hos. 11 9 (of which Duff also gives an unusual exposition, OT Theology, 1 108), which contains the words, 'I am God, and not man, Hosea announces the destruction of Ephraim or Israel (see Nowack), because God is not, like an impressionable human being, to be cajoled into forgiveness ; he is in the midst of Israel in all his awful majesty, and must sweep out of existence those who persistently reject his gracious condescension. SALAMIS (σαλαμις, Acts 13_{5}). Salamis (represented by the modern town of Famagusta) was situated on the eastern side of Cyprus, near the river Pediæus which traverses the fertile plain which runs inland to Nicosia, the present capital of the island. It had the advantage of a good harbour, which in history is famous for the double victory of the Athenians over the Phœnicians in 449 B.C., and the great sea-fight in which Demetrius Poliorcetes defeated Ptolemy I. in 306 B.C. From prehistoric times Cyprus was famous for its copper mines (copper in fact deriving its name from that of the island ; see CYPRUS), and its valuable timber supplies. From the ninth century B.C. iron also was worked (cp Plin. HN 34_{2}). The forests, though much reduced by the continual export of timber, had not wholly disappeared even in imperial times (Strabo, 684). Corn, wine, and oil were also exported, and salt was prepared at Salamis and at Kition (Plin. HN 31_{84}). In all these natural advantages Salamis largely shared, and in fact became by far the largest and most prosperous town in the island, to a great extent owing to its favourable situation with respect to the Syrian coast and also to that of Cilicia. Even distant Lebanon is visible from the mountain Stavrovúni (2260 ft. high) above Larnaka (anc. Kition) on the SE. coast (cp Is. 23_{1}, 'from the land of Chittim it is revealed to them'—i.e., the smoke of burning Tyre).[1] Much more readily then is the opposite coast in the neighbourhood of Seleucia and Antioch visible from Salamis.

The natural result was that Cyprus displayed a long-continued struggle between Phœnician and Hellenic civilisations. Greek tradition, however, consistently claims Salamis as a very early Hellenic colony, along with Curium ; and we now know that both were centres of the civilisation called 'Mycenæan,' which is certainly not Semitic. Nevertheless, in Salamis as elsewhere, Phœnicians and Greeks were settled side by side, and although Hellenic influences had a firm hold upon the town, this affected little the general condition of the island, where upon the whole the original basic population was in affinity with the Phœnician element. After the withdrawal of the Greeks from interference in Cyprus upon the conclusion of the Peace of Cimon, there took place a reaction against Hellenism, until about 410 B.C., when Evagoras won back his ancestral throne of Salamis. Salamis was thus once more open to Hellenic influences and was connected by close bonds with Athens (Isocr. Evag. 47 f., CIA 2_{397}). Subsequently it was to Egypt that Cyprus succumbed ; for in 295 B.C. Ptolemy reconquered the island, and under the Ptolemaic regime large numbers of Jews settled in it (cp 1 Macc. 15_{23}). Their numbers would be increased under the early Empire owing to the fact that Herod the Great farmed the Cyprian copper mines (Jos. Ant. xvi. 4_{5}). Hence we find apparently more than one synagogue at Salamis, whither of course the majority of the Jews would congregate (Acts 13_{5}).

[1] [One form of the ordinary view is thus expressed by Delitzsch (Isaiah, ET, 1_{403}), 'Cyprus, the principal Phœnician emporium, is the last place of call. As soon as they put in here, what they had heard as a rumour on the high sea is disclosed to these crews (נגלה)—i.e., it becomes clear, undoubted certainty.' But this does not exhaust the possibilities of meaning. See, further, Crit. Bib.]

Various reasons account for the fact that Salamis was the starting-point of the missionary work of Paul and Barnabas. Not only was Barnabas himself a Cypriote (Acts 4_{36}, Κύπριος τῷ γένει), possibly, for aught we know to the contrary, a native of Salamis ; but many natives of the island were Christians and had set the example of missionary enterprise (Acts 11_{19} f.); and lastly, the number of the Jews established there and in other parts of the island was a guarantee of the existence of a proportionate number of proselytes. If Cyprus was to be visited at all, entry would be most naturally made from Syria at Salamis, which besides was connected with Paphos by two good roads—one by way of Soli, the other along the S. coast by way of Curium and Citium (vid. Tab. Peut.).

As regards the later history of Salamis, mention should be made of the great insurrection of the Jews in the time of Trajan (117 A.D.), in which a large part of the city was destroyed. Hadrian in consequence expelled all Jews from the island and closed it to them under penalty of death (Milman, Hist. of the Jews, 3_{111} f.). In Constantine's time, having been ruined by earthquakes, Salamis was rebuilt, and renamed Constantia (cp Jer. Philem.). In the fourth century A.D., consequent upon the discovery of the relics of Barnabas, with a copy of the First Gospel, at Salamis, Cyprus was made autonomous and the patriarch has ever since enjoyed the right of signing his name in red ink. Salcah, the mod. Salḫat or Ṣarḥad, is situated four or five hours E. of Boṣra, on an eminence (probably once a crater) in a very strong position on the S. extremity of the Jebel Ḥaurān. It seems to have been hotly contended for by the Aramæans and the Israelites respectively, and may have played a prominent part in the legends, legendary genealogies, and history of the Israelites, though Cheyne thinks a geographical confusion may well be suspected, see GILEAD, RAMOTH-GILEAD, cp also ZELOPHEHAD. It was well known to early Arabian geographers. The Nabatæans called it צלחד, and an inscription found there (of 66 A.D.) refers to the fact that the goddess al-Lāt (אלת) was especially honoured by its inhabitants (CIS 2_{182}). Some well-known place must be meant—not, therefore, the Salumias of OS 149_{18}, 8 R. m. from Scythopolis (Reland), or the Sālim near Nāblus (Wolff). Probably the whole verse should run thus, '. . . Samaria, and CYAMON [q.v.], and IBLEAM (see BELMEN), and Jericho, and the circle of Jordan (Syr.; see CHOBA), and to Esdraelon.' The words καὶ αισωρα καὶ τὸν αὐλῶνα σαλημ seem to be made up of three fragments of εσδρηλων εσδρηλωμ. (Cp αυλωνος for אלוני in Dt. 11_{30}, οἱ λοιποί in Hex.) T. K. C.

SALIM (ϲαλειμ [Ti.WH], v.l. ϲαλλειμ [A], ϲαλημ [V, Eus. Cyr. Theophylact)], a place, on the W. of the Jordan, near which was Ænon, where John baptized, Jn. 3 23†. The reason given for the choice of Ænon (=a place of fountains) is, 'because there were many springs (ὕδατα) there,' so that a multitude could spread themselves out, and John could pass from one spring to another baptizing them. Eus. and Jer. (OS 245 91 134 25) place Ænon 8 R. m. S. of Scythopolis, 'juxta Salim et Jordanem,' and it is true that about seven miles from Beisān there is a large Christian ruin called Umm el-'Amdān, near which are several springs. But no name like Salem or Ænon has been found there. Conder himself, who points this out, identifies Ænon with the springs between the well-known Sālim (near Nāblus) and a place called 'Ainūn, in the Wādy Fāri'a. The place is accessible from all quarters, especially from Jerusalem and Galilee (see the attractive description in Tent Work, 257 f.). But the distance of the springs from Sālim (about seven miles) is rather against this identification. It should be noticed, too (1) that Jesus, as we are told, was at this time baptizing in the country districts of Judæa (v. 22), and was apparently not very far from John, and (2) that 'near Salem' is really mentioned to explain the ready access of the Jews to John (ὅτι ὕδατα πολλὰ ἦν ἐκεῖ has the appearance of being a gloss). Considering the frequent errors of the text connected with 'Salem,' it is very plausible to correct τοῦ σαλημ (see above) into ιερουσαλήμ,[1] in which case it becomes natural to identify Ænon with 'Ain Kārim, which boasts of its beautiful St. Mary's Well, and to the W. of which is the 'Ain el-Habs (the Hermit's Fountain), connected by a very late Christian tradition with John the Baptist. The legendary connection should not prejudice us against the view here proposed, which rests solely on exegetical and geographical considerations. SALIMOTH (ϲαλειμωθ [B]), 1 Esd. 8 36 RV= Ezra 8 10, SHELOMITH, 4.

SALLAI (סַלָּי), 1. Neh. 12 20; in 12 7 SALLU (q.v. 11).

2. See GABBAI SALLAI.

SALLAMUS (ϲαλλουμοϲ [B*A]), 1 Esd. 9 25 = Ezra 10 24, SHALLUM, 11.

SALLU (סַלָּא [Neh.], סַלּוּא [Ch.]), a Judæan Benjamite (BENJAMIN, § 9, iii.), temp. Nehemiah (Neh. 11 7; ϲηλω [Bא*A], ϲηλωμ [א^c.a], ϲαμαα [L]; 1 Ch. 9 7; ϲαλωμ [BL], ϲαλω [A]). Cp SALU.

SALLU (סלּוּ), a priest enumerated in one of the post-exilic lists (Neh. 12 7 ϲαλουαι [א^c.a mg. sup.], ϲαλουια [L], om. Bא*A). In Neh. 12 20 the name is SALLAI (סַלָּי; σαλλαι [א^c.a mg. inf.], σαλουαι [L], om. Bא*A); and the head of Sallai's 'father's house' in the time of Joiakim, Joshua's successor, is said to have been KALLAI (קַלָּי).

SALMA (שַׂלְמָא), the name of the clan which was reckoned as the 'father' of Bethlehem, 1 Ch. 2 51 54, and introduced into the genealogy of Jesse, v. 11. According to Wellhausen (CH 358, cp De gent. 29), 'Salma is the father of Bethlehem after the exile.' But to the present writer there is good reason to suppose that the Bethlehem intended is not the Bethlehem in Judah, but another Bethlehem—i.e., Beth-jerahmeel, in the Negeb (RUTH, § 4). It will be noticed that the 'sons' of Salma include Netophah and Atroth-beth-Joab. Now Netophah is most probably a modification of Nephtoah or Naphtoah (cp NAPHTUHIM, SALMAH, 2), and Atroth of Ephrath. See JABEZ, SHOBAL, and, on the Arabian affinities of this clan, SALMAH (vv. 51 54, σαλωμων [BA], σαμα, -αα [L]; v. 11, σαλμων [BL], -αν [A]). T. K. C.

[1] It is true that the Fourth Evangelist, according to the MSS, invariably uses ιεροσολυμα. But he may now and then have used ιερουσαλημ, like other evangelists.

SALMAH (שַׂלְמָה; ϲαλμων [AL], -αν [B]).

1. Ruth 4 20 RV^mg., according to MT's reading. See SALMA, SALMON.

2. The name of an Arabian people mentioned in several OT passages—Cant. 1 5 1 K. 4 11 Nu. 24 23 Ezra 2 55 58 (and ‖ passages), Neh. 11 3. (1) In Cant. 1 5 the poet couples the 'tent-curtains of Salmah' (read שַׂלְמָה, not שלמה) with the 'tents of Kedar' (see CANTICLES, § 6, col. 687). Now the tribes of KEDAR [q.v.] tenanted the region afterwards appropriated by the Salmæans (שלמי), and the Salmæans were followed by the Nabatæans. The two latter peoples are mentioned together in a Nabatæan inscription (CIS ii. 197 9). Pliny mentions the 'Salmani et Masei Arabes' (NH 6 30), and Steph. Byz., quoted by Euting, refers to the Σαλάμιοι as an Arab population in alliance with the Nabatæans. The emendation in Cant. l.c. is due to Wellh. (Prol.[5] 218, n. 1); cp Wi. AOF 1 196 292. (2) Most probably in 1 K. 4 11 בת־שלמה should be pointed בַּת־שַׂלְמָה. This suggestion assumes that two of Solomon's prefects, supposed to have had daughters of Solomon as wives, really married Salamian or Salmæan women. One of these is called Basemath (בשמת), a corruption of 'Ishma'elith';[1] the other TAPHATH, perhaps a corruption of Naphtuḥith (cp 1 Ch. 2 54, reading Naphtūḥī). (3) The impossible words מִשְּׂמוֹ אֵל in Nu. l.c. should be emended into מִשַּׂלְמָה or מִשַּׂלְמָאִים. The context relates to the Kenites. Observe that in the Targums שלמאי is the equivalent of the Heb. קיני. See, however, BALAAM, § 6; Wi. AOF 2 423. (4) On the passages relating to the עבדי שלמה in Ezra-Neh., see SOLOMON'S SERVANTS, SONS OF.

Winckler (AOF 2 545 ff.) proposes to substitute the 'Salamians' for 'Shalman' in Hos. 10 14, as the barbarous captors of Beth-arbel. In this he shows much acumen; but it is more probable that 'Shalman' is the name of one of the N. Arabian kings who invaded the Negeb. He was apparently a king of the N. Arabian Cusham or Cush (see Crit. Bib. on Hos. 10 14 Am. 1 3).

SALMON (צַלְמוֹן), Ps. 68 14 [15]† RV, AV ZALMON, 2.

SALMON (שַׂלְמוֹן; ϲαλμαν [B]: -μων [AL]), father of Boaz, Ruth 4 20 f. (a variant to MT's SALMAH in v. 20, cp 𝔊 Vg.), Mt. 1 4 Lk. 3 32 (EV ϲαλμων [א^cAD]; but ϲαλα [א*B]). See RUTH, § 4. Mt. (1 4) makes him the husband of RAHAB, whom, however, Talmudic tradition makes, as a proselyte, the wife of Joshua. Cp Nestle, Exp. T 10 91, and see GENEALOGIES ii., § 2.

SALMONE (ϲαλμωνη Ti.WH), a cape at the eastern extremity of Crete, as appears from the passage in Acts 27 7, where it is spoken of as the first land sighted after leaving Cnidus.

The ship on which Paul sailed beat up with difficulty (μόλις, v. 7) to the latitude of Cnidus from Myra. A true course W. by S. from Cnidus would have taken her by the N. side of Crete. As she was unable to hold that course, but was yet able to fetch the eastern cape of the island, which bears SW. by S. from Cnidus, we may infer that the wind blew from between NNW. and WNW. (assuming that the ship could make good a course about seven points from the wind). The wind, therefore, in common language would have been termed NW. (see Smith,

[1] This explanation of Basemath accounts for the double name of Esau's wife—Basemath and Mahalath—i.e., 'Ishmaelite' and 'Jerahmeelite.' The initial B (or M? see 𝔊) is secondary.

Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, 74 f.). Such winds prevail in the eastern Mediterranean in the summer, and are the Etesian winds of the ancients (Aristotle, De Mundo, 4 15; Pliny, HN 2 47).

As regards the identification of Salmone some doubt is possible. The name appears in various forms.

Σαλμώνη, Acts 27 7; Σαλμωνὶς ἄκρα, Apoll. Rhod. Argon. 4 1693;[1] Σαλμώνιον, Str. 106;[2] the most frequently recurring form is Σαμώνιον (Str. 472, etc., Stadiasm. m.m., §§ 318 and 355, Ptol. 3 17, Plin. HN 4 20 [Sammonium]).

The extreme NE. cape, now called Cape Sidhero (the 'Iron Cape') or C. Salomon, is generally supposed to be the ancient Cape Salmone; but it is perhaps more probable that Cape Salmone should be identified with the promontory called Plaka, some 7 m. to the southward (so it is in the map in vol. i. of Spratt's Travels and Researches in Crete; see discussion of the point, ibid, 189 f.). It is very possible also that the usage of the name may have varied in ancient times in the case of two conspicuous promontories lying so close together.

SALOM (ϲαλωμ [ANV]), 1 Macc. 2 26 AV, RV SALU.

SALOME (ϲαλωμη, see NAMES, § 50, cp 'Shelomi,' 'Shelumiel'; or, perhaps, 'Salma,' see ISRAEL, § 79, ad fin. and cp SOLOMON, § 1), one of the women who witnessed the crucifixion and afterwards visited the sepulchre of Jesus, Mk. 15 40 16 1†. She is almost certainly to be identified with the wife of Zebedee, the mother of James and John; see Mt. 27 56, and cp CLOPAS, § 2.

The name Salome was borne also (1) by the daughter of Herodias; see HEROD, § 10; (2) by the wife of Alexander Jannæus; see ISRAEL, § 80.

SALT (מֶלַח; 𝔊 αλϲ, also αλαϲ, αλα).[3] Indispensable as the use of salt appears to us, it must have been quite unattainable to primitive man in many parts of the world.

1. Domestic uses of salt.

Indeed where men live mainly on milk and flesh, consuming the latter raw or roasted, so that its salts are not lost, it is not necessary to add sodium chloride, and thus we understand how the Numidian nomads in the time of Sallust and the Bedouins of Ḥadramaut at the present day never eat salt with their food. On the other hand, cereal or vegetable diet calls for a supplement of salt, and so does boiled meat. The important part played by the mineral in the history of commerce and religion depends on this fact. At a very early stage of progress salt became a necessary of life to most nations, and in many cases they could procure it only from abroad, from the sea-coast, or from districts like that of Palmyra, where salty incrustations are found on the surface of the soil. The Hebrews had ready access to an unlimited supply of this necessity of life in the waters of the Dead Sea, and in the range of rock-salt at its south-western extremity.

When the waters of the 'Salt Sea' (see DEAD SEA) subside after the spring floods have caused them to rise several feet beyond their normal level, the heavily impregnated water, left in the marshes on its borders, rapidly evaporates, leaving a deposit of salt. The Dead Sea is said to yield by evaporation 24.57 lbs. of salt in 100 lbs. of water, as compared with 6 lbs. from the same quantity of water taken from the Atlantic Ocean (Hull).

It has been adduced as evidence of the 'practical turn of the prophet's mind' (Dr. Intr.(6) 294) that the marshes found on the western shore of the Dead Sea in Ezekiel's day are expressly exempted from the sweetening and reviving influence of the river of the prophetic vision (Ezek. 47 11). The second source of supply, above referred to, was the famous ridge of Jebel Usdum, whence probably came the mělaḥ sědōmith (מֶלַח סְדוֹמִית) or 'salt of Sodom' of the Talmud. This ridge, which geologists tell us must once have formed the bottom of a larger lake, consists mainly of rock-salt, the friable nature of which, under climatic influences, causes portions of the range to assume fantastic shapes. One of these, a pillar resembling in outline a gigantic female form, gave rise in the prehistoric period to the familiar legend of Gen. 19 26 (cp Wisd. 10 7—where the pillar of salt is characterised as 'a monument of an unbelieving soul'—Jos. Ant. i. 11 4 [§ 203], and the illustration in Stade, GVI 1 119). To one or other of these sources of supply reference is made in the obscure mikrēh mělaḥ (מִכְרֵה מֶלַח) of Zeph. 2 9 (EV 'saltpits'; 𝔊 θιμωνία ἅλωνος), it being uncertain whether the expression signifies salt-pans for evaporation (τὰς τοῦ ἁλὸς λίμνας of 1 Macc. 11 35), or salt-pits for the excavation of salt.

As among ourselves, salt entered in countless ways into the domestic and social economy of the Hebrews. A morsel of bread and salt and 'water by measure' (Ezek. 4 11) are given by a late Jewish thinker as the irreducible minimum of human sustenance (Pirḳē Ābōth 6 4).

Similarly, among the principal things for the whole use of man's life, the son of Sirach assigns a prominent place to salt (Ecclus. 39 26, cp Job 6 6).

Bread (פַּת בְּמֶלַח, Ābōth l.c.) and olives (Ma'ăśēr. 4 3) dipped in salt were the poor man's fare; or the salt might be dissolved in water for this purpose (Shabb. 14 2; cp Erub. 3 1). In a stronger form as brine (הִילְמִי—i.e., ἅλμη), salt water (מֵי הַמֶּלַח) was used for pickling vegetables and meat (Baruch, 6 [Ep. of Jeremy] 28) and in the preparations of olives for the table (FRUIT, § 9).

The practice of rubbing the flesh of newly killed animals with salt for the purpose of depleting it of every particle of blood required a large supply of salt. So, too, the process of pickling (ταριχεύω) and preserving fish, which formed so important an article of commerce (for methods adopted see FISH, § 7). Salt was also employed for preserving hides (Middōth, 5 3). In the Messianic age, even the domestic animals are to share in the material joys of the period by having their provender seasoned by the addition of saline herbs (Is. 30 24 חָמִיץ, RVmg. 'salted'). Besides the natural sea- and rock-salt, the Jews of later times were familiar with the sal conditum or spiced salt of the Romans (סַלְקוֹנְדִּית 'Āb. Zār. 26—for other readings and explanations see Jastrow, Dict. of Targ. etc., s.v.). Salt was also used medicinally. A grain of salt in a decayed tooth was reckoned a cure for toothache (Shabb. 6 5). Here, too, may perhaps be classed the rubbing of new-born babes with salt, attested by Ezekiel (16 4, see FAMILY, § 9), varied by washing in salted water (Van Lennep, Bible Lands, 569), although it probably had its origin in a quite different circle of ideas as a safeguard against demonic influence (cp Běkhōrōth 40*a*, where salt at meals is alleged to have this effect). For the medicinal properties of the water of the 'Salt Sea' see DEAD SEA (col. 1045). Many other illustrations of the curative properties of salt itself, as employed among semi-civilised races, are given by Trumbull in his exhaustive treatise The Covenant of Salt, 1899. The economic importance of salt is further indicated by the almost universal prevalence in ancient and mediæval times, and indeed in most countries down to the present day, of salt taxes, or of Government monopolies.

An interesting and exhaustive study of the working of the salt monopoly in Egypt under the Ptolemies is given by U. Wilcken in his recent work Griechische Ostraka aus Ægypten, etc. (1 141 ff., ἡ ἁλική, salt-tax). In Palestine under the Seleucids, the salt-pans on the shore of the Dead Sea were also a government property, as we learn from the remission of the royalty upon salt (ἡ τιμὴ τοῦ ἁλός)[1] decreed by Demetrius in the hope of gaining the support of the Jews (1 Macc. 10 29 11 35). We have no further information, unfortunately, as to the details of the operation of this tax.

That a religious significance was attached to a substance so highly prized, which was often obtained with difficulty, is no more than natural. But it must also be remembered that the habitual use of salt is intimately connected with the advance from nomadic to agricultural life, i.e.—with precisely that step in civilisation which had most influence on the cults of almost all ancient nations. The gods were worshipped as the givers of the kindly fruits of the earth, and, as all over the world 'bread and salt' go together in common use and common phrase, salt was habitually connected with offerings, at least with all offerings which consisted, in whole or in part, of cereal elements. This practice is found alike among the Greeks and Romans, and among the Semitic peoples (Lev. 2 13); Homer calls salt 'divine,' and Plato names it 'a substance dear to the gods' (Timæus, 60; cp Plutarch, Sympos. 5 10).

2. Salt in the sacrificial ritual.

Bread and salt were the chief and inseparable constituents of the Hebrews' daily food. It was, therefore, to be expected that every offering—was it not the 'bread of God' (לֶחֶם אֱלֹהִים Lev. 21 22)?—laid upon the altar should also have the accompaniment of salt. It is immaterial whether we regard the actual provision of Lev. 2 13 c: 'With all thine oblations thou shalt offer salt' as younger than the more special provision of 13*a* 'every oblation of thy meal offering (minḥāh) shalt thou season with salt (RV),' as Dillmann and some others are inclined to do (but see Ezek. 43 24), since both the fundamental conception of primitive sacrifice and the extant testimony to the actual practice in historical times point to the constant practice of adding salt to every species of offering, animal and vegetable alike.

Hence the statement of Mk. 9 49*b*, 'every sacrifice shall be salted with salt,' though absent from the oldest authorities, is a statement of fact (cp for the NT times Jos. Ant. iii. 9 1, Mishna, Zĕbāḥ. 6 5 f.). Even incense was not excepted (see INCENSE, § 6), and the Greek text of Lev. 24 7 is doubtless right in adding salt to the SHEWBREAD (which see, and cp Philo, Vit. Mos. 3 10 [ed. Mangey, 2 151] 'loaves and salt'). Grants of salt for the services of the restored worship of the returning exiles were thus entirely in place (Ezra 6 9 7 22; cp for a later period the decree of Antiochus '345 medimni of salt,' Jos. Ant. xii. 3 3 [§ 140]).

Whilst, however, the origin of the presence of salt in the cultus is to be traced to a primitive conception of sacrifice, it must be borne in mind that at the stage of religious thought reflected in the priestly legislation, the use of salt has already become symbolical (see § 3).

In the cults of Greece and Rome we find the same appreciation of salt, as is shown by the frequent references in classical writers (see Di.-Ryssel, Kurzgef. exeget. Handb., on Lev. 2 13; also Hehn, Das Salz, 6 ff., Schleiden, Das Salz, 73 ff. [1875]). It also appears in the lists of offerings in the older cultus system of Babylonia (Zim. Beiträge zur Kenntnis der Babyl. Religion 1901, 95). Cp RITUAL, § 10, col. 4123.

3. Salt in symbol and metaphor.

The absolute barrenness of the region bordering on the Dead Sea, owing to the saline incrustations with which the ground is covered, naturally suggested the employment, by various Hebrew writers, of salt as a figure for barrenness and desolation (Dt. 29 23 [22]; cp Job 39 6 Jer. 17 6). Such a barren waste, innocent of every form of vegetation, formed a fitting contrast to 'the fruitful land' (Ps. 107 34 render with RV 'a salt desert [מְלֵחָה]' for 'barrenness' of AV). This figurative use of 'salt' and 'saltness' is not confined to Hebrew, being found in several of the other Semitic dialects (Toy, 'Ezekiel,' SBOT, 74 ET). The same idea has usually been regarded as underlying the expressive symbolical act, once referred to in the OT, of sowing a city that had been put under the ban (ḥērem, see BAN) with salt (Judg. 9 45). It is more probable, however, that this practice is to be brought into connection with the use of salt in sacrifice (Rel. Sem.(2) 454 n.), the idea of the complete dedication of the city to Yahwè, as symbolised by the strewing of it with salt, being more in harmony with the fundamental conception of the 'ban.'[1] This practice is also attested for Cyprus (Rel. Sem.(2) l.c., Schleiden, Das Salz, 95, who adduces as historical parallels the tradition that Attila so treated Padua, and Friedrich Barbarossa, Milan). [Cp also Zimmern's correction (in Gunkel, 'Gen.' in HK, 193) of the translations of Assyrian inscriptions (Tiglath-pileser and Ašur-bani-pal) in KB 1 37 2 207, where 'salt' should be read for 'stones' and 'dry sand.']

As covenants were ordinarily made over a sacrificial meal, in which salt was a necessary element, the expression 'a covenant of salt' (Nu. 18 19) is easily understood; it is probable, however, that the preservative qualities of salt were held to make it a peculiarly fitting symbol of an enduring compact, and influenced the choice of this particular element of the covenant meal as that which was regarded as sealing an obligation to fidelity. Among the ancients, as among orientals down to the present day, every meal that included salt had a certain sacred character, and created a bond of piety and guest-friendship between the participants. Hence the Greek phrase ἅλας καὶ τράπεζαν παραβαίνειν, the Arab phrase 'there is salt between us,' the expression 'to eat the salt of the palace' (Ezra 4 14 RV; not in $\mathfrak{G}^{BA}$), the modern Persian phrase namak haram, 'untrue to salt'—i.e., disloyal or ungrateful—and many others. The OT expression 'covenant of salt' (Lev. 2 13 Nu. 18 19) is therefore a significant figure of speech, denoting the perpetual obligation under which the participants in the covenant of God with Israel (having in the sacrifice and sacrificial meal partaken of salt together) lay to observe its conditions.[2] So also in 2 Ch. 13 5 the expression may legitimately be rendered without a figure by 'a perpetual irrevocable covenant.'

Although salt, from one aspect of its effects in nature, might be used, as we have seen, by Hebrew writers as a figure of desolation and death, on the other hand, in virtue of its giving piquancy and, so to say, life to otherwise insipid articles of diet (cp Plutarch, Sympos., cited by Trumbull, Covenant of Salt, 53), or it may be, as Trumbull suggests (l.c.), from its being associated with blood in the primitive mind, 'salt seems to stand for life in many a form of primitive speech and in the world's symbolism.' It is as a symbol of life that salt is employed by Elisha in healing the death-dealing spring at Jericho (2 K. 2 19 ff.).

Here, too, may be classed the familiar description of the true followers of Jesus as 'the salt of the earth' (Mt. 5 13), the living embodiment of the highest ideals of life, a permanent and pervasive influence in the world making for righteousness. Paul's exhortation to the Colossians (4 6) to have their 'speech seasoned with salt' is not to be understood of 'wit,' the 'Attic salt' of the ancients, but rather of sober, good sense, as contrasted with 'profane and vain babblings' (1 Tim. 6 20 2 Tim. 2 16).

For the many interpretations of the crux interpretum, Mk. 9 49 a ('salted with fire'), reference must be made to the commentaries (cp also Trumbull, op. cit. 65 f.) Finally the much discussed reference to the impossibility of restoring to salt its lost savour (Mt. 5 13 and parallels) is ingeniously connected by Robertson Smith with the oppressive taxation of salt, referred to above, one result of this being that the article is apt to reach the consumer in a very impure state largely mixed with earth. 'The salt which has lost its savour' is 'simply the earthly residuum of such an impure salt after the sodium chloride has been washed out.'

The use of salt in various rites of the Christian church, as in the baptism of catechumens, in holy water, etc., falls without the scope of this article (see Smith's Dict. of Christ. Antiq., s.v., Trumbull, op. cit.).

[1] This view is also preferable to that suggested recently by Schwally, Semitische Kriegsaltertümer (1901) 32, that the 'strewing with salt denotes dedication to the demons of solitary and barren places.'

[2] For a slightly different explanation of the origin of the expression see Kraetzschmar, Die Bundesvorstellung im AT 46 n. 207. Cp Rel. Sem.(2) 479 (the Arab oath taken over salt strewn upon a fire). For other examples of salt in covenants and oaths see Wellh. Heid.(2) 124, 189, Landberg, Arabica, 5 134 157 (Leyden 1898).

SALT, THE CITY OF (עִיר הַמֶּלַח; αι πολειc cαλωμ [B], αι πολιc αλων [A], αι πολειc των αλων [L]), one of the six cities 'in the wilderness,' grouped with NIBSHAN and EN-GEDI [q.v.] in Josh. 15 62. If the VALLEY OF SALT [q.v.] or rather 'Valley of ham-melaḥ,' is the Wady el-Milḥ, the 'Ir ham-melaḥ may be placed on the site now known as el-Milḥ, a little to the SE of Kh. Sa'we (the ancient SHEMA or JESHUA?) on the great route from Hebron to the Red Sea through the 'Arabah (cp MOLADAH).

In this case, it is plain that, as, e.g., in 1 S. 23 29 24 1, En-gedi must have come from En-gadiš, En-kadesh (Kadesh-'barnea'), and the wilderness be that of Arad (Judg. 1 16, if we may read מדבר ערד; see KENITES), the term 'ir ham-mělaḥ is a corruption of 'ir jeraḥmeel, 'city of Jerahmeel.' A 'city of Jeraḥmeel' is referred to in 1 S. 15 5; also probably in Judg. 1 16 (crit. emend., see KENITES). See JERAHMEEL, § 4.

T. K. C.

SALT, THE VALLEY OF (גֵּי הַמֶּלַח, in Chronicles and Psalms [η]κοιλαc [or φαραγξ] των αλων; in Samuel and Kings γεβελεμ, ρεμελε [B], γημαλα, γαιμελα [A], γαιμελαχ, -εχ [L]), the scene of encounters between the Israelites and the Edomites (or rather, perhaps, Aramites—i.e., Jeraḥmeelites), first under David (2 S. 8 13 [ארם], 1 Ch. 18 12 [אדום], Ps. 60 heading [both ארם and אדום]),[1] and then under Amaziah (2 K. 14 7 [אדום], 2 Ch. 25 11 [see closing sentence]). The 'Valley of ham-mělaḥ' has been identified with the great marshy plain (es-Sebkhah) at the S. end of the Dead Sea (see DEAD SEA, § 3), which is strongly impregnated with salt. It is true, it is described as at the present day 'too spongy to walk upon,' nor can we easily understand how it can ever in the historical period have been otherwise than marshy. An examination of the text of the passages referred to, however, makes it seem in the highest degree superfluous to choose this site for the famous battlefield. It is plausible (Buhl, Pal. 88)[2] to identify the 'valley of ham-mělaḥ' with the Wādy el-Milḥ, one of the two wadys into which the W. eṣ-Ṣeba' parts at Beersheba. This wady and the W. eṣ-Ṣeba' may be regarded as forming a first frontier between Canaan and the steppe-country.

It is important to notice that ham-mělaḥ (in the Hebrew name) is an easy corruption of JERAHMEEL (q.v., § 4), and that the Wādy el-Milḥ would naturally enter into the Negeb of the Jeraḥmeelites. Most probably we should read אֲרָם ('Aram,' a popular corruption of Jeraḥmeel) instead of אֱדֹם in all the passages quoted above, except the last (2 Ch. 25 11), where בְּנֵי־שֵׂעִיר should be emended into בְּנֵי־מִצּוּר—i.e., the Miṣrites. Cp JOKTHEEL; SALT, CITY OF; SALT SEA. T. K. C.

SALT SEA (יָם הַמֶּלַח; see DEAD SEA, § 1), a name of the Dead Sea, Gen. 14 3 Nu. 34 3 12 Dt. 3 17 Josh. 3 16 12 3 15 25 18 19†. It is an expressive name, no doubt (cp Hull, Mount Seir, 108), but need not on that account be original. If the gē-hammělaḥ (see SALT, VALLEY OF) has arisen, by a popular corruption from gē-yĕraḥme'el (valley of Jeraḥmeel), the presumption surely is that yām ham-mělaḥ (EV 'salt sea') has arisen in the same way out of yām yĕraḥme'el ('sea of Jeraḥmeel'), which is most naturally viewed as the original Hebrew name of the Dead Sea. Winckler, however (GI 2 36), thinks that the identification of the 'Salt Sea' with the 'vale of SIDDIM' [q.v.] is due to a mistake on the part of the second editor or reviser of the original narrative. His theory is that the first editor or reviser meant Lake Ḥūleh (cp MEROM), called by William of Tyre Melcha, on the NW. side of which is a fountain still called 'Ain el-Mellāḥa. The water of Lake Ḥūleh, however, is not salt. The same editor, it is added, interpreted the phrase 'the vale of Siddim (?)' as referring to a wādy running towards Lake Ḥûleh, the same in which the 'Ain el-Mellāḥah is situated. Winckler (GI 2 92 f. 108) also offers a new explanation of 'salt sea.' He connects the phrase with the wide-spread Oriental myth of sweet and bitter waters (cp MARAH). It may be remarked, however, that place-names compounded with māliḥ, mālik, and the like, are at the present day of not infrequent occurrence in Palestine. See SODOM AND GOMORRAH. T. K. C.

SALUTATIONS. To 'salute' is EV's equivalent for Heb. שָׁאַל לְשָׁלוֹם פ׳, lit. 'to ask after the welfare of some one' (2 S. 11 7 and elsewhere), and שָׁאַל לְפ׳ לְשָׁלוֹם, 'to ask some one as to welfare' (1 S. 10 4 and elsewhere), and for Gk. ἀσπάζομαι (Mt. 5 47 Rom. 16 3 ff. and often) whence ἀσπασμός, 'salutation' (Mt. 23 7 and elsewhere).

The Hebrew phrase, however (cp Lat. salutatio, 'wishing health') means 'to greet,' whereas the Greek includes both greetings and embraces. In Rom. 16 16 1 Cor. 16 20 2 Cor. 13 12 1 Thess. 5 26 1 Pet. 5 14 we have the phrase ἀσπάσασθε ἐν φιλήματι (ἁγίῳ or [1 Pet.] ἀγάπης; see § 3).

We take salutation here in the widest sense, and begin, not with formulæ of greeting, but with those conventional gestures which are even more significant.

1. Prostration. Of prostration as a sign of deep humility and respect, not much need be said.[1] David bowed himself three times before his friend Jonathan (1 S. 20 41); Jacob, seven times before his offended brother Esau (Gen. 33 3). The lowly prostrations exacted by sovereigns are too familiar to require examples from the OT or illustrations from other nations. The prostrations of women before men (or, at least, men of rank) are more startling (Gen. 24 64 1 S. 25 23); K. Niebuhr found the same custom in Arabia. Kneeling will be referred to later (see § 5).

2. Kissing. The custom of embracing and kissing calls for fuller treatment. When Esau ran to meet Jacob, he 'embraced him, and fell on his neck, and kissed him' (Gen. 33 4); and Joseph's recognition of his brethren, and especially of Benjamin (Gen. 45 14 f.), and the meeting between 'the prodigal son' and his father (Lk. 15 20), are described in exactly similar terms.[2] In the last two biblical passages καταφιλέω is the word used in the Greek; but in Gen. 33 4 φιλέω. There is no strongly marked distinction between them, nor is there more than a theoretical difference between Heb. nāšaḳ and niššēḳ (Piel indicating a formal kiss).

Parting friends quite as naturally used these conventional acts. Thus, after his father's death, Joseph 'fell on Jacob's face, wept upon him, and kissed him' (ἐφίλησεν Gen. 50 1), and the disciples from Ephesus 'wept sore, and fell on Paul's neck and kissed him' (κατεφίλουν, Acts 20 37), when he continued his journey to Jerusalem.

Such is still the mode of exchanging salutations between relatives and intimate friends practised in Palestine. 'Each in turn places his head, face downwards, upon the other's left shoulder and afterwards kisses him upon the right cheek, and then reverses the action, by placing his head similarly upon the other's right shoulder, and kissing him upon the left cheek';[1] 'or, again, a man will place his right hand on his friend's left shoulder, and kiss his right cheek, and then lay his left hand on his right shoulder, and kiss his left cheek.' A third mode of salutation may be mentioned. The person who gives the kiss lays the right hand under the head of his friend and supports it while it receives the kiss. This custom is referred to in the account of Joab's assassination of Amasa (2 S. 20 9). One or the other of the two former customs may explain the account of the entertainment of Jesus by Simon the Pharisee, in which none of the usual courtesies were granted to the wandering teacher—'thou gavest me no kiss' (Lk. 7 45). Absalom's self-seeking geniality to the common people (2 S. 15 5) may best be brought into connection with the second form (the hand on the shoulder).

The cheek, the forehead, the beard, the hands, the feet may be kissed, but not (in Palestine) the lips.

Two passages of AV seem to contradict this. In the MT of Gen. 41 40 (literally rendered) the Pharaoh is made to say to his Hebrew vizier, 'Upon thy mouth shall all my people kiss.' Dillmann and Delitzsch render 'According to thy mouth (=command) shall all my people order themselves' (so too RVmg.). This is, at any rate, not against the social customs of the East; but no Hebrew writer would have expressed his meaning thus. It is better to read 'shall obey thee' (וְעָלֶיךָ יַקְשִׁיב; see Crit. Bib.). The other passage is Prov. 24 26 '(Every man) shall kiss (his) lips that giveth a right answer.' EVmg. gives a less objectionable rendering, 'He kisseth with the lips that giveth a right answer.' But yiššaḳ should be yaḳšîbû, and the passage (see Crit. Bib.) should be rendered—

26 Even the simple will listen
To him who gives a right sentence,
25 And those that rebuke will they trust,
And upon such a blessing will come.

Kissing the hands or even the feet, or the hem of the garment, is at present the respectful salutation given to a superior. Kissing the feet of Jesus was the grateful tribute of the sinful but reclaimed woman at Simon's feast (Lk. 7 45, καταφιλοῦσα). A kiss on the hand is nowhere expressly mentioned in OT or NT. Still, such a kiss may be meant in the narrative of the betrayal of Jesus (Mt. 26 49 Mk. 14 45). If Delitzsch is right in supposing the kiss of 1 S. 10 1 to be the kiss of homage, we may further conjecture that Samuel raised the hand of Saul respectfully to his lips. More probably, the narrator means that Samuel greeted the new king as a friend, on the cheek. In the Assyrian inscriptions the vassals of the great king are said to signify their submission by kissing his feet (see BABYLONIA, § 69). No Hebrew phrase of this sort occurs, though the phrase 'to lick the dust' in Is. 49 23 Ps. 72 9 may be suggested by the custom of kissing the ground on which a superior has trodden ('to smell the dust' is a parallel Egyptian phrase). The Assyrian kiss of vassalage may also perhaps have been less humiliating than it seems; primitive usages early began to lose their original crudeness. In modern Syria, when a man seeks to propitiate one placed over him, he will just touch the feet of his superior with his right hand, and then kiss the hand and place it on his forehead.[2] This, or some other modification of the complete ceremony, may be meant by Ziba's 'I do obeisance' in 2 S. 16 4 (see OBEISANCE).

There is only one OT passage in which, if the text is correct, the kiss of homage (whether given to hands or feet) must be referred to,—viz., 'kiss the Son' (נשקו בר) in Ps. 2 12. Acting on the principle that a text which contradicts the social usages of Palestine cannot be correct, we are bound to try all available means of emending the text.[3] Such a cautious critic as Baethgen admits 'kiss the Son' into his version only with a parenthetic note of interrogation.

3. The 'Holy Kiss.'

It hardly needs to be remarked that freedom of intercourse between the sexes was unknown to the Jews in the period of the rise of Christianity. Ecclus. 42 12 (cp Jn. 4 27) is proof enough that the exchange of a kiss between men and women, as a sign of their common membership in a religious society, must have shocked Jewish sentiment. It appears to be the received view that such a shock to Jewish sentiment was really given in early Christian worship, and whenever recognition of a common Christian standing was called for. In the article 'Kiss' in Wace and Cheetham's Dict. of Christian Antiquities, it is stated that 'the primitive usage was for the "holy kiss" to be given promiscuously, without any restriction as to sexes or ranks, among those who were "all one in Christ Jesus,"' and that only when this indiscriminate use had given rise to scandals was it restricted by the church authorities. The evidence, however, is not so distinct and certain as to justify so positive a statement.[1] Paul (reff. above) does not expressly direct this startling mode of applying the truth that 'ye all are one man in Christ Jesus.' We know, however, that he does enjoin that women should have their heads veiled in the Christian assemblies (1 Cor. 11 6), which implies that he was on his guard against the occurrence of scandals. We also know that the Apostolical Constitutions (2 57 8 11) direct that the men of the laity should salute the men, and the women the women separately, and that the Didascalia (early in 3rd cent.), on which Book II. of the Constitutions is based, distinctly refers to the separate places of men and women, though the 'kiss of peace' is not referred to at all.

It seems very possible that the Constitutions do, in fact, represent the mind of the original founders of the churches on this subject, and that we are not compelled by a somewhat obscure passage in Tertullian (Ad Uxorem, ii. 4), who can only speak for Africa, to suppose a violation of Jewish sentiment in any of the earliest Christian assemblies. There may, however, of course, have been a deviation in some places from the earliest church practice.

4. Kiss of Adoration.

We have still to refer briefly to the kiss of adoration. 'It was dim night,' writes Doughty, 'and the drooping clouds broke over us with lightning and rain. I said to Thaifullah, "God sends his blessing again upon the earth." "Ay, verily," he answered devoutly, and kissed his pious hand toward the flashing tempest' (Ar. Des. 2 67). But there was a time when this religious hand-kiss was a sign of idolatry. Job denies having practised it, for it would have proved him a worshipper of sun and moon, and not of him who created both (Job 31 26-28). In Farther Asia as well as in Greece the rising sun was greeted by his worshippers with a hand-kiss (Lucian, De Saltat. 17). This was, in fact, a substitute for the kiss which would be offered to an idol—such a kiss as is referred to in Hos. 13 2, 'The men that sacrifice kiss calves'[2] (see CALVES, GOLDEN), and in 1 K. 19 18, 'Every mouth which has not kissed (Baal).'

5. Kneeling.

The ordinary salutations of worship were two—prostration, and spreading forth the hands (see the Pss. passim, Ex. 20 5 2 K. 5 18 for the former, and 1 K. 8 22 38 Is. 1 15 for the latter). A substitute for prostration was kneeling, which Hebrew custom set apart as an act of homage to the Deity (1 K. 8 54 2 Ch. 6 13 Is. 45 23 Dan. 6 10 Lk. 22 41 Acts 7 60 and elsewhere), though from Mk. 1 40 10 17 15 19 Mt. 17 14 27 29 we may infer that, when haste was required, kneeling might take the place of prostration as a sign of respect to a man of rank.

Formulæ of greeting are either inquiries as to the welfare of the friend, or prayers for his continued prosperity.

[1] Cp Neil, op. cit., 27 ff. 78 ff. On the 'holy kiss,' etc. Conybeare (Expos. 1894 a, 461) points out two passages in Philo's Quæstiones in Ex., preserved in Armenian, which seem to imply that the 'kiss of peace' or 'of concord' was a formal institution of the synagogue.

[2] There is some difficulty in this passage. But at any rate the phrase 'kiss calves' is possible. Cp Crit. Bib.

6. Greetings. The treacherous Joab addresses Amasa, 'Art thou in peace, my brother' (𝔊 εἰ ὑγιαίνεις [σὺ] ἀδελφέ; 2 S. 20 9). Jesus bids his disciples say, on entering a house, 'Peace be to this house' (Lk. 10 5). Boaz, when he meets his reapers, says, 'Yahwè be with you,' and the friendly answer is, 'Yahwè bless thee' (Ruth 2 4; cp Ps. 129 8). Saul piously addresses Samuel with the words, 'Blessed be thou of Yahwè' (1 S. 15 13). To a king the loyal salutation was, 'Let the king live' (1 S. 10 24 2 S. 16 16 1 K. 1 39 2 K. 11 12), or 'Let the king live for ever' (1 K. 1 31; cp Dan. 2 4 3 9 5 10 6 6 21 Neh. 2 3), possibly with an allusion to legendary tales of highly favoured mortals who had escaped Shĕōl. In the NT we find the Greek expression χαῖρε, as a substitute for 'Peace be to thee' (Mt. 26 49 Mk. 15 18 Lk. 1 28, and elsewhere). For epistolary greetings, see Ezra 4 17 7 12 Acts 23 26 30, and the close of Pauline Epistles.

'Peace be on you' is still the commonest form of salutation among Moslems. The conventional reply is, 'And on you be the peace (of God),' to which it is usual to add, 'and the mercy of God, and his blessings.' This salutation may not be used by or to an 'infidel'; a Moslem who finds that he has addressed it by mistake to a wrong person generally revokes his salutation. He may also do so if a Moslem refuses to return his greeting, saying, 'Peace be on us and on (all) the right worshippers of God!' This seems to Kitto (Bib. Cyclop., s.v. 'Salutation') a striking illustration of Lk. 10 5 f. 2 Jn. 11. The salām, however, is only the beginning of a string of conventional formulæ which take up much time, and are evaded by persons in haste. Specimens of these are given by Lane (Mod. Egyptians, 1 253). No doubt Jewish politeness had also its optional formulæ, which would be evaded in circumstances such as are described in 2 K. 4 29 Lk. 10 4. T. K. C.

SAMARIA (שֹׁמְרוֹן; the Aram. שָׁמְרַיִן, whence the Gk. σαμαρ[ε]ια, has become assimilated to names like

1. Name. Mahanaim, Ramathaim [cp NAMES, § 107]; Ass. Samerina).[1] The city so called is said in 1 K. 16 24 (cp Jos. Ant. viii. 12 5) to derive its name from שֶׁמֶר (SHEMER), the owner of the hill on which it was built.[2] Shemer may in fact quite well be an ancient clan-name, though it is plausible enough to derive the name of such a loftily-placed city from שָׁמַר in the sense of 'outlook' (so GASm., HG, 346). Shōm^erōn may denote (1) the hill, (2) the city built on it, (3) the whole district of which the city came to be the capital. In the last sense Shōm^erōn, EV 'Samaria,' is equivalent to the Northern or Israelitish kingdom (Hos. 7 1 8 6, etc. [Wellh.]), and hence עָרֵי שֹׁמְרוֹן means Israelitish cities (2 K. 17 24 26 23 19).[3]

The city is situated close to the borders of Ephraim and Manasseh, in Mt. Ephraim, about 6 m. NW. of

2. History. the earlier capital Shechem. Of its foundation we have a definite account in 1 K. 16 24, where it is stated that Omri purchased the hill from Shemer for two talents, and built on it the city which he called after the name of the former owner. Kittel confirms the accuracy of this notice by a reference to the case of David in 2 S. 24 21 ff. From Omri's time (about 925 B.C.) it became the capital of the northern kingdom, although it never attained to the religious prestige of the older Shechem. Ahab adorned it with a temple of Baal, and Baal-worship soon became recognised there as on a level with the original Israelitish calf-worship. The city was in a naturally strong position (cp Jos. Ant. xiii. 10 2), standing on an oblong isolated hill which is precipitous on the one side, and easily fortified on the other. In the reign of Ahab it was besieged (901 B.C.) unsuccessfully by the Aramæans under Ben-hadad (1 K. 20), and again in the reign of Joram (892 B.C.), when it was relieved by a panic among the Aramæans (2 K. 6 24). It was captured by the Assyrian army in 721 after a siege of three years, many of the inhabitants were deported and the kingdom of Israel was finally brought to an end. For its colonisation and the little that can be gathered as to the history of the district down to the time of Nehemiah, see SAMARITANS. It was again taken by Alexander the Great who deported many of its inhabitants to Shechem, and substituted Syro-Macedonian settlers. The district, Σαμαρεῖτις χώρα, was then given over to the Jews. The city seems to have remained in the occupation of Alexander's settlers until the time of John Hyrcanus, who completely destroyed it (109 B.C.) and seized the whole district (Jos. Ant. xiii. 10 3). It was partially restored under Gabinius (Jos. Ant. xiv. 5 3), and shortly afterwards (in 25 B.C.) entirely rebuilt on a large scale by Herod the Great (ib. xv. 8 5), who named it Sebaste[ia] (Σεβαστή or Σεβάστεια; Rabb. סבסטי or סבוסטי) in honour of the Emperor. After Herod's death in B.C. 4 the kingdom of Samaria together with that of Judæa went to his son Archelaus. In the NT the city is not mentioned; the name Samaria denotes the district. As Samaria lay between Galilee and Judæa, Jesus passed through it on his way S. to Jerusalem (Lk. 17 11 Jn. 4) although the Jews ordinarily avoided doing so. Later, Christianity was preached there (εἰς τὴν πόλιν τῆς Σαμαρείας) by Philip the evangelist (Acts 8 5 ff.). The subsequent history of the city is obscure, and there is no record of its final destruction. According to Jerome Sebaste was believed in his time to be the burial-place of John the Baptist, as well as of the prophets Elisha and Obadiah. It apparently was a place of some importance in the early centuries of the Christian era, since we find a Bishop of Sebaste at the Council of Nicæa (325) and again at that of Jerusalem (536). It was occupied by the Crusaders, and a bishopric re-established there in 1155. The site is now represented by a village named Sebusṭîyeh, where is the interesting half-ruined church of John the Baptist, with other Christian remains. Not far off, at about the same level, run the streets of columns with which Herod adorned the city.

The Samaritans are called once in the OT (2 K. 17 29) Šōmĕrōnīm (שֹׁמְרֹנִים), a name which becomes

1. Name. common later. It is a gentilic form from שמר. In Rabbinical literature they are called kūthīm (כּוּתִים), a term intended to be contemptuous, referring to the colonists from Cuthah. The Greek Σαμαρεῖται properly means inhabitants of the district of Σαμάρεια. They call themselves בְּנֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל,

[1] On the question whether Samerina always means Samaria, see MENAHEM.

[2] According to Stade (ZATW, 5 171), the punctuation with Holem implies an erroneous explanation of the Aramaic forms with a. The lateness of this pronunciation may be inferred from 𝔊's representation of שמרון in 1 K. 16 24, which is (1) σεμερων [B], εμερων [A], σοβορων [L], (2) σαεμηρων [B], σομηρων [A], σομορων [L]. Cp, however, Kittel's note in SBOT on 2 Ch. 13 4, and note in HK on 1 K. 16 24.

or specifically שֹׁמְרִים from שָׁמַר, properly keepers, sc. of the Law. On the name of the place, see SAMARIA.

The history of the Samaritans, as such, begins where that of the northern kingdom ceases. We read in

2. Colonisation. 2 K. 17 3 ff. that Shalmaneser went up to Samaria, and that in the ninth year of Hoshea, the king of Assyria took Samaria, and carried Israel away into Assyria and brought men from Babylon, and from Cuthah, and from Avva, and from Hamath and Sepharvaim and placed them in the cities of Samaria. In Ezra 4 2 it is 'Esar-haddon, king of Assyria, who brought us up hither.' Lastly in Ezra 4 10 they are 'the nations whom the great and noble Osnappar brought over.'[1] The importation of foreign colonists is thus attributed apparently to three several kings, the last of whom bears a name not otherwise known. To these names yet a fourth must be added. It is noticeable that in 2 K. 18 9 f. it is stated that Shalmaneser besieged Samaria, 'and at the end of three years they (not he) took it.' It is now known that SHALMANESER [q.v.], who began the siege, died in 723 B.C., and that it was his successor, Sargon II., who actually took the city in 721. Perhaps the death of Shalmaneser may account for the length of the siege. It is natural therefore to infer from the accounts in 2 K. that Sargon introduced the (first) settlement of colonists, and this is definitely stated to be the case in the annals of Sargon.[2] With regard to the other names, most recent critics rightly identify Osnappar with Ašur-bani-pal. The accounts are further simplified if Esar-haddon be taken as a corruption of the same name, due to the similarity of the first element in each (see ASNAPPER). We shall thus have two colonisations, the first by Sargon, the second by Ašur-bani-pal. As to the list of cities from which the colonists were drawn, Sepharvaim should no doubt be the Babylonian Sippar. The cuneiform account expressly states that Babylon, Cuthah, and Sippar opposed Ašur-bani-pal, and it would be consistent with Assyrian policy to deport the inhabitants of those cities to the distant province of Samaria. On the other hand, it would be altogether an unusual step to transfer the inhabitants of Hamath or of Avva (in Syria; but cp AVVAH) to a neighbouring district. See HAMATH. Sargon may indeed have brought colonists from Hamath, which he reduced in 720, and the combination of the two sets of malcontents may have led to the necessity of his reducing Samaria for the second time in 720; but there are no grounds for such a conjecture. It is far more consistent with the facts to suppose (with Winckler) that just as the Deuteronomic redactor has combined into one the two Assyrian kings, and inserted a long passage to point the moral of the story, and imparted to the whole a tone hostile to the Samaritans, so he has combined the two colonisations into one, and amplified his account from 2 K. 18 34 which he took to refer to the same events. But this last passage has not necessarily anything to do with the colonisation of Samaria. The Rabshakeh is there citing instances of towns which have fallen before Assyria, so that Hamath, Sepharvaim, and Ivvah (see AVVAH) are quite in place as being comparatively close at hand and therefore the more likely to appeal to the inhabitants of Jerusalem. The redactor's view was doubtless based on a confusion of Sippar (in Babylonia) with Sepharvaim (in Syria): see SEPHARVAIM. From the biblical and the Assyrian accounts together we thus restore the history as follows: Shalmaneser besieged Samaria but died during the siege: Sargon took the city in 721, deported 27,290 of its inhabitants, and introduced in their place (? in 715) colonists from other conquered cities: in 720 the country had to be subdued again: later Ašur-bani-pal further colonised the country.

The resulting population was called by the general name Samaritan. How far must it be considered

3a. Population. foreign (ἀλλογενής, Lk. 17 18)? The later Samaritans have always claimed very strongly to be בני ישראל, regarding Joseph especially as their ancestor (cp Bĕrēshîth Rabbā, § 94, on Gen. 46 13). On the other hand, the Jews deny them any right to the name of Israel, representing them as merely descendants of the Assyrian (Cuthæan) colonists. The truth lies midway. It is now generally admitted that the deportation under Sargon was not complete. A district so important as Samaria would not have been entirely depopulated by losing 27,290 of its inhabitants. (When a similar fate befel Judah, upwards of 200,000 went into captivity.) The number undoubtedly represents the persons of importance (including the priests), who alone were likely to be dangerous, whilst the poorer class were left as before and the inhabitants of the outlying towns and villages were probably hardly affected. This seems indeed to be definitely stated by Sargon, though the passage is not very clear. The account in 2 K. 17 is written from the Jewish point of view; but the real state of the case comes out in the later history—e.g., when Josiah, a century afterwards, put down idolatry 'in the cities of Samaria' (2 K. 23 15 19 f.) obviously among Israelites (cp 2 Ch. 34 6 f.), and collected money for the repair of the temple from 'Manasseh and Ephraim, and of all the remnant of Israel' (ib. v. 9). There can hardly be a doubt that in Nehemiah's time, for example, the population of the district of Samaria consisted of the 'remnant of Israel' with an admixture of foreigners. What was the proportion of the two elements to one another cannot now be determined. Nor have we any means of knowing how far they were intermixed, and how far the colonists really adopted the religion of the 'God of the Land.' So long as the name 'Samaritan' meant only the inhabitant of Samaria and the surrounding country, it no doubt included all the mixed population; but when the name of the city was changed the term acquired a purely religious significance, and then probably denoted the descendants of the 'remnant' together with such of the colonists as had become proselytes and intermarried with Israel. But it was just this (perhaps slight) admixture which gave colour to the Jewish taunt implied by the term Cuthæan.

As to the early history of the Samaritan people, we have little information. We are indeed told in 2 K.

3b. History. 17 25 that the country was infested by lions (Jos. Ant. ix. 14 3, § 289, says a pestilence) and that the inhabitants in consequence made request to 'the king of Assyria' for a priest who was accordingly sent to 'teach them the manner of the god of the land.' Josephus says, 'some of the priests,' and it is probable that this was the original reading of 2 K. 17 27, since the text still preserves the strange plurals 'let them go and dwell' (וְיֵלְכוּ וְיֵשְׁבוּ). The idea is quite in keeping with the common view of a tutelary deity whose protection was necessary in his own land and whose power was connected with and restricted to it. Cp a similar incident in the story of Naaman, 2 K. 5 17. It is generally thought that this request could only have been made by the foreign colonists; but since the 'remnant' consisted of 'the poorer sort,' the people of the land (עַם הָאָרֶץ) who in Rabbinical literature are proverbially ignorant of the law, it is only natural that all alike should require a teacher who understood the technicalities of Yahwè-worship. So 'they feared Yahwè, and served their own gods (2 K. 17 33). However, the high-places which Josiah suppressed need not have been idolatrous: they may have been merely unauthorised Yahwè-shrines. That 'the remnant' joined with Judah in the use of the temple at Jerusalem at this period, may be inferred from 2 Ch. 34 9 and also from Jer. 41 5 where it is mentioned that eighty men came 'from Shechem, from Shiloh, and from Samaria' to make their offerings there (cp SHECHEM, § 2, SHILOH, § 2). It is unlikely that these were apostate Jews: they can only have been Samaritans.

After another period of nearly a century, during which we have no information about the Samaritans, they are mentioned in the account of a return of Jews from Babylonia under Cyrus, when they ask to be allowed a share in the building of the new temple—a request which was refused (Ezra 4 5). It is usually considered that this refusal was the cause of a mutual estrangement and an implacable hatred between the two peoples. There can be little doubt, however, that the real cause was something deeper and went back farther than this mere incident. If we admit the presence of a strong Israelitish element in the Samaritan people, we shall not be far wrong in seeing here the old spirit of opposition between Israel and Judah, always ready to break out, which definitely asserted itself under Jeroboam,—the refusal to recognise Judah's claim to a hegemony, the revolt against centralisation. It was based on a difference of race, an incompatibility between N. and S., and was more political than religious. No reason is assigned for the refusal: the Jews do not charge their 'adversaries' with idolatry, nor even with heresy.[1] Indeed it would seem that Israel continued to be willing, and were allowed, even after this, to join in Jewish worship in Jerusalem, if Ezra 6 21 is to be so understood.

On the other hand the Jewish policy, while purely patriotic, was rigidly exclusive. It aimed at fixing the worship of Yahwè as the religion of Judah, purifying it from all foreign elements, and making Jerusalem its headquarters. Hence it was out of the question that they should allow the participation of a race whose devotion to Jewish ideals was open to suspicion and whose origin was perhaps mixed. The Jew could not risk contamination by having any dealings with the Samaritan; but, as we see from Ezra 6 21 and Jer. 41 4, there was no barrier of the kind on the Samaritan side. Only when Judah, by refusing their help, proclaimed an exclusive policy, did a political separation become inevitable, and it then became necessary for the Samaritans to pursue something of the same policy. No doubt, in their condition of social and religious disorganisation, the restoration of a Jewish state at Jerusalem appeared an imminent danger, and accordingly we find them endeavouring by truly Oriental intrigues to prevent first the building of the temple and afterwards the erection of the walls (Ezra 4 4 ff. Neh. 4 7 ff.); cp EZRA-NEHEMIAH, § 10. In this they were unsuccessful, and matters must have continued in much the same state of political separation, with a good deal of individual intercourse, until the building of the temple on Mt. Gerizim, which made Shechem the religious centre of Samaria and finally rendered re-union impossible.[2] A sanctuary once established on their own sacred mountain, it became a point of honour to refuse to recognise the temple at Jerusalem. Of the Samaritan temple we have no mention in the OT, and the occasion and date of its erection are alike difficult to ascertain. According to Josephus (Ant. xi. 7 2, xi. 8 2) the satrap of Samaria under Darius Codomannus (336-330) was Sanballat, who gave his daughter in marriage to Manasseh, the brother of Jaddus the Jewish high priest. Manasseh was ordered by the elders and Jaddus either to give up his foreign wife or to renounce the priesthood, and thereby the possible succession to the office of high priest. He thereupon complained to Sanballat, who urged him to migrate to Samaria, promising to get him established there as high priest under state protection, and to build a temple. He was joined by other Jews who had foreign wives or were discontented with the reforms at Jerusalem, and the rival temple was ultimately built in 332 under the sanction of Alexander the Great. This account must however be received with caution.

Where Josephus differs from Nehemiah we so often find him to be in the wrong that his narrative is open to suspicion where we have no such check. In this instance, from whatever cause, he seems to be confused, and to place his account (which may very likely represent the facts) a century too late. After the enactments mentioned in Ezra 9 10 5 Neh. 10 31 13 23 28, it is improbable that foreign marriages would still be occurring in Jerusalem in 333.

On the other hand the story fits on very well to the events mentioned in Neh. 13 28, so that it would seem that Josephus confounds Darius Nothus with Codomannus and fills out his story accordingly. It is possible that he is following a trustworthy tradition in ascribing the foundation of the temple to the time of Alexander, and that he intentionally connects with it the story of Manasseh in order to cast discredit on the Samaritan religion as being founded by a renegade priest. Cp SANBALLAT. We may therefore put the secession of Manasseh soon after 432, and perhaps accept Josephus' account that the temple was built about 332.

The Temple continued to exist till 128 B.C. when it was destroyed by John Hyrcanus, in pursuance of the same exclusive policy noticed above. From the time of Alexander, Samaria shared the varying fortunes of its neighbours, gradually losing any political importance it ever possessed. A few events only need be mentioned. The city of Samaria was embellished by Herod the Great and renamed Sebaste in honour of Augustus. The temple on Mt. Gerizim was rebuilt by the Romans as a reward for Samaritan help in the suppression of Bar Kokhba's revolt. But such favourable treatment was not often received or deserved by them. After the national existence of Judah had been destroyed under Titus and Hadrian the animosity of the Samaritans turned towards the growing power and claims of the Christians. Their excesses were repressed by Justinian with a severity from which they never recovered.

During the middle ages only scattered notices of the Samaritans occur, and the native records are little more than lists of names. Colonies are mentioned by Benjamin of Tudela (died 1173) as living in several cities besides Nāblus (Shechem), and Obadiah of Bartinoro (circa 1487) speaks of them in Cairo. There certainly was a community in Damascus, and probably also in Cairo, as late as the seventeenth century. In more modern times communications were opened with them by Scaliger and continued by Huntington, Ludolf and others. At the present day the only remnant of them is at Nāblus (Shechem). They number about 120 persons, and 'the forty' (families) have become locally proverbial. According to a recent traveller attempts are being now made to save the tribe from extinction by encouraging intermarriages with the neighbouring Jewish families, but hitherto with little success, although no difficulty seems to be felt on religious grounds.

4a. Doctrine: books.

i. Sacred books.—The Samaritans are by no means a Jewish sect. Though they started from the same point the development of their respective systems has proceeded on independent, though naturally parallel, lines. Their only sacred book is the Pentateuch, of which they possess a recension agreeing essentially with the Jewish (Massoretic) text. (See TEXT AND VERSIONS, § 45.)

At what time they first received the Pentateuch cannot now be determined; but it is most natural to suppose that a copy (or copies) of the law would be carried by Manasseh to Samaria at the time of his migration thither. It is not probable that any but the priestly caste would possess, or would be allowed to possess, a copy of it at that time. If then Manasseh took with him a book of the law as part of his priestly equipment about 430, this would explain the fact that the Samaritans accepted it in its final form, which, according to modern criticism, had probably been attained about that date.

The reason why the Pentateuch alone of Jewish books was taken over is obvious. The Tōrāh is of the highest importance, not for its historical contents, but as containing practical rules for the ritual 'of the God of the land,' and the hălākhāh or regulations by which the daily 'walk' of Jew and Samaritan alike must be governed. These things alone are of vital importance; matters of faith and theoretical doctrine are secondary. Moreover, even among the Jews, the other books had not yet acquired the authority which they possessed at a later time. Having once accepted the Tōrāh, the Samaritans followed its injunctions with a rigidity recognised even by the Jews. For example, in Jn. 4 8 the disciples went into a Samaritan city to buy food, apparently as a matter of course, whilst the question in v. 9 probably refers to the asking of a favour, and the following comment is a later gloss. At a later time Jewish opinion became more hostile, and various charges were laid against them, mostly, it would seem, without foundation. 'He that eateth bread of a Cuthæan is as one that eateth swine's flesh.' They were accused of worshipping a dove and a god Ăshīmā. For the former there is no evidence, nor is it even probable from what we know of them otherwise; the latter is due to a malicious misunderstanding of the Samaritan pronunciation of שמא (eshma, 'the name') which they everywhere substitute for יהוה, just as the Jews read ארני (and earlier השם), from motives of reverence. But while holding closely to the Levitical law as the one thing needful, the Samaritans did develop theoretical doctrine, based upon the Tōrāh, if not derived from it. The earliest evidence for anything of the kind is contained in Jn. 4.

[1] In Ezra 4 12 'to us' suggests that Samaritans had been accustomed to use Jerusalem as a sacred place before the return.

[2] [On the constitution of the Samaritan community see further Duhm's commentary on Isaiah (chaps. 56-66); Che. Introd. Is. 316 f., 322, 364-374 385; Jew. Rel. Life, 25-68.]

4*b*. Eschatology.

ii. Eschatology.—The belief in a Messiah is already established, in Jn. 4, and from later Samaritan sources we now know its character.

The Messiah is called תהבה, the Tāhēb, a term variously explained to mean 'he who returns' or (more probably) 'he who restores,' and the belief is founded on Dt. 18 15. He will bring to an end the period of Fanūta (פנותה), which has lasted since the schism of Eli who removed the tabernacle to Shiloh, and, as the name probably implies, he will restore the period of grace (riḍwān, רחותה) with the tabernacle and the worship of the Lord on Mt. Gerizim, as well as the temporal prosperity of the nation, after which he will die.

The chief external information on such points is in the writings of the Christian fathers, who assert that the Samaritans did not believe in angels, the resurrection, or a future life. These statements are due partly to a confusion, and partly to a disregard of the development of theological speculation, since we know from native sources that all these doctrines were held at least from the fourth century onward. Nevertheless the patristic account very probably rests on a basis of genuine tradition.

If the Samaritans acquired their law and their priestly system about 430 B.C., they no doubt took over with them the set of beliefs current at the time in Jerusalem. But in the fifth century B.C. Jewish theology was not concerned with eschatological doctrines, or at any rate had never formulated them, and the Samaritans, being essentially conservative, probably developed doctrine more slowly than the progressive Pharisaic party in Judæa. (Cp ESCHATOLOGY, § 45.)

The native literature, from which alone we can safely judge of the beliefs of the Samaritans, begins only in the fourth century A.D., and we then find them in full possession of those doctrines which the Christian fathers denied to them. It would therefore seem that the patristic account perpetuates a tradition which had once been correct but had ceased to be so. In the liturgies frequent references are made to the Tāhēb. Closely connected with that belief is the doctrine of the final judgment, which shall be after the death of the Tāhēb, when the righteous shall go into the garden of Eden, and the wicked be burned with fire.

The full expression is יום נקם ושלם (sometimes יום דינה רבה) derived from Dt. 32 35, where the Samaritan text reads ליום for the Massoretic לי. The character of the future life to be enjoyed by the righteous is not further described. It would seem that the condition of the dead in the interval between the present time and the final judgment is capable of alteration, since prayers are offered on their behalf.

4*c*. Angels.

With regard to the belief in angels the case is quite as clear. It has often been said that angels were considered merely as aspects of the divine energy, virtutes dei, and this view was supported with much ingenuity by Reland. It is indeed true that such apparent abstractions as כבודה and טובה are often mentioned; but there can be no reasonable doubt that these were considered as the names of real persons, nor have we any ground for supposing the Samaritan mind capable of any more abstract conception. In their Targum an angel is regularly introduced instead of the name of God wherever it is possible so to avoid anthropomorphism. Man is formed in the image of the angels, and it is an angel who spoke with Moses from the bush. This is only one instance, out of many, of their spiritual conception of God. He is eternal, without beginning, without a companion. He uttered a word without a mouth and the world was created from nothing. He rested on the seventh day, but not from weariness. Possibly owing to the unapproachable attributes of God we find prayers offered through the mediation of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, of Joseph, the seventy elders, the holy angels, and more especially of Moses. Thus the development of Samaritan theology corresponds in the main with the development of Jewish belief, by which, no doubt, it was in some respects influenced.

4*d*. Gerizim.

iii. Mt. Gerizim.—The essential points of difference were with regard to Moses and Mt. Gerizim. Moses is the only prophet and apostle of God, of miraculous birth, destined from the creation to reveal the law to Israel. In Dt. 34 10 the Samaritans read לא יקום for לא קם, and on this ground admit no later prophets. From the Jewish point of view the most insurmountable difference was the Samaritan reverence for Mt. Gerizim. It is called the 'blessed mountain,' 'the house of God,' and is regarded as the place which Yahwè chose to place his name there.

On Gerizim are still shown the sites of the altars built by Adam and Seth, the altar built by Noah after the flood, and the altar on which Abraham was about to sacrifice Isaac. A few yards off was the thicket in which the ram was caught, and on this spot afterwards stood the Holy of Holies of the Samaritan temple. On Gerizim, too, are the stones brought up from the Jordan whereon Joshua wrote the words of the law (Dt. 27 4, Gerizim being read for Ebal), and there are still celebrated the most sacred rites of the community.

4*e*. Institutions.

iv. Priesthood and festivals.—The priestly family of the house of Aaron died out in 1624 A.D., and the office is now held by Levites of a younger branch, who do not bear the title of 'high priest' (כהנה רבה). The festivals observed are the same as those of the Jews in so far as they are authorised by the Pentateuch. They do not therefore keep Purim, nor any of the later and more specially Jewish ceremonies, such as Ḥănukkah or the 9th of Ab. Half-yearly, sixty days before Passover and Tabernacles respectively, they keep the assembly (צמות, also an astronomical term, 'conjunction') of those feasts, when every man pays to the priest a half shekel, and a calendar for the ensuing six months is fixed. The Passover is still celebrated by the offering of sacrifice on Mt. Gerizim. The whole congregation assembles before dawn at the door of the synagogue, and then proceeds in pilgrimage (the meaning they attach to the term חג, ḥajj) up the mountain, where specially selected lambs are sacrificed, baked entire for some hours in a hole in the ground, and then, at sunset (בין הערבים), eaten in haste. Then follow the seven days of unleavened bread, on the last of which they again make the pilgrimage. The day of Pentecost is kept as the anniversary of the giving of the law. For these, as well as for New Year, the day of Atonement, the feast of Tabernacles, and many minor occasions, there are special services, besides the ordinary prayers for Sabbath. There are also services for circumcision (which must be performed on the eighth day, even though it be a Sabbath), for marriage, and for burial.

With regard to the sects alleged to have existed among the Samaritans, it is impossible to arrive at any certain facts. The accounts are confused, and there seems to be no mention of them in the native literature.

The native literature naturally centres in the one sacred book, the Pentateuch, which has been preserved, as mentioned above, in a recension agreeing in all essentials with the MT. It first became known in Europe from a copy brought, together with the Targum, from Damascus by the great traveller Pietro della Valle in 1616, and now preserved in the Vatican library. The text was published in the Paris Polyglott from which it was afterwards copied by Walton, and its variations from the MT gave rise to the keenest controversy. The question is by no means settled yet, nor can it be so until we have a thoroughly critical edition of the text. The many passages in which the Samaritan agrees with the Septuagint against the Massoretic, show that a study of it is important. The MSS are many, mostly dated, but not of great age.

5a. Literature: Torah and Targum.

The copy in the synagogue at Nāblus is regarded with great veneration as having been written by Abisha the great-grandson of Aaron, thirteen years after the entry into Canaan. No scholar has ever had the opportunity of examining it with a view to determining its date; but there are no reasons for supposing that it is much older than the twelfth or thirteenth century, about which time its 'invention' is chronicled by Abulfatḥ.

Several translations of the Pentateuch were made.

1. Perhaps it was translated into Greek. τὸ Σαμαρειτικόν is quoted by the early fathers; but we have no certain information about it, and cannot even say whether it was a distinct version or whether the citations of it are only a loose way of citing the Sam.-Hebrew text.

2. It was translated into Samaritan proper, or Aramaic. The most noticeable feature of this Targum is its frequently close resemblance to Onkelos. Until this fact has been thoroughly investigated the most reasonable explanation of it seems to be that both Targums go back to an oral tradition current in Palestine at the time when Aramaic was the common language of the people, and that they were subsequently reduced to writing independently, and with local variations, in Samaria (probably in the 4th cent. A.D.) and in Babylon. It was brought to Europe, as mentioned above, in 1616, and first printed in the Paris Polyglott. MSS of it are very scarce, since the language died out before the eleventh century, and copies were no longer multiplied.

For the same reason the text has suffered much corruption and is by no means yet definitely settled even in the best edition. In character the Aramaic translation is very literal; it very carefully avoids anthropomorphisms. It seems to be by several hands, and to have received interpolations at a later period. These and the corruptions of copyists are, according to the latest researches, responsible for most of the enigmatical words formerly supposed to be specially Samaritan.

3. The origin of the translation into Arabic is obscure. It was perhaps made by Abulḥasan of Tyre in the eleventh century, and revised early in the thirteenth century by Abu Said. There are many good MSS of it. The translator apparently made use of the Jewish Arabic version by Saadiah Gaon.

The Chronicles which have come down to us are: (1) A Book of Joshua, in Arabic, giving the history of Israel (i.e., the Samaritans) from the time of Joshua to the fourth century A.D. It is a compilation, dating perhaps from the thirteenth century. As history its value is very small, since it consists mostly of fabulous stories of the deeds of Joshua, whilst its later chronology is of the wildest. (2) El-Tōlīdeh, in Samaritan-Hebrew with an Arabic translation. It contains the history (or rather annals) from Adam to the present time. The original part of it is ascribed to Eleazar b. Amram in the middle of the twelfth century, and it has been carried on by various writers from time to time. The history, if used with caution, is generally trustworthy, especially for the period just preceding the date of each several author. (3) The chronicle of Abulfatḥ written, in Arabic, in 1355 A.D., is a compilation from earlier works. By a comparison of these two (El-tōlīdeh and Abulfatḥ) it is possible to arrive at a tolerably trustworthy account of the Samaritan families in the Middle Ages. Of commentaries and theological works there is a considerable number in MS; but very little has been published.

5b. Chronicles.

One of the most interesting is a fragment on Genesis by an unknown author, in Arabic, remarkable as quoting from many books of the OT and from the Mishna. A commentary by Marḳah on the Pentateuch survives in a late but apparently unique MS in Berlin, and is linguistically important as being composed in the Samaritan dialect of which there are few specimens outside the Targum. Others are, a book of legends of Moses in Arabic, and a commentary by Ibrahim 'of the sons of Jacob,' from which extracts have been given by Geiger.

The liturgies form a very large and important branch of the literature. The earliest pieces which can be dated with any certainty, are those of Marḳah and Amram, composed in Aramaic in the fourth century A.D. at the instance of Baba Rabba, a sheikh of some eminence in his time, who, according to El-Tōlīdeh, restored the services of the synagogue. These are called par excellence the Defter or 'book.' The later portions are in Samaritan-Hebrew mostly of the fourteenth and subsequent centuries down to the present time. MSS of the later liturgies are very numerous.

5c. Liturgies, etc.

Finally, there are several letters in existence, written by Samaritans to scholars in Europe. The first of these, in 1589, was an answer to one from Jos. Scaliger; others were addressed to Huntington, Ludolf, De Sacy, Kautzsch (in 1884), and recently to the present writer.

The Samaritan language proper is a dialect of Western Aramaic as commonly spoken in Palestine, and is found in the Targum and in the earlier liturgies. It may best be compared with the Aramaic of the Jerusalem Talmud, and with Palestinian Syriac. The 'Cuthæan' words formerly supposed to be found in it, have been shown by Kohn to be mostly corruptions of good Aramaic forms. The native dialect probably began to be supplemented by Arabic soon after the Mohammedan conquest of Syria, and was no longer commonly understood in the tenth century, although used for ritual purposes. From that time onward Arabic has been the language used both in ordinary life and for literary purposes. The later liturgies, however (and the letters), are written in a corrupt Hebrew.

According to Schrader the words are Hebraised from šumgir-nabû, 'be gracious, Nebo' (KAT(2), 416); but Giesebrecht conjectures a corruption of שַׂר מג, šar-mag, equivalent to רב מג, rab-mag, which implies virtual dittography. 𝔊 connects ναβου with the following name (see SARSECHIM).

The truth, however, probably is, that the editor had a corrupt text before him, and tried in vain to make Babylonian names out of the false readings. נבו might come from נֹדָב, NODAB (q.v.); סמגר from [ס]רסכם. SARSECHIM (q.v.) was therefore written twice over, and once it has taken the place of שַׂר (before נדב). Read therefore 'and the prince of Nodab' (one of the Jeraḥmeelite princes in the army of king Nebuchadrezzar, at least, if some other name—not Babylonian—does not underlie 'Nebuchadrezzar'). SAMOS (ϲαμοϲ, 1 Macc. 15_{23} Acts 20_{15}). The third in size of the four large islands (Lesbos, Chios, Samos, and Cos) which lie off the western coast of Asia Minor, all appearing in the narrative of Paul's journeys.

1. Geography and history.

Samos lies at the mouth of the bay of Ephesus, into which the Cayster flows, and so midway between Ephesus and Miletus by the sea route. It gained its name from the line of 'lofty broken summits' (so described by Tozer, Islands of the Ægean, 157 f.) running from E. to W. through the island; for the name Samos means 'height' (Str. 346, σάμους ἐκάλουν τὰ ὕψη. Cp id. 457, and see SAMOTHRACE). The highest point, Mt. Kerki (anc. Kerketeus) is 4725 ft. high, a conspicuous feature from all the surrounding islands. Between the eastern extremity of the island (Cape Colonna, anc. Poseidium) and the long well-wooded ridge of Mycale on the mainland (Herod. 1_{148}) there is a narrow 'marine pass' about one mile in width; this strait was the scene of the Greek victory over the Persian fleet and army in 479 B.C. (Herod. 9_{100} f.).

The Samians at an early period were distinguished for their maritime enterprise (cp Paus. vi. 2_{9}); it was a Samian who first ventured through the pillars of Herakles into the western ocean (Herod. 4_{152}; cp Thuc. 1_{13}; Plin. HN 7_{57}). Samian power and splendour reached their highest pitch under the so-called tyrant Polycrates (c. 533-522 B.C.) who made the island for a short time the mistress of the eastern Ægean. At this period Samos had extensive commercial relations with Egypt (Herod. 2_{178}). She produced oil in abundance; but her wine was not of the best quality (Str. 637). Her trade was largely in pottery (cp Plin. HN 35_{46}, Samia in esculentis laudantur).[1] Many Jews resided in the island (1 Macc. 15_{23}); and they, and the Samians generally, enjoyed the liberality of Herod the Great, who with Agrippa was in the island in 14 A.D. (Jos. Ant. xvi. 2_{2}; BJ i. 21_{11}, τὰς εἰς Λυκίους ἢ Σαμίους δωρεάς). In Paul's time Samos was a libera civitas (Plin. HN 5_{37}; Dio Cass. 54_{9}) in the Province of Asia by the favour of Augustus; Vespasian deprived it of this privilege (Suet. Vesp. 8).

The island and its chief town bore the same name. The town (now Tigani) lay on the SE. shore, whereas the modern capital, Vathy, is on the N. of the island. The question of the meaning of the word in the account of Paul's voyage is difficult (cp the case of Chios, Acts 20_{15}).

2. NT reference.

In neither case apparently did the ship stop at the town or its harbour itself, nor did Paul land. 'The ship evidently stopped every evening. The reason lies in the wind, which in the Ægean during the summer generally blows from the N., beginning at a very early hour in the morning; in the late afternoon it dies away; at sunset there is a dead calm, and thereafter a gentle S. wind arises and blows during the night' (Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, 293). It stopped at a point opposite Chios (κατηντήσαμεν ἄντικρυς Χίου, 'came . . . over against,' EV), i.e., probably in the strait between Chios the capital of the island, and Cape Argennum on the opposite mainland. Next morning they struck across to Samos making a course either E. of S., to the western extremity of that island, by the Great Boghaz (so Ramsay, l.c.), or more easterly across the Caystrian Bay to the eastern extremity of the island, so as to pass through the Little Boghaz or strait of Mycale. In either case, the failure of the breeze from the N. found them at Trogyllium (the reference to which should undoubtedly be retained from DHLP: see TROGYLLIUM), and there is no need to understand Samos to be the town, and not rather the island merely; for the Greek word translated 'arrived at' (παρεβάλομεν, so AV; 'touched at,' RV) does not necessarily imply stoppage or landing at the harbour of Samos. Probably it was this erroneous idea that was largely responsible for the omission of the reference to Trogyllium; for the distance between the town of Samos and the anchorage of Trogyllium (5 m., according to Strabo 636) is too small to make a distinct stage of the voyage. It ought, however, to be noticed that μείναντες need not be restricted to spending the night at anchor, but might indicate a short stop occurring during the final run between Samos and Miletus; but the order of the words seems to be opposed to that interpretation.

[1] Cp Vulg. in Is. 45_{9}, testa de Samiis terræ.

SAMOTHRACE RV, AV Samothracia (ϹΑΜΟΘΡΑΚΗ, Acts 16 11). The two conspicuous features of the Thracian sea are Mt. Athos and the island of Samothrace. The island is described as a 'huge boulder planted in the sea,' towering above Imbros and conspicuous from the Thracian and the Asiatic shore.

Homer, who calls the island the 'Thracian Samos,' describes the seat of Poseidon on its topmost peak overlooking 'all Ida, with the city of Priam and the ships of the Achæans' (Il. 13 12, ὑψοῦ ἐπ' ἀκροτάτης κορυφῆς Σάμου ὑλῃέσσης Θρηϊκίης κ.τ.λ. cp Verg. Æn. 7 208, Threiciamque Samum, quæ nunc Samothracia fertur; Strabo, 331, frg. 50, ἐκαλεῖτο δὲ ἡ Σαμοθρᾴκη Σάμος πρίν).[1]

So excellent a sailing-mark, placed also at a convenient distance in the passage from the Asiatic to the Thracian and Macedonian shores was certain to arrest attention. The ship in which Paul sailed from Troas (Acts 16 11) 'ran before the wind' (εὐθυδρομήσαμεν, 'came with [RV 'made'] a straight course') to the island, passing probably to the E. of Imbros, in order to avoid the Mythonaës reef which lies off the coast of Lemnos. Although the island possesses several good anchorages, it has no good harbour (vel importuosissima omnium, is its description by Plin. HN 4 23). The safest landing-place is near the promontory Acroteri at the western end of the island, and there was probably the ancient anchorage Demetrion, in which Paul's vessel may have spent the night at anchor. The old capital (now Palæopoli) is on the northern side. The voyage to Macedonia thus occupied two days (v. 11), whereas the reverse journey on a subsequent occasion took five days (Acts 20 6).

In history Samothrace is chiefly famous as the main seat of the worship of the Cabiri and the religious mysteries connected therewith. The Cabiri were known to the Greeks as 'the Great Gods,' and were probably pre-Hellenic and in the main of Semitic origin. Their worship was of great celebrity and lasted to a very late time. Both Philip of Macedon and his wife Olympias were initiated into the Cabiri mysteries (Plut. Alex. 2). After Delos, Samothrace numbered more votaries than any other spot in the Ægean (see Herod. 2 51; Aristoph. Pax, 277; Tac. Ann. 2 54). The cult was in full vigour in Paul's time. It was owing to its celebrity that Samothrace, which belonged to the Thracian kingdom, became a free state when Thrace was reduced to a province in 46 A.D. by Claudius (cp Tac. Hist. 1 11).

SAMPSAMES (ϹΑΜΨΑΚΗ [A], ϹΑΜΨΑΜΗ [ℵV], lampsaco [whence EV^mg. LAMPSACUS], samsamæ [Vg.]) a locality mentioned first in a list of peoples and countries in 1 Macc. 15 23. According to Grimm, identical with Samsun, which is described by Abulfeda as lying on the Black Sea between Trebizond and Sinope. But some better known people or place is surely meant. The reading σαμψακη (cp Vet. Lat.) is almost certainly an intentional corruption arising from the difficulty felt in identifying Sampsame (so, rather than Sampsames).

[1] Samos = height: cp Strabo, 346, σάμους ἐκάλουν τὰ ὕψη. The word is of Semitic origin. The Samothracian coins are all subsequent to the time of Alexander. On an imperial coin of Hadrian occurs the remarkable inscription Σαμίων ἐν Θράκῃ. On some the fore-part of a ram, or a ram's head, occurs, a symbol of the cult of lower-world divinities of a pre-Hellenic type. See Head, Hist. Numm. 226.

SAMSON (שִׁמְשׁוֹן, Šimšôn, i.e., 'solar'; the MT pronunciation is not so old as that of 𝔊, ϹΑΜΨΩΝ [BAL]; cp Šamšânu [Hilprecht]).

1. Story of Samson. The great enemy of the Philistines is reckoned as one of the judges of Israel in two editorial notes which belong to the chronological scheme of the book of Judges (15 20 [see Budde's note], 16 31); but this view is not that of the story of Samson itself. The story of Samson is a self-contained narrative by a single hand (Judg. 13 2-16 31*a*; see, however, § 3) and represents Samson not as a judge but as a popular hero of vast strength and sarcastic humour, who has indeed been consecrated from his birth as the deliverer of Israel, and is not unaware of his vocation, but still is inspired by no serious religious or patriotic purpose, and becomes the enemy of the Philistines only from personal motives of revenge, the one passion which is stronger in him than the love of women. In his life, and still more in his death, he inflicts great injury on the oppressors of Israel; but he is never the head of a national uprising against them, nor do the Israelites receive any real deliverance at his hands. The story of his exploits is plainly taken from the mouths of the people, and one is tempted to conjecture that originally his Nazirite vow was conceived simply as a vow of revenge, which is the meaning it would have in an Arab story. Our narrator, however, conceives Samson's life as a sort of prelude to the work of Saul (13 5), and brings out its religious and national significance in this respect in the opening scene (chap. 13), which is closely parallel to the story of Gideon, and in the tragic close (chap. 16); whilst yet the character of Samson, who generally is quite forgetful of his mission, remains much as it had been shaped in rude popular tale in a circle which, like Samson himself, was but dimly conscious of the national and religious vocation of Israel.

Though the name means 'solar,'[1] neither name nor story lends any solid support to Steinthal's idea that the hero is nothing but a solar myth (cp Wellh. CH 229 f. [and GASm. HG 222 f.; Wellhausen, whilst he rejects Steinthal's myth theory, also denies Samson's historical character]). He is a member of an undoubtedly historical family of those Danites who had their standing camp near ZORAH, not far from the Philistine border, before they moved north and seized Laish (cp 13 25 with 18 8 11 f.). The family of MANOAH (q.v.) had a hereditary sepulchre at Zorah, where Samson was said to lie (16 31), and their name continued to be associated with Zorah even after the exile, when it appears that the MANAHETHITES of Zorah were reckoned as Calebites. The name had remained though the race changed (1 Ch. 2 52 54). The narrative of Samson's marriage and riddle is of peculiar interest as a record of manners; specially noteworthy is the custom of the wife remaining with her parents after marriage (cp Gen. 2 24). See KINSHIP, § 8, and DAN, § 3.

After all has been said, the probability of mythic elements remains. When we consider the great sus-

2. Mythic elements. ceptibility of the Jews in later times for a folklore containing features of mythic origin, it is intrinsically probable that the beliefs of the early Israelites were also affected by mythology. That this is so in the case of the Samson-story seems likely, if the present text is on the whole correct (cp § 4). If the hero's name was really Samson, and if in the neighbourhood commonly con-

[1] It is worth noting that Samson's tribe or clan bears a name (Dan, i.e., judge) which belongs specially to the Assyrian sun-god, and that there is Egyptian evidence for the existence of a place called Šamšan in the neighbourhood of the southern Dan. See BETH-SHEMESH, 1.

nected with Samson there was really a Canaanitish sanctuary called Beth-shemesh (but known perhaps, as Budde conjectures, in earlier times as Bit-Ninib; see HERES, MOUNT), we may venture to infer the existence of a primitive solar myth. In short, we may in this case surmise that there may have been a solar hero analogous to Gilgameš,[1] who bore the name or title Šamšân, which ultimately attached itself to some real or imagined champion of the Danites, or even of the people of Israel against Philistine oppression. Some of the exploits of the legendary Samson may also have affinities with nature myths; but nature myths had become no more than 'fairy tales' by the time they supplied details to the plastic imagination of the people.

See Steinthal's essay on Samson (1862), translated in Goldziher's Hebrew Mythology (by R. Martineau), 392-446, also Goldziher's remarks, pp. 21 f., Stucken, Astralmythen, 14-6 72-75 (1898), and references in Moore's commentary, and cp Budde, Das Buch der Richter, 109, Van Doorninck, Th.T, 1894, pp. 14-32, 1896, pp. 162-167. 3. A national champion?

Robertson Smith's view that the Samson-story forms a single narrative would perhaps have been modified by him, had he been able to take his part in current debates. It is very possible that the narrative is of composite origin, and that in one of its forms it represented the hero as a national champion. It is true, Moore (Judges, 313) contrasts the 'solitary hero' Samson who 'in his own quarrel, single-handed, makes havoc among the Philistines' with Ehud, Deborah and Barak, Gideon, and Jephthah, 'who, at the head of their tribesmen, "turned to flight the armies of the aliens," and delivered their countrymen.' But according to Budde (Richter, 92 [1897]), each of the two great sources or strata of early tradition had a national champion: the S. Israelitish source (J) Samson the Danite; the N. Israelitish source (E) Samuel the Ephraimite. Samuel in J (1 S. 9 f.) is only Yahwè's messenger to Saul; in the war of liberation he plays no part. In a similar case (Judg. 4; Jabin and Sisera) the redactor effected a fusion of kindred narratives; in the case of the two Samson stories he preserved the individuality of each. Budde also thinks that there were two forms of the Yahwistic story of Samson (J_1 and J_2) which a redactor harmonised. See further, JUDGES [BOOK], and Van Doorninck, l.c.; also SHAMMAH, SHAMGAR (the legends of Samson present points of contact with the legends of these heroes).

4. New hypothesis.

Whilst granting that the Samson-legends as we now have them seem to present 'motives' derived from a solar myth, the present writer cannot any longer admit that there were such mythic elements in the original legend of the Danite deliverer.

1. That the scene of the legends has been shifted, and that as a consequence the name of the hero has undergone modification, seems for several reasons highly probable. A close examination of the text may convince us that this has occurred in other stories in the Book of Judges; indeed warning is already given in Judg. 3 3, if the nations by which Israel was to be 'proved' are catalogued, according to a very probable restoration of the text, as 'the five princes (read רוזני) of the Zarephathites, and all the Kenizzites, and the Misrites, and the Horites that dwell in the mountains of Jerahmeel unto the entrance of Maacath.' The first heroic impulses, we are told in 13 25, came to Samson 'in Mahaneh-dan, between Zorah and Eshtaol.' But the original text may have said, 'between Miṣṣur and Eshtaol,' while for MAHANEH-DAN (q.v.), we should read 'Manaḥath-dan'; see 1 Ch. 2 52-54, where the Chronicler, like modern critics, is puzzled at the combination of Manaḥath-dan both with Zorah and Eshtaol and (see Judg. 18 11 f.) with Kirjath-jearim; the present writer believes that Kirjath-jearim is simply a corruption of Kirjath-jeraḥmeel, and that all the places referred to lay near together in the Negeb. According to his theory the Negeb was always a 'bone of contention' between the Zarephathites (Philistines) or Jeraḥmeelites (Arammites or Amorites) and the Israelites. The Israelite champion known to us as Samson was known to the earliest narrator only as a Cushamite. There was in fact another place in the Negeb of even more importance than either Miṣṣur or Eshtaol—viz., Cusham. Often its true name is (through a faulty geographical theory) disguised as SHECHEM (q.v., 2); but sometimes (e.g., 1 S. 6 9 ff.) as 'Beth-shemesh' (from Beth-cusham[1]). A similar corruption or distortion has occurred in the personal name Shimshai, which comes from 'Cusham.' See, further, SHIMSHAI.

2. To the question, Did the early legend of the Cushamite deliverer present mythic motives? we reply in the negative for two reasons. (a) The mythic 'motives' discovered by Winckler in the legends of the other judges rest, according to our theory, upon a precarious textual basis; and (b), not only the name Samson but also the story of the foxes, and that of the jawbone, explained by Steinthal and Stucken as mythological, are, we suspect, really based on corruptions of the text of the written story which lay before the narrator.[2] See Crit. Bib.

SAMUEL (שְׁמוּאֵל, §§ 21, 39, ϲαμογηλ [BℵAQRTL]). I. A prophet, or rather seer, who attained distinction in the period of Israel's transition to regal government.

1. Name.

Narratives respecting Samuel are contained in 1 S. 1 1-16 13 19 18-24 25 1. He is also mentioned in Jer. 15 1 (not 𝔊^A) Ps. 99 6 1 Ch. 10 13 (𝔊 not MT) 6 28 [13] 33 [18] 9 22 11 3 26 28 29 29 2 Ch. 35 18.

On the etymology, see SAUL, § 1; SHEMUEL; SHEM (NAMES WITH). The two etymologies 'asked of God' (1 S. 1 20) and 'lent to God' (v. 28) come from the narrators and have only the value of popular etymologies. This is too clear for any trained biblical scholar to deny (see Dr. TBS 13 f.).

2. Oldest traditions.

1 S. 1 1-16 13 has the appearance of forming a connected account of Samuel. A closer examination, however, shows that this section contains very inconsistent elements. The narratives have been put together from different sources, two of which (the parallel reports fused together in 1 S. 4 1*b*-7 1) make no mention of Samuel, and they have received their present form by a complicated process of redaction. The inconsistencies which they present are to be explained by the transformation which the traditional picture of Samuel experienced in connection with the development of religious ideas in Israel and in the Jewish community. This transformation is no isolated phenomenon. In many another people a variation in the national and religious ideals has produced a corresponding change in the picture of the old national heroes. Since life means continual change, the great men of a people can live on only through a constant modification of the forms which they wear in memory.

The oldest notices of Samuel occur in the section 1 S. 9 10 1-16 13 1 7*a* 16-18 23 14 1-46 (see SAMUEL [BOOKS], § 3). Samuel is there represented as a seer (רֹאֶה), who at the same time officiates as a priest on the bāmāh ('high place') of a small country-town in the 'land of Zuph' (9 5)—i.e., the district inhabited by the clan so called. [Cp PROPHET, § 5.]

The name of the town is not given, from which Budde (ZATW 8 225) infers that it was certainly not Ramah, which is the name given in the later narratives. But what can have induced later writers to place Samuel's dwelling in Ramah, unless this were the view of the older tradition? For we find other places (Gilgal, Mizpah, Bethel) mentioned as the scenes of his official activity.

At any rate Samuel is a much respected seer, whose predictions are thoroughly trustworthy; but his reputation is only local, for Saul, who dwells at Gibeah in Benjamin, is unacquainted with him, and has his attention called to him for the first time by his servant. The story of the meeting of Samuel and Saul is well known. Saul was in quest of the lost she-asses of his father, and his servant wished him to fee the man of God to tell them where to go. Samuel on his side was already expecting the visitor. He knew by revelation that the destined ruler of Israel would be sent to him, and after announcing to Saul his high destiny, he specified three striking experiences which he would have as he returned home. These were to be the sign of the truth of the announcement. Not long after, the first exploit of Saul marked him out to the people as their king (1 S. 11). The narrative contains two mentions of Samuel; but the words 'and after Samuel' in v. 7 and the whole of vv. 12-14 are later insertions. Saul and the people are the two parties in the great ceremony whereby Saul is made king 'before Yahwè' at Gilgal.

3. Later traditions. The later strata in the Book of Samuel are distinguished from this old tradition by the increased importance which they attribute to Samuel. They represent him, not as a seer of merely local reputation, but as an authority for the whole of Israel; and, so far as they have not a deuteronomic colouring, they regard him as a prophet (נָבִיא). We turn first to the two narratives in (a) 1 S. 1 1-28 2 11-26 3 1-20 (transpose v. 20 and v. 21; see 𝔊), and (b) chap. 15. The former describes the youth of Samuel, bringing him into connection with the old sanctuary at Shiloh. He was the son of the Ephraimite (or, more precisely, the Zuphite)[1] Elkanah and of his favourite wife Hannah, who had long been childless, and had vowed to give the son who might be born to her to Yahwè (1 S. 1 11).[2] He grew up at Shiloh, where he acted as Eli's minister, and became the true heir of Eli's spirit, the two sons of Eli, Hophni and Phinehas, being worldly and degenerate. While still young he learned by revelation the impending fall of the house of Eli, and afterwards he became known as a prophet whose words came true, 'from Dan even to Beersheba.'

The narratives in (b) regard Samuel as a prophet whose home was in Ramah. The command to exterminate the Amalekites was transmitted by him to Saul, who obeyed, but, in violation of the ban (ḥērem; see BAN), spared the Amalekite king (see AGAG) and the best of the animals taken. A revelation then came to Samuel to the effect that Yahwè repented that he had made Saul king. The prophet announced this to the disobedient king at the Judæan Carmel, and then hewed Agag in pieces before Yahwè's altar (1 S. 15). The chapter presupposes the tradition in 1 S. 9 10 1-16, since Samuel expressly refers (v. 1; cp v. 17) to his having anointed Saul. The author must have lived in the time of the first literary prophets, or at any rate have shared their circle of ideas. Samuel confronts Saul very much as Isaiah confronts Ahaz (Is. 7), and the saying in 1 S. 15 22 f. is entirely in the prophetic manner.[3] Much as we sympathise with this fine utterance, the following verses place Samuel in an extremely unpleasing light from our modern point of view. Vatke does not mince matters when he says (Die Religion des AT, 1835, p. 300), 'Samuel appears here as a stern and obstinate zealot'; but his words are true. The passage in question is largely responsible for unfavourable judgments on Samuel's character.

4. Dt. Narratives. The deuteronomistic narratives (1 S. 7 2-8 22 10 17 27 12 1-25) show a further tendency to glorify Samuel. This hero of tradition now becomes the last of the Judges of all Israel in succession to Eli. Like Eli, he is also a priest of Yahwè, and it is he who brings the Israelites back to the worship of Israel's God. It is Samuel too who delivers Israel from the yoke of the Philistines, gaining a brilliant victory as the reward of a national repentance and reformation[4] (see EBEN-EZER, BETH-CAR). In his

[4] [Kittel is of opinion (Hist. 2 108) that, though 1 S. 7 in its present form is 'decidedly unhistorical,' there is an element of early tradition in it (similarly Budde). He therefore accepts the assembly at Mizpah under the presidency of Samuel issuing in a religious reform as historical. To Stade such a distinction old age he appoints his sons to be judges. Their gross misconduct is given as the reason why the chief men of Israel desire a king. It is, however, a foolish and wicked desire, and in obedience to a divine command Samuel warns the Israelites of the hardships to which the subjects of a king are liable. Their request, nevertheless, is granted. At Mizpah a religious assembly of the people is held. The sacred lot falls upon Saul, who receives the admiring homage of the people. Before transferring the reins of power to Saul's hands, however, Samuel makes a solemn 'apologia' to the people, coupling this with a farewell charge. How the writer of chap. 12 harmonised his representations with 7 15, indeed whether he himself noticed the inconsistency (Josephus, Ant. vi. 13 5, certainly did not) we have not the means of judging.

5. Post-Deut. embellishments. Subsequently to the time when the historical books underwent the deuteronomistic redaction, three narratives arose as the result of reflection on the traditional narrative. Their late origin is shown both by the nature of the contents and by their very loose connection with the surrounding narratives. (a) One is the story of the early anointing of David by Samuel in accordance with a divine command (1 S. 16 1-13), which is inconsistent with the traditional account in 2 S. 2 4. To remove this contradiction, or at any rate to justify the statement in 2 S. 2 4, the Chronicler assumes that the anointing at Hebron was in obedience to the word of Yahwè by Samuel (1 Ch. 11 3). (b) Another is the account of the very early rejection of Saul (1 S. 13 7*b*-15*a*), inserted in the account of Saul's war against the Philistines. This passage is merely an anticipation of chap. 15. (c) A third is an anecdote in which Samuel appears, like an Elijah or an Elisha, as the head of the prophetic community in Ramah, with which David seeks refuge (1 S. 19 18-24). See DAVID, § 1 (end).

In one of those passages of the Book of Jeremiah which betray the hand of an editor (Jer. 15 1; not 𝔊A)[1] we find Samuel placed beside Moses as an intercessor for his people and a hero of prayer. The same view of him, which is clearly due to exegetical study of the Book of Samuel (see, e.g., 1 S. 7 9 8 6 12 18), is given in Ps. 99 6 (post-exilic). The Chronicler even makes Samuel a member of the tribe of Levi because, according to the Book of Samuel, he offers sacrifices; in 1 Ch. 6 22-28 [7-13] and 33-38 [18-23] he gives us two genealogies which trace Samuel's descent back to Kohath.[2] Some very singular statements respecting Samuel 'the seer' will be found in 1 Ch. 9 22 26 28.

6. Summing up. To assign an equal weight to all these documents is of course impossible. The oldest are the most trustworthy, and wherever the later notices are inconsistent with the earlier and can be understood by that inevitable modification of traditional pictures of which we have spoken, they must be rejected. This at once compels us to set aside those narratives which represent Samuel as a leading prophet for all Israel, or as a zealous advocate of the exclusive worship of Yahwè, or as a judge and a deliverer of Israel from the Philistine yoke. They contradict the surest facts of the beginning of the regal period. Take the deuteronomistic narratives.[3] The transformation of facts is here radical. The presuppositions are those of an age which had no kings, and regarded kingship as opposed to the will of God, and as the means by which Israel was turned away from its true mission. Its own ideals were once, it believed, those of Israel; but by desiring a king Israel fell to the low level of the other peoples. To this we may add that if these narratives were based on an old tradition, the rise of another tradition which made Samuel a seer of merely local celebrity would be inconceivable, whereas, granted the priority of the simpler story, the growth of the deuteronomistic account is perfectly natural.

Really trustworthy material for a picture of Samuel we must seek first of all in chaps. 9 10 1-16. The tragedy in the fate both of peoples and of individuals springs from uncomprehended circumstances and neglected opportunities. The greatness of leading personalities consists in this—that they comprehend the national aspirations and turn to account favouring circumstances. Only thus can impending ruin be averted and the road to progress and prosperity be opened. Others besides Samuel may have conceived the idea that the deliverance of Israel from the Philistines was possible only for a king; but it is his inalienable merit to have found in Saul the man who appeared equal to the task, and to have awakened in him the consciousness of his divine mission. The people itself, too, comprehended the situation, and gave this a legal expression by a solemn choice of Saul at Gilgal (1 S. 11 15).

This view of the historical significance of Samuel is in perfect harmony with the statement that his course of action was determined by Yahwè, who pointed out to him Saul as the future king of Israel. Ideas which burst upon a man suddenly and seem to have no links with his other thoughts belong to modern as well as ancient experience; to the ancients it was natural to regard them as given by inspiration. When Saul's imposing form came before the seer, revealing doubtless already something of that impetuous energy which marked Saul as king, the idea may have flashed through his mind that here was Israel's king. There is no reason to doubt that Samuel became accidentally acquainted with Saul, and then anointed him king over Israel (cp SAUL, § 1).

On the other hand it is not so certain whether the account of the details of the first meeting of Samuel and Saul in chap. 9 10 1-16 is based on an exact knowledge of facts. They spoke together without witnesses, and upon Saul's accession his grown-up son Jonathan was already his best support. It is therefore very improbable that at this important moment he was but like a superior servant who could be sent out to seek for runaway asses, and that such a person should find, not indeed the asses, but a kingdom. Surely this representation is but part of the literary vehicle of the tradition.

Besides the kernel of chap. 9 10 1-16 we may regard as historical the central facts of chap. 15 1-23 32-35 [see SAUL, § 3]. The expedition against Amalek would of course not be undertaken without an oracle, and Saul's earlier relations to Samuel make it intelligible that the oracle would come from that seer. The violation of the ban corresponds to the egoistic character of the Israelites of that time, and the slaying of Agag before the altar is consistent with their religious usages. Nor need we doubt that Samuel himself hewed Agag in pieces. Probably enough, too, difficulties may have arisen between Samuel and Saul in consequence of the violation of the ban [cp SAUL, § 3]. The influences of the later period when the narrative was written will be confined to the description of the attitude of Saul on his meeting Samuel, to the statement that Samuel on this occasion made known to Saul his rejection by Yahwè, and to the fine prophetic saying ascribed to Samuel.

According to 1 S. 28 3, Samuel died and was buried at Ramah, to which 25 1 adds that his grave was in his own house, which corresponds to the early custom (cp 1 K. 2 34). This of itself shows that the late tradition which placed his dwelling-place and sepulchre at Neby Samwil is wrong. See MIZPAH. Nothing is said of Samuel's age at the time of his death. The number 20 in 1 S. 7 2 is obtained by artificial means. This is also true of the statements in Josephus (Ant. vi. 13 5 14 9) and in the Midrash. They depend on exegetical inferences which, from the nature of the sources, are destitute of any sure foundation.

1. Name. That the two books of Samuel, like the two books of Kings, originally formed one book, is explained elsewhere (CANON, § 10). The idea of dividing the respective books of Samuel and Kings comes from 𝔊,[1] where, however, the divided books are recombined as the four Books of Kingdoms (βίβλοι βασιλειῶν). It is true that the greater part of the Book of Samuel refers to the regal period, and that the gap between 2 S. 24 and 1 K. 1 is less prominent in the 𝔊^L arrangement (cp KINGS, § 1). But the older Palestinian-Hebrew arrangement has the advantage of reflecting the fact that Samuel and Kings arose by editorial redaction out of two different older works, the limits of which were only effaced when two chapters which originally belonged to Samuel were attached to the Book of Kings (1 K. 1 f.). The Book of Samuel derives its name from the fact that it opens with the story of Samuel's birth (cp the names Genesis, Exodus, etc., which correspond to the Jewish custom of naming books with reference to their commencement). In reality it describes the origin of the Israelitish kingdom, and the fortunes of Saul, Ishbaal, and David.

2. Literary history. A book, in the modern sense, Samuel can no more be said to be than any other of the historical writings of the OT. It is a compilation from older works which has passed through repeated redactions, and the final redaction of all can have occurred only after the close of the Pentateuch, in connection with the formation of the prophetic canon. Like the Torah, however, and like the other books of the 'former prophets,' the Books of Samuel attained in essentials their present form as a result of the great 'Deuteronomistic' literary movement (see HISTORICAL LITERATURE, § 7). In the book which immediately precedes Samuel this movement has left only too many traces of its influence. In Samuel, however, we are happily in a position to indicate a series of vivid and ancient narratives which is only at certain points interrupted by later insertions and additions. We must infer from this that the deuteronomistic editor or editors found this connection already in existence; in other words, the basis of our Samuel was formed by a pre-deuteronomic redaction of older works.

The insertions and additions, however, are to a great extent derived neither from the deuteronomistic nor from the final redaction. Not only do some relate to the time between both redactions, but in certain cases it seems possible that they may have been brought into their present connection before the deuteronomistic redaction occurred. The history, therefore, of the origin of the Books of Samuel, in spite of the great predominance of the ancient sources, is very complicated. It is, however, only what might have been expected, when we consider the manner in which the OT writings have come down to us; the processes of copying and of exegetical study were, in the case of Samuel, combined with redactional alteration of various kinds, and, more particularly, with additions of new materials and insertion of explanatory matter.

The Books of Samuel fall into three main divisions. (1) The history of Samuel and of Saul down to the rejection of the latter, 1 S. 1-15 (§ 3); (2) the history of David during the reigns of Saul and Ishbaal, and his own reign at Hebron, 1 S. 16-2 S. 8 (§ 4 f.); (3) the history of David at Jerusalem, 2 S. 9-24 (§ 6).

3. Samuel and Saul: 1 S. 1-15 Part I. has for its nucleus two sections: (a) 1 S. 4 1-7 1, a fragment—the original beginning and end are now wanting—recounting the subjugation of Israel by the Philistines and the captivity of the ark of Yahwè; (b) 1 S. 9 1-10 7 10 9-16 11 1-11 14 f. 13 2-7*a* 17 f. 23 14 1-46, which describes the anointing of Saul by Samuel, Saul's victory over Ammon, his election as king, and his first encounters with the Philistines.

The first-mentioned section (a)—a torso (for it introduces the reader abruptly into the midst of the Philistine wars, and does not complete the account of the fortunes of the sanctuary at Shiloh and of the ark)—gives the necessary premises for the section which follows, [1] There is a trace of 1, 2 S. and 1, 2 K. having been each one book in 𝔊^B where the first words of 2 S. and 2 K. are also made the last words of 1 S. and 1 K.

according to which the kingship is Yahwè's way of interposing to save Israel from the Philistines. The two sections, however, are from different pens. The former is made up of two parallel accounts, one Yahwistic, the other Elohistic.[1] But, first of all, to satisfy the reader's curiosity respecting the central figure of chap. 9 f., a description of Samuel's childhood has been inserted (1 1-28 2 11-26 3 1-21), which bears throughout the stamp of a later age than the two parallel narratives, but may quite well be pre-exilic. The substance of the narrative thus produced has undergone much drastic revision at the hands of the deuteronomist.

A specimen of this is met with in 1 S. 2 27-36—where an unnamed man of God foretells the doom of Eli and his house and his supersession by a 'faithful priest'—i.e., collectively, Zadok and his house (cp 1 K. 2 26 f., see ZADOK). According to Kuenen, Yahwè's revelation to Samuel in the night (1 S. 3 11-14) was also worked over by D; but it sufficiently meets the case if we regard 3 12 as a redactional back-reference to 2 27 ff. On the notice of 4 18*b*, added by the last deuteronomistic redactor, see below, § 7.

The second narrative (b) has been much more profoundly modified by inserted deuteronomistic passages (1 S. 7 2-8 22 10 17-27 12 1-25). In fact, the account of the rise of the monarchy contained in these sections directly contradicts the original story at every point. Samuel is Israel's last judge. Under his leadership repentant and converted Israel throws off the Philistine yoke (7), and in order to be like other nations requests Samuel to give it a king. This Samuel does at the command of God (8). At Mizpah the sacred lot falls on Saul (10 17 ff.). Samuel then reproaches the people with ingratitude towards Yahwè (12). The links which connect this narrative with the older account are 10 25-27 11 12 f.

Critics are not agreed as to whether we have before us here a narrative written with full knowledge of the older account in 9 10 1-16 11, but with the deliberate intention of altering its scope (We., Kue.)—in which case the links just mentioned may be derived from the writer himself—or whether we have an independent source which has been brought into connection with the older narrative by means of these same links, which on this hypothesis must be attributed to the hand of a redactor (Co., Bu.). The first of these assumptions is in harmony with the known habits of deuteronomistic writers, and not less so is the wording of 8 20 12 12, which plainly suggests that we have before us a deuteronomistic narrative, dependent on the older account. Cornill and Budde fail to perceive the character and age of these deuteronomistic pieces, holding them to be pre-deuteronomic and assigning them to an Elohistic source.

The old version of the story of Saul has, however, undergone other expansions. The oldest of these (it is perhaps pre-exilic) occurs in 15 1-23 32-35 (Saul's war against the Amalekites and his rejection by Samuel). Verses 24-31, which describe Saul's self-abasement before Samuel, are a later embellishment to this narrative. To another late writer, however, it seemed that Saul's rejection did not occur early enough, and he has therefore in 1 S. 13 8-15 carried back this occurrence, which is most awkwardly accounted for, to the beginning of Saul's reign, preparing the way for it by means of 10 8. These additions are later than the deuteronomistic portions, for they regard Samuel as an authority superior to Saul. A later interpolation also is 13 19-21, with its incredible statement that the smith's craft was suppressed by the Philistine overlords throughout the land of Israel. The Song of Hannah (1 S. 2 1-10) was interpolated at a still later period,[2] and probably owed its introduction here to a mistaken interpretation of the figure (v. 5) of the barren woman. It is a post-exilic psalm, which gives expression to the belief of the Jewish Church in the compensating Messianic judgment of Yahwè.

In Part II. (1 S. 16 1-2 S. 8 18) the pre-exilic sources are present in almost a larger proportion. The passage contained in 1 S. 16 14-23 is old. Saul is seized with melancholy; David is brought to the court to cheer him with his harp. The narrative is brought by 14 52 into connection with that of Saul's election and his struggles with the Philistines. The continuation of 1 S. 16 23 is to be sought, not in 17 1 ff. (WRS OTJC 433)—for what is there related is irreconcilable with 16 18—but in 18 6-8*a* (Saul's jealousy of David's growing popularity). Between these two sections is interpolated a narrative, compounded from two independent but both much later sources, describing David's victory over Goliath and his friendship with Jonathan (17 1-18 5). Chaps. 17-18 rank among the most interesting of all the sections in the Book of Samuel, for here we have alongside of MT a shorter text in 𝔊B where 17 12-31 41 50 (in v. 51, 'and he drew it out of its sheath') 55-18 5 8*b*-11 12*b* 17-19 are wanting—a statement that is unaffected by the presence of 18 9 in B. The critics are not at one on the question whether it is the original that has come down to us in the Greek recension, or whether we have to do with an abridgment made in harmonistic interests.[1] The main argument that makes for the abridgment view is that 20 8 seems to take account of the bond of brotherhood between David and Jonathan spoken of in 18 3 (Kuenen). But this, doubtless, was one of the constant themes of the older history, and we can all the more readily imagine 20 8 to have referred to some passage which has not come down to us, inasmuch as between 16 23 and 18 6 it is probable that a piece of ancient narrative has dropped out. But, further, the question as to the character of the text of 𝔊 does not quite dispose of the question as to its composition, inasmuch as abridgment with a view to obviating contradictions is an operation that might very well have been performed precisely upon the later portions in chap. 17 f.

4. David: 1 S. 16-2 S. 8.

The view that the shorter recension (𝔊B), 17 1-11 32-40 42-49 51 (in part) 52-54, constitutes a narrative, complete in itself, which has been broken up in MT by fragments of a parallel account (vv. 12-31 41 50 f. [in part] 55-58), is supported by the fact that v. 54 marks the conclusion of a narrative, and that v. 32 admits of being joined on to v. 11, whilst v. 12 is plainly the beginning of a new story. The same phenomena show that vv. 55-58 also, and 18 1-5, which form the immediate continuation of the fragmentary narrative, proceed from another source than the main narrative. At the same time it must be allowed that the close of the fragmentary narrative was perhaps originally 18 2, and vv. 3-5 an addition; for v. 2 separates v. 1 from v. 3.[2]

The connecting link by which the two parallel narratives are held together is constituted by 17 14*b*-16. Of the two accounts, the main narrative relates the events in the form of a history of the kingdom, whilst the fragmentary narrative has the character of a biography. If we assume that v. 36 has not been worked over, and that v. 47 is a later addition, both narratives can only be exilic, at the earliest (cp GOLIATH).

The continuation of 18 8*a* is found in vv. 12-16. David is removed from the court with honour. His own popularity, and, with it, Saul's fear, go on increasing. The story of Saul and his javelin in v. 8*b*-11, viewed by itself, can very well have come from an old source; but it is here out of place.

Verses 17-19 are likewise foreign to the ancient source, as is shown by what comes after: Saul promises his daughter Merab to David, but does not keep his word. This story has grown out of the fragmentary narrative of MT contained in 17 12-31 41 50 55 ff., if indeed it does not actually form part of it. It can very well have come in after 18 2.

Chap. 18 16 has its continuation in 18 20-30. Michal falls in love with David, who marries her in spite of Saul's malignant plot against him. (Verse 21*b* is wanting in 𝔊B and is a later addition). We again come upon old material in chap. 20—one of the accounts of the outbreak of enmity between Saul and David.

[1] On the one side (expansion) are Co., St., WRS; on the other (abridgment) We., Kue., Bu., and others (for references see GOLIATH). We. formerly held an opposite view (TBS 104 f.).

[2] For the proof see WRS OTJC(2), 433.

Jonathan helps David in ascertaining what Saul's true disposition towards him is; vv. 4-17 and 40-42 are disturbing insertions of a later hand. As it now stands, this account is without its natural premises; if it comes from the same source as 16 14-23 18 6-8*a* 12-16 20-30, something has dropped out from between them. The continuation is given in 1 S. 21 1-7 (David's flight to Nob), 22 1-4 6-23 (David's sojourn in Adullam, and Saul's vengeance on the priests of Nob), 23 1-14 (David takes refuge in Keilah, but in fear of Saul quits it for the wilderness); 25 (David's life in the wilderness, and the Nabal-episode), 27 1-12[1] (David takes refuge with Achish and receives Ziklag), 28 1 f. 29 1-11 (David takes the field with the Philistines against Saul, but is mistrusted and sent back), 30 1-31 (David finds Ziklag plundered and burnt by the Amalekites, but pursues them and recovers the spoil), 31 1-13 (Saul and his sons fall in battle).

In 2 S. the same source is continued: 2 S. 2 1-32 (David is made king of Judah at Hebron, Ishbaal king of Israel at Mahanaim; there is war between them), 3 1 6*b*-39 (Abner's betrayal of Ishbaal; Joab's vendetta on Abner), 4 1 2*a* 5-12 (Ishbaal's assassination—where vv. 5 f., on the one hand, and v. 7 on the other, show that the section contains remnants of a second parallel account of this occurrence), 5 1-3 17-25 (David becomes king over all Israel and is victorious over the Philistines), 8 (David's wars against external enemies; his officers). Chap. 8, however, in its present form has been much revised and corrected throughout (see DAVID), which opens our eyes to the fact that what comes after is derived from another source. If we have already found, in chap. 4, traces of an ancient parallel narrative, we are able to point out other elements also which interrupt the thread of the narrative. 2 S. 1 1*b*-4 11 f., is old; an Israelite warrior escaped from the battle brings David the news of Saul's death. That the source here is not the same as before is shown by the joining in v. 1*a*, and by a comparison of v. 4 with 1 S. 31 2. Verses 5-10 13-16, according to which the messenger is a chance Amalekite who happened to be on the battlefield, are a later interpolation, of the nature of Midrash, based upon 2 S. 4 10 not rightly understood. 2 S. 5 6-12 is also old, but from another source than the adjacent portion. David conquers Jebus and enters into relations with Hiram of Tyre; and in chap. 6 David brings the ark to Jerusalem. Both these passages perhaps come from the same source as that which we afterwards come upon again in chap. 9.

Part II. has undergone excessive expansions. Probably we ought to assign to a later date (1) both the parallel accounts of David's adventure in the wilderness of Ziph: (a) 1 S. 23 19-24 23 [22], (b) chap. 26. The Ziphites betray David to Saul. He escapes Saul's pursuit, however, and spares him when chance has brought him into his power. Both passages are brought into connection with one another and with the subsequent interpolation, 23 15-18, describing a visit of Jonathan to David, by means of 23 19*b*. The expressions 'in the strongholds' and 'in the wilderness of Ziph' bring them into relation with the older section. (2) 28 4-25 (Saul's visit to the witch of Endor).

5. Later additions.

1 S. 17 and the later portions of chap. 18 have already been considered. 19 1-16, one of the variants on the outbreak of enmity between Saul and David, takes account of these (see v. 5). Jonathan, we hear, attempts the part of mediator, but in vain. Then a victory of David's brings Saul's hatred to a crisis; he throws his javelin at his rival, who with Michal's help succeeds in making his escape. Co. and Bu. mark v. 2 f. as a later addition, but with doubtful justification; for this would involve the deletion of the whole of v. 7, which, however, is necessary for the connection.

The following are the sections in this part which are of later origin: (1) 16 1-13 (Samuel, after the rejection of Saul, anoints the youthful David at Bethlehem as king). This was written specially for the place where it now occurs, for it stands in immediate connection with chap. 15 (cp v. 1 f.), aims at correcting the narrative of 1 S. 16 14-23, and in v. 12 takes account of 17 42. It is probable that the parenthesis in v. 19 ('which is with the sheep') comes from the same hand. (2) 19 18-24 (David flees from the presence of Saul to the school of the prophets at Ramah). This is a probably post-exilic development, in the nature of Midrash, from the proverbial saying 'Is Saul also among the prophets?' (3) Apart from the passage, already referred to, in 1 S. 23 15-28, the old theme of the friendship of David and Jonathan occurs in another variant in 1 S. 20 40-42. (4) 21 11-16 [10-15] (David flees from Nob to Achish of Gath, and, to save his life, feigns madness). Kuenen conjectures this to have been intended to take the place of 1 S. 27, where David's real relations to Achish are set forth. (5) Particulars about David's family: (a) 2 S. 3 2-5 (his children born in Hebron); (b) 2 S. 5 13-16 (the wives he married in Jerusalem and the children born to him there). Late interpolations in any case are also the following poems: (1) David's lament (2 S. 1 17-27) over Saul and Jonathan, the genuineness of which is doubtful. It has come into its present position from the 'Book of Jashar' (see JASHER, BOOK OF, § 2). (2) David's lament over Abner (2 S. 3 33 f.); 34*b* in particular, which is rendered superfluous by v. 32*b*, betrays the interpolation (cp DAVID, § 13, col. 1035).

2 S. 7 is also an instance of deuteronomistic expansion in Pt. II.

David desires to build a house for Yahwè, and is encouraged in his purpose by Nathan. Afterwards Nathan is commanded by Yahwè to prohibit David from doing so. David is not to build a house for Yahwè, but Yahwè for David—the stability of his dynasty being meant. Verse 13, which conflicts with v. 16 and destroys this point (Wellh.) by making the prophecy of Nathan refer to the building of Solomon's temple, is a gloss.

Chap. 7 is certainly a later addition, for it connects the accounts of David's building of a house (2 S. 5 11 f.) and of the removal of the ark to the city of David (2 S. 6 1 ff.), and is occasioned by these. It is rightly held by Wellhausen and Kuenen to be deuteronomistic; cp the reference to the appointment of judges and the dark days of the period of the judges, also vv. 1 and 11 with Dt. 12 9 1 K. 5 4 [18] 8 56.

It is impossible, however, to agree with Wellhausen in holding the passage to have been written while the kingdom of Judah still subsisted, perhaps under Josiah, or with Kuenen in holding it to be manifestly pre-exilic. The promise of the perpetual kingship of the house of David had also, as Ps. 89 shows, a meaning for the Messianic faith of the post-exilic period, and v. 10 betrays acquaintance with the exile.

It is no longer possible to determine how this deuteronomistic interpolation is related in point of age to the latest interpolations previously referred to, or how many of these are of later date. So far as the poetical pieces and the Midrash narratives are concerned, it may be assumed with some degree of confidence that they did not find their way into the book until after the deuteronomistic interpolation had occurred.

It is in Pt. III. that the greatest amount of old material has been preserved, and here also, accordingly, the impression of literary unity is greatest. The narrative in 9-20 is continuous, exhibits the same peculiarities of style throughout, and must therefore be attributed to one and the same writer; it is but rarely that the original thread is interrupted by glosses and expansions. It describes Meribaal's succession to the heritage of Saul (9), David's Ammonite wars and his sin with Bathsheba (10-12), the story of Amnon and Tamar (13), Absalom's revenge and banishment, and the revolts of Absalom and Sheba (14-20). To it also belongs 1 K. 1 f., containing Adonijah's proclamation as king, the death of David and Adonijah's downfall. The narrator, one of the best in the OT, apparently wishes to show how it was precisely that Solomon should have come to be David's successor. He dwells by preference on the more intimate affairs of the court, and depicts the different characters with admirable skill. Later insertions, however, are not altogether wanting. Among these are certainly the notes upon the dress of kings' daughters (13 18*a*) and upon Absalom's beauty (14 25 f.), and the reference to the Levites in 15 24. This reference, which is post-exilic, needs no explanation; the other two notes owe their origin to the antiquarian interests of some reader, and are, at the earliest, exilic; cp 14 26 ('the [Babylonian] king's weight'). The account of David's war against Hadarezer (Hadadezer) in 10 15-19*a* is also liable to suspicion (see DAVID, § 8 [b]); and Schwally (ZATW 12 153 ff.) even regards the whole of 12 1-15*a*, including the parable of Nathan, as an addition (see JEDIDIAH, NATHAN). Whether we accept the latter view or not, it is beyond doubt that 12 7*b* 8, the first clause of v. 9, and vv. 10-12 were inserted at a later date. This is especially clear in the case of vv. 10-12, for these verses disagree with the tenor of the denunciation by which they are followed, and are a vaticinium ex eventu.

6. David: 2 S. 9-1 K. 2.

[1] 1 S. 27 8-12 was rejected by St. GVI(1) 252 (after Wellh., in Bleek, Einl.(4) 220=CH 253) as a later addition. But in Gesch.(2) Stade withdrew this view. Cp Bu. Ri. Sa. 232.

This section also, as is shown by 1 K. 1 f., has undergone deuteronomistic revision. In 2 S. 14-20, indeed, it is impossible to establish traces of such redaction; but the gradual amplification of the old sources can here be demonstrated with exceptional clearness. The connection between 2 S. 20 and 1 K. 1 is, in the first instance, broken by the interpolation of those old sections, 2 S. 21 1-14 (the vengeance of the Gibeonites on the house of Saul) and 2 S. 24 (the numbering of the people, the pestilence, the establishment of the sanctuary on Ornan's threshing floor). Both are from the same pen and may have been introduced here even by a pre-deuteronomic editor. The connection thus constituted (2 S. 9-20 21 1-14 24 1 K. 1 f.) is again broken up by the introduction of the anecdotes of the encounters of David and his worthies with the Philistines (2 S. 21 15-22), and the list of these worthies (23 8-39). These portions were probably first introduced into the book after it had been deuteronomistically edited. It is also advisable to assume this for 22 1-51 (a psalm expressive of the Messianic faith of the post-exilic community, here introduced as a song of David's), and for 23 1-7 (David's last words, which were not introduced here till after the narrative had been expanded by the addition of 21 15-22 23 8-39, and, in point of fact, themselves interrupt this addition).

Thus four strata are observable in the narrative of Samuel as it now stands. At the foundation lies a series of pre-exilic narratives relating to the origin of the kingship, and its earlier history. It is possible that in its oldest form this series may have contained pieces which disappeared in later revisions. In particular there is some reason to conjecture that after 1 S. 7 1 there at one time stood an account of the downfall of the sanctuary at Shiloh. We have no means of determining the date at which the narratives embodied in the succeeding record became incorporated with the pre-exilic part of the book. Equally in the dark are we as to whether the process of redaction involved in this led to excisions of old material. This was certainly the case when the deuteronomistic revision was made; cp what has been said above on 1 S. 4 1-7 1. By means of this last revision Samuel was brought into line with the series of historical books which, in continuation of the Pentateuch, describe the history of Israel from the conquest of Canaan onwards. It is probable that more than one hand had a share in this deuteronomistic redaction. The deuteronomistic portions are partly edifying amplifications (1 S. 2 27-36 2 S. 7), partly contexts and substituted passages intended to correct the course of the history (1 S. 7 8 10 17 ff. 12). At the same time the narrative was conformed to the chronological system of the deuteronomistic recension of the Book of Judges. The traces of this process are to be found in 1 S. 4 18*b* 27 7 2 S. 2 10*a f.* 5 4 f., and its connection with the work of the deuteronomist appears in 1 S. 7 2. If 𝔊^BA (cp 𝔊^L) has preserved the more original form of the narrative in omitting 1 S. 13 1, this kind of work must have continued much later. Regarding the additions made to the text in the further course of its transmission, we cannot always be sure whether they were inserted directly by some redactor or made their way in from the margin. Some of these have been already indicated. To the same class belong 1 S. 6 17 18*a* 9 9 24 13 [14] 30 5 9*b* 2 S. 3 30 4 2*b* 3 11 21*a* and perhaps other passages.

It has been already remarked that the exact date of these additions often eludes us. At the same time there is good ground for the belief that the poems (1 S. 2 1-10 2 S. 1 17-27 3 33 f. 22 23 1-7) and those additions which have the characteristics of Midrash were the latest passages to be inserted. Since 2 S. 21 18-22 is repeated in 1 Ch. 20 4 ff. and 2 S. 23 8-39, and 24 in 1 Ch. 11 10 ff. 21, the Chronicler (about 300 B.C.) must have used our book in a form agreeing in all important points with the recension that has reached us in the Hebrew text (see CHRONICLES). From the fact that Chronicles does not contain the psalm or the last words of David (2 S. 22 23 1-7) Budde concludes that these were not inserted into Samuel till after the Chronicler's time. That is no doubt possible; but it is not to be proved by such an argumentum e silentio. We cannot argue from the presence of the psalm in 1 Ch. 16 8 ff. that the Chronicler would not have passed over a Davidic psalm found in his old source, for 1 Ch. 16 8 ff. is a later interpolation into the Book of Chronicles. That the Chronicler was acquainted with the present division into Samuel and Kings may be conjectured. Still, the fact that many passages occur with a better text in Chronicles shows that the text of Samuel was not yet in the Chronicler's time quite identical with ours.[1] That the text found now in all Hebrew MSS has not arisen without considerable distortion of the manuscript tradition appears on comparing it with the text of 𝔊; and in many cases it is only when this is done that the Hebrew text becomes intelligible. This undesigned distortion of the text is explained by the fact that the Books of Samuel were never used in the regular service of the synagogue.

[1] That it was worked at even after his time is shown by 2 S. 10 6, where the Chronicler did not read אִישׁ אֶלֶף after מַעֲכָה as the MT of 2 S. does.

[2] [H. P. Smith divides most of the contents of Samuel between two main sources, each of which gives an account of Saul and David, one of them including 2 S. 9-20 (the court history of David, relating the story of Uriah, Bathsheba, Amnon, Tamar, and Absalom). There are also two accounts of the denunciation of Eli; the appointment and rejection of Saul; the coming of David to Saul's court, the negotiations for his marriage, his flight, his generosity to Saul, his flight to Achish, and the death of Saul. This constant duplication of incidents is the chief ground for holding the existence of the second source, which is less primitive than the other, and presents 'indications of a comparatively late date—perhaps in or after the exile.' But it should be noticed that, according to H. P. Smith, these two sources are themselves of composite origin. The date suggested for the second main source involves the transference of much material usually regarded as pre-deuteronomic to the period of the deuteronomistic writers.]

SANASIB (σαναβεις [B], ανασειβ [A]), a priestly name, 1 Esd. 5 24, wanting in ‖ Ezra 2 36 Neh. 7 39. Possibly a corrupt repetition of Senaah in the preceding verse.

SANBALLAT (סַנְבַלַּט—i.e., San^e^bhallaṭ = Sin-uballiṭ[anni], 'Sin [the moon-god] caused [me] to live'; cp Nabû-[u]balliṭanni; σαναβαλλατ [BNA], αναβ. [twice B, once א], σαλλαβ. [once א], σαναβαλατ [L, twice א]), one of the chief opponents of Nehemiah (Neh. 2 10 6 1 f.). He is called a 'Horonite' (Neh. 2 10)—i.e., according to most scholars, a native of Beth-horon or Horon (see BETH-HORON, § 4, and cp ISRAEL, § 55); Winckler (AOF 2 228 ff.) pleads very earnestly for the view that Sanballat was a Moabite of Horonaim. This view, however, is out of the question if Guthe has rightly emended the text of Neh. 4 2 (3 34), 'And he said in the presence of his brethren (= fellow Samaritans), "Is this (הֲזֶה) the might of Samaria that these Jews are building their city?"' (following $\mathfrak{G}^{BNA}$, cp $\mathfrak{G}^{L}$). It is also generally held that Sanballat's daughter would not have been taken to wife by a grandson of the Jewish high priest (Neh. 13 28), if he had not been, at any rate, of a N. Israelitish stock. Josephus, certainly, calls him a Cuthæan (cp 2 K. 17 24), and states that he was sent by the last Darius as governor to Samaria, and that he married his daughter Nicaso to Manasseh, brother of Jaddua the high priest (Ant. xi. 7 2).

1. Earlier theories.

If the geography of MT is correct these arguments are very strong. If, however, as can be made probable with regard to many other narratives, the received text has been produced by editorial manipulation, and if the opponents of the Jews come from the N. Arabian region where (on the present writer's theory) the Jews had languished in captivity, the question of Sanballat's ethnic connection (and, indeed, that of his name as well) passes into a new phase. חרני will then naturally be read Ḥarani, 'the Ḥaranite' (there being, according to the theory in question, a southern as well as a northern Ḥaran). Certainly the passage quoted above in Guthe's text may be more plausibly read thus, 'And he said before the Jerahmeelites in Shimron, What do the Jews?'[1] Now, too, there is considerable reason for questioning the name 'Sanballat.' Very possibly it is the coinage of the redactor; the original name may have been Nebaiothi (man of NEBAIOTH). Corresponding emendations of the names of Sanballat's companions must also be made. For 'Sanballat the Horonite, Tobiah the Ammonite, Geshem (or Gashmu) the Arabian,' we should possibly read, 'The Nebaiothite, the Haranite, the Tubalite, the Jerahmeelite, the Cushamite, the Arabian.' The true opponents of the Jews were not merely individuals but masses of men representing the N. Arabian borderland—i.e., the story of Nehemiah has very possibly been rewritten on the basis of a very imperfect text. Josephus's phrase, 'a Cuthæan as to race' (Ant. xi. 7 2) is not so far wrong as it may seem, for 'Cuth' in 2 K. 17 30 is doubtless an editorial manipulation of 'Cush' (i.e., the N. Arabian Cush). See TOBIAH, and cp SHESHBAZZAR.

5 and 6. ναός in Mt. 23 35 27 5, and οἶκος in Lk. 11 51, where AV has 'temple,' but RV 'sanctuary.' The Holy, and the Holy of Holies are meant, the 'house of God' (Mt. 12 4). 'How vividly does it set forth the despair and defiance of Judas that he presses even into the ναός itself' (Trench, NT Synonyms, 14)! But, as B. Weiss points out, the form of the narrative is suggested by Zech. 11 13, 'in the house of Yahwè.'

The name seems to mean 'palm-branch'; but there are parallels enough for the view that it is really a corruption of שמשמה = כושם (Cusham), cp Hazar-susah = Hazar-cusham, another name of the same place, and see MARCABOTH. SAPHIR, or, rather, as RV, SHAPHIR (RV שָׁפִיר, 'glittering, beautiful'; καλως [BAQ]), a place mentioned in Micah's elegy on towns of Judah (Mic. 1 11). Generally identified with Shamir or Shaphir in the mountains of Judah (Josh. 15 48). See SHAMIR.

Eusebius, however, places σαφειρ between Eleutheropolis and Ascalon (OS 293 37 151 27); he says that it is in the mountain district, but this is because he supposes it to be the σαφειρ (cp $\mathfrak{G}^{AL}$) of Josh. 15 48, which is reckoned among the cities of the mountains. The σαφειρ of Eusebius may possibly be one of the three villages called Sawâfir in the Philistine plain, SE. of Ashdod. But it is not likely (Gath being—see Crit. Bib.—very probably a misreading in Mic. 1 10) that Micah troubled himself about Philistine cities. There were doubtless several places called Shaphir; es-Ṣâfirîyeh, near Bēt Dejan (BETH-DAGON), may be one of them. The latter place is too far from Mareshah to be meant; but there is one spot which has a good claim to be called Shaphir, 'the glittering,' and may be the place meant by Micah, even if it be also the Mizpeh (המצפה) of Josh. 15 38, and that is that tall white cliff which commands the entrance to the Wâdy es-Sanṭ from the Philistine plain, known to the Crusaders as Blanche Garde, and to Arabic speakers of to-day as Tell eṣ-Ṣâfiyeh, 'the shining hill.' See MIZPEH, 1. The prophet perhaps foresees that the 'brilliance' (שִׁפְרִיר) of the far-shining fortress will 'pass into captivity' (עָבַר בַּשְּׁבִי). At the same time, another view (see below) is more probable, if the criticism summed up in MICAH (BOOK), §§ 3 f., PROPHET, § 38, be in the main correct.

On the text see Che. JQR, July 1898, and Crit. Bib. Nowack admits that what MT gives must be incorrect. On the root שפר, 'to glitter' see G. Hoffm. ZATW 2 68 (1882).

It will be noticed that both Mizpeh in Joshua and Shaphir in Micah stand near Zenan or Zaanan and Lachish. It is not improbable, however, that the lists in Josh. 15 33 ff. (in part?) and also the elegy Mic. 1 10 ff. referred originally to the Negeb. This affects the situation of Shaphir. See ZAANAN.

SAPPHIRE (סַפִּיר; ϲαπφειροϲ [BAL][1]), mentioned as a much-prized stone in Ex. 24 10 28 18 39 11 Job 28 6 16 Cant. 5 14 Lam. 4 7 Is. 54 11 Ezek. 1 26 10 1 28 13 Tobit 13 16; to which we can now add, from the self-evidently correct Hebrew text, Ecclus. 43 19 [of the hoar-frost], 'he makes it to bloom with flowers like sapphire,' and in NT Rev. 21 19, where RVmg. has 'lapis lazuli.' The marg. rendering just cited is correct; wherever 'sapphire' occurs in the above passages we should mentally interpret 'lapis lazuli.' That lapis lazuli was the sapphire of the ancients is plain from Theophrastus (p. 692) and Pliny (HN 37 38 f.). Theophrastus states that it is ὥσπερ χρυσόπαστος (as it were sprinkled with gold dust), and Pliny says, Inest ei (cyano) aliquando et aureus pulvis qualis in sapphiris, in iis enim aurum punctis conlucet (cp xxxiii. 31 aurum in sapphiro scintillat). Such a description would be quite inappropriate to any variety of the modern sapphire, but applies very well to the lapis lazuli, which frequently contains disseminated particles of iron pyrites, easily mistaken by their colour and lustre for particles of gold.

Lapis lazuli was so much prized by the Assyrians, Babylonians, and Egyptians (see LAPIS LAZULI) that we should expect to find it sometimes, or even often, referred to in the old Hebrew writings. We must, however, omit from the list of occurrences Job 28 6 (see below), Cant. 5 14,[2] and Lam. 4 7. The identification of sappir with this stone throws light on the description of the appearance of the Most High in Ex. 24 10 (J) and Ezek. 1 26. According to J, where the divine form stood, it was 'as the very heaven for clearness, like a paved work of sapphire stone' (see PAVEMENT); according to Ezekiel, the base of the throne of God was something like a firmament (see 𝔊), above which was a sapphire-coloured pavement (see Toy, 'Ezekiel,' SBOT). In fact, the 'gold dust' on the deep blue of the lapis lazuli made this stone a most appropriate symbol of 'this brave o'er-hanging firmament, this majestical roof fretted with golden fire.'

This, however, is merely a plausible interpretation; the text does not expressly refer to the star-like, gold-like particles which add lustre to the deep blue of the lapis lazuli. It has been thought by some (Hitz., Bu., Du.) that such a reference is to be found in a section where, if anywhere, we should certainly expect to find it, viz., in Job 28. This is how Duhm renders v. 6,—

His stones are the place of the sapphire,
Which has grains of dust of gold.

If this is right, we need not have hesitated elsewhere (see OPHIR) to connect 'Ophir' with Ass. epru=Heb. עָפָר. But the truth is that עפר properly means, not dust, but a lump of earth; עַפְרֹת is not the word which a Hebrew poet would have chosen for the 'aureus pulvis' of which Pliny speaks. The passage needs very careful treatment. ספיר, 'sapphire,' should be כֶּסֶף, 'silver.' See GOLD, § 1, col. 1750, foot.

The name by which our modern sapphire was known to the ancients is ὑάκινθος or hyacinthus, the stone which forms the eleventh foundation of the wall of the New Jerusalem (Rev. 21 20). See JACINTH. The colourless sapphire may perhaps be intended by the ḥašmal (ḥalmiš ?) or taršīš. See TARSHISH (STONE OF), STONES (PRECIOUS), §§ 4 c, (2), 11. T. K. C.

SARAH (שָׂרָה, § 44; ϲαρρα; sara), and SARAI (שָׂרַי; ϲαρα; sarai), wife of Abraham.

1. Traditions. There is but one reference to Sarah in the OT outside the Pentateuch, viz. in Is. 51 2, which is hardly of earlier date than the age of Ezra. (There is a play on ăbānīm 'stones' and bānīm 'sons'; cp Mt. 3 9). The three most conspicuous features of her story are: (1) her twofold relation to Abraham as his wife and his sister (12 12 f. [J], 20 12 [E]), on which see § 2; (2) her long barrenness (11 30, 16 1 f.), a feature paralleled in the story of Rebekah and of Rachel, of Samson's mother and of Samuel's, and, in Babylonian legend, of the wife of the hero Etana (cp ETHAN); and (3) her extraordinary beauty, which is mentioned to account for the danger from which the destined mother of Isaac so narrowly escaped (12 10 ff. 20). The change of her name from Sarai to Sarah is related (by P), together with that of Abram to Abraham, in connection with the announcement of the birth of Isaac (17 15 ff.). The Priestly Writer avoids attributing unbelief to so favoured a woman; but the Yahwist, with perfect simplicity and with true insight into the heart of woman, reports that Sarah 'laughed within herself' (18 12 ff.; cp ISAAC). According to P, she died at Hebron (23 2), an event which led to the purchase by Abraham of the cave of Machpelah (cp 23, 25 10, 49 31). According to J, if 24 67 is correct, Isaac brought his bride Rebekah 'into his mother Sarah's tent,' and 'was comforted after his mother's death.' But the text is plainly incorrect, and must originally have run thus, 'And Isaac brought her into the tent . . . and Isaac was comforted after his father's death.'[1]

Reference is made to Sarah in Heb. 11 11, in 1 Pet. 3 6 (cp Gen. 18 12), and in Gal. 4 21-31, where she becomes a type of the heavenly Jerusalem (cp HAGAR, § 3), just as in Is. 51 2 Sarah appears as the mother of the true Israel. One could almost venture to believe that the writer of the passage in Gal. used a book of extracts from the prophets, in which chap. 51 (with its pointed reference to Sarah) and chap. 54 (with its encouraging address to childless Zion, soon to become the antitype of Sarah) were brought into close proximity.

2. Origin of legend. Various opinions have been held as to the meaning of Sarai, which, according to P (Gen. 17 15), was the earlier name of Abraham's wife (see Di. on Gen. l.c.). It is plausible to hold that Sarai is an old form of Sarah[2] (ـَى = ـָה, as in Arabic; cp Nöld. ZDMG 40 183 42 484; Lag. Uebers. 92 f.), and that Sarah means 'princess,' or rather (through Assyrian), 'queen.' W. R. Smith, however, thought that Sarah and Israel had the same origin (Kinship, 30), and to those who question the mythological origin of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob this view will commend itself most. Since some conjecture must be offered, we may venture to suppose that just as Jacob's marriage with Leah symbolises the union of the Jacob clan and the Levi clan (see JACOB, § 3), so Abraham's marriage with Sarah expresses the union of a Jerahmeelite clan (אברהם for אברהם; see JERAHMEEL, § 4 [y]) with a clan calling itself by the name which underlies Israel; thus Sarah would correspond to Israel as LEAH [q.v.] probably corresponds to Levi. The explanation of 'Sarah' as 'princess' or (Ass.) 'queen,' is usually thought to be paralleled by Milcah=Malcah, 'queen,' and the mythological interpretation of 'queen' as 'queen of heaven' by Assyrian and Babylonian titles of goddesses, especially of the consort of Sin, the moon-god of Ḥarran, who is called šarratu (Sumerian nin-gal).[1] The present writer's objection to this otherwise plausible view is that he regards 'Milcah' in Gen. 11 29, etc., as certainly corrupt, and that (if we feel compelled to hold that there is only one Ḥaran—viz. in the north) the correctness of 'Ḥaran' seems to him to be in the stories of the patriarchs also open to suspicion (see HARAN ii., MILCAH). It is true, Winckler is of opinion[2] that the twofold relation of Abraham to Sarah as husband and brother is undoubtedly of mythological origin. Following Stucken, he regards the rôle of Abraham as analogous to that of Tammuz-Adonis in relation to Ištar (see the legend of the Descent of Ištar, and cp TAMMUZ); Sarah in fact is the Hebrew Ištar. Their father is Teraḥ, or, more probably, Jeraḥ, 'the moon'; he comes from one centre of moon-worship, Uru, and dies in another, Ḥaran (see TERAH). But the textual basis of this hypothesis is not less doubtful, or rather, being broader, even more doubtful than that of Jensen already mentioned. Baethgen, without criticising the text, is equally opposed to mythological theories of this sort. He thinks (Beitr. 157) that, as applied to the wife of Abraham, the name Sarah is simply an appellative. Both Abu-ramu and Sarai or Saraia[3] (Sa-ra-a-a) occur as names of individuals on Babylonian tablets. But, plausible as Baethgen's view may at first appear, it is not really probable. To hold that Abraham and Sarah are historical characters, is a perfectly unnecessary concession to apologetic arguments, which, if permitted to have consequences, would destroy historical criticism and carry us back to the unsympathetic attacks and the uncomprehending defences of the theologians and rationalists of the pre-critical period (cp ABRAHAM). We are therefore driven back to the theory first mentioned. The marriage of Abraham and Sarah symbolises a union of tribes. Sarah represents the Israel clan which joins a Jeraḥmeelite clan, whose centre is, according to our text, at Hebron, but, according to a corrected text, at REHOBOTH [q.v.]. The variation of tradition as to Abraham's relation to Sarah is exactly parallel to the variation as to Nahor's relation to Abraham in Gen. 11 24 and 27.

Von Gall's attempt (Altisrael. Kultstätten, 57 f.) to combine two opposite theories, representing Sarai as the numen of Machpelah, and Sarah as the consort of the divinity Abram, implies that the arguments for the two theories are equally balanced, which is hardly the case. T. K. C.

SARDINE STONE (ϲαρδιοϲ), Rev. 4 3 AV, RV SARDIUS.

SARDIS (ϲαρδειϲ), Rev. 1 11 3 1 4. The oldest form of the name in Greek is Σάρδιες (Ionic), accusat. Σάρδις; the Attic form is Σάρδεις; hence the Latin Sardes or Sardis; the later Greek form is Σάρδις as in Ptol. and on coins, e.g., Σάρδις Ἀσίας Λυδίας Ἑλλάδος μητρόπολις (see Head, Hist. Numm. 553).

1. Geography and history.

Sardis lay at the foot of Mt. Tmolus (mod. Boz-dagh), on a spur of which its citadel was placed (Herod. 1 84). It was an old city, perhaps the last western outpost of that early non-Aryan empire (of the Hittites?) which extended to Carchemish on the Euphrates. The valley of the Hermus was the centre of a monarchy which for a long time owed allegiance perhaps to the Phrygian kingdom farther inland, when that arose through the incoming of the Aryan Phryges from Europe, according to Greek tradition (Herod. 7 73). The Cimmerian invasion which broke the Phrygian power (about 720 B.C.) enabled the Lydian kingdom on the Hermus to play an independent part under the dynasty of the Mermnadæ, beginning with Gyges (see LYDIA). Sardis was the capital of the Lydian kingdom.[1] Lying as it did on a strong hill about 4 m. S. of the river Hermus, commanding the fertile plain (Strabo, 626), and the commencement of the old Hittite route through northern Asia Minor (later the royal road of the Persian empire), the city was marked out for a great career. In addition to its other advantages, the gold-bearing stream of the Pactolus flowed through its agora past the temple of Cybele on its way to the Hermus, and was for long a source of revenue (Herod. 5 101 1 93; Strabo, l.c.). Yet the Greek cities on the coast constituted an obstacle to its progress, and held the chief share of the wealth derived from the trade with inner Asia. Hence the first task of the monarchs of Sardis was the subjugation of these cities, and especially the utter destruction of Smyrna, the nearest and most formidable rival of their capital. Under Crœsus (about 560 B.C.) Sardis was at the height of her prosperity. From her mint were issued rudely executed electrum[2] staters as early as the reign of Gyges—the first European coinage (Herod. 1 94; Xenoph. ap. Jul. Poll. 9 83)—and later, in the time of Crœsus, pure gold and silver coins bearing figures of the lion and the bull, symbolical perhaps of the worship of the sun and the moon (see Head, Hist. Numm. 545 f.).

The trade of the city must have been largely concerned with the manufacture of woollen goods. The art of dyeing wool is said to have been invented at Sardis, and the city was the centre for the distribution of the woollen goods, the raw material of which was furnished by the vast flocks of Phrygia (Herod. 5 49). We have frequent allusion to the excellence of the dyed stuffs of Sardis (cp Aristoph. Pax, 1174; Sappho, frg. 19, Bergk; Athen. 2 30).

After its conquest by Cyrus, Sardis became the residence of the Persian satrap (Paus. iii. 9 5; cp Anthol. Pal. 9 423). During the three centuries following the death of Alexander the Great its history is obscure; but under the Romans it became again important. It was the centre of a conventus juridicus, which embraced Philadelphia. Its position made it a natural knot in the Roman road-system; from it a road ran NW. through Thyatira (36 R. m.) to Pergamos; another W. to Smyrna (54 R. m.); a third E. through Phrygia; a fourth SE. through Philadelphia (28 R. m.) to the important towns of the Mæander valley; a fifth SW. to Ephesus, crossing Mt. Tmolus and the valley of the Cayster (about 63 R. m.).[3] We have in this fact the explanation of the position of Sardis as one of the Seven Churches of Asia. (Note that the order of names in Rev. follows the line of the Roman road, N. from Ephesus through Smyrna to Pergamos, where it turns and runs down S. along the great road going through Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia to Laodicea, taking the towns in their true geographical order.)

[1] Jensen, ZA, 1896, p. 299. Hence Winckler (GI 2 72) regards both Abraham and Sarah as originally lunar deities. This is methodical; only the mythological interpretation seems to the present writer to be in this case forbidden by the results of a careful examination of the text.

In 17 A.D. Sardis suffered fearfully from the great earthquake that ravaged Asia Minor in that year (cp Anthol. Pal. 9 423).[1] She received a subsidy from the emperor's privy purse, together with remission of taxation for a period of five years (Str. 627; Tac. Ann. 2 47). By 26 A.D. the town is again in a flourishing condition (Str. 625, calls it a 'great city'), and vies with Smyrna for the honour of erecting, as representative of the Asiatic cities, a temple to Tiberius (Tac. Ann. 4 55).

As regards the reference to Sardis in the NT, there is little allusion to the special circumstances of the town. The thrice-repeated mention of garments may have been suggested by the staple industry. In v. 1 the words 'thou hast a name that thou livest, and art dead' throw a light upon the decay of spiritual life in Sardis about 100 A.D. (cp v. 2)—perhaps as a result of undisturbed mercantile prosperity leading to luxury and apathy (v. 3). In 3 4 the phrase 'which have not defiled their garments,' may well remind us of what we hear from other sources of the voluptuous habits of the Lydians (cp Herod. 1 55 1 79; Æsch. Pers. 41; Athen. 12 57).

SARDITE (סַרְדִּי), Nu. 26 26 AV, RV SEREDITE.

SARDIUS. 1. A precious stone 'ōdem (אֹדֶם) occurs in P as one of the gems of the high-priestly breastplate (Ex. 28 17 39 10), whence, among others, it is assigned by an interpolator for the adornment of the king of Tyre (or Miṣṣur?) in Ezek. 28 13†. The EV rendering 'sardius' follows 𝔊 (σάρδιον); Josephus also, in describing the sacred breastplate, has σάρδιον in BJ v. 5 7, but in Ant. iii. 7 6, σαρδόνυξ, 'sardonyx.' RVmg. gives 'ruby,' but with doubtful justification (see RUBY, CARBUNCLE). σάρδιον also occurs in Rev. 21 20, and (so Ti. WH and RV) in Rev. 4 3. The Hebrew gem-name 'ōdem is usually derived from ארם, 'to be red'; if so, the carnelian may be plausibly identified with the 'ōdem of the OT. Probably the ancients meant this identification, though the sardius in modern parlance means the brown chalcedony, the red being our carnelian. The meaning of the word carnelian is obvious. The vividness of the red, flesh-like hue[2] determines the estimation in which it is held. In ancient times, as in our own day, this stone is more frequently engraved than any other. Pliny (HN 37 7) speaks of the sardius of Babylon as of greater value than that of Sardis. The Hebrews would naturally obtain the carnelian from Arabia. In Yemen there is found a very fine dark-red kind, which is called el-'aḳīḳ (Niebuhr, Beschreib. 142). The Arabs wear it on the finger, on the arm above the elbow, and in front of the belt. Cp STONES (PRECIOUS), §§ 4, b (1), 7.

This, as we have said, is the current identification. When, however, we refer to Ezek. 27 16 where among the articles supplied to Tyre (or Miṣṣur?) by Edom (so Cornill, Toy, etc., read, following 𝔊) we find, close together ראמות and כרכר (or perhaps [see RUBY] כרכר), the suspicion grows upon us that (as in Job 28 18, according to TARSHISH [STONE] § 3) ראמות springs from ראמו, and this from אֲרֹמִי, 'Edomite stone,' and כרכר from ירחמאלי, i.e., Jerahmeelite stone (for a parallel, see RUBY), so that we are entirely ignorant of more than the name of the regions from which the people of Palestine derived these stones. If so, all renderings must be purely conventional.

2. שֹׁהַם, šōham, is in 𝔊 of Ex. 25 6 [7] 35 9 σάρδιον. See ONYX; STONES (PRECIOUS), §§ 4, b (3), 18.

3. σάρδιον occurs also in 𝔊 in Prov. 25 11 f., where it represents apparently both כסף and כתם, but really perhaps only כתם (see col. 499, n. 1).

SARDONYX (יָהֲלֹם, Ex. 28 18 RVmg.) in modern mineralogy, is a name applied to those varieties of onyx, or stratified chalcedony, which exhibit white layers alternating with others of red or brown colour. The brown chalcedony is known to modern mineralogists as sard and the red as carnelian (see CHALCEDONY, SARDIUS). The simplest and commonest type of sardonyx contains two strata—a thin layer of white chalcedony resting upon a ground of either carnelian or sard; but the sardonyx of ancient writers generally presented three layers—a superficial stratum of red, an intermediate band of white, and a base of dark brown chalcedony. The sardonyx has always been a favourite stone with the cameo-engraver, and the finest works have usually been executed on stones of five strata. Such, for instance, is the famous Carpegna cameo, in the Vatican, representing the triumph of Bacchus and Ceres, and reputed to be the largest work of its kind ever executed (16 inches by 12). When the component layers of a sardonyx are of fine colour and sharply defined, the stone is known in modern parlance as an 'Oriental sardonyx'—a term which is used without reference to the geographical source whence the stone is obtained. A famous ancient locality for sard was in Babylonia, and the name of the stone may be of Persian origin (see preceding col. n. 2). The sardonyx is frequently stained, or at least its colour heightened, by chemical processes. Imitations are fabricated by cementing two or three layers of chalcedony together, and so building up a sardonyx; baser counterfeits are formed simply of paste. See ONYX.

σαρδόνυξ (Rev. 21 20†) does not occur in 𝔊. But RVmg. unaccountably has sardonyx for yahălōm (יהלם) in Ex. 28 18 (EV 'diamond'), though it passes over Ex. 39 11 and Ezek. 28 13 without remark.

1. Descent; claim to throne.

Sargon (סַרְגוֹן; αρνα [BℵAQΓ], ϲαραγω̄ [Aq. Theod.], ϲαργων [Symm. in Qmg.]; Assyrian, Šarru-ukîn, 'He [the god] has established the king') was the successor of Shalmaneser IV. as king of Assyria, B.C. 722-705. He is often called Šarrûkîn arkû, 'Sargon the later,' to distinguish him from Sargon of Akkad, one of the earliest and grandest rulers of Babylonia, in the third millennium B.C. Sargon II. had apparently little difficulty in seizing the reins of power, for according to the Babylonian Chronicle (KB 2 276 ll. 29 ff.) Shalmaneser died in the month of Ṭebētu B.C. 722, and Sargon sat on the throne in Assyria on the 22nd of the same month. By what claim he succeeded he nowhere tells us, nor does he ever mention his father or ancestry. His son Sennacherib usually claims descent from him, but on his entry into Babylon seems to have put forward a claim to descent from Gilgameš and the mythical heroes of the past, through a long line of Assyrian and Babylonian kings. Sargon's grandson Esarhaddon put forward a claim to be the remote descendant of Bêl-bânî son of Adasi, an ancient king of Assyria not otherwise known to us. The sons of Esarhaddon, Ašur-bâni-pal and Šamaš-šum-ukîn, adopt his claim to royal descent. We need not contemptuously reject their claim, since it may have come to them through Esarhaddon's mother. On the other hand we are bound to admit his right to be called mukîn išdi mâti, 'founder of a dynasty.' Further, his evident partiality for the old capital Aššur, which he invariably styles 'my city,' and the epithet pir'u Aššur, 'offspring of Aššur,' so often applied to him by his descendants, point to his having come from that city.

Sargon II. certainly represents the return to power

[1] This earthquake destroyed twelve cities of Asia, Plin. HN 2 84; Tac. Ann., l.c., where see note in Furneaux ed.

[2] The Gk. σάρδιον too has been thought to derive its name from its colour (cp Pers. sered, 'yellowish red'?), though the Greeks themselves supposed the name to be derived from Sardis, the place where they first became acquainted with it. See SARDONYX.

in Assyria of the old aristocracy, as the restorer of the ancient burgher rights and privileges in the old capitals Aššur and Ḫarrân, and later the consolidator of his empire by the extension of like freedom to the cities of Babylonia. His scrupulous regard for the claims of ancient titles to land, whether temple endowments or ancestral domains, and his careful restoration of rights taken away by fraud or violence, tyranny or conquest, both in Assyria and (later) in Babylonia, were repeatedly set forth by him as justifications for a turn which he wished to give to his own name Šarrukînu, 'the true king.' The fact that the achievements, which later writers ascribe to Sargon of Akkad, bear such close resemblance to the historical events of Sargon II.'s reign, has tempted some to doubt the historical worth of the earlier parallels. It is not unlikely that Sargon II., who may have taken the name Šarrûkin on coming to the throne, deliberately set to work to revive the glories of the ancient Sargon.

2. His policy.

Sargon II. did not immediately enter into full possession of the empire which Tiglath-pileser III. had conquered and Shalmaneser IV. seems to have retained. The change of dynasty was the signal for a general rebellion of the outlying tributary states. There could not have been much of the year B.C. 722 left when he was acknowledged successor in Assyria; but before the end of his accession year, Merodach-baladan II., a Chaldæan king of Bît Yakin, who had submitted and paid tribute to Tiglath-pileser III., had moved his hordes of nomad supporters into Babylonia, and in Nisan B.C. 721 sat on the throne of Babylon. The army of Ḫumbanigaš, king of Elam, invaded N. Babylonia, and Sargon had to meet both. Fortunately Samaria, after a 'three' years' siege, had just fallen, and so probably released an army. Sargon fought with Ḫumbanigaš in the rêbitu of Dûrilu, and both sides claimed the victory. Merodach-baladan seems to have arrived too late to engage in battle. Ḫumbanigaš, either incensed at this lack of support, or too shattered to renew the strife even with such reinforcement, returned to Elam. Sargon did not pursue him, or venture to attack Merodach-baladan; but Dûrilu and all N. Babylonia remained in Sargon's hands. Merodach-baladan indeed reigned twelve years in Babylon and the S. of Babylonia, in spite of Sargon, and 'contrary to the will of the gods'; but never did he venture to fall upon Sargon's rear whilst he waged his wars incessantly in every other direction. On the whole the advantage lay with Sargon, who was able to deal with his enemies one by one and crush them in detail, and finally to turn the whole force of his mighty empire on Babylon.

3. Early troubles.

From some of Sargon's own earlier inscriptions there is reason to believe that he did not reckon his own reign from B.C. 722 but from B.C. 720. The historians of Babylon and his own later inscriptions, however, reckoned his regnal years from his acknowledgment in Aššur itself. Left undisturbed by his most formidable enemies in the S. he turned his attention to the reconquest of the W. In the account of the capture of Samaria, and the deportation of 27,290 men, the flower of the nation, Sargon's annals record the settlement there of captives from other lands. In this the scribe surely anticipates what occurred later, for Sargon had won no victories at that time. Certainly Samaria was in a position to join the cities allied with Ilu-bi'di in B.C. 720.

4. Samaria.

Doubtless encouraged by the indecisive appearance of Sargon's battle at Dûrilu, relieved evidently of the Assyrian army then withdrawn to the S., and urged on by the intrigues of Pir'u, king of the N. Arabian land of Muṣri, the whole West seems to have struck for independence. Ilu-bi'di (or Iau-bi'di), an upstart, probably a creature of Pir'u, had made himself king of Hamath. Such old dependencies of Assyria as Arpad and Ṣimirra joined him. Damascus and Samaria, only lately captured, and partly no doubt peopled by exiles from other lands, who had nothing to lose and hoped for revenge, joined the conspiracy. Ḫanun of Gaza, once expelled by Tiglath-pileser III., now supported by Sib'e, the Tartan (see So) of Muṣur, had got back his kingdom. But though Ilu-bi'di was able to collect a vast army at Ḳarḳar, Sargon seems to have swept them away with ease. Sargon followed up Ḫanun to Rapiḫu, where he and Sib'e were defeated. Hanno was captured and taken to Aššur, Sib'e fled, Rapiḫu was plundered. Syria and the West remained quiet for some ten years, 720-711 B.C.

5. Hamath and Gaza.

Sargon's most powerful enemies now lay in the N.

Sargon and his principal officers.

and NE. Already Tiglath-pileser III. had subdued Man and placed there a vassal king, Iranzû. Beyond that buffer state, however, lay Zikirtu (Sagartia), probably pressed by the already encroaching Cimmerians, if not themselves an advance guard of that horde of nomad barbarians. Their king Mitatti incited two of Iranzû's subject cities to rebel, and Iranzû appealed to his overlord for assistance. In 719 B.C., accordingly, Sargon captured and destroyed these cities (Šuandaḫul and Durdukku). Three of the cities which had been fortified against Armenia, but had gone over to Rusâ, king of Armenia, the instigator of most of the trouble here, were captured and their people deported to Syria.

7. Armenia.

In the next year Kiakki, prince of Šinuḫtu, one of the districts in Tabal, had omitted to send tribute. He was captured and taken with most of his people to Aššur. His land was added to that of Matti of Atun (Tun, Tyana), which was subjected to a proportionate increase in tribute. Next year, Carchemish was dealt with. It had retained a shadow of independence, whilst its neighbours had lost theirs, from policy on the part of Assyria. The Assyrian monarch was content with loyalty and a rich tribute, and Pisiris of Carchemish had been loyal to Tiglath-pileser III. Now, doubtless owing to fear, he had allied himself with Mitâ of Muški, and omitted to send tribute. He was deported to Assyria and Carchemish was peopled with Assyrians. In this year, Umma-nigaš, king of Elam, died and was succeeded by Šutruk-naḫunta. The death of Iranzû, king of Man, reopened the north-eastern question.

Azâ, the son of Iranzû, who succeeded his father, was murdered by Bagdatti of Umildiš, Mitatti of Zikirtu and a ruler of Misianda being concerned in the conspiracy, and Rusâ of Armenia being a supporter. Sargon promptly marched into the district, captured Bagdatti and flayed him alive on the spot where he had murdered Azâ. Ullusunu, brother of Azâ, succeeded him on the throne of Man with Sargon's consent. But he clearly distrusted the power of Assyria to protect him against Armenia, and gave up twenty-two of his cities to Rusâ, as a 'present.' Beyond Man, towards Media, lay Karalla and Allabra, two small buffer states, whose kings Ašur-li' and Ittî had been subject to Assyria, if they were not actually Assyrians. Ullusunu fled to the hills and left his capital Izirtu to be captured and burned. Two other cities, Zibia and Arma'id, which resisted were taken. But Sargon had no intention to hold permanently, with Assyrian garrisons, such a remote dependency. He accepted Ullusunu's submission, reinstated him as king, and caused him to resume possession of the cities 'presented,' doubtless in fear, to Rusâ. The allies were severely treated, Ašur-li' of Karalla was slain, his people deported to Hamath, and his land turned into an Assyrian province. Ittî of Allabra, with his family, was deported to Hamath, and a new vassal king set in his place.

Sargon now advanced farther E.

10. The Median cities. Šurgadia, whose governor Šêpâ-šarri had rebelled, was captured and, with Niksamma, added to the Assyrian province of Parsûa. Bêl-šar-uṣur, governor of Kišêsim in W. Media, was captured, his city made an Assyrian colony and called Kâr-Nabû. Then a number of Median cities, Bît Sagbat, Bît Ḫirmâni, Bît Umargi, Kilambâte, Armangu, were taken and constituted a new province. Ḫarḫar, whose governor Kibaba had been expelled by the inhabitants, was captured, repeopled with captives from other lands, renamed Kâr-Šarrûkin, and made the capital of a new province. While settling the affairs of this new district Sargon received the tribute of twenty-eight Median city governors.

These events are related under 716 B.C.; but the scribe seems to have chosen to finish the story of the Median conquests at once, rather than return to it under 715 B.C., when some of the events clearly occurred.

11. Armenia. All this while Rusâ of Armenia had continued to instigate rebellions, which he does not seem to have openly supported, and would not take warning by the fate of his allies. As Ullusunu had deserted his cause, he fell upon the twenty-two cities which had once been presented him, took them by force from Man, and set up Daiukku, a subject of Ullusunu, as a rival king. In 715 B.C., Sargon put down this new kingdom, deported Daiukku to Hamath, took again the twenty-two cities, and put them under Assyrian garrisons. In Ḫupuškia, Sargon now received the homage of Ianzû of Na'iri. Tilusina of Andia, to whom Rusâ had given the twenty-two cities, was now captured. So at last Ullusunu was left in undisturbed possession of his land as a vassal of Sargon's. Ḫarḫar, just made into a province, had already rebelled; so it was again reduced, augmented by Assyrianised territory, and strongly fortified as a garrison against the Medes, on whom a yearly tribute in horses was imposed.

12. Muškê; Cyprus; Arabia. In the NW., Mitâ of Muški (see TUBAL AND MESHECH) had annexed some cities from the land of Ḳuê (cp HORSE, § 3). In 715 B.C. Sargon's troops recaptured them. At this time, probably, Sargon made his influence supreme over Tyre and extended it to the 'Ionian Sea,' perhaps to Cyprus.

In Arabia the tribes of Ḫaiapâ (cp EPHAH, and see KAT[(2)] 146 f., 613), Ibâdidi, Marsimanni, and Tamud had been tributaries of Tiglath-pileser III. They had neglected to send tribute to Sargon; for how long does not appear. He now sent an expedition against them. They were easily reduced to order and many deported to Samaria. Pir'u of Muṣur, Samsi queen of Arabia, It'amra of Saba, and some of the kings on the sea coast and in the desert sent rich tribute of gold, precious stones, ivory, incense, spices, horses, and camels.

13. Reduction of Armenia. In 714 B.C., Sargon went back to Man. Ullusunu received him loyally. Dalta of Ellipi sent presents from the S. border of Media. Zikirtu was then attacked. Three fortresses and twenty-four cities were taken and plundered. The capital Parda was burnt, and then Mitatti with his people disappeared. Whether they migrated to the N. of Armenia and joined the advancing Gimirri (see GOMER), or were swallowed up by them, or returned to their old home S. of the Black Sea, does not appear. Now Sargon turned on Rusâ of Armenia and defeated him with great slaughter and carried off 260 of the royal family. Rusâ fled to the hills. Sargon then went through the regions which had owned Rusâ's sway, burnt and pillaged cities, to the number of 140, augmented the dominions of Ullusunu with Ziḫardussu and Umildiš, and reduced Armenia to helplessness. One city deserved special vengeance, Muṣaṣir (Mushitzar), whose prince Urzana had submitted long ago to Shalmaneser IV., taking an oath of fealty to Ašur, but had turned traitor, and gone over to Rusâ.

Muṣaṣir was approached by difficult mountain paths. Urzana fled to the hills, but his city was soon taken. Sargon makes much of this capture, representing it on his sculptures at Khorsabad. Urzana's wife and family, 6000 of the inhabitants, and an immense booty of mules, asses, cattle, gold, silver, bronze, precious stones, magnificent garments, were carried away to Assyria. The city was extraordinarily wealthy. Sargon placed large portions of Armenia, probably all the S. and E., and the districts accessible from Lake Van, under his own rule, garrisoning the towns and appointing Assyrian governors. Rusâ, in despair at the irretrievable ruin of his land, committed suicide, 'like a pig.'

14. Further Median conquests. In 713 B.C., Sargon was recalled to Ellipi, Bît Daiukku, and Karalli. The inhabitants of Karalli had expelled his delegate and set up Amitašši, brother of Ašur-li', as king. Sargon put down this rebellion and further extended his conquests in Media. The regions named are of the highest importance for the early history of the Medes. The Aribi (named by Ptolemy as later in the S. of Gedrosia), the mighty Mandai, were all subdued, and Sargon received the tribute of Ullusunu of Man, Daltâ of Ellipi and Ninib-aplu-iddina of Allabria.

15. Cilicia and Tabal. In the time of Tiglath-pileser the land of Tabal had been conquered and its king deposed. Tiglath-pileser had set Ḫullê, a man of humble birth, on the throne, who seems to have been a faithful vassal till his death. Sargon had added the people of Bît Burutaš to his dominions. When his son Ambaris succeeded, Sargon sent him presents and gave him his daughter to wife and added the city of Ḫilakku to his territory. But Ambaris was a traitor, and was involved in the plots of Mitâ of Muškê and Rusâ of Armenia. Sargon now deprived him of his throne, made his country into an Assyrian province, and deported Ambaris to Assyria with his family and chief nobles.

16. Commagene; Togarmah. In 712 B.C. Sargon punished the intrigues of Tarḫu-nâzi of Meliddu. He had attacked Gunzinanu of Kamman, one of Sargon's faithful vassals. City after city was captured, Meliddu the capital fell, Tarḫunazi was besieged in Tulgarimme, captured, and taken in chains to Assyria. The district was made an Assyrian province, a number of fortresses erected against Armenia, and against Muški, whilst Meliddu was annexed to Ḳummuḫ. Next year, seemingly, Gurgum had to be pacified. Here Mutallu had slain his own father, Tarḫulara, and set himself on his throne. The parricide was soon put down and carried captive to Assyria, and his land made an Assyrian province.

Once more trouble arose in Philistia. Azuri, king of Ashdod, had planned to refuse his tribute, and had begun to negotiate alliances with the neighbouring states of anti-Assyrian tendencies, when Sargon deposed him, and placed his brother Aḫimiti on the throne (see ASHDOD). The inhabitants, however, rebelled under the leadership of one Yamāni, a common soldier, perhaps an Ionian Greek, or a man from Yemen, and Aḫimiti was expelled (see § 20). Then Philistia, Edom, Moab, and Judah, relying on Pir'u of Muṣri, joined the rebellion.

17. Ashdod.

Sargon swiftly sent his army to the scene, captured Ashdod, Gath, Ašdudimmu, and carried off their inhabitants, their gods, the palace treasures, and Yamâni's wife and children. Yamâni escaped to Muṣur; he was, however, apparently captured by the king of Meluḫḫa, and sent in chains to Ašur. The cities were rebuilt and repeopled with captives from other quarters. Again, for the time, the W. country was quiet, having received a warning that no help could be had from Muṣur.

Those states which, though hoping for Muṣur's assistance, had avoided hostile acts, seem to have been unmolested by Sargon. It is true, this king does once call himself mušaknis mâtu Iauda ša ašaršu rûḳu, 'the subjugator of the land of Judah, whose situation is far off' (KB 2 36 f.). This has been thought either to arise out of a confusion between Israel and Judah, or to refer to the Syrian land of Yaudi, but may possibly point to an otherwise unrecorded submission of Judah, consequent on the fall of Ashdod, in 720 B.C. (See ASHDOD.)

Now came the crowning achievement of Sargon's reign. He had humbled his enemies on every side, secured his rear, accumulated vast treasure, trained a veteran army, and now had at his command the services of countless slave warriors who had proved their valour against him and were now at his disposal. He turned his resistless forces against MERODACH-BALADAN, in Babylon, who had not been able to conciliate the Babylonians. His nomad supporters had been allowed to possess themselves of the lands and property of the old inhabitants, doubtless as a reward for their support. Merodach-baladan was unable, if he wished, to win the affections of his subjects. They looked to Sargon to follow the examples of Tiglath-pileser III. and Shalmaneser IV., and so to restore the old privileges and rights. Sargon first attacked the allies, Aramaic peoples on the borders of Elam. Such tribes as the Gambuli, Ru'a, Ḫindaru, Iatburu, and Puḳudu were subdued and formed into a new Assyrian province with Dûr-Nabû for its capital. Holding this region, Sargon was safe from any movement on the part of Elam, if Šutruknaḫunta had cared to move. When Merodach-baladan sent to Elam to ask for his help, that astute monarch accepted the presents, but gave no help. Merodach-baladan could not depend upon his small band of Chaldæan retainers to face Sargon, and fled when the Assyrians commenced operations in Babylonia by the capture of Bît Dakkuri.

18. The relief of Babylon.

Merodach-baladan seems to have spent the winter in the S., at Iḳbi-Bêl, which he fortified with the greatest care. Sargon made no haste to follow him. Sargon's objective was Babylon. The inhabitants of Babylon welcomed him as a deliverer. They went out in a great procession to Dûr-Ladinna, the capital of Bît Dakkuri, and brought Sargon in triumph into the city of Babylon. There he took possession of the palace of Merodach-baladan, offered the regular offerings to the gods, and received the tribute of the subjugated Babylonian states. Then he set himself to restore order. He cleaned out and rebuilt the ruined canal, from Borsippa, which served as the procession street for Nabû at the Nisan feast. Then in the beginning of the year 709 B.C., he 'took the hands of Bêl' and was legitimate monarch of Babylon.

Next month, Aaru of 709 B.C., Sargon resumed his campaign against Merodach-baladan. The latter had seen all his allies in turn surrender, so he withdrew to his ancestral domain Dûr Iakin on the Euphrates. There he assembled the scattered remnants of his forces. He had carried off in chains some of the notables of the S. Babylonian cities. Now he set out his camp under the walls of the city and protected it by a wide moat filled by a canal from the Euphrates, broke down all the bridges, and 'in the midst of the waters like a swamp hawk' awaited Sargon's attack. Sargon made his veterans 'fly over the waters like eagles.' Merodach-baladan's army was again defeated, under the walls of the city; wounded himself, he managed to escape; but his camp with all its treasures fell into Sargon's hands. The city was soon after taken and destroyed. The captive notables were released and reinstated in their old possessions. The old temple endowments were restored, the worships renewed, the deported gods brought back. The captured districts of Bît Iakin on the Elamite frontier were resettled with captives from Ḳummuḫ, and their inhabitants transferred there. Fortresses were garrisoned against Elam, and the old kingdom of Bît Yakîn became an Assyrian province, attached to the governor of Babylon and Gambuli.

These successes secured Sargon further bloodless triumphs. Upiri, king of Dilmun, in the Persian Gulf, sent presents and an embassy of congratulation. Mitâ of Muški, who had been such a trouble in past years, and was now hard pressed by the governor of Ḳuê, sent in his submission, while Sargon was still engaged in Iatburi. The kings of seven Cyprian cities sent presents. Tyre also seems to have desired friendly relations.

19. Closing years.

Sargon's absence in the S. affected other states somewhat differently. In 708 B.C., Mutallu of Ḳummuḫ, in collusion with Argistis of Armenia, Rusâ's son and successor, threw off his allegiance. An army was sent against him; he dared not meet it, and fled. His family and possessions fell into the hands of the conqueror. Ḳummuḫ became an Assyrian province. In the same year arose troubles in Ellipi. Daltâ had proved a faithful vassal; but on his death his sons Nibê and Išpabara quarrelled over the succession. Nibê obtained assistance from Elam, Išpabara applied to Assyria. An Assyrian army soon besieged Nibê and his Elamite supporters, captured the capital Marubišti, and brought Nibê captive to Assyria. Išpabara was duly set on the throne as an Assyrian vassal.

The inscriptions of Sargon extend no further, and his last three years are somewhat obscure. He died in 705 B.C., some think by the hand of an assassin.

Sargon was a great builder. For the greater part of his reign he lived at Kalaḫ, but he was all the while building the magnificent city of Dûr Šarrûkîn, on the site of the old city of Maganuba, in the rêbit (see REHOBOTH-IR) of Nineveh. The vast ruins of Dūr Šarrūkīn with its palaces, now the village of Khorsabad, were excavated by the French under Botta, Place, Oppert, and others. They form the most perfect type of an Assyrian city yet known. There were found the chief inscriptions which give so full an account of Sargon's reign. For a full description of the wondrous halls with their long series of sculpture and endless detail of battle scenes, we must refer to Botta and Flandin, Monument de Ninive. Sargon's inscriptions are full of descriptions of the preparations for the building of this city. He ransacked the quarries and forests of Lebanon, Amanus, and the Syrian hills for wood and valuable stones to beautify his palace. He expended the vast treasures which his conquests gave him in its construction, though for the greater part of the time his swarms of captives were employed there in forced labour. As the ilku or corvée seems to have ceased in Marḫešwān, 709 B.C., the actual building was probably finished then. In 707 B.C. Sargon returned from Babylon; on the 22nd of Tešrit in that year the gods of Dûr-Šarrûkîn entered their temples.

Sargon also built and restored largely at Kalaḫ and other cities in his kingdom. Nineveh was then comparatively insignificant; but he restored the temple of Nabû there. C. H. W. J.

20. Sargon and Isaiah. Is. 20 1 is the only OT passage which mentions the great usurper by name. The view that מצרים and כוש often stand for the N. Arabian regions of Miṣrim and Cush (see MIZRAIM, CUSH, 2), and the theory that אפרים, 'Ephraim,' is sometimes a corruption, or, at any rate, a synonym of ירחמאל, 'Jeraḥmeel' (e.g., in Judg. 17 1 19 1 1 S. 1 1; cp RAMATHAIM-ZOPHIM, MICAH, 2), oblige the present writer to modify or even reject some of the current views on what are called the 'Assyrian prophecies' of Isaiah. According to his theory it becomes in the highest degree probable that the danger which beset the state from N. Arabia was as much in the mind of Hebrew prophets and statesmen as the danger from Assyria, and that some prophecies which have been thought to refer to Assyrian invaders may refer after all to N. Arabians.

1. We will look first at Is. 10 5 ff., and specially at vv. 8-10. These verses are usually supposed to refer to the fall of Carchemish, Calno (?), Arpad, Hamath, Damascus, and Samaria, and are thought to indicate as the date of the prophecy some period in the reign of Sargon after 717 (fall of Carchemish). This appears to be a mistake. The places referred to in v. 9 are probably not to the N. but to the S. of Judah: Kir-cusham, Jeraḥmeel, Ephrath, Maacath, Cusham, and Shimron —places on the N. Arabian border, of the two latter of which Isaiah had predicted the conquest in a much misunderstood earlier prophecy (see 8 4, where probably 'Dammeśeḳ' [EV Damascus] should be 'Cusham,' and 'Shōmrōn' [EV 'Samaria'] should be 'Shimron'). This critical conclusion, however, does not force us to give up referring Is. 10 5 ff. to the reign of Sargon. The prediction of Isaiah in 8 4 (as we can now understand it) was fulfilled, at least to a moderate extent, not by Tiglath-pileser, but by Sargon, who was perhaps starting on his Arabian campaign (see above, § 13) when the prophet put dramatically into the mouth of 'Assyria' the boastful exaggerations of Is. 10 8-10.

2. In passing on to Is. 20, it is almost enough to refer here to ISAIAH [PROPHET], § 5, [BOOK], § 9, and for monumental evidence to the well-known passage in Sargon's cylinder text (KB 2 64; Intr. Is. 120), relative to the treasonable designs of Philistia, Judah, Edom, and Moab, and the inability of Pir'u, king of Muṣri (so Winckler),[1] to help them.

Something may, however, be said about the names of Azuri, king of Ashdod, his brother Aḫimiti, and the popular nominee Yamâni which the present writer regards as probably N. Arabian ethnics; for Azuri cp Azariah and Azareel, where the final -ah and -(e)el are separate additions, and for Aḫimiti cp Aḥiṭūb, which is commonly misunderstood, and springs from an ethnic, most probably Reḥōbōthi,[2] while Yamâni (hardly 'Ionian') may perhaps be grouped with such popular Hebrew corruptions of the ethnic 'Jeraḥmeel' as יָמִין, יְמִינִי (Yāmīn, Yĕmīnī). Winckler (KAT(3) 70, n. 1) compares Yamâni to Omri. Now, in the present writer's opinion, OMRI (q.v.) was of Jerahmeelite origin, and from Joab's time onwards (cp ZERUIAH) adventurers from the Negeb made their way to power through their ability in warfare.

3. Now, too, we can understand better Is. 28 1-4, which describes the fall of the 'proud crown' of certain 'drunkards'—surely not the unfortunate brethren of Isaiah in Samaria, but the tyrannical princes of the southern Ephraim—i.e., Jeraḥmeel; the place intended is probably the capital of the land of Jeraḥmeel, by which so much harm had been done to Israel and Judah. The Jeraḥmeelites, however, must have sent tribute in time to avert the dreaded punishment of captivity; the prophecy of woe was unfulfilled.

4. The attempt of Sayce to explain several passages of Isaiah (e.g., chaps. 1 10 5 ff. 22 1-14 and partly 36 f.) with reference to the supposed invasion of Judah by Sargon lacks adequate exegetical and monumental basis. On these passages, see Intr. Is. especially 3 f. (with the references). Even if 'subjugator' (mušakniš, see § 17) pointed to a submission of Hezekiah to Sargon in 720 B.C., this would not serve as an explanation of the strong language of Isaiah, who speaks (in so far as the language is really his) of invasion and devastation. T. K. C.

21. Literature. In his Keilschrifttexte Sargons (2 vols. 1889) Winckler rearranges the material published by Botta, Place, Oppert, and others, and gives a full bibliography. His own articles (AOF, passim) and his monograph, Muṣri, Meluḫḫa, Ma'in (MVG, 1898, 1 and 4) are the chief additional sources. Sargon's Annals are chronologically arranged. The Babylonian Chronicle gives a brief imperfectly preserved summary, and the Canon lists supply a few more particulars. The letters sent to Sargon, or his son Sennacherib, by the governors or generals will, when completely published by Prof. R. F. Harper, add greatly to our knowledge of events, but are not yet available. On the whole, we are better informed about Sargon's reign than about any other portion of Assyrian history.

The chief inscriptions of Sargon are given by Winckler, Die Keilschrifttexte Sargons, Leipzig, 1889. For the literature see there p. 1-3, also KB 2 55. Winckler has added several texts in his Sammlung von Keilschrifttexten, 2, on which see his AOF, passim. For a fuller text of K. 1989 see Johns, Assyrian Deeds and Documents, no. 809. For the History see now Rogers, History of Babylonia and Assyria 2 148-182, as well as the Histories in ASSYRIA. For a view of events in Armenia in Sargon's reign, of uncertain date, probably during his stay in Babylon, see article by R. C. Thompson, in AJSL, July 1901.

SARID (שָׂרִיד), a place on the S. border of Zebulun, Josh. 19 10 12 ([ε]σεδεκ [γωλα], σεδδουκ [B] [εως], σαρθιδ, σαριδ [A], σαρειδ, [σ]αρ[ε]ιδ [L]; Pesh. Ashdoa). Reading שריד, we may place the site at Tell Shadūd, on the N. edge of the plain of Esdraelon, 12 m. S. of Jefāt (Conder, PEFM 2 70).

SARON (σαρων), Acts 9 35, RV SHARON.

SAROTHIE (σαρωθει [B], -θιε [A], om. L), a group of children of 'Solomon's servants' (see below) in the great post-exilic list (see EZRA ii., § 9, § 8*c*), one of eight inserted in 1 Esd. 5 34 after Pochereth-hazzebaim of ‖ Ezra 2 57 = Neh. 7 59.

According to the ordinary view, an explanation would be hazardous (for the two views, see NETHINIM and SOLOMON'S SERVANTS). If, however, שלמה is 'Salmah' and נתינים is a corruption of איתנים, then we have a right to look to the N. Arabian borderland, and 'Sarothei' (𝔊B), like 'Sophereth' and 'Shephatiah,' may be a corruption of צָרְפָתִי, Ṣārĕphāthī (see ZAREPHATH). T. K. C.

SARSECHIM (שַׂרְסְכִים and שׂר־סכים—the Western and the Eastern readings respectively), apparently the name of a Babylonian prince (Jer. 39 3 ναβουσαχαρ [BℵA], -σαραχ [Q], σαρσαχειμ [Q^mg.]). Schrader (KAT(2) 416) offers no explanation. Giesebrecht thinks that the preceding 'Nebo' (in MT) should form part of the name (cp 𝔊), and that the name thus produced is a corruption of NEBUSHASBAN (q.v.). The hypothesis, however, that Jeraḥmeelites and Edomites took part (to say the least) in the capture of Jerusalem suggests our reading שַׂר כֻּשִׁים, 'the prince of the Cushites (of N. Arabia).' SATAN. Satan appears in the OT, as a distinct superhuman personality, only in three passages (Zech. 3 Job 1 2 1 Ch. 21 1), all of which are post-exilic, the earliest dating from 519, the last from about 300 B.C.

1. Occurrence in OT. In Ps. 109 6 (see Cheyne), as also probably in Ecclus. 21 27 (see ECCLESIASTICUS, § 19), the term is used of a human adversary or opposer. So far as the OT is concerned, three points require discussion; the meaning and usage of the term (§ 2), the origin of the belief (§ 3), and its development (§ 4).

[1] Muṣri, etc. (MVG, 1898, 1 281 and 25; KAT(3) 70; cp MIZRAIM, § 2 b.

[2] The Hebrew name AHIMOTH (q.v.) most probably has the same origin.

The root (śṭn), which belongs to the old Semitic stock (cp Ar. šṭn), signifies 'to oppose another (by putting oneself in his way).' The noun שָׂטָן śāṭān occurs in the early Hebrew Literature; in a passage like Nu. 22 22 32, the original sense is still clear—'The angel . . . set himself in the way to be a śāṭān to him (Balaam)'; elsewhere the original sense is less prominent (see 1 S. 29 4 2 S. 19 22 [23] 1 K. 5 4 [18] 11 14 23 25, cp Siṭnah, Gen. 26 21). In Ps. 109 6 the word is used of an opponent at law, an accuser. It is with this last shade of meaning that haś-Śāṭān, 'the Satan,' is used in Zech. 3 1 f., where for the first time the word becomes the official title of a distinct personality; in Job, where the word is also used with the article, the usage is similar; but in Ch. the article disappears, the word virtually becomes a proper name and the original sense probably loses prominence, although here, as generally elsewhere, 𝔊^BA translates the term by διάβολος; in NT both the translation and the transliteration (Σατανᾶς) are common; the transliteration occurs in the LXX (of the person; sometimes as Σατάν, see Redpath) only in 𝔊^A at Job 2 3, in Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion in Zech. 3 1; in Aquila also in Job 1 6. The word used as a common noun is transliterated in 1 K. 11 14 23 25 (with variants) and also in two or three places by one or more of the later Greek versions.

2. Meaning and use.

It has often been suggested that Persian influences have, if not produced, yet affected the development of the Jewish belief in Satan. That the name Satan is borrowed, cannot of course be maintained. It is, as we have seen, a pure Semitic word in early use among the Israelites. Nor can it be asserted that the position of the Satan at all closely resembles that of Angromainyu (Ahriman).[1] Angromainyu is an independent power sharply opposed to Ahura Mazda, the good power; and, like him, concerned in the work of creation. The Satan in the earlier Hebrew passages is completely subordinate to Yahwè. Still, if the Book of Job (including the Prologue) is post-exilic, and later than Zech. 1-8, it is not inconceivable that the Persian belief in Angromainyu may have influenced the further development of the belief in Satan as we find it in Job—a view which would be in perfect accordance with historical analogy. The matter, as here stated, needs a more thorough investigation in the light of biblical and Avesta criticism (cp ZOROASTRIANISM, § 8). But at any rate, the ultimate roots of belief in Satan, as well as of the belief in angels, lie in the early popular Israelitish religion, which, however, of course, cannot be dissociated from the religions of the other Semitic peoples. To that religion the 'sons of the Elōhīm' (ANGELS, § 2)—in post-exilic psalms a term for angels—were apparently native, and it is in the closest connection with these that 'the Satan' quite clearly appears in Job, though it should be added that, unlike the sons of Elōhīm, and unlike 'the Satan' of Zech. 3, 'the Satan' of Job 1 11 is a cosmic personage. May it not be that 'the Satan' owes his origin as a distinct character among the 'sons of Elōhīm' (or angels), partly at any rate, to the growing tendency, manifest in both Zech. and Job, and even as early as Ezekiel (cp e.g., 40 3 f.), to distinguish Yahwè's attendants by their functions; and may not at any rate the main reason why he gained a more distinct and enduring individuality than, e.g., 'the man with the measuring line' (Zech. 2 1 [2 5]), or 'the interpreting angel' (Job 33 23), be found in the constant presence of evil and the increasing desire to dissociate it from God? The Satan, at least as far as the kernel of the conception is concerned, may thus be one of those figures due to the crystallisation of temporary functions, which had long before been recognised as performed by Yahwè or one of his spirits, into permanent personalities. In an ancient story (Nu. 22 22 ff.) the mal'akh Yahwè

3. Origin of belief.

[1] Cp de Harlez, Les origines de Zoroastrisme, 301-307.

had on a special occasion become a Satan; now a single personality among Yahwè's attendant spirits permanently appears as the Satan, whose duty it is to test men or to discharge God's hostile purposes against them. If we would fix more exactly on the origin of the Satan, there is much to be said for Marti's suggestion that he is the personification of the self-accusing conscience of Israel (cp Zech. 3 1-4); see Theol. St. Kr., 1892, pp. 208-245. With the foregoing discussion cp ANGELS, §§ 3 5.

The development of the doctrine moves along two lines; (a) from being subordinate to, Satan becomes (largely) independent of Yahwè; (b) from being the (not necessarily unjust) accuser he becomes the tempter and enemy of men. In NT both developments are complete, in OT both are in process.

4. Development of belief.

(a) In Zech. the chief marks of Satan's subordination are the rebuke administered to him and the complete disregard of his accusation, though, as the reference to the 'filthy garments' = 'iniquity' shows, it was well founded. In Job this subordination is still clear; throughout the book the angels are strictly subject to Yahwè, and the Satan is virtually one of them; he suggests trying Job by calamities, but has no power to inflict them without Yahwè's permission or in excess of the divinely assigned limits (1 11-13 2 5-7). Yet germs of the later independence of the Satan can be discerned; the terms of 1 6*b* 2 1*b* indicate that, whilst closely associated with the 'sons of the Elōhīm,' he is in a certain manner distinct from them ('the Satan came also in the midst of them'): cp Enoch 40 7; again, in Zech. (1 10 f. 6 5-7) the angels are sent by Yahwè to go up and down in the earth, in Job the Satan appears to do so on his own initiative (note the question 1 7*a* 2 2*a*), although the idea is as yet by no means that of 1 Pet. 5 8; and finally he instigates Yahwè to injure Job (2 3*b*)—a significant feature when we contrast 1 K. 22 20, where it is only at Yahwè's request that the spirit becomes a lying spirit to entice Ahab. In 1 Ch. 21 1 (= 2 S. 24 1) the independence of Satan has apparently become as complete as it ever became; whereas in Job he moves God against man, in Ch. he moves man against God. In Wisd. 2 24 Satan's independence of and opposition to God is so well-established that, as in NT, men are classified as adherents of God or the Devil (οἱ τῆς ἐκείνου μερίδος ὄντες).

(b) The view of Satan as tempter[1] belongs to an advanced stage. Statements attributing temptation to God, which were at first harmless, became impossible in the development of Jewish theology in a more reflective age. Four passages which illustrate the four main stages in the evolution may be quoted in proof of this. Temptation to evil is in 2 S. 24 1 directly attributed to Yahwè; in Job 1 f. ultimately to God, but through the medium of Satan; in 1 Ch. 21 1 it is ascribed directly to Satan, and by the Chronicler's alteration of his source, tacitly denied of God; and finally in James 1 13 it is directly denied of God. Except therefore in the very latest OT passages temptation to evil is not inconsistent with the character of God; consequently even in Job, far less in Zech., the Satan is not in any distinct manner morally opposed to God; this, at the earliest, he becomes in Chronicles.

This is the main point; how much anticipation of the later moral distinction can be discerned in Zech. and Job is an open question; in Zech. it certainly seems most natural to see in him simply the spokesman for the sternly just demands of God; but the narrative of Job justifies Davidson's sentence, 'He shows an assiduity slightly too keen in the exercise of his somewhat invidious function' (Job, p. 7).

The passage already quoted from Wisdom illustrates another important development; the Satan is identified with the serpent of the narrative of the fall. This identification may have been due to foreign influence, either Persian (see Grimm on the passage) or Alexandrian (see Toy, Judaism and Christianity, 159, 167). Compare and contrast Enoch 69 6. Another late identification—that of Satan and the depraved will—is altogether exceptional (Bābā bath., 16); cp ECCLESIASTICUS.

Before passing on to the NT doctrine two negative points may be noted; in OT no reference is made to angels attendant on Satan; 'angels of evil'—i.e., angels who inflict injury—are still directly subject to God (cp Ps. 78 49 cp 35 5 f. and earlier 1 S. 16 14 ff. Judg. 9 23; see ANGEL, 3), nor to any 'fall' or 'punishment' of Satan. G. B. G.

5. In NT. All uncertainty as to the current conception of Satan ceases when we reach the NT. No theory of dramatic or poetic personification can here be maintained. The 'enemy' of the OT is now individualised, the 'Satans' of the book of Enoch are now unified. Satan is now the distinctly personal (Ja. 4 7) originator (2 Cor. 11 3 Jn. 8 44 1 Jn. 3 8 12), instigator (1 Thess. 3 5 Mt. 4 1 ff.) and perpetuator (Eph. 2 2) of sin, and the cause of its penalty, death (Jn. 8 44 Heb. 2 14); the personal head of the realm of evil, with the ministers thereof (Eph. 2 2, ἐξουσία, collective), evil bodily (Mt. 12 24 Lk. 13 16) and spiritual (Eph. 2 2 Jn. 12 31 1 Jn. 3 8); and the antagonist generally of God (Mt. 13 39 Acts 13 10) and of man (1 Pet. 5 8 Eph. 6 16 Lk. 22 31 Rev. 12 12).

6. Names. Satan appears under nine distinct names.

1. ἄρχων, 'prince' (Synoptists, τῶν δαιμονίων, Mk. 3 22 etc.; Jn., τοῦ κόσμου τούτου, 12 31; Paul, τῆς ἐξουσίας τοῦ ἀέρος, Eph. 2 2; and cp θεὸς τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου, 2 Cor. 4 4, with the κατὰ τὸν αἰῶνα τοῦ κόσμου of the Ephesian passage.

2. ὁ πειράζων, 'the tempter,' Mt. 4 3 1 Thess. 3 5.

3. διάβολος, 'accuser,' not necessarily 'slanderer,' of those who sin through his temptation (cp κατήγορος τῶν ἀδελφῶν, Rev. 12 10), a title confined to Satan, except when used of human slanderers in the Pastoral Epistles,[1] but generally signifying simply (as in 1 Ch. 21 1 and everywhere in LXX), the 'enemy' of God (Mt. 13 39 1 Jn. 3 10) and of man (1 Pet. 5 8); see Hatch, Essays in Biblical Greek, 45-47.

4. Σατανᾶς (Hebrew transliterated, with Grecised form) 'adversary,' NT passim, whether as an adversary (1 Thess. 2 18), a tempter (Mk. 1 13), or the prince of the demons or evil angels (Lk. 11 18 2 Cor. 12 7 [there is some authority for the form Σατᾶν here; see Ti.]).

5. βεελζεβούλ (βεεζεβούλ [אB]), of doubtful derivation and signification (see BEELZEBUB), a name for Satan in the Synoptists alone, and solely in regard to demoniacal possession (Lk. 11 19 compared with Mt. 12 26).

6. ὁ ἐχθρός, 'the enemy' (Mt. 13 39 Lk. 10 19).

7. ὁ πονηρός, 'the evil, injurious one' (Mt. 13 19, cp πνεύματα πονηρά, Lk. 7 21) Eph. 6 16, and especially 1 Jn.).

8. βελίαρ, Syriac and Greek form of BELIAL (q.v.), only in 2 Cor. 6 15 (Christ and Beliar, light and darkness, God and idols, contrasted).

9. ὁ ὄφις, 'the serpent' (2 Cor. 11 3), and ὁ ὄφις ὁ ἀρχαῖος, 'the old serpent,' Rev. 12 9 (ὁ καλούμενος διάβολος καὶ Σατανᾶς) ὁ πλανῶν, 'that deceiveth' (see Wisdom 2 24 as referred to above). See ANTICHRIST.

7. Works. It will be seen that, though various functions are here and there suggested by these names and passages, they all tend to the same issue, the maintenance and propagation of evil; and the NT writers who contribute to the history of Satan and the description of his doings in no wise contradict one another. If we draw an inference from what is said of evil angels in 2 Pet. 2 4 Jude 6, Satan was not originally evil, but had a first estate which he did not keep, leaving, through sin, his own habitation. His sphere of dominion was now the air or firmament (Eph. 6 12 2 2 Lk. 10 18 Rev. 12 9), whence the Syriac etymology of Beliar (in Bar Bahlūl), 'lord of the air.' From the beginning he has been a man-killer (Jn. 8 44), seducing Eve (2 Cor. 11 3), and bringing sin and death into the world (cp Wisd. 2 24, not opposed to Rom. 5 12), and, by the power of death, keeping men, through fear of it, in bondage (Heb. 2 14 f.); enticing men to sin (1 Cor. 7 5) and accusing them when they have fallen (Rev. 12 10); trying to entice Jesus himself (Synn.) but failing, Jn. 14 30, cp Heb. 4 15 2 Cor. 5 21; inflicting upon men misery both bodily and mental, sometimes by 'possessing' them with his 'dæmons' (Mt. 12 24), at other times apparently by direct and ordinary disease (1 Cor. 5 5 2 Cor. 12 7). He is the prince of this world (Jn. 12 31)—i.e., 'the present age (αἰών) with all its evil' (Gal. 1 4)—and as 'god of this age' he blinds the unbelieving (2 Cor. 4 4), and is prince of the spirit that is active in the children of disobedience (Eph. 2 2), the 'children of the devil' (1 Jn. 3 10); and by deceitful wonders and lying prophecy he will lead men astray in the final apostasy (2 Thess. 2 9 f. Rev. 20 8).

8. No dualism. But though Satan is opposed to God (Ja. 4 7), and the 'authority of darkness' to the 'kingdom of the Son of God's love' (Col. 1 13),—as darkness to light in the Parsee antithesis,—there is no Parsee dualism in any true sense. True, Satan is not often, as in the OT, a mere angel of destruction used by God (1 Cor. 5 5 2 Cor. 12 7); but, on the other hand, he is no more independent of God or co-equal with him than is man, who can, as he chooses, serve the one or the other. All that can be said in this direction is that the Satanic power is superhuman, and therefore equally superhuman is his capacity for seduction and destruction (Eph. 6 12). But, though Satan is 'strong,' Jesus is 'stronger' (Mt. 12 29, and parallels); he can spoil Satan's 'goods' (Mk. 3 27) and destroy his works (1 Jn. 3 8); Christ will finally bring him to naught and rescue his bondsmen (Heb. 2 14), casting him and his angels into the eternal fire prepared for them (Mt. 25 41 Rev. 20 10 Jude 6), along with the last enemy death (1 Cor. 15 26 Rev. 20 13). This deliverance is, in principle, already begun (Lk. 10 18 f. Col. 1 13 1 Jn. 4 4 Jn. 12 31 16 11), but will not be complete till the παρουσία of Christ (Rom. 16 20 1 Cor. 15 26 2 Thess. 2 Rev. 20). SATHRABUZANES (ϲαθραβουζανηϲ [BA]), 1 Esd. 6 3, EV; AV[mg.] SHETHAR-BOZNAI.

SATRAPS (אֲחַשְׁדַּרְפְּנִים, and ־נִין, aḥašdarpĕnīm, -īn; ϲατραπαι, but ϲτρατηγοι in Esth. 3 12 [not L[a]]; Vg. Satrapæ; AV 'princes,' or 'lieutenants,' RV always 'satraps') are mentioned in Ezra 8 36 (𝔊 διοικηταί) Esth. 3 12 8 9 (𝔊[BALβ] οἰκονόμοι) 9 3 Dan. 3 2 f. 27 6 2-5 7 f.[1] It is the O. Pers. khšatrapāvan (khšatra, 'realm, empire' + pā, 'to protect'), not to be confounded with the Avest. šōithrapān, which has a different meaning. The division of the empire into satrapies is due to Darius I. Hystaspis. Though really bound to an implicit obedience to the king's orders and controlled by other officials, the satraps grew into a kind of viceroys, who exercised in their provinces an all but sovereign power, and in their household imitated the royal court. See, further, PERSIA, § 18, SHERIFFS; and cp A. Buchholz, Quæstiones de Persarum satrapis (Leipsic, 1896). C. P. T.

SATYRS is the EV rendering of the Heb. שְׂעִירִים, sĕʿīrīm, in Is. 13 21 34 14 (RV[mg.] 'he-goats'; American RV 'wild goats') and RV[mg.] in Lev. 17 7 2 Ch. 11 15 (RV 'he-goats'; AV 'devils').

1. Meaning of the term. In these four passages[2] it is quite clear that the reference is not to the natural animal—the he-goat—which the Hebrew word śāʿīr (an abbreviation for the fuller and frequent locution śĕʿīr ʿizzīm) generally denotes (cp GOAT, §§ 1 [4] 5). It is true that some scholars (e.g., Hengstenberg; similarly Baethgen in Riehm, HWB(2) 'Feldgeister') have retained this meaning by explaining the sacrifices to the sĕ'īrīm referred to in Lev. and Ch. as belonging to an Egyptian cultus of the goat (cp Herod. 2 46), borrowed by the Hebrews from the Egyptians and practised by them in the wilderness and revived by Jeroboam after his residence in Egypt. But (apart from the consideration that these two references are exilic and post-exilic respectively) this interpretation fails to do justice to the passages in Isaiah.

1 Not used in any of the commonly called Pauline Epistles except in Ephesians and the Pastorals.

1 σατράπαι does not occur in Dan. 3 2 f. 27 6 7 f.

2 And in 2 K. 23 8 which originally spoke of במות השעירים = the bāmōth of the śĕʿīrīm (not as MT הַשְּׁעָרִים = the gates); so Hoffmann in ZATW, 1882, p. 175, subsequently others (e.g., Kautzsch). For post-biblical references to שעירים, see M. Schwab, 'Vocabulaire d'Angelologie' (Academie des Inscriptions 10 [1897] 370 420 (s.vv. שעירים and Σιγιμιμ).

The ancient tradition (as preserved in the versions) is substantially consistent and substantially also correct. In all four passages the versions agree in not rendering śā'īr by the equivalent of he-goat. They render either by a word denoting demon or false god, or by a term probably implying demons though signifying directly only 'hairy'—a meaning which the Hebrew word possessed (cp Gen. 27 11) and out of which the use of the word for he-goat probably sprang. Thus 𝔊 renders by δαιμόνια or μάταια (in 2 Ch. 11 15 there is probably a 'doublet'; τοῖς εἰδώλοις καὶ τοῖς ματαίοις), Syr. by šēdā, Tg. שידין, Vg. dæmon or pilosus; cp, further, Field's notes in the Hexapla on Is. 13 21 and 34 14.

The suggestion of the versions (see above) that śā'īr was a term for demons or a particular kind of demon is confirmed by the contexts of the five passages (including 2 K. 23 8) already mentioned. Thus in Is. 34 14 LILITH (q.v.) is also mentioned; and although certain natural animals (e.g., wolves, jackals) are mentioned in the same connection both here and in Is. 13 21, they are not domestic animals like the goat; moreover, we have the same combination of actual animals and demonic beings in an Assyrian description of devastation (G. Smith, Annals of Ašur-bāni-pal; see Che. on Is. 13 21). The association of demons with desert places was a prevalent element in popular belief (cp DEMONS, § 3). Note, further, that the sĕ'īrīm are described as dancing and calling to one another. In 2 K. 23 8 Lev. 17 7 and 2 Ch. 11 15, where the bāmōth of the sĕ'īrīm and sacrifices offered to them are mentioned, the term may be used in derision of false and forbidden objects of worship in general—for which abundant parallels could be cited. In Lev. 17 7, however, the association of the sĕ'īrīm with the 'open field' (v. 5) suggests a connection, direct or indirect, with the custom or rite of sending a goat to Azazel on the day of Atonement (see AZAZEL).

It remains to consider how far the sĕ'īrīm were a clearly defined class of demons and what were their special characteristics. We have really little more than the etymology to guide us. It is generally assumed, on the ground of the usual significance of śā'īr, that they were goat-shaped. This is not improbable, and if correct, the use of the term 'satyr' is sufficiently appropriate; only it must be remembered that we have no reason for attributing to the Hebrew conception the richer details that characterise the Greek.

2. Characteristics of the sĕ'īrīm.

Some (e.g., Duhm; Marti, Gesch. d. Isr. Rel. 236) suggest that Azazel (cp above) was chief of the sĕ'īrīm; we might then compare the relation to the Greek satyr. But this is not very probable (see Cheyne's paper in ZATW, 1895; and cp AZAZEL). Wellhausen, on the other hand, seems inclined to limit his inference from the etymology to the hairiness of these beings; see Heid.(1) 135 f.; (2) 151 f. where some Arabic parallels will be found. If śā'īr (=demon), in spite of being confined to exilic and post-exilic literature (for which there may be sufficient reason; cp DEMONS, § 1), is actually of early origin, probably it merely expressed the 'hairiness' of the demons; but if late, it was most probably chosen on account of its secondary sense (goat) because these beings were regarded as goat-shaped. Cp in general Boch. Hieroz. bk. vi. 7; Ges. Jes. 465 f.; Baudissin, St. 1 136 ff. and the article 'Feldgeister' in PRE(3); Mannhardt Wald- u. Feldkulte, ch. 3 (§ 8 refers to a trace of Syrian goat spirits in a story of Iamblichus). G. B. G.

SAUL

Origin (§ 1). End; character (§ 4 f.).
Wars (§ 2 f.). Family (§ 6).

Saul (שָׁאוּל, šā'ūl, as if 'asked for,' § 56; according to Jastrow [JBL 19 (1900) 101] 'devoted,' viz., to Yahwè; but see below [§ 1, midway]; ϲαογλ [BAL]) is traditionally regarded as the first king of Israel. His story has passed through phases little less various than that of David, with which it is so closely interlaced (see DAVID). In its present form, indeed, it raises insoluble problems both of history and of character; neither the outer nor the inner life of the heroic king is intelligible to us. Reluctant, therefore, as we may be to touch narratives which are universally interesting—though the interest partly arises from their enigmas—we cannot avoid criticising them, and we may be well assured that the gain which will result from critical thoroughness will be far greater than the seeming loss. There cannot but be a more potent attraction in narratives which can be read more nearly as they were meant to be read; and if the historical element turns out to be less than we have supposed, we can at any rate use it with some confidence, whilst in a secondary sense even the less historical elements are of documentary value for the period to which the traditions in their present form can be shown to belong (see SAMUEL [BOOKS]).

The traditions agree (and we shall find good reason to accept the statement) that Saul was a Benjamite of Gibeah (1 S. 9 1 10 26 11 4 15 34), though the most ingenious of our modern historians (Winckler) seeks to show that he was a Gileadite.

1. Origin.

The short genealogy in 1 S. 9 1 represents his father KISH as a 'son of Bechorath' (APHIAH which follows is a corruption of 'Gibeah'), and in 10 21 Saul ben Kish is assigned to the family called MATRI [q.v.], while in 2 S. 20 1 SHEBA the Benjamite, David's opponent, is called ben Bichri—i.e., a Bichrite (cp BECHER, and see below on the 'Bezek' of 1 S. 11 8). Taking these names Bechorath, Matri, and Bichri together, and noticing 𝔊L's reading μαχειρ in 1 S. 9 1, it is difficult not to see that Saul's family, according to the tradition underlying 9 1 and 10 21, was known as Machirith (cp בכורת=בכירית in 9 1) or Jeraḥme'elith (cp § 6); cp 1 Ch. 8 29 f., where the origin of Kish is traced to Maachah (a corruption of Jeraḥme'el). In other words, the clan and family to which the first king belonged were ultimately of semi-Jeraḥmeelite origin. Nevertheless the early writers were quite consistent in regarding Saul as a Benjamite, for the tribe of Benjamin (as its very name may perhaps indicate) had a strong Jeraḥmeelite element; this is suggestively expressed in 1 Ch. 7 7 f. where (by no mere arbitrary fiction) Jerimoth, at once son of Bela and son of Becher, is recognised as a Benjamite; now JERIMOTH is certainly not = 'excelsa' [Ges.] but one of the most unmistakable popular corruptions of Jeraḥme'el.[1]

This theory suggests an explanation of the name of Saul's father Kish, which, in spite of the very plausible connection suggested by Robertson Smith (see col. 2682), is perhaps best explained as a corruption of Cush (כּוּשׁ) or Cushi (כּוּשִׁי). Cush and Miṣṣur (Muṣri) were contiguous regions in N. Arabia; if there were Miṣrite elements in Israel (see MOSES, § 4), there were, of course, equally developed Cushite elements.

The name of the king himself does not admit of as [1] It may no doubt be asserted that this way of regarding Saul was erroneous. It is said in 1 Ch. 7 14 f. of Machir, whose wife was MAACAH (= Jeraḥme'elith), that he was the son of Manasseh, and Winckler holds that Saul was not a Benjamite but a Manassite of Gilead. But surely the right view is that there wefe both northern and southern clans of Machirite (i.e., Jeraḥmeelite) affinities. According to 1 Ch. 8 29-33 Kish and Saul belonged to the southern Jeraḥmeelites (MAACAH). This is the theory expressed above.

ready an explanation, and it seems to have been very much misunderstood. The key to it is probably to be found in 1 S. 1 28, where the name שמואל (Samuel) is expressly made equivalent to שָׁאוּל (Saul), and connected (cp v. 20) with √שָׁאַל (šā'al), 'to ask.' It is at any rate plausible to suppose that Šĕmū'ēl and Šā'ūl (also Ishmael and Shobal?) are modifications of a common original,[1] viz., the southern clan-name Shema (=Sheba, 𝔊B σαμαα, Josh. 19 2?) with the afformative ל or אל. It will be remembered that elsewhere Saul (SAUL, 2; SHAUL) is a N. Arabian name, given both to a Simeonite and to a Muṣrite; also that Samuel, according to tradition, was a son of JEROHAM—i.e., belonged to a clan which had Jeraḥmeelite (N. Arabian) affinities. It is even possible that the narrator who worked up the legends respecting Saul's connection with Samuel may have been ignorant of the seer's real name, and have selected for him one of two variants of the traditional name of the first king.[2]

1b. Name and home.

The view of the origin of the name 'Saul' here recommended may help to account for the fact that ancient scribes were liable to confound the two names Saul and Samuel, for evidence of which it is enough to refer to 1 S. 11 7, where the rival readings אחרי שאול ('after Saul') and אחר שמואל ('after Samuel') stand side by side, and 1 S. 28 12, where the cry of the 'witch of Endor' is said to have been called forth by the sight of 'Samuel,' a palpable error (as Perles has pointed out) for 'Saul.'[3]

The true name of the first king, however, has probably passed into oblivion, like so much besides connected with this dim far-off figure.

The true name of Saul's native place is perhaps recoverable. It was most probably not Gibeath-shaul (EV Gibeah of Saul), but Gibeath-shalishah (שאול and שלשה may reasonably be taken to be kindred forms); i.e., Shalishah was the name of the district in which this Gibeah was situated. Near it were (a) LAISH, also called in MT Laishah and Zela (both corruptions of Shalishah), and (b) Gilgal or Beth-gilgal—i.e., very probably Beth-jeraḥmeel (see § 6). Beth-jeraḥmeel[4] (if we may adopt this name as the true one), which was apparently a walled city of some importance, may be regarded as the centre of Saul's clan. As we shall presently see, it was the city which this hero relieved when in a very critical situation; it was also the place where his married daughter (see MERAB, PALTI) and his grandson (see MEPHIBOSHETH) resided, and where Sheba the Bichrite took refuge with his clansmen when pursued by Joab.[5] The restoration of the true name throws a bright light on a number of passages (cp GALLIM).

1c. Predecessors?

It is a disputed point whether or no Saul was the first to realise the idea of kingly government. According to Winckler (GI 2 56 157), the stories of Gideon, Abimelech, and Jephthah were brought into shape as justifications of the claim made by the Gileadite (?) Saul to the sovereignty of western Israel and to the possession of the religious capital—Shechem. This theory is decidedly ingenious; but it is more probable (see ISRAEL, § 10; GIDEON; but cp ABIMELECH, 2) that Gideon was, strictly speaking, the first Israelitish king. It remains true, however, that Saul is the first king of a section of the Israelites of whom fairly definite traditions are preserved, and it is to these traditions, not all equally trustworthy, that we now direct our attention.

1d. Traditions.

Traditions of much interest respecting Saul have come down to us from a school of writers trained under prophetic influence. According to these, it was a seer called Samuel[1] who, by his preternatural insight, recognised in the son of Kish the destined 'captain' or 'prince' (nāgīd, see PRINCE) of united Israel (1 S. 9 16). This patriotic Israelite (see SAMUEL) is introduced to us going up to the bāmāh of an unnamed city to 'bless the sacrifice' and partake of the sacrificial repast. By a happy accident—as it seems—Saul, on a journey in search of his father's lost asses, appears before him, and timidly asks the way to the seer's house. At once Samuel (who, if a member of a Jeraḥmeelite clan, would perhaps recognise Saul) discloses his identity. He treats his visitor with marked consideration, and on the morrow, in strict privacy, communicates to him a divine oracle respecting him.[2] At the same time he solemnly anoints[3] and then kisses him (see SALUTATIONS). Finally, to strengthen Saul's faith, he specifies three remarkable experiences which the favourite of heaven will have as he returns home. One was that he would meet two men (see RACHEL'S SEPULCHRE) who would give news respecting the lost asses and would mention the paternal anxiety of Kish. Another was that three pilgrims whom he would also meet (see TABOR) would be so struck by his bearing that they would salute him and offer him a present of two loaves. The third sign was that Saul would meet a company of nĕbī'īm in a state of frenzy (see PROPHET, § 4), and would be seized upon by the spirit of Yahwè and pass into the same state (calling out perhaps for the advent of Israel's war-god to lead his people to victory). All this, we are told, came to pass; yet it was not this, but the disclosures of the seer Samuel, which transformed Saul's nature, and made him a true king (10 9).

1e. Winckler's theory.

In about a month's time Saul was called upon to justify the seer's selection. So at least the true text of 1 S. 11 1 (preserved by 𝔊)[4] tells us. Winckler, however, rejects the words which assert a month's interval, as not belonging to the original tradition. According to this scholar, it is quite a fresh account of Saul and his origin that we have in 1 S. 11 1-11, the original story having been recast when, to soothe patriotic feelings, the Gileadite hero was converted into a Benjamite. After undoing what he regards as the work of the later editor of the tradition, Winckler arrives at this simple statement of fact which he considers to be authentic. Nahash, king of the Ammonites, was besieging the city of JABESH in Gilead, and pressing it hard. By a bold stroke, akin to that related, Winckler thinks, by anticipation in Judg. 7 (see GIDEON), Saul relieved the city (v. 11), which appears to have been his birthplace.[5] The points which seem to Winckler to force upon us the view that Saul was a Jabeshite are three—(1) the tra-

1 For the same idea somewhat differently applied see Wi. GI 2 224, KAT(3) 225. This scholar's own explanation of שאול is fully set forth in KAT(3), l.c.; the Hebrew name ('asked') is the literal translation of bêl purussê, 'the oracle-god,' a title of Sin, the moon-god.

2 Cp Sayce, Hibbert Lectures (1887), 52. 'Sheba,' too, was hardly the birth-name of the Bichrite mentioned in 2 S. 20 1.

3 Σαμουηλ represents שאול in Gen. 46 10 (A), 1 S. 11 13 (B*) 15 (BA), 15 12 (B), while Σαουλ represents שמואל in 1 S. 15 12 (B).

4 There were, of course, different places called Beth-jerahmeel. Cp GALLIM, SACK (4).

5 The passage (2 S. 20 14 f.) should probably be read thus, 'And Sheba passed on to Beth-jeraḥme'el, and all the Bichrites (Jeraḥmeelites) assembled and went in after him. And they came and besieged him in Beth-jeraḥme'el'; hence in v. 18 אבל should be {ירח}מאל. In v. 14 שבמי (בכל) should be שבע, and ישראל אבלה should be ירחמאלה; the following words ובית מעכה should be בית ירחמאל (an early correction). Other references to 'Beth-jerahmeel' probably underlie certain corrupt words in Am. 1 3 Hos. 10 14 (see Crit. Bib.).

1 According to Winckler (GI 2 151), Zuph in Mt. Ephraim, whence the earlier prophetic legend brought Samuel, was within the ancient limits of Benjamin. See, however, ZUPH.

2 The relation between the prince-elect and the seer reminds us of the traditions respecting Elisha as a king-maker (1 K. 19 15 f. 2 K. 8 13 9 3). No doubt it appeared natural to the prophetic school of narrators. Observe that there is an omission in the MT of 1 S. 10 1 (see Var. Bib.) which can be supplied from 𝔊. The sentence dropped out by homœoteleuton.

3 Whether this is historical may be doubted (see Smend, Rel.-gesch.(2) 66, n. 1).

4 καὶ ἐγενήθη ὡς μετὰ μῆνα (BA); καὶ ἐγένετο μετὰ μῆνα ἡμερῶν (L). MT has ויהי כמחריש (καὶ ἐγενήθη ὡς κωφεύων [L]); 𝔊L points to a Heb. text in which מחריש and חֹדֶשׁ both had a place at the end of 1 S. 10 26, giving not only a wrong reading but a wrong connection. For clearly 11 1 is a continuation of the narrative which breaks off at 10 16. See H. P. Smith.

5 So, not only GI 2 but also KAT(3) 227.

dition in 1 S. 31 11-13 relative to the pious care of the Jabeshites for the bones of Saul and his sons, (2) the stand made by Saul's son and heir ISHBOSHETH, as king of E. Israel, at Mahanaim, and (3) the legendary statement in Judg. 21 8-14 that Jabesh-gilead sent no warriors against the offending tribe of Benjamin, and (virtually) recognised the right of connubium enjoyed by Jabeshites and Benjamites.

Winckler's conclusion, however, though plausible (cp MANASSEH, § 4), cannot well be admitted. As to (3), the statement in Judg. 21 8-14 does indeed imply the currency of a belief in the connection between the Benjamite king Saul and Jabesh-gilead, but in its present form (the text is, in the opinion of the present writer, in need of revision) it is too late to have any critical value. As to (2), Ishbosheth's stand at Mahanaim could only prove that Saul's sovereignty extended in some degree to Gilead. As to (1), the statement in the traditional text of 1 S. 31 11-13 is impossible, if, as the present writer believes, the place where the bodies[1] of Saul and his sons were exposed on the wall was, according to the original tradition, not Beth-shan, but some southern town, such as Eshean (Josh. 15 52), i.e., perhaps Beer-sheba[2] (cp ESHEAN, ASHAN). Who the friends of Saul really were, we shall see later; Jabeshites of Gilead, they most certainly were not.

1f. Cheyne's theory.

Saul therefore was not a Gileadite but a Benjamite. The difficulty arising out of the improbable geographical statement in 1 S. 9 3 ff. (see SHALISHA, ZUPH), and out of the statement in the traditional text (rejected) of 1 S. 31 11-13 (so far as it refers to Beth-shan and the Jabeshites), must be met by stricter criticism of the text. Underlying 'Jabesh-gilead' there must be the name of some place easily accessible from Saul's home at Gibeah.[3] What that name is, no one who has studied the errors of the scribes, both in MT and in 𝔊, can doubt for a moment. It is Beth-gilgal, i.e., Beth-jeraḥmeel, a place-name to which we have already been introduced—the city intended was in the S. of Benjamin near Gibeah and Anathoth; and the foes who threatened the city and all Benjamin besides,[4] were not the Ammonites but the 'Amalekites'—i.e., a branch of the Jeraḥmeelites (עמון was miswritten for עמלק=ירחמאל; cp Judg. 3 13), the name of whose king was Achish (אכיש), as we should probably read for 'Nahash' (נחש; see NAHASH). It may be noticed in passing that the danger to which Beth-jeraḥmeel was exposed from the N. Arabians was, in the opinion of the present writer, not always averted; in Hos. 10 14 and Am. 1 3 there is possibly a reference to the cruel conduct of the Salmæans (nearly = Cushites) at their conquest either of this fortress or of a fortress with the same name in the Negeb. See SALMA.

The place where the Israelites mustered in obedience to Saul's summons was Bezeḳ (1 S. 11 8), which on the supposition that the distressed city was in Gilead is suitably identified with Khirbet Ibziḳ. If so, there will appear to be two places called Bezeḳ, for in Judg. 1 4 f. we meet with a Bezek[5] which is undeniably in the S. of Palestine (see BEZEK).

If, however, the threatened city was in Benjamin, and the foes were Jeraḥmeelites from the extreme S., it is probable that the warriors who responded to Saul were from Benjamin and from the territory farther S., and that the mustering

[1] On 1 Ch. 10 10 see HEAD.

[2] Not unfrequently in P's lists we find a corrupt variant of a place-name presented as the name of a fresh place.

[3] This has a close bearing on the criticism of Judg. 21 8-14 (referred to above).

[4] 1 S. 11 2 has been thoroughly misunderstood owing to textual corruption. For בְּנִקּוֹר we should certainly read בִּמְקוֹל. The passage then becomes, 'that I stop up to your loss every fountain of Benjamin' (cp 2 K. 2 25). מ and נ can be confounded in Aramaic characters; cp 𝔊BA's [ε]ιαβεις in 1 S. 12 9 for יבין.

[5] 'Adoni-bezek' in Judg. 1 5 ff. is probably a combination of two clan-names ארני (from ערני; see PARADISE, § 7) and ברך (see above). Cp 'Adonikam' and 'Adoniram,' where 'kam' and 'ram' represent fragments of 'Jeraḥmeel.'

place was in (or, less probably, to the S. of) the district occupied by Saul's clan. Of 'Bezek' we know nothing; but a southern clan-name ברכי is attested by the name ברכיה and by the place-name בְּרָכָה (near Tekoa). Most probably, however, we should read, for בזק, not ברך, but בכר; BECHER [q.v.] was in fact one form of the name of Saul's clan. The proceedings of the heroic leader thus become geographically clear; 'Gilgal' in 1 S. 11 12-15 may be emended into 'Jeraḥmeel,' i.e., Beth-jeraḥmeel, the name of the central place of Saul's clan.

1g. King of Benjamin.

Naturally enough, such an important event as the relief of Beth-jeraḥmeel (Jabesh-gilead) led to the recognition of Saul as king of Benjamin (v. 14 is rightly regarded by Driver as redactional, and may be omitted). Possibly other tribes, too, recognised him as in a qualified sense their king by sending him presents, so that they might profit in time of need by his proved ability in warfare; but of this no certainty is attainable. The thoroughly antique action[1] ascribed to Saul in 1 S. 11 7 has been placed in a wrong setting. The compiler gives no hint that the action referred to made the war a holy war, and he represents the pieces of flesh as having been sent throughout all Israel. It is not likely, however, that other clans besides those most nearly connected with Saul and those which were in equal danger from the Jeraḥmeelites (on the significant notice in 1 S. 31 7 [emended text] respecting 'the men of Israel that were in Jeraḥmeelite Arabia' see § 4 c) were summoned to his standard. Saul was by no means king of all Israel; that distinction was reserved for David.

Still in such turbulent times even this moderate dominion demanded all the energy and fervent patriotism of the ruler, who was certainly no mere lad at his succession, though his precise age is not recorded.[2] The words in 1 S. 11 7 'whosoever comes not out after Saul,'[3] suggest that Saul was already well-known as a bold warrior. The story in 1 S. 9 3 ff., which presents him as a youthful and modest dependent of his father Kish, does not inspire us with confidence; indeed the whole connection of Saul with an individual called Samuel is historically not free from doubt.

2a. Gibeon.

According to the tradition, Saul now returned to his home at GIBEAH. From 1 S. 13 2 it would seem that one of his first regal acts was to collect a small army of Israelitish warriors. Probably they were chiefly Benjamites under the leadership of Abner; it is a plausible hypothesis of Winckler that Benjamin was at that time by no means 'the smallest of the tribes of Israel' (1 S. 9 21), and that its territory was more extensive than in the later period, after it had been conquered (?) by David.[4] This view of the composition of the army agrees with 1 S. 22 6 ff. where Saul is described as in Gibeah, surrounded by Benjamites,[5] when he pronounced an unjust sentence on the priests of Yahwè. It is probable, however, that he had also (like David) a bodyguard composed of foreigners, if rāṣīm (v. 17

[1] For the archæological origin of the custom referred to see WRS Rel. Sem.(2) 402, who illustrates from Lucian and Zenobius, and notices the parallel statement in Judg. 19 29. The narrative in Judg. 19-21 has been much edited, the statement referred to is partly connected with a mythological story relative to creation (see SODOM, § 9), partly with an antique sacrificial rite (cp Schwally, Semit. Kriegsaltertümer, 1 54). Those who partook of the sacrificial pieces of flesh which Saul sent round became consecrated persons whom no enemy could harm. The later compilers of the story of Saul had forgotten this; but it is the duty of the historical critic, so far as he can, to get behind their compilation, and restore the original setting of misunderstood traditions.

[2] 1 S. 13 1 gives no sense. Most critics since Wellhausen regard it as a gloss, and read '. . . years old was Saul when he began to reign, and he reigned . . . years over Israel.' The glossator did not venture to fill up the number of years. This involves regarding שתי before שנים as a corrupt duplication of שני. See, however, Driver and Löhr, ad loc. Klostermann's theory seems too complicated.

[3] The following words '[and] after Samuel' are a variant, as explained already.

[4] The conquest may be obscurely referred to in Judg. 20. Similarly, it seems, Nöldeke (col. 536, n. 3).

[5] On 1 S. 22 6 see TAMARISK; on 'ye Benjamites,' v. 7, see Crit. Bib.

'runners') is, as the present writer suspects, a mutilation and corruption of Zārephāthīm (Zarephathites). These foreigners, however, were virtually Israelites; they had adopted Israelitish reverence for the persons of the priests of Yahwè, whom they refused to massacre at the bidding of the enraged king (v. 17). It was Doeg an 'Aramite' (see 1 S. 21 8 [7], 𝔊BA)[1] who, according to the narrative, out of hatred for David performed the dreadful act, for which, after David had come to the throne, a stern penalty was (not indeed by David) exacted (2 S. 21).

The historical character of the massacre (apart from the details) cannot be doubted; but the real cause of it is not clear. Had the priestly clan of Gibeon, like Samuel (a typical personage), 'rejected' Saul as king? Had they really espoused the cause of a pretender, and so done all in their power to paralyse Saul's patriotic activity? However that may be, we must not forget the arduous nature of the task to which Saul had braced himself.

2*b*. Philistines.

He had to put an end to the disastrous incursions of a powerful enemy, the name of which is given as Pĕlištīm (ἀλλόφυλοι) or PHILISTINES [q.v.]. The correctness of this name is generally accepted, but has, elsewhere by the present writer (see PELETHITES, ZAREPHATH), been questioned. In particular, there are passages in the narrative which is commonly used as evidence for David's outlawry, but may really be a transformed, distorted version of a tradition of a struggle between Saul and David (so Winckler), and also in the account of the closing scene of Saul's life, and of David's subsequent exploits, which force the present writer to hold that the Zarephathites—excluding those who had expatriated themselves and joined Saul's bodyguard—were, together with their neighbours the 'Amalekites,' the true enemies of Saul and for a time at least of David after him (see PELETHITES, REHOBOTH, ZAREPHATH). In a word, the so-called 'Philistines' are Zarephathites, and their centre was not the 'Philistian sea-coast' but the NEGEB [q.v.].

A striking account is given by one of the narrators of the opening of the war against the 'Philistines' (1 S. 13)—of course, before the massacre just referred to. Jonathan (whose relation to Saul the writer assumes to be well-known) had offered an open insult to the 'Philistines' (v. 3); we may perhaps suppose that it was an insult which affected their religion.[2] The 'Philistines' mustered in force to avenge it. Affrighted at their appearance, the Israelites took refuge in mountain-hollows, or crossed over into Gad and Gilead. From the camp at Michmash (opposite Geba where the outrage had been committed) the 'Philistines' plundered the country, secure of meeting with no opposition, because few of the Israelites had any weapons (1 S. 13 19-22; cp FORK). Only six hundred men, we are told, remained with Saul at 'the border of Gibeah'; but one of these was no less than Jonathan. This brave man, together with his armour-bearer, is said to have performed a most audacious exploit (1 S. 14; on the text of vv. 4 f. see MICHMASH). His object was to surprise the outpost of the enemy, whose duty it was to watch the steep ravine between Geba on the S. and Michmash on the N. (the Wādy es-Suwēnīt). The two men went secretly down into the valley below Geba, as if on their way to the caves where the timid Israelites were hidden. There is in fact a line of such caves on both sides of the wady, and they are practically impregnable (cp MICHMASH). Greeted with scoffs by the enemy, who noticed their first movements, Jonathan and his follower afterwards disappeared from view, and climbed up on the other side.[1] The Philistine outpost was thrown into confusion by the sudden appearance of the two men. Jonathan, fatigued as he was with his climb, smote right and left, and his armour-bearer quickly despatched the wounded. The 'spoilers' fled in dismay, and the general panic—so the legend says—was heightened by an earthquake (see EARTHQUAKE). Then Saul, who had (somewhat strangely) been tarrying under the pomegranate tree 'in the border of Geba' (14 2; see GIBEAH, § 1; MIGRON), arose, and discovering the absence of Jonathan and his follower, applied to the priest for guidance. Before there was time, however, for Ahijah to bring forward the EPHOD [q.v.], circumstances had made the duty of the slowly moving king clear to him. Promptly he led his little band against the disordered enemy. At once those Israelites who had been compelled to serve with the 'Philistines' withdrew, and joined the patriots. The 'Philistines' were seen hurrying wildly towards Bethel across the watershed and down the steep descent of Aijalon. In hot chase the Israelites followed them. The story is vividly told, and is evidently ancient. How far is it trustworthy? Certainly it cannot be a pure romance; but Winckler has called attention to some very doubtful elements, and to these the present writer must now add the designation of the oppressors of the Israelites by the name of 'Philistines.'

We have also an account of a battle between the Israelites and the Philistines in the valley of Elah (rather, ha-Elah), or, as the scene appears to be otherwise described, in Ephes-dammim (1 S. 17 1 f.). The chief point in it, however, is the encounter of David with Goliath, which appears to be a reflection of the story of Elhanan and Goliath in 2 S. 21 19, where the scene of the combat is at Gob (=REHOBOTH). Probably 'ēmeḳ hā-ēlāh and ĕphes-dammim are corruptions respectively of 'ēmeḳ jeraḥme'el and 'ēmeḳ ărammīm, synonymous phrases (ărammim = jeraḥme'elim) for the valley of Jerahmeel (=the wādy el-Milḥ?). It is important to mention this here, to prepare the reader for the change in our view of the localities of the last fatal fight ('Gilboa') necessitated by our criticism of the text (see § 4). As has been shown elsewhere, the period as well as the scene of the traditional fight with Goliath is misstated in 1 S. 18.

According to the statement in 1 S. 14 47 f., Saul had various other wars in which he was uniformly successful.

3. Other wars.

It is doubtful from what source this passage is derived. Evidently the writer is an admirer of Saul, for he does not scruple to transfer exploits ascribed by tradition to David (2 S. 8 12)[2] to his neglected predecessor. The text of the passage needs rectification, and should probably run thus (see Crit. Bib.)—

And when Saul had taken the kingdom over Israel [he fought against all his enemies round about, against Muṣur, against the Amalekites, against Jerahmeel-Miṣṣur, and against the Zarephathites, and whithersoever he turned, he was

[1] By Aramite we mean 'Jeraḥmeelite'. There is some reason to think that Doeg was one of the רצים or rather Zarephathites (cp Grätz's view, col. 1124). For some new evidence see Crit. Bib. 𝔊L has Ἰδουμαῖος.

[2] 'Garrison' (EV) is not a probable rendering of נְצִיב. Like נצב in the Hadad inscription found near Zenjīrlī, the word might mean either 'prefect' or 'pillar.' The meaning 'pillar' is to be preferred (cp, however, ISRAEL, § 13). Jonathan would have slain more than one person, and נבאש seems to point to some religious insult. Probably we should read וַיַּכֵּת, 'he shattered' (Klo.). A sacred pillar seems to be meant; we need not emend נְצִיב into מַצֶּבֶת (cp JEHOSHAPHAT, n. 2, col. 2352; PHŒNICIA, § 9). In 10 5 for 'the hill of God' (גבעת האלהים) read גִּבְעַת יְרַחְמְאֵלִים 'Gibeah of the Jeraḥmeelites.' 'Jeraḥmeelites' and 'Zarephathites' (='Philistines') are synonymous terms. The sacred pillar of the Zarephathites (Philistines) caused the place to be called 'Gibeah of the Jeraḥmeelites.' From 13 3 it appears that Geba is meant.

[1] Cp Miller, The Least of all Lands, 104; also Conder, Tent-work, 2 114 f.

[2] 2 S. 8 12 should probably run thus, or nearly thus (see Crit. Bib., but cp DAVID, § 8), 'From Aram, and from Miṣṣur, and from the Amalekites, and from the Zarephathites, and from the spoil of Hadad, the Rehobothite, king of Miṣṣur.' On 'Aram' (i.e., Jeraḥmeel), as an emendation of 'Edom,' cp JOKTHEEL, § 2; REZIN; SALT, VALLEY OF; ZAIR; ZOBAH.

victorious], he showed valour; he smote Amalek, and rescued Israel out of the hand of his spoiler.

Thus in its original form the passage was not the close of a history of Saul (Wellh. CH 246 f.), but rather an introduction to the story of the campaign against 'Amalek,' which is, in fact, the only war of Saul described at any length in our traditions before the tragedy of Mt. 'Gilboa' (see 1 S. 15, and cp AGAG, BESOR, HAVILAH, SHUR, TELAIM, SAMUEL).

The narrative suffers greatly from the want of preliminary explanations. Are we to suppose that the bands of raiders had already forced their way to Saul's territory? Or should we rather assume that the clans to the S. of Benjamin had appealed for aid to the king's generosity? In order to answer these questions we must read the notice of Saul's expedition against 'Amalek' in the light of the new but indispensable theory (see above) that his warfare was chiefly with the Ṣarephathites (Pĕlištim being a corruption of Ṣārĕphāthīm as 'Amalek' is a distortion of Jeraḥme'elim). It may be assumed that if these raiders penetrated into Saul's kingdom (the territory of Benjamin was then perhaps more extensive than afterwards), the Amalekites (Jeraḥmeelites), whom we can only with some difficulty distinguish from the Zarephathites, were not less successful. It is true, the details respecting Samuel are, from a critical point of view, questionable. But we may perhaps accept the statement (so much more creditable, rightly considered, to Saul than to Samuel) that on a certain point of religious tradition the seers represented by Samuel were more conservative than the king. The statement is that Samuel was highly displeased because, after Saul had 'utterly destroyed' (הַחֲרִים) all 'the warriors' (הָעָם) of Amalek, he spared Agag and 'the best of the sheep and the oxen' (vv. 8 f.), thus violating the fundamental religious custom (see BAN) of devoting enemies taken in war, and even the animals which belonged to them, to the wrathful God of Israel (cp 1 S. 28 18). Still this, even if correct, was surely not the only or the chief reason why the seer (or the seers?) broke off intercourse with the king. As most agree, there was some other cause for the breach which can only be divined.

We must not, of course, underrate the benefit of the application of methodical criticism to the corrupt proper names in this section (ch. 15); see BESOR, HAVILAH, SHUR, TELAIM, and especially JERAHMEEL. Thus, in v. 2 we should do well to read, 'I have marked that which Jeraḥmeel did to Israel' (the hostile section of the great Jeraḥmeelite people is intended), and should emend 'Amalek' and 'Amalekites' throughout accordingly. In v. 12 the word 'Jeraḥmeel' has undergone fresh transformations which obscure the narrative. Not improbably we should read, 'It was told Samuel (saying), Saul came to Jeraḥmeel, and, behold he destroyed the Jeraḥmeelites, and went down to Gilgal' (1 S. 15 12; see Crit. Bib.). These gains are of the utmost value from the point of view of intelligibility. It is to be feared, however, that no textual criticism can make the narrative quite satisfactory as a piece of history. First of all, the success of Saul's expedition is evidently much exaggerated. If the 'Amalekites' had really been so completely crushed, we cannot believe that they would so soon have recovered from their overthrow. Next, the rupture between Samuel and the king (as was remarked above) is by no means fully intelligible. H. P. Smith considers the 'rejection' of Saul by Samuel in the name of his God to be an imaginary justification of the anointing of David as king; if David was to be anointed, it was clear that Saul must have been rejected. We may also plausibly hold that the 'rejection' seemed to the ancients to account for Saul's subsequent calamity. It remains true, however, that the cause of the 'rejection' given in 1 S. 15 is far from adequate.

As an additional reason it was related (1 S. 13 7*b*-15*a*) that Saul had offered a sacrifice himself instead of waiting for Samuel, and (the object of the narrative in 1 S. 28 4-25 can hardly have been different) that before the fatal struggle on 'Gilboa' Saul applied to a necromancer at En-dor (see ENDOR; HAROD, WELL OF)—an act of infidelity to Yahwè which naturally deprived Saul of the protection of his God. A modern historian (Kittel, Hist. 2 136) suggests a more critical reason, which, however, is not entirely satisfactory. He thinks that the estrangement of Samuel from Saul may have been caused by Saul's continued inattention to the fate of the ark, and his want of comprehension of the peculiar religious character of Israel.

4a. Saul's melancholy.

It is usual (in spite of the parallel feature in the legend of Alexander[1]) to accept the report of Saul's morbid melancholy alternating with fits of passion as historical, and to connect with it his first acquaintance with David (cp MADNESS). Certainly there was enough in the manifold difficulty of the king's position to affect his mind injuriously; but the circumstances in connection with which it is mentioned do not inspire us with much confidence. The whole story of Saul's relations with David, which has in general been regarded as founded on fact (see DAVID, §§ 1-4), has received a great shock from the investigations of Winckler. Apart from some questionable details in this scholar's criticism, it appears to be at any rate very unsafe to follow the tradition in its present form. That David early became attached to Saul, partly by loyalty, partly by a family tie (cp MERAB, MICHAL), as the narratives represent, is, in the light of Winckler's criticism, very improbable. David appears to have been an ambitious freebooter from the Negeb who sought to carve out a realm for himself (see JUDAH, §§ 4 f.), starting first of all from 'Adullam'—i.e., the southern 'Carmel' (Jeraḥmeel)—and afterwards, when that attempt was baffled, renewing his enterprise from Ḥalūṣah ('Ziklag'). Of course, to say this, is not to deny that he may have possessed some attractive qualities in which Saul was deficient, and which not only favoured his ambitious schemes, but also facilitated the idealising process of later narrators. We now hasten on to the pathetic closing scene of the life of the hapless king.

4b. Last battle.

We have two versions of the ancient tradition: a, chaps. 28 and 31 belong to one document; b, chaps. 27 29 f. and 2 S. 1 belong to another.[2] In a the camp of the 'Philistines' is placed at Shunem; in b at APHEK [q.v.]. In a we have the strangely fascinating story of the 'witch of Endor'; in b, a great deal of interesting information respecting David, who was at that time at Ziklag or rather Ḥalūṣah, a vassal of Achish (or Nahash?), king of Gath or REHOBOTH [q.v.] in the Negeb. There are also differences between the two accounts relative to the death of Saul. Neither of the two stories makes it clear what the precise object of the 'Philistines' was. An able geographer holds that they sought 'either to subjugate all the low country and so confine Israel to the hills, or else to secure their caravan route to Damascus and the East from Israel's descents upon it by the roads from Bezek to Beth-shan and across Gilboa' (G. A. Smith, HG 402). Hence, when Saul had taken up his position on Mt. Gilboa (or rather Haggilboa הגלבע), which is taken to be the ridge running SE. from the eastern end of the great central plain, the 'Philistines' did not hesitate to attack him on his superior position (see GILBOA; HAROD, WELL OF). To dislodge him was imperative, because from Gilboa he could descend at will either on Jezreel or on the Jordan valley. Before the battle, as one of the documents states, the despondent king, who neither by dreams, nor by Urim, nor by prophets could obtain any oracle from Yahwè (28 6 15), applied to a female necromancer at En-dor, of whom he had heard from his servants. In former times he had done all in his power to exterminate such magicians from his realm; but now he relapsed into the ancient superstition (see DIVINATION,

[1] Winckler, GI 2 172.

§ 4). Accordingly the necromancer called up the shade of Samuel, who disclosed the terrible fact that on the morrow the king would die, and his army would be worsted, as a punishment for his disobedience in the matter of 'Amalek.'[1] On hearing this, Saul fell to the ground; it is added that he had not eaten bread the whole day and the whole night, yet he could hardly be induced to break his fast. After this meal, we are told, Saul and his servants 'rose up and went away that night' (28 20-25). It is impossible to decide how far the story is based on fact.[2] As it stands, it appears to be meant as an explanation of Saul's desertion by his God (see § 3). Whether in any degree historical or not, the narrative is highly natural, though considerable doubt attaches to the place-name, En-dor (see ENDOR; HAROD, WELL OF; and the criticism below).

Thus far we have provisionally assumed the correctness of the MT. There is, however, a strong probability that the text of both forms of the tradition is vitiated by a great misunderstanding, and that here, as in many other cases, there is an underlying tradition very different from that represented by the text. The geographical obscurity of the present text of 1 S. 28 f. 31, is undeniable; one may therefore naturally suspect corruption. It is, moreover, difficult to believe that the form 'Philistines' is correct in chaps. 28 f. and 31, when close by (30 16; see PELETHITES) it has only been introduced by a textual error. The case is very similar to that of a passage in the famous elegy (2 S. 1 20). Whatever we may think of 'Gath' (the name is far from certain—see REHOBOTH), we can hardly say that the mention of 'Ashkelon' was to be expected, and even if we defend 'Philistines,' we cannot assert that 'uncircumcised' forms a natural parallel to it.[3] 'Jezreel' (1 S. 29 1 11) needs no correction; the place intended is the Jezreel in the hill-country of Judah, not far from Carmel (i.e., Jeraḥmeel), to which David's wife Ahinoam by birth belonged. But the other names have been partly corrupted, partly manipulated, by an editor, till a completely false geographical setting of the narrative has been produced. The scene of the military operations has been supposed to be in the N., whereas it was really in the S. It is not the least of the arguments for the correctness of this view that it enables us to emend and explain a historical notice (1 S. 31 7) which has been a great trouble to commentators (see ISRAEL, § 16, and cp HPSm.), but may, with the utmost probability, be read thus:—'And when the men of Israel who were in Arab-jeraḥmeel [i.e., Jeraḥmeel in N. Arabia] saw that the men of Saul had fled and that Saul and his sons were dead, they forsook the cities and fled, and the Zarephathites came and dwelt in them.' The cities referred to are the 'cities of the Jeraḥmeelites,' where, according to 1 S. 30 29, 'elders of Judah' had quite lately been residing.

4c. Emendations of names.

We must briefly indicate the emendations referred to; the names form the skeleton of the history. For 'Shunem' (שונם, 1 S. 28 4) and 'Beth-shan' (בית שן, 1 S. 31 10) it is the simplest course to read 'Eshean' (אשען) and 'Beer-sheba' (באר שבע). The same place is no doubt intended by both forms; see ESHEAN. Perhaps בעין (29 1) should be במעון, 'at Maon.' For 'Gilboa' (גלבע) or rather Haggilboa (הגלבע) we should restore 'Amalek' (עמלק) or 'Jeraḥmeel' (ירחמאל); so, too, in 2 S. 1 21. For 'to Aphek' (אפקה, 29 1) we should read 'to Gibeah' (גבעה; the same error is probable in Josh. 15 53; cp also אפיח in 9 1 [see APHIAH]); the 'Gibeah' of Josh. 15 57 (see GIBEAH, 1) or that of Judg. 7 1 seems to be meant. 'The house of Ashtaroth' (בית עשתרות, 31 10) should probably be 'Beth-ṣarephath' (בית צרפת), better known to us as 'Beth-peleṭ' (בית פלט, rather בית פלת, where פלת comes from צרפת [see PELETHITES]); the situation is suitable. 'Jabesh-gilead' (§ 1) should be 'Beth-gilgal'; 'Ziklag' should be Ḥalūṣah, and Endor (עין דור) should be En-'ărād (עין ערד). In Judg. 7 1 En-ḥărōd is combined with Gibeath-hammoreh or rather Gibeath-jeraḥmeel [see MOREH], and in 2 S. 23 25 f. a Harodite and a Paltite are mentioned together; Arad and Beth-peleṭ ('En-dor' and 'Beth-ashtaroth') are, if our explanations are correct, mentioned as in the same district in the narrative which contains chaps. 29 31. To pass now to the elegy: the true names in 2 S. 1 20 are Rehoboth, Ḥalūṣah, Ṣārephāthīm, and Jeraḥme'ēlim.[1]

[1] Probably the original tradition represented the 'Amalekites' and the 'Philistines' as allied on this occasion, so that the retribution to Saul would be exactly proportioned to his guilt.

[2] Stade (GVI 1 255) rejects the narrative; cp Schwally, Das Leben nach dem Tode, 73 f. Budde and Kittel, on the other hand, accept it as historical.

[3] The fourth line of the stanza ought, like the others, to contain an ethnic name.

These, then, are in all probability the historical circumstances of the great crisis. The Zarephathites, probably with the aid of the 'Amalekites' (cp 2 S. 16 20), were on their march northwards; David, lord of Ḥalūṣah (ZIKLAG), narrowly escaped accompanying them. Saul and his army went to meet the enemy, hoping to deal them such a blow as would effectually stop their incursions. He encamped, shifting his position from Maon by Jezreel (29 1, emended text) to the hills near 'Carmel' (i.e., Jeraḥmeel), one of which we suppose to have been specially called Gibeah or Gibeath-jeraḥmeel. It was at this Gibeah (certainly not at any place called 'Aphek') that the Zarephathites encamped. Not far off was Arad, whither Saul may perhaps have gone to consult a necromancer; Arad was presumably one of the 'cities of the Jeraḥmeelites' (1 S. 30 29) occupied by the Judahites. The original encampment of the Zarephathites was probably at Beersheba,[2] and it was perhaps on the ridge which runs from the southern 'Carmel' WSW. towards Beersheba that the fate of Saul was sealed. The Zarephathites attacked him fiercely. After a heroic resistance, he gave way, and bade his armour-bearer thrust him through with a sword, on account of a critical blow which had been dealt him by a great stone.[3] His attendant, however, hesitating to do his bidding,[4] the hapless king is said (but this is by no means certain) to have taken his own life (31 4).

4d. Saul's death: Cheyne's theory.

A different tradition is reported in 2 S. 1 (the sequel of chaps. 29, 30), where the fate which in 1 S. 31 4 Saul is said to have deprecated, actually befalls him (cp ISRAEL, § 15). An 'Amalekite' (i.e., Jeraḥmeelite), who 'happened by chance upon Mt. Gilboa' (v. 6, EV), but who, as the narrator probably means us to suppose, had his own reason for being on the spot,[5] slays Saul. We need not, with Stade (GVI 1 258) reject the story altogether, though we must at any rate admit that it has been touched up by the writer who records it. Certainly it is in harmony with the well-known elegy ascribed to David, where the destined successor of Saul is represented as forbidding the sad news to be published in Ḥalūṣah, lest the malicious Jeraḥmeelite women should triumph (see translation in col. 2334, and compare 1 S. 31 4 a, 'lest the Jeraḥmeelites come and thrust me through').

In this connection it may be noticed that the elegy says nothing of Saul's 'sons,' which is in accordance with the fact that 2 S. 21 12 speaks only of the bones of Saul and Jonathan his son. Very probably the statement in 1 S. 31 2 respecting

[1] For גַּת, חוצת and אַשְׁקְלוֹן, פְּלִשְׁתִּים, עֲרֵלִים. See JASHER, BOOK OF, § 2.

[2] Both locations (reading 'Gibeah' for 'Aphek,' and 'Eshean' or 'Beersheba' for 'Shunem') are plausible; but Beersheba naturally comes before Gibeah. Beersheba was doubtless more important than Gibeah; hence the omission of 'Gibeah' in one document and the probable reference to Beersheba in 31 10.

[3] Read probably, in v. 3, וַיִּמְצָאֻהוּ הַמּוֹרִים בַּחִשְּׁבֹנוֹת וַיְהַלְמֻהוּ בֵּין הַיְּרֵכַיִם, 'and those who cast (stones) with engines found him, and they crushed him between the thighs.' See Che. Exp. T 11 137. We can now see the full force of Saul's remark to his armour-bearer, v. 4*a*, 'lest these Jeraḥmeelites come and thrust me through,' etc.; ערלים (as often elsewhere) should be ירחמאלים. See Crit. Bib.

[4] Unlike the armour-bearer of a grandson of Merodach-baladan in a similar case (KB 2 212 f.).

[5] The 'Amalekites' (Jeraḥmeelites), as we have seen, had possibly joined the Zarephathites.

SAUL

Abinadab and Malchishua is incorrect (cp § 6). 'Abinadab' seems to the present writer to be a double of 'Jonathan' ('Nathan' and 'Nadab' confounded), and 'Malchišua' to be a development (see § 5) of 'Jeraḥme'el' (whose name is misread Ishbosheth). The latter certainly did not fall on the field of battle. On the contrary he lived to succeed his father on the throne. Tradition not impossibly said that he was lame (see MEPHIBOSHETH).

The story of the death of Saul in its present form is a narrative of the heroic but useless sacrifice of the king's life for the deliverance of Israel from the Philistines. That we have had to interfere with it may be a subject for regret, but not for surprise. The story of Saul and of his relations with David was of course told and re-told, edited and re-edited, and could not but be considerably modified in the process. Textual corruption, too, naturally increased the confusion. The story becomes to some extent intelligible only when the textual errors have been removed by a methodical criticism. We have also to consider alterations due to later hands. It was the editor who placed the story of the 'witch of Endor' where it now stands. Endor (or En-harod?) is in the N.;[1] but the scene of the great battle was in the S. The account of the indignities offered to the bodies of the king and of his sons (vv. 9 10; see Exp. T 10 522), however, has the impress of truth, and we can well believe that fierce resentment arose in the city so gallantly liberated by Saul. All night the warriors of Beth-gilgal[2] in Benjamin are said to have journeyed. Not the northern fortress of Beth-shan, but more possibly Beer-sheba was their goal; there they found the dead bodies of the heroes fastened to the city walls. Piously they took them down and brought them to Beth-gilgal, where they raised a fitting dirge over them,[3] and gave an honoured burial to the bones beneath the sacred tree (see TAMARISK). Afterwards, we are told, David sent his warrior Benaiah[4] for them, and they were reinterred in the family grave at Shalisha (not 'Zela') near Beth-gilgal (see ZELAH, and cp RIZPAH).

There is a third reference to this generous action in 2 S. 2 4*b*-7 which needs elucidation. Vv. 4*b* 5 should probably run thus,—'And they told David, "The men of Beth-gilgal have buried Saul under the Asherah" (תַּחַת הָאֲשֵׁרָה; cp 1 S. 31 13, above). And David sent presents (שְׁלָמִנִים) to the men of Jabesh-gilgal,' etc. In v. 6 EV's 'will requite you this kindness' should be 'show you this friendliness.' David sends presents, nominally to acknowledge the generous act of the men of Beth-gilgal, but really to induce them to work for the extension of his sovereignty over Benjamin. 'Your lord' means 'the lord of Benjamin,' not 'the lord of Gilead.'

The impression which Saul produced on the later editor of the tradition was not on the whole favourable.

5. Saul's character. His fine physical gifts, his ardent patriotism, and his inextinguishable courage were readily acknowledged (1 S. 10 23 f. 11 11 18 7 17 32 f. cannot be quoted on the other side); but we also hear of fits of passion and cruelty (1 S. 20 27-34 22 6-19), of a dangerous religious scrupulosity (1 S. 14 36-45),[5] and (cp § 4) of sudden accesses of a disturbing melancholy (1 S. 16 14 18 10 19 9). This mental disturbance is described (in 18 10) by the same phrase (צלח על) that is used elsewhere for that heightening of the physical powers under the influence of rage against Yahwè's enemies which characterised the successful great warriors and athletes. Was it a melancholy produced by a wild longing for battle?[1] Was it 'but the morbid reflex of the prophetic inspiration of Saul's heroic period'?[2] Does the story of the witch of Endor suggest that it was a frenzied anticipation of evil for Saul himself and his people? Or is it historical at all? May not the statement be due to the influence of a wide-spread Oriental tale (see § 4)? At any rate it is connected with statements respecting David which, if our criticism is justified, cannot be even approximately correct. Tradition has in fact been at once too kind to David and too unkind to his predecessor. That Saul had good cause to oppose David has been stated already (§ 4), and even if we consider the loyalty of the men of Beth-gilgal (1 S. 31 11 ff.) to be largely the result of clan-loyalty (since Jabesh-gilead = Beth-gilead = Beth-jeraḥmeel), it is plain that nothing had been done by Saul which seemed to his fellow-clansmen to be unworthy of a great Israelite. Kittel (Hist. 2 135 ff.) has given an eloquent and sympathetic portrait[3] of the heroic king to all of which one would gladly subscribe if the historical evidence were slightly stronger. The chief difficulty connected with Saul is his massacre of the priests of Gibeon ('Nob'); but we cannot say that we know the circumstances sufficiently well to pass a peremptory judgment.

The best attested names in Saul's family are those of his concubine Rizpah and his son Jonathan, unless

6. Saul's family. indeed Jonathan was originally represented as Saul's brother.[4] ABINADAB and MALCHISHUA, however (1 S. 31 2; cp 1 Ch. 8 33 9 39, and see above, § 4), are suspicious. Abinadab is probably a variant of 'Jonathan,' Malchishua a corruption of 'Jeraḥme'el [bĕnê] Shā'ūl.' The names of the two sons of Rizpah (2 S. 21 8), Armoni and Mephibosheth, are also doubtful. Armoni is probably a corruption of 'Abinadab'; Mephibosheth seems to be borrowed from one of the two historic 'Mephiboshesths.' Tradition probably did not preserve the names of the two hapless sons of Saul and Rizpah. The present writer has suggested that both Eshbaal (1 Ch. 8 33) and Ishbosheth may be corruptions of Jeraḥme'el or Ishmael, and a similar origin may with reasonable probability be assigned to the current name of Saul's grandson (see MEPHIBOSHETH, and cp Crit. Bib.).

It is remarkable that, according to a new theory which fits in with a well-supported theory of the course of the history of Israel, no less than eleven of the personal names connected in MT with the family of Saul are corruptions of Jeraḥmeel and Ishmael, or of fragments of those names. These are—MERAB, MICHAL, PALTIEL, ADRIEL, MEPHIBOSHETH, ESHBAAL, ISHBOSHETH, MERIBBAAL, MICHA, MACHIR, AMMIEL. This theory throws doubt on the genealogy in 1 Ch. 8 33 ff. 9 39 ff., which was possibly inserted to gratify a post-exilic family professedly descended from Saul. It is obvious that some of the names must be variants of the name of the same person; also that the names Jeraḥmeel or Ishmael were given, sometimes at least, as a substitute for the true name which had been forgotten. Jerahme'el or Jeraḥme'elith was in fact most probably the name of Saul's clan (see § 1), and Beth-jeraḥmeel that of the chief seat of the clan. Here probably 'Mephibosheth' resided, not in 'the house of Machir, the son of Ammiel, in Lo-debar'[5] (2 S. 9 4). See § 1, and cp MEHOLATHITE, SHEBA.

[1] Of course there is the possibility that dor of En-dor (עין דור) may have come from 'Arad (עֲרָד), and that the original story may have been recast in accordance with a later view of the scene of the conflict. This may be the simplest solution of the problem.

[2] Not Jabesh-gilead (see § 1).

[3] Reading וישפדו להם (Klo. Budde). H. P. Smith's objection is of no weight; the mourning is naturally mentioned before the burial (Klo. refers to 25 1 28 3). W. R. Smith's suggestion (RS(2) 372), that the burning (וישרפו) may have had a religious intention, is ingenious; but see MOURNING.

[4] 2 S. 21 12 𝔊; see Klostermann, ad loc.

[5] Saul, it appears, had tabooed all eating before sunset. The only person who tasted food was Jonathan, who had not heard Saul impose the taboo. Yahwè was believed to be offended by this transgression. By the sacred lot (see URIM AND THUMMIM) Jonathan was found to be the culprit, and condemned by his father to death. But 'the people ransomed Jonathan that he died not' (v. 45, MT). How this was effected, we are not told. Ewald supposes that it was by the substitution of another human life of less value; Kittel (Hist. 2 116) and Driver (note ad loc.) modify this view. But 𝔊's προσεύξατο περί points to the reading וַיְפַלְלוּ אֶל, 'and they acted as arbitrators concerning (Jonathan),' i.e., they mediated between Jonathan and the sacred custom or law. So Klostermann, who paraphrases, 'they imposed a fine on Jonathan.' [Winckler, GI 2 163 f., assumes a mythological basis for the detail.]

[4] This is a startling suggestion of Winckler (GI 2 191), based on 2 S. 1 22 f. Compare the doubt (SODOM, § 10) whether Lot was not originally Abraham's brother.

[5] The repetition of the elaborate description in 2 S. 9 5 is suspicious. Note here, to supplement LO-DEBAR, that בר in לו דבר may have arisen out of בית, and לוד out of גלעד, which

2. (RV SHAUL). An early Edomite king (Gen. 36 37 f. 1 Ch. 1 48 f.). Was he, however, an Edomite or a Jerahmeelite? ארם and ארם are so much alike that we may choose that reading which best suits the circumstances. On the whole, ארם, i.e., ירחמאל (Jerahmeel), best accords with the notices of the kings, though a connected examination of these would be required to make this appear as probable as it really is. To suppose that this Shaul was a foreign conqueror and founder of a dynasty,[1] is a serious error. Certainly it is plausible at first sight to identify 'the river' (in the phrase 'Rehoboth by the river') with the Euphrates (see Onk.), and to compare the Rehoboth-Ir of Gen. 10 11. Sayce (Hibb. Lect. 55) would even identify our Rehoboth with Babylon, and make Saul the Hebraised form of Savul or Sawul (cp § 1), which he regards as a name of the Babylonian sun-god;[2] Furrer, however, thinks of a place called Raḥaba, on the W. side of the Euphrates (Riehm's HWB 1291). But all this is even hazier than the speculations about Rehoboth-Ir in Gen. 10 11. הַנָּהָר and נְהַר מצרים (Gen. 15 18) may both mean 'the stream of Muṣri,'—i.e., some wādy in the Negeb, perhaps the Wādy el-'Arīš, the border-stream of the N. Arabian land of Muṣri (see EGYPT, BROOK OF; ABEL-MIZRAIM, but cp SHIHOR), so that 'Rehoboth' is er-Ruḥaibeh, the REHOBOTH (q.v.) of Gen. 26 22, SW. of Beersheba. Cp BELA, PETHOR. See also SHAUL.

See WMM As. u. Eur. 134 (RP 2 115). An ancient Egyptian text mentions Ra-ph and R-ḥu-bu-ra-ti next to Naharu (the 'stream'). The Robotha in Gebalene (OS 286 77; 141 75) is not to be compared. T. K. C.

SAW. The saws of the Egyptians, so far as known, were all straight and single-handed; but the double-handed saw seems to have been known to the Assyrians (Layard, Nin. and Bab., 195), and we suppose from the reference in 1 K. must have been known to the Hebrews. Cp HANDICRAFTS, § 2 f. On the Egyptian saws see especially Petrie, Temple of Gizeh, 173 ff. Petrie infers that the blades of the saws were of bronze, and that jewel-points were sometimes fixed in the teeth. Circular saws were also employed. According to Schliemann (Tiryns, 264 f.) the ancient Mycenean saw took the form of an ordinary knife or blade. See, further, Dict. Class. Ant., s.v. 'serra,' and for Egyptian saws, Wilk. Anc. Eg. 2 261, and illustration, 1 401 (nos. 7, 8).

The OT words for 'saw' are:—

1. maššōr, מַשּׂוֹר, πρίων, serra, used for cutting wood, Is. 10 15†.

2. mĕgērāh, מְגֵרָה, 2 S. 12 31 ∥ 1 Ch. 20 3*b* (in 1 Ch. 20 3*c* it is usual to emend מגרות into מגזרות, 'axes,' after 2 S. 12 31 [so already EV]); used for cutting stone, 1 K. 7 9 (ἐκ διαστήματος = במגרעה, cp 6 6). See AXE, 6.

[There is a remarkable difference of expression between 1 Ch. 20 3 and 2 S. 12 31. The 1 Ch. passage has וַיָּשַׂר בַּמְּגֵרָה, 'and he sawed (them) with saws' (the verb corresponding to משור), διέπρισεν [𝔊ᴸ ἔκρισεν ἐν] πρίοσιν; Vg. fecit super eos tribulas . . . ita ut dissecarentur et contererentur. 2 S. 12 31 has וַיָּשֶׂם בַּמְּגֵרָה, καὶ ἔθηκεν ἐν τῷ πριόνι (𝔊ᴸ διέπρισεν ἐν πρίοσι); Vg. serravit. That the Chronicler's statement gives a gross caricature of David, is becoming more and more generally admitted, and G. Hoffmann's explanation ('he set them at the saw and at the iron pickaxes,' etc.) gains ground. The difficulties in this explanation are referred to by Driver (TBS 228 f.); but the corruptness of the whole passage, perhaps, has not been adequately realised, except by Klostermann. That able critic's restoration, however, does not produce very good Hebrew. If we take due account of the three verbs הוציא, וישם, and והעביר, the general meaning of the passage ought to be clear. The people of Rabbah of the b'ne Jerahmeel (not Rabbath-ammon) were 'brought out' from their city, and 'placed' in other parts of David's realm; so he 'made (them) to pass' from Jerahmeel.[1] מגרה must, therefore, be a place-name.[2] This fits in with other results of a more searching criticism of the history of David and Solomon. Cp SOLOMON, and see Crit. Bib. T. K. C.]

was a corruption of גלגל. Cp 'Jabesh-gilead' in 1 S. 11 for 'Beth-gilgal.' Also that לא דבר in Am. 6 13 is most probably a corruption of בית גלעד (Beth-gilead). The two cities conquered by the Israelites appear to have been Beth-gilead—i.e., Beth-jerahmeel—and either Mahanaim or Horonaim. See further MAHANAIM, and cp Crit. Bib.

SCAFFOLD (כִּיּוֹר, ΒΑCΙC, basis) in EV of 2 Ch. 6 13 denotes the specially-made platform or stage of bronze on which Solomon stood and kneeled at the dedication of the temple. Kiyyōr is elsewhere rendered pot, basin, or laver; and interpreters, therefore, have been led to suppose that Solomon's platform also was 'probably round, bowl-like in shape' (so BDB, s.v.); this, however, is not a likely shape, nor is it suggested by the terms of length, breadth (each 5 cubits), and height (3 cubits) in which its dimensions are given. Klostermann followed by Oettli (ad loc.) proposes, therefore, to emend to כִּיּן (√כן); cp 𝔊, Vg. (cp also כֵּן, used of the laver; כיור, itself, is sometimes written כיר).

With the measurements cp the description of the 'base' in 1 K. 7 27 (see LAVER, § 1); four (𝔊, Jos. five) cubits long, the same in breadth, and three (𝔊, Jos. six) high. The position, too, would correspond with P's statement (see LAVER, § 2), as also would the inference that there was only one base in the temple. Finally, it should be noticed, that ויעמד עליו, for which EV has 'stood upon it,' means equally naturally 'stood by the side of it' (on this not infrequent use of על, see BDB s.v. 756 a), in which case the MT כִּיּוֹר may refer to the 'laver' itself, and no emendation is necessary.

SCARLET is used in EV as rendering the following words and phrases:—

1. šānī, שָׁנִי (Gen. 38 28 and many other places), a common word of uncertain etymology, which may be connected either with Ar. sana—according to Philippi (ZDMG 32 79) this root has for its original sense 'to be bright or shining'—or with Ass. šinītu, 'a dyed cloth. The plur. šānīm is found twice, Is. 1 18 Prov. 31 21.

2. The fuller šĕnī tōlă'ath (שְׁנִי תוֹלַעַת, lit. 'worm-scarlet') occurs in Lev. 14 (five times) and in Nu. 19 6. 3. Another equivalent phrase is the tōlă'ath šānī (תּוֹלַעַת שָׁנִי, lit. 'scarlet-worm') so frequent in Exodus, as well as (4) the shorter tōlā' (תּוֹלָע) of Is. 1 18 (EV 'crimson') and Lam. 4 5. 5. A Pu'al participle, mĕthullā'īm (מְתֻלָּעִים, derived from tōlā'), occurs once (Nah. 2 3 [4]) to signify 'clothed in scarlet.'[3]

[1] מלוכה (v. 26), מלכם (v. 30), and מלבן (v. 31; prefixed ב should be מ) all probably come from ירחמאל.

[2] מגזרות (cp ASA, 6) is a variant to מגרה. Read, perhaps, גְּשׁוּרִים or גִּרְזִים '(the land of) the Geshurites' or 'Girzites.

[3] But see SHOE, § 3, and cp Crit. Bib.

6. κόκκινος in Mt. 27 28 Heb. 9 19 Rev. 17 3 has, no doubt, the same meaning as šānī, of which it is 𝔊's rendering. See CRIMSON.

7. argĕwānā, ארגונא, the Aram. equivalent of ארגמן, is in Dan. 5 7 16 29 rendered 'scarlet' in AV (AVmg. RV 'purple'), and AVmg. suggests the same rendering for the Hebrew word in Ezek. 27 7. See COLOURS, § 14; PURPLE. N. M.

SCEPTRE. 1. שֵׁבֶט, šēbeṭ, cp Ass. šibṭu. In Nu. 24 17 (EV) we read of a 'sceptre' which shall smite Moab. The translators apparently take 'sceptre' as a symbolic expression for 'king.' Here, however, as also in Ps. 2 9 (EV 'rod'), šēbeṭ seems to denote rather a warlike instrument—a mace. For Egyptian representations of such a weapon see Wilk. Anc. Eg. 1 216 f. 3 frontispiece; some, too, will remember the large heavy maces of limestone with relief sculptures, of the period before the sixth dynasty, exhibited lately (1900) in London, and found by Mr. Quibell at Kōm el-Aḥmar (Hierakonpolis). An 'iron šēbeṭ' is referred to in the traditional text of Ps. 2 9; such a weapon was, at any rate, known to the last editor of the Psalter (cp the σιδηρείη κορύνη of Il. 7 140). For a representation of Ašur-naṣir-pal holding a short staff or sceptre see Perrot-Chipiez, Art in Ass. 2 123; and for another of Sargon with a long one, see SARGON. In Ps. 125 5 'sceptre' is adequate (so RV, AV 'rod'); in Is. 14 3 (EV sceptre) we seem to need 'staff' as a parallel to 'rod.' Less common are:—

1. Terms.

2. שַׁרְבִיט, šarbīṭ, a late form of šēbeṭ, perhaps influenced by σκῆπτρον (Kö. Lehrgeb. 2 152), only in Esth. 4 11 5 2 8 4.

3. מְחֹקֵק, mĕḥōḳēḳ, √חקק, Nu. 21 18 RV† (‖ משענה), Gen. 49 10 RV (‖ שבט): Ps. 60 7 [8] RV (= Ps. 108 8 [9] RV). In all these three passages, however, Cheyne suspects that the text is corrupt. In Nu. 21 18 and in Ps. 60 7 [8] מ' has probably come from ירחמאל Jeraḥmeel (Che.), and in Gen. 49 10 מ' means a ruler (read, in ‖, שֹׁפֵט). See SHILOH, 1, Che. Ps.(2), and Crit. Bib.; but cp Moore, Judges, 153 (on Judg. 5 14).

As to the form of the sceptre, it is plausible to hold that it was a reminiscence of the shepherd's staff or perhaps crook (cp Ass. re'ū = רֹעֶה, [1] shepherd, [2] ruler). Koran, Sur. 20 17 f. may be quoted in illustration. 'What is that in thy right hand, O Moses?' Said he, 'It is my staff on which I lean, and wherewith I beat down leaves for my flock, and for which I have other uses.' We find the shepherd's crook (combined with the whip—mistaken by Diod. Siculus [3 3] for a plough) as an emblem of Egyptian royalty and vice-royalty; see Erman, Eg. 60, 63, also Wilk. Anc. Eg. 3 371 (early, and Seti I.) and 3 128 (Ah, son of Athor), 1 183 (no. 7). As the emblem of Hebrew royalty we find not only a 'rod' or staff (Ezek. 19 11 14) but a spear (ḥănīth, from ḥānāh, 'to bend, curve, bend down'), 1 S. 18 10 22 6; in Is. 2 4 Joel 3 10 the 'spear' is parallel to the 'pruning-hook,' out of which it might conceivably, according to the writers, be made.

2. Form.

SCEVA (ϹΚΕΥΑϹ), 'a Jew, a chief-priest,' whose seven 'sons' (or disciples [Baur]) practised exorcism at Ephesus, with the results described with reference to two of them (v. 16 ἀμφοτέρων, but TR αὐτῶν) in Acts 19 14-17. See EXORCISTS. Schürer thinks that ἀρχιερέως (gen.) in v. 14 means 'member of a high-priestly family.' More plausibly we might read ἀρχισυναγώγου; the ἱερέως of D seems too slight an emendation. As to the name Sceva, it may be a Græcised Latin name (Blass). T. K. C.

SCORPION (עַקְרָב, 'aḳrāb, ϹΚΟΡΠΙΟϹ). Scorpions are especially common in the peninsula of Sinai and the desert of et-Tīh (cp Dt. 8 15, and see AKRABBIM), and the Arabian desert generally.

'Scorpions lurk under the cool stones,' says Doughty; 'I have found them in my tent, upon my clothing, but never had any hurt. I have seen many grown persons and children bitten, but the sting is not perilous; some wise man is called to "read" over them' (Ar. Des. 1 328; Doughty's statements about Arabia must not be taken too generally; cp § 3). The form of expression, therefore, in Lk. 10 19 ('I empower you to tread upon serpents and scorpions') is not quite so striking as that in the ‖ passage, Ps. 91 13 𝔊 ('Thou shalt go upon the asp and the basilisk'), and in the description of the locusts from the 'pit of the abyss' the weakest part may seem to be the detail of their 'tails like (those of) scorpions' (Rev. 9 10, see RV). From a picturesque point of view, however, this detail is quite in place; it is indeed a formidable appearance which the 'appendages' of the scorpion present.

1. References.

Ezekiel apparently likens bitter words to the sting of a scorpion (Ezek. 2 6); so, perhaps, Ecclus. 26 7. In 1 K. 12 11 14 (2 Ch. 10 11 14) 'whips' and 'scorpions' are parallel, but the 'scorpions' intended are worse than those of nature (see WHIP).[1] In 1 Macc. 6 51 the forcible term σκορπίδια ('little scorpions') is used for instruments for hurling darts; cp Cæs. Bell. Gall. 7 25, 'scorpionem.' The term, weakened by EV into 'pieces' (without mg.), arose from the resemblance of part of the instrument to the uplifted tail of a scorpion.

There is also a reference to the scorpion in Lk. 11 12, which needs fresh investigation. The saying of which, in Lk., it forms part, occurs also in Mt. 7 9-11; but there a hungry son appears asking his father for a loaf, or a fish, confident that he will not get a stone or even a serpent, whereas in Lk. (in the ordinary texts) the son is also represented as asking for an egg, sure that he will not get a scorpion. There is good evidence (cod. B, Vet. Lat., Syr. Sin.) for the omission of the loaf and the stone in Lk., and Plummer and Jülicher accept this form of the text, the insertion from Mt. being, it is urged, more probable than the omission. But how can Lk. have been satisfied with such a form of the saying? The hungry child's first request is for bread, and the connection in which the saying stands being more original in Lk. than in Mt., we have a right to presume that Lk. did not omit the loaf and the stone. But there is this prior difficulty to meet. How came Lk. to suppose that one of the antitheses of Jesus was egg and scorpion? One commentator suggests that 'scorpion' may mean the egg of a scorpion; another, that when it is dormant, a scorpion is egg-shaped. Tristram passes over this point, and remarks (NHB 1 302) that Jesus adopts a current Greek proverb, 'a scorpion instead of a perch' ἀντὶ πέρκης σκορπίον); similarly Jülicher (Gleichnisreden, 239). But if we compare this Greek proverb, we are bound to show either that ᾠόν can mean 'fish' or some kind of fish, or that ᾠόν can have been corrupted out of some Greek word meaning fish. The second alternative alone is feasible; ᾠόν may be a corruption of ὄψον, which does not indeed occur in the NT, but might occur just as well as ὀψάριον.[2] The third pair of objects thus becomes 'fish' (ὄψον) and 'scorpion' (σκορπίος). These are variants to 'fish' (ἰχθύς) and 'serpent' (ὄφις). There are two pairs, not three, and the trouble of explaining the egg is removed. 'Scorpion' is probably correct.

2. Criticism: Lk. 11 12.

Scorpions are nocturnal in habit, and carnivorous, living on the juices of insects, spiders, etc., which they kill with their pointed sting borne on the last joint of their tail. When the animal is running about, the tail is often carried turned forward over the trunk. Scorpions are provided with a pair of small clawed appendages on the head, and these are followed by a large pair of nippers or jointed claws which resemble those of a lobster and which serve to catch and hold their prey. Behind these are four pairs of walking legs. The sting is very painful, and if it occurs in such a part of the body as the throat, or if the sufferer be out of health, may cause death.

Zoologically scorpions belong to the group Scorpiones of the Arachnida. SCRIBE. To do justice to this heading it is not enough to register and explain the three Hebrew words rendered 'scribe' in AV and RV taken together. We are bound to notice the fact that 𝔊 sometimes renders שֹׁטֵר (šōṭēr) as well as סֹפֵר (sōphēr) by γραμματεύς, and to consider the sense which this queen of the versions gives to that Greek word. The two Hebrew words will illustrate what is said elsewhere in this work on writing, literature (in its various branches), and government; in studying them we shall see how sōphēr came to mean 'theologian,' and šōṭēr came to signify 'official.' The strange word ṭiphsar (טפסר), rendered 'scribe' in RVmg. at Nah. 3 17, will also have to be considered; the discovery of the meaning of this word suggests literary influences, which are likely to receive more and more justification.

1. Terms.

For a hardly less strange word, ḥarṭōm (חרטם), rendered 'sacred scribe' in RVmg. at Gen. 41 8, etc., see MAGIC (§ 3); the rendering of RVmg. is not very probable, and has no ancient support (but cp Ges.-Bu. s.v.).

2. The sōphēr and šōṭēr.

Sōphēr (Ass. šāpiru) seems to be a denom. of sēpher (Ass. šipru), and to judge from the Assyrian usage sēpher may originally have had a very wide sense, including every sort of message, and even permitting the rendering 'command.' It is a question whether sōphēr in Judg. 5 14 should not be taken in accordance with this (possible) early usage as 'commander'; but to this we will return presently. The root-meaning of šṭr, on the other hand, is 'to write'; the distinction should be remembered—šapâru in Ass. = 'to send'; šaṭâru = 'to write,' cp Aram. šeṭârâ, 'document.' In Heb. 'to write' is not spr (ספר) or šṭr (שׁטר), but ktb (כתב) (see the Lexicons), a word not found in Ass. Presumably, therefore, sōphēr (also, of course, sēpher; cp EPISTOLARY LITERATURE, § 5) and šōṭēr were borrowed from Assyrian or Babylonian. We find the Ass. noun šâpiru used as a syn. of aklu, 'secretary'; one or the other term was often wanted, for the most different classes needed secretaries to prepare legal documents and other business records. So, doubtless, among the Israelites. In Judg. 5 14, as also in Is. 33 18, we meet with a sōphēr in the army (the Isaiah passage, being a late literary work, may be used as a Jewish record). There were, no doubt, different grades of military sōphĕrīm; the highest would be the military adjutant who enrolled the warriors, and who might even (but this is an uncertain inference[1] from 2 K. 25 19) be the same person as the 'captain of the host' (cp Ass. šapiru, 2, 'ruler'). The king, too, naturally had his sōphēr (2 S. 8 17 20 25 2 K. 12 10 [11], etc.), EVmg. 'secretary' (see GOVERNMENT, § 21). Only twice do we find the sing. šōṭēr—viz., in Prov. 6 7 (between ḳāṣīn and mōšēl) and in 2 Ch. 26 11 (of a military enroller, syn. with sōphēr).[2] Repeatedly, however, the šōṭĕrīm are mentioned either next to the 'elders' of the people (Nu. 11 16 Dt. 29 9 [10] 31 28 Josh. 8 33 23 2 24 1), or beside the 'judges' (Josh. 8 33 23 2 24 1 Dt. 16 18). Proclamations or orders in time of war were made known through them (Dt. 20 5 8 f. Josh. 1 10 3 2).

In Ex. 5 6 10, etc., the Israelitish overseers appointed by the Egyptian taskmasters are designated šōṭĕrīm; 𝔊 gives γραμματεῖς; cp 𝔊's rendering of šōṭēr in Prov. 6 7, τὸν ἀναγκάζοντα. The term also occurs six times in Chronicles (1 Ch. 23 4 26 29 27 1 2 Ch. 19 11 26 11 34 13). Evidently sōphĕrīm and šōṭĕrīm were synon. terms, and could be used of any subordinate office which required ability to write. No doubt, too, in 1 Macc. 5 42 γραμματεῖς τοῦ λαοῦ = שֹׁטְרֵי הָעָם.

3. Later use of sōphēr.

Thus the later Jewish meaning of sōphēr (see SCRIBES AND PHARISEES) must be kept carefully apart, when we are considering the old and very slowly forgotten meaning of the term. When the plur. sĕphārīm took the new sense of holy writings (Dan. 9 2, βίβλοι, 𝔊 Theod.), it was natural that sōphēr should come to mean theologian or 'lawyer' (so EV for νομικός). But the older meaning was precisely that which was most natural to Alexandrian Jews. Both under the Pharaohs and under the Ptolemies a 'scribe' was a government clerk, or registrar—in short, an official (see HISTORICAL LITERATURE, §§ 3, 5). He was not a theologian; the priests were the theologians. He was not properly a military man, for he was exempt from military service. Hence in Judg. 5 14 šēbeṭ sōphēr (שבט ספר) becomes διηγήσεως γραμματέως (𝔊B), 'the report of an official' (?), and in Is. 33 18 sōphēr becomes οἱ γραμματικοί. Under the Ptolemies, it is true, the term 'scribe' received a military colouring; but, for clearness' sake, it was usual to fill out the phrase and put γραμματεὺς τῶν μαχίμων or τῶν δυνάμεων.[3]

Δυνάμεις is actually found once in 𝔊, which gives in Jer. 52 25 (see note 1) τὸν γραμματέα τῶν δυνάμεων, reading סֹפֵר הַצָּבָא. The term γραμματοεισαγωγεύς in 𝔊, Ex. 18 21 25 (not in B in these two passages) Dt. 1 15 16 18 29 9 [10] 31 28, awaits explanation from the papyri.

4. Tiphsar.

The third and most difficult word remains—a word on which 𝔊 throws no light,[4] and for which our revisers in their uncertainty give two renderings—'marshal' and 'scribe.' 'Marshal,' no doubt, was chosen for ṭiphsar or (Nah.) ṭaphsar, because this sense suited Jer. 51 27. But it can be shown that it does not suit Nah. 3 17, and in Jer. (l.c.) we expect the name of a country; here טפסר is probably corrupt (see Crit. Bib.). In fact, ṭiphsar, as Lenormant first showed,[5] is the Ass. dup-šarru, 'tablet-writer,[6] which

1 Kraepelin, 'Scorpiones u. Pedipalpi,' Das Thierreich, 8 Lief., Berlin, 1899.

1 MT reads here הַסֹּפֵר שַׂר הַצָּבָא, but 𝔊 presupposes סֹפֵר, whilst L reads סָפָן (τὸν Σαφαν) and Vg. Sophēr, both as proper names. סֹפֵר, too, is MT's reading in Jer. 52 25 (𝔊 does not express שַׂר). 'Saphan' is adopted from 𝔊L (Kings) by Klo.; 'scribe of the general' is also a possible rendering in Jer., and is preferred by Kamph. in Kau. HS and Nowack (Arch. 1 360). Otherwise שר הצבא will be a gloss (but cp Giesebrecht).

2 𝔊, however, gives κριτής for šōṭēr, γραμματεύς for sōphēr.

3 Deissmann, Bibelstudien, 106 (1895).

4 In Jer. 𝔊 gives βελοστάσεις, a mere guess (?); in Nah. ὁ συμμικτός σου, which seems to represent ערבך, a possible variant to כארבה, which in 𝔊's Heb. text supplanted וטפסריך, owing to the similarity of ריך to רבך.

5 La langue primitive de la Chaldée, 365 (1875); Études sur syllabaires cunéiformes, 186 (1876). So Schrader, KAT(2) 424.

6 Halévy (Origine de la civ. Bab. 235 [1875]) compares duppu, 'tablet,' with New Heb. דַּף, column (of a scroll) or page. Cp also Syr. dappā, 'plank,' 'board' (e.g., Acts 27 44). Duppu also = 'letter'; see EPISTOLARY LITERATURE, § 5.

is of Sumerian origin, but occurs countless times in the contract-tablets. See TARPELITES. The proof of the correctness of this explanation is that a similar one is equally needful for the parallel word מנזריך (EV 'thy crowned'; so Kimchi, unsuitably) which is perhaps corrupt in one letter (ז for ד), and should be read מִנְדָּדַיִךְ (so P. Ruben). Mindidu, like dupšarru, occurs often in contract tablets; it means one who is legally empowered to measure wheat, dates, etc. These two officers are naturally mentioned after the merchants (Nah. 3 16).

The same words (tiphsar and mindidu) have been recognised by the present writer in Is. 33 18, where, for איה ספר את־המגדלים we should read אַיֵּה מְסַפְּרִים אַיֵּה מִנְדָּדִים, 'where are the tablet-writers? where are the measuring clerks?' (Che. SBOT 'Isa.' [Heb.]), and mindidu is probably to be found also in Zech. 9 6, where 'a mamzēr (EV 'bastard'; see MAMZER) shall dwell in Ashdod' should be 'a mindīd shall dwell in Ashdod'—i.e., Ashdod shall be subject to Assyrian (or foreign) civil functionaries (Che. PSBA, May, 1900). This is at any rate at once a possible and a suitable explanation. T. K. C.

1. Incidental references in NT. It is too often forgotten that the gospel narratives make only incidental references to the Scribes and Pharisees. The stern reproofs uttered by Jesus against their arrogant self-righteousness, narrowness, and deadening spiritual pride, were undoubtedly well deserved as applied to the later form of Pharisaism; but they do not aid us in discovering, either the fundamental principles of the school, or the causes which produced such a religious development. Our present object must therefore be, first, to ascertain what the two classes of Jews, designated in the NT Scribes and Pharisees, really represented in the current theological thought, and thus to determine, as nearly as possible, the character of their party, and secondly, to trace their historical development down from its beginnings at the time following the Babylonian exile.

2. Usage of writers. The usage of the terms 'Scribes' and 'Pharisees' throughout the Gospels shows that a conscious distinction was made between them, as may be seen, for example, from the common expression 'Scribes and Pharisees,' passim. It is significant that the word 'Scribe' is not used by any evangelist with reference to single individuals. It is in every instance applied to a literary class, as in Mt. 7 29 Mk. 1 22 (more specifically Mt. 15 1 Mk. 3 22 'the Scribes who came from Jerusalem,' who naturally were the most important and most influential members of the party). Where single scribes are meant, the writer usually designates them 'some of the Scribes' (Mt. 9 3 12 38 Mk. 7 1), or else classes them with the Pharisees, as just indicated. On the other hand, the term 'Pharisees' is frequently used in passages where the writer evidently means to refer to individual members of a certain school (Mt. 9 11 34 12 2 14 24 Mk. 2 18 24, etc.).

Josephus also refers to the Scribes as 'those learned in the law' (ἱερογραμματεῖς, BJ vi. 5 3), and as 'expositors of the law' (πατρίων ἐξηγηταὶ νόμων, Ant. xvii. 6 2), whereas by the term 'sophists' (σοφισταί, BJ i. 33 2 ii. 17 8 ff.), he may mean the members of the distinctly Pharisaic party, some of whom taught law. Josephus, who uses the regular expression φαρισαῖοι much more often than any of the other terms, neglects to inform his readers (for example in Ant. xiii. 10 6) of the close connection between the Scribes and the Pharisees, probably because it was too well-known a fact to require explanation.

There can be no doubt that in the NT, especially in the many speeches of Jesus directed against the Scribes and Pharisees, the term 'scribes' (usually γραμματεῖς) is used of those learned persons who made a special study of the law ('the lawyers,'[1] Lk. 14 3; 'doctors, teachers of the Law,' νομοδιδάσκαλοι, Lk. 5 17 Acts 5 34), and that the expression 'Pharisees' always means the peculiar body of men who affected to live according to the letter of the law. In spite of this evident distinction, however, it is quite clear that wherever the Scribes and the Pharisees are mentioned side by side in the NT they were purposely brought together as the representatives of the same intellectual tendency (cp Mt. 5 20 12 38, etc.). Furthermore, in Mk. 2 6, in the account of the cure of the palsied man, we find the term 'Scribes'; but in the parallel passage Lk. 5 21, the expression 'Scribes and Pharisees' is used in an evidently synonymous sense. Finally, the application of both terms to the same school of thought is found in the later Jewish literature, where the earlier Scribes of Maccabæan times are generally made to call themselves ḥăkāmīm, 'learned men,' but are also referred to as 'Pharisees,' especially in passages inspired by hostile Sadducee sentiment (Yādaim, 4 6 ff.; Bab. Sōṭ. 22 b). Cp ISRAEL, §§ 81 ff.

3. Name Pharisees. The meaning of the name Pharisees (Φαρισαῖοι) is perfectly clear. Its original Heb. form פְּרוּשִׁים, pĕrūšīm (Aram. פְּרִישַׁיָּא פְּרִישִׁין) can signify only 'those who have been set apart'—i.e., from the mass of the people (עַם הָאָרֶץ). The opprobrious sense in which the word was often used was imposed upon it by enemies. In itself the term means simply a school of ascetics[1] and is really quite in harmony with the general character of the Pharisees, who may have used it of themselves at first. Their own term for themselves was ḥăbērīm, 'brethren'—that is to say, members of the true congregation of Israel.

4. Relations of Scribes and Pharisees. Our data regarding the Scribes and Pharisees would appear to indicate that, while the Scribes were a class of literati devoted to the study and exposition of the Law, the Pharisees were more properly a distinct religious party, most of whose members belonged to the class of Scribes. The object of the Pharisees was, clearly, to live according to the Law, which the orthodox Scribes interpreted. It follows, therefore, that from the very inception of the Pharisaic party, its leaders must have been orthodox Scribes. As the Sadducees also followed the written Law, there must have been Sadducee Scribes as well, and it is highly likely that there were also Scribes who belonged to neither party. This explains the distinctive expressions 'Scribes of the Pharisees' (Mk. 2 16 Acts 23 9); 'the Pharisees and their Scribes' (Lk. 5 30), from which it is evident that not all the Scribes were Pharisees. It is probable also that some of the Pharisees, owing no doubt to lack of education, belonged only nominally to the scribal class and practised blindly the precepts laid down for them by their more scholarly scribal leaders.[2] At the time of Jesus, we almost always find Scribes in judicial positions; thus, wherever the high priests and elders are mentioned, the Scribes are generally included—without, however, any specification as to whether they belonged to the Pharisees or the Sadducees, or whether they were merely neutral scholars (cp Mt. 16 21 Mk. 11 27 Lk. 9 22, 'the elders and chief priests and scribes'; Mt. 20 18, 'the chief priests and scribes,' Lk. 20 1 . . ., 'with the elders'; Mt. 26 57 Acts 6 12, 'the scribes and elders').

5. Pharisees not a sect. It is certainly an error to characterise the Pharisees as a religious sect,[3] because that word implies a divergence in creed from other followers of the same cult. This was distinctly not the position of the Pharisees, as they were really from their first development representatives of orthodox Judaism

[1] Νομικοί; cp Mt. 22 35 Lk. 7 30 10 25 11 45 52 14 3.

[1] The abstract form פרישות is used in the sense 'abstinence, continence,' Yōm. 74 b.

[2] Wellhausen's statement (Pharisäer u. Sadducäer, 11) that the Pharisees were the party of the Scribes needs some qualification.

[3] EV's rendering in Acts 15 5 26 5 is unfortunate; αἵρεσις means here 'a party which professes certain philosophical principles,' in fact, 'a school.' Cp Sext. Emp. 1 16. See HERESY.

who distinguished themselves from the mass of their co-religionists rather by the strictness of their observances than by any deviation from accepted doctrine. The words of Jesus in Mt. 23_2 clearly prove the Pharisees' position; 'the scribes and Pharisees sit in Moses' seat; all things, therefore, whatsoever they bid you, these do and observe'; but, he adds, as a reproof to their externalism, 'do ye not after their works, for they say and do not.' The sole object of the Pharisees' religious life was to fulfil, regardless of consequences, the requirements of the law which they believed to be the clearly expressed will of Yahwè. According to Josephus, when Petronius asked the Pharisee leaders whether they were ready to make war against Cæsar without considering his strength and their own weakness, they replied: 'we will not make war with him; but still we will die rather than see our laws set aside.'[1] This short sentence expresses most characteristically their fundamental principles.

6. Dogmas: oral law.

The Pharisaic dogmatic peculiarities, as outlined in § 2 f., all tend to show how fully their religious position was in accord with orthodox Judaism, and to what an extent their opponents the Sadducees had remained behind and apart from the current religious development. The chief point in the Pharisees' code wherein they differed from the Sadducees was their insistence on the validity of a mass of oral tradition (Mt. 15_2 Mk. 7_3) which had accumulated in the course of centuries as a supplement to the written law. The Pharisees held that this traditional matter, regulating and explaining the observance of the written law, was as binding on the Israelites of every generation as the law itself (Sanh. 11_3), whereas the Sadducees rejected all such oral traditions and held strictly to the written Mosaic ordinances (Ant. xiii. 10_6). Herein the Pharisees, rather than the Sadducees, represent the natural religious development, because traditions, both oral and written, recording, for example, precedents for the interpretation of the law are a necessary and logical supplement to a fixed code, and, whilst they should not be accorded the same authority as the code itself, are undoubtedly a permissible and normal growth.[2] In the case of the Pharisees, however, their reverence for traditional precepts gradually degenerated into a slavish regard, first, for the text of the law itself, and, secondly, for a purely arbitrary supplementary oral code which had exceeded the legitimate functions and authority of tradition.

This oral matter had largely originated among the scribes since the time of Ezra,[3] although most of the literary class undoubtedly believed that it descended from Moses. They consequently even went so far as to lay down the principle that, in case of a contradiction between a written and an oral precept, the preference must be given to the oral. Their observance of law and tradition became, finally, so thoroughly formal, that the Pharisees actually seemed to have lost sight of the contents of the Law in their endeavour to carry out its demands in proper form.

7. Resurrection.

The Pharisees believed in a resurrection of the body and in a future state of rewards and punishments (Acts 23_8, Jos. Ant. xviii. 1_3).

The resurrection referred to in Dan. 12_2 is most probably confined to the Israelites; probably the author of Daniel did not believe in eternal life for the heathen. The resurrection of all human beings, however, is announced in Enoch 22, and was the prevailing orthodox dogma in the time of Jesus. The author of Dan. 12 also teaches the doctrine of future rewards and punishments for the Israelites, and for the first time uses the expression 'everlasting life'[4] (Dan. 12_2).

The Sadducees denied both resurrection of the body and a future life (Mt. 22_{23} Mk. 12_{18}, Jos. Ant. xviii. 1_4). See SADDUCEES, § 6.

The Pharisees, unlike the Sadducees, believed in the existence of angels and spirits (Acts 23_8). This was a doctrine which had been part of orthodox Judaism since the days of Zechariah (Zech. 7_{17}; 520 B.C.), and had in later times become expanded into a definite hierarchical system (cp Dan. 10_{13} Tobit 12_{15}, and the Book of Jubilees). Here, also, the Pharisees were undoubtedly the representatives of orthodox opinion. See ANGELS, DEMONS.

8. Other points.

Furthermore, the Pharisees held in general the doctrine of predestination, which was a natural outgrowth of their strict literalism, attributing the origin of everything, even of evil, to the far-seeing wisdom of Yahwè. Unlike the Essenes, however, they made a distinction between such actions as were controlled entirely by fate (Yahwè's will) and such as were, to some extent, directed by man's will, which, according to their theory, was permitted to operate within certain fixed limits—e.g., τὸ πράττειν τὰ δίκαια, 'to choose the right' (Jos. BJ ii. 8_{14}, Ant. xiii. 5_9, xviii. 1_3). The Sadducees, on the other hand, held that man's own will regulated all the events of human life and determined his happiness or unhappiness.

The Pharisees were the most eager cultivators of Messianic ideas. They longed for and awaited the temporal Messiah of the earlier Israelitish hopes (see MESSIAH). They therefore, quite naturally, were among the most bitter opponents of the more spiritual teachings of Jesus, which they regarded as a dangerous departure from their point of view. Their ideal of a personal Messiah may be gathered from Jos. Ant. xvii. 2_4 where the author relates that the Pharisees were involved in an intrigue of Pheroras against his brother Herod, and that they sided with Pheroras, in order to accomplish the overthrow of Herod and place Pheroras on the throne. This statement is, without doubt, based on a misunderstanding of the Pharisees' motives.

In the first place, the prophecy which they made to Pheroras that Herod's government and dynasty should cease was uttered quite openly. This would hardly have been done had the Pharisees really been plotting directly against Herod with the aim of supplanting him by another. Secondly, they are said to have told Bagoas the eunuch that the new king would have control over all things and would be able to restore to him his powers of procreation. Such a statement could scarcely refer to Pheroras, a mere human monarch, but was plainly an allusion to the expected Messiah whose reign, according to Is. 66, should be a time of miraculous fruitfulness.[1] It was quite natural that such an idea should arise among the Pharisees at a time when the impious Herod was sitting as an usurper on the throne of David.

9. Defects.

Jesus' frequent and bitter denunciations of both Scribes and Pharisees because of their intense immovable bigotry and cold formalism, show very clearly their intellectual attitude in his time. They bound heavy burdens and laid them on men's shoulders (Mt. 23_4 Lk. 11_{46})—i.e., they laid the utmost stress on a minute external observance of details. Such a formalism, although originally the product of a true desire to stand in the right way and follow the injunction of Yahwè, was certain to become the most crass externalism in a very short space of time. According to this system, the man who fulfilled to the letter all the physical requirements of the law, such as fasting, wearing the prescribed dress, etc., was technically 'righteous,' quite irrespective of his true inner feelings. This position is admirably illustrated by the well-known comparison between the Pharisee and the publican (Lk. 18_{9-14}). Such externalism could only breed a love of religious show, a tendency to display their formal 'righteousness' before the world, and was certain not only to kill all appreciation of the spiritual meaning which underlay the various forms (Mt. 6_1 23_5), but also to engender a spirit of casuistry which manifested itself whenever the strict requirements of an ordinance became unpleasantly onerous.

This cannot perhaps be better illustrated than by citing the extraordinary means adopted by the later Pharisees to obtain a greater degree of freedom on the Sabbath than was allowed by the written law.

[1] Ant. xviii. 8_3.

[2] Schürer in Riehm, HWB 2_{1209}.

[3] The oral law was regularly codified in writing in the second century A.D. Cp LAW LITERATURE, § 23.

[4] It is identical with the ζωὴ αἰώνιος of the NT, and must not be confused with חיים עד העולם of Ps. 133_3, 'eternal life' for Israel as a nation.

[1] On this discussion see Wellhausen, Phar. u. Sadd. 25.

According to Jer. 17 21-24 (post-exilic) it was forbidden to convey or carry anything on the Sabbath from one place to another. It is clearly stated in Jer. that the ordinance refers, not merely to the city gates, but also to private houses out of which nothing might be carried. The Pharisees, whose tradition used the word rĕšûth, 'district,' to define the limit in which carrying was legal, deliberately enlarged the rĕšûth artificially according to their own pleasure. Thus, if it was desired to fetch and carry on the Sabbath within the limits of a street or large space, they barred the street at either end or enclosed the space on four sides with beams or cords, thus making technically a legally defined limit (rĕšûth) within which the labour of carrying or loading might go on![1] Cp SABBATH, § 4, notes.

It is not surprising then that Jesus stigmatises the Scribes and Pharisees as hypocrites 'who paid the tithes but neglected the weightier matters of the law'; 'men who cleansed the outside of the cup and platter, but within are full of extortion and excess'; 'whited sepulchres, which outwardly appear beautiful but inwardly are full of dead men's bones' (Mt. 23 23 ff.).

The following Jewish classification of the Pharisees is an interesting confirmation of Jesus' estimate of them.

10. Jewish classification. Certain Rabbinical writers divided the Pharisees under seven heads:[2] (1) the shoulder Pharisee, who wore openly on his shoulders a list of his own good actions. (2) The temporising Pharisee, who begged for time in order to perform a good deed. (3) The calculating Pharisee who said: 'my sins are more than counterbalanced by my many virtues.' (4) The saving Pharisee who said: 'I will save a little from my modest fortune to perform a work of charity.' (5) The Pharisee who said: 'would that I knew of a sin which I had committed, in order that I might make reparation by an act of virtue.' (6) The God-fearing Pharisee (Job). (7) The God-loving Pharisee (Abraham).

Of these, only the last two may be understood in a good sense. In spite of the general self-righteous tone of the party, such epithets were not infrequently applied to Pharisees. It must not, of course, be supposed that every member of the party was of necessity a spiritless formalist, dead to all true religious feeling. We need only remember the case of the righteous Nicodemus, and especially the words of Jesus already quoted (Mt. 23 2 f.), confirming the Pharisees in their principle of observing the law, but attacking their insincere and external manner of carrying out their own precepts. Paul himself boasts that he followed the Pharisaic ideas regarding the law (Phil. 3 5), thereby implying that he recognised the authority of both the written and the oral law.

In considering this subject, it is necessary to seek the reason why the Pharisees enjoyed such an ascendancy

11. Growth of scribal party. over the people, and to examine into the causes which had produced such a lamentable state of religion among the Jews of the time of Jesus. These are all to be found in the history of the gradual rise, after the Babylonian exile, of the scribal class, and in the account of the development of the distinctively Pharisaic party from their ranks.

As both Josephus and the NT writers, whose statements regarding the Scribes and Pharisees are certainly the most important that we have at our disposal, were familiar with this school of thought only when it was in an advanced state of development, their account is of use chiefly in showing the character of the party in later times. The sources which are most instructive, however, for the study of the origin and growth of the scribal party are the OT Apocrypha and the Pseudepigrapha, especially the Psalter of Solomon. Besides these, the canonical books of Ezra, Neh., Dan., Ch., and Esther are of great value in indicating the beginnings of the tendencies which produced the post-exilic literary and religious development.

It is useless to seek the origin of religious parties as far back as the period of the Babylonian exile.

[1] See Schürer in Riehm, HWB 2 1207.
[2] See Levy, NHWB 4 142.

The capture of Jerusalem by the Babylonians had of course completely shattered the Jewish political organisation, so that

12. Pre-exilic times. whatever differences of thought there had been before that event could hardly have survived in a concrete form under the radically changed conditions which obtained afterwards. In the pre-exilic days the people had been led, on the one hand, by the priests and priestly families, who were the real literalists and ritualists, and, on the other hand, by prophets who claimed to speak in the name and with the special commission of Yahwè, and who, as spiritual reformers professing to guide Israel through the crises of her history,[1] were, in general, opposed to the more formal and worldly priestly caste. As it is impossible to trace here any of the differences between the Pharisees and the Sadducees already noted, the rise of all of them must be sought in the post-exilic times.

Directly after the return, we find the people divided, as shown by many passages in Ezra and Nehemiah, 13. Two exilic schools. into two hostile schools, of which one approved of uniting by marriage with the neighbouring peoples, especially with the Samaritan mixed race which they did not regard as heathen, and the other opposed such amalgamation most strongly, urging the necessity of keeping Yahwè's favoured nation intact (cp Ezra 9 1 f. 10 2 18 ff.). Both Ezra and Nehemiah were most zealous upholders of a strict observance of the law (Neh. 8 1 ff. 14 ff.), and the bitterest opponents of the tendency manifested by all classes of Jews to contaminate themselves by foreign alliances. Ezra's and Nehemiah's earnest efforts to spread a knowledge of the law met, therefore, with only partial success (Ezra 10 15 Neh. 6 7 10-14 10 30, etc.). The worst offenders against their injunctions were among the prominent high-priestly families who constituted the aristocracy, and in many cases had already allied themselves with outsiders seeking admission into the Jewish nation (note the relationship in Neh. 6 18, between the Persian official Tobiah and a prominent Jew, and in 13 28, between Sanballat and the son of the high priest Eliashib). It should be said in all fairness that the position so strongly taken by Ezra and Nehemiah was not necessarily the strictly legal one, as their opponents could cite many precedents from the earlier history which justified a considerate treatment of such strangers as wished to live at peace and in union with Israel (Lev. 24 22 Nu. 15 16, etc.; cp STRANGER, § 10). In fact, in the earlier law it was only marriage with the Canaanites that was expressly forbidden (cp Ex. 34 16, but see Judg. 3 6, etc.). This being the case, the rise of two post-exilic parties at bitter feud with each other can easily be understood. The one consisted of the high-priestly families, the real aristocracy (Ezra 10 18), who were anxious to connect themselves with another aristocracy in order to increase their own strength, not, as some scholars thought, to form an anti-Persian alliance. The pious leaders, on the other hand, were the strictly Jewish party, who sought to follow the Law as they understood it. These latter formed the beginnings of the class of scribes whose founder was Ezra 'the priest and scribe' (Ezra 7 11 Neh. 8 1). It should be remarked that the Book of Ruth, which derives the house of David from a Moabitish stock, is now considered by many to be a conscious polemic against the extreme position of Ezra with regard to foreign marriages (but cp RUTH [BOOK], § 7).

From this time onwards, a circle of Jewish scholars, many of whom were of priestly[2] (not high-priestly) race,

14. Juristic students. applied themselves with increasing devotion to the study of the law from a juristic point of view. Among these men began and developed the system of oral tradition already mentioned which eventually took rank in their minds with the law itself. Between the time of Ezra and the period of Antiochus Epiphanes (520-175 B.C.) the differences became even more accentuated between this student class and the aristocratic high-priestly party whose policy of associating themselves with the nobility of the adjacent or dominant heathen people (Samaritan, Persian, Greek) remained unchanged. By the time the Græco-Syrian domination began, the scholarly class, who edited and circulated the historical and prophetical Scriptures, treating them from the same minute dogmatic-ethical point of view as they did the law, had founded many schools.

Into these schools gathered great numbers of students who, of course, assisted in promulgating the peculiar orthodox doctrines already described. In these schools it was especially laid down as the imperative duty of the faithful student to remember accurately the principles which he had learned and to transmit them with equal accuracy to others. This is fully illustrated by two characteristic maxims of the Talmud :—(i.) 'To him who forgets a precept it is accounted by the scribe as if he had deliberately forfeited his life.' (ii.) 'Every one is bound to teach with the exact words of the teacher.'[1] In spite of these prescribed lines which the faithful student should follow, we find the caste of the Scribes at the time of Christ divided into two distinct schools, viz., the school of Hillel and the school of Shammai, which differed from each other, however, more on minor questions of interpretation than on any serious points of doctrine. In general, the school of Hillel was more lenient than that of Shammai (cp CANON, § 53, n. 3).

The Scribes were undoubtedly the originators of the Synagogue service which was a natural result of their religious position.[2] Separated as they were from the high-priestly class, the teachers in these synagogal schools developed of necessity into a well-defined independent order of religious leaders called Rabbis, whom Sirach, writing at the beginning of the second century B.C., praises most heartily (39-40). It is doubtful whether the Scribes had crystallised into a distinctly political party as early as the time of Sirach.[3]

15. Assidæans.

The first thing which tended to turn the religious students called Scribes into a fierce politico-religious faction was the attempts of Antiochus Epiphanes, so bitterly stigmatised in the book of Daniel, to Hellenise the entire Jewish people. In this, Antiochus was aided by the aristocratic party which, from the beginning of his reign, had manifested marked phil-Hellenic tendencies. Among the opponents of the Hellenistic movement we find a party calling themselves ASSIDÆANS [q.v.] or the 'pious,' and representing the most rigid development of the ideas of the Scribes.

They were strict observers of the law (1 Macc. 2 42), and in particular so rigid in their views of the Sabbath that they even refused to defend themselves on the holy day (1 Macc. 2 32 ff.). That they were ascetics in their mode of life may be inferred from 1 Macc. 1 62 ff., and that they were evidently a well-organised body is seen from the unanimity with which they acted together (1 Macc. 7 13). See ASSIDÆANS.

It is interesting to notice that the author of Daniel shows many Assidæan tendencies. We need observe only the stress which he lays on the necessity of observing the law, and the indifference with which he regards the Maccabæan rising, calling it only 'a little help' (11 34). This is probably an allusion to the fact that many of the Maccabæan combatants attached more importance to the political than to the religious aspect of the question at issue.

16. The popular rising.

The reasons for the rebellion of the Assidæans against Antiochus Epiphanes must not be confounded with those which produced the popular rising of the Maccabees. The fundamental impulse of the Maccabæan rebellion was a pure patriotism, a true feeling for the miseries which the common people were undergoing (1 Macc. 2 7 ff.). The Assidæans were much more selfish in their aims, as they were perfectly willing to recognise the dominion of the heathen king, as long as they were left undisturbed in the observance of the law. They accordingly took part in the contest only long enough to insure their own religious freedom and, as soon as this seemed safe, promptly surrendered to Alcimus the Hellenistic high priest.

[2] See SYNAGOGUE. Cp Sieffert, 'Die jüd. Synagoge zur Zeit Jesu,' in Beweis des Glaubens, 1876, pp. 8 ff.; also Kuenen, Over de Mannen der Groote Synagoge (Amsterdam, 1876).

[3] Cp Sieffert, RE(2) 13 220.

The statement in 2 Macc. 14 6 that the Assidæans were the real Maccabæan war party is in direct contradiction to the data in 1 Macc. regarding them. In order to explain this, Hitzig (GVI 417) considers 1 Macc. 7 13 as an interpolation. The probability is, as was suggested by Sieffert (RE(2) 13 223), that 1 Macc. was written from a Maccabæan, and 2 Macc. from a Pharisaic point of view. The Pharisees wished to claim for themselves the credit of the Maccabæan victories. The true attitude of the Assidæans is probably given in 1 Macc. 7 13 (see also Wellhausen, l.c. pp. 79 ff.; cp MACCABEES i., § 4).

17. Assidæans = Pharisees.

There can be little doubt that these Assidæans were practically identical with that party of the Scribes[1] which came to be called Pharisees under Johannes Hyrcanus (135-105 B.C.). As soon as the Maccabæan dynasty had become established, the new rulers assumed the high-priesthood, and so the ancient aristocratic and high-priestly families who, up to that time, had been the kernel of the phil-Hellenic party, were now forced to relinquish their position as political leaders. They retained a great part of their influence, however, as party leaders of their own faction which continued under the name Sadducees with essentially the same principles.

18. Rupture with Hasmonæans.

At the time of Hyrcanus, we find the Pharisees opposed to the Maccabæan or Hasmonæan family, with whom during the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes they had temporarily made common cause.

It is not difficult to account for this change of attitude. As has already been stated, the Assidæans cared little for political freedom and were therefore not in sympathy with the Maccabees as to the main issue. It was only natural, therefore, that, as soon as the Maccabees had succeeded in founding a temporal dynasty, they should begin to drift apart from the stricter scribal religious class who had now quite evidently assumed the leadership of their own party. The first rupture between the royal family and the Pharisees occurred in the reign of Hyrcanus who, although himself a Pharisee at first, deliberately left that party and became a Sadducee (cp ISRAEL, § 78).

The son and successor of Hyrcanus, Alexander Jannæus (104-78 B.C.), inherited his father's spirit, and waged a six years' war against the now powerful Pharisaic party. On the death of Jannæus, however, his widow and successor Salome Alexandra (78-69 B.C.), realising the futility of attempting to resist the Pharisees, who were becoming stronger and stronger under opposition, made peace and allied herself with them (Ant. xiii. 6 1). It was at this period that the Pharisees gained over the minds of the people the ascendancy, retained without interruption until the days of Jesus, which appears so plainly in the pages of the NT. Indeed, their opponents the Sadducees never again became prominent as a political party after the advent of the Romans, who in 63 B.C. appointed the Pharisaic Hyrcanus, son of Alexandra, as their vassal-king, giving him the preference over his Sadducee brother, Aristobulus (cp Ps. Sol. 2).

19. As leaders.

The Pharisees now appear as the leaders of Jewish national religious feeling, although they must not be regarded as forming the kernel of the people, nor as being the people's party. This is true in spite of their violent opposition to Herod, with whom the Sadducees had allied themselves. The Pharisees naturally hated all religious oppression and were therefore on the people's side. Their position, like that of the earlier Assidæans, was purely religious, however, and their object can be said to have been political only in so far as they desired to establish the theocratic idea. The Pharisees hated the Romans, therefore, with perfect consistency, because it was from them that the anti-legal exactions came. Extremists like the Scribes refused, accordingly, to pay the foreign tax and were consequently in a constant state of friction with the Roman provincial authorities whom the Sadducees, ever true to their foreign predilections, supported. It cannot be said, however, that the later Sadducees like their phil-Hellenic predecessors were entirely anti-national.

[1] Sieffert denies the identity of the Assidæans and Pharisees, claiming that they were merely alike in principle, and not necessarily the same party. He finds it therefore impossible to trace the Pharisees farther back than the time of Hyrcanus (l.c. 226). It seems quite clear, however, that the party divisions of the Hasmonæan period were merely continuations of early differences and, as long as we can note in the Assidæans the chief characteristics afterwards found in the Pharisees, there is every reason to see in the later party the logical development of the earlier.

There can be no doubt that this bigoted theocratic nationalistic tendency, which the Pharisees never ceased to preach, eventually caused the disastrous anti-Roman rebellion that ended so fatally for the Jewish nation. Indeed, according to Josephus (BJ iv. 3 9 ff., Ant. xviii. 1 1), it was the Zealots, a distinctly Pharisaic development, who were the instigators and ringleaders of this movement. It happened then that those who wished to lead the people to righteousness and to the realisation of the Messianic hopes of centuries became, through their own blind pride, the chief instruments in the downfall of their nation and religion. The Pharisees' bigotry and narrow short-sightedness, therefore, which Jesus had condemned so frequently and so vehemently, were punished in the most terrible manner conceivable.

20. Rebellion.

The literature on the subject is very extensive. Among the modern publications the following should be mentioned:—Cohen, Les Pharisiens (Paris, 1877); Ewald, Gesch. des Volkes Israel,(3) 3 357 ff. 476 ff. (1864); Geiger, 'Sadd. u. Phar.' in Jüd. Ztschr. 2 11 ff. (1863); Gfrörer, Das Jahrhundert d. Heils, 1 309 ff. (1838); Grätz, Gesch. der Juden,(2) 71 ff. 455 ff. (1863); Hamburger, *Realencycl. für Bibel u. 2. ΠΗΡΑ, Mt. 10 10 Mk. 6 8 Lk. 9 3 10 4 22 35 f. (RV WALLET). A scrip is a pouch or wallet used by shepherds (Milton, Comus, l. 626); cp CATTLE, § 6. But the yalkūt was also used by travellers. It is probably the πήρα of Judith 10 5 13 10 15 (EV 'bag'), and of Mt. 10 10, etc.; ילקוט or (ה)קלעת may (Che.) also be restored in Judg. 5 26 (MT יָתֵד), where it would mean a household box or bag (see JAEL).

SCRIPTURE, SCRIPTURES. 1. In Dan. 10 21 the seer's supernatural visitant is reported as saying, 'I will show thee that which is noted in the scripture of truth' (AV), or rather (RV), 'I will show thee that which is inscribed in the writing of truth'—i.e., in the book in which the destinies of mankind are written down beforehand. The expression stands in close relation to the growing interest of the later Jews in the 'last things.' Prophecy in the grand old style having ceased, it became necessary to look to the source of all true knowledge of the future—viz., to God—or more specially to those seers and sages of primitive times whom Yahwè, it was believed, favoured by giving them special revelations, either directly, or by one of those angels who 'see his face' (Enoch, Seth, Daniel, etc.). The phrase in its context is important for the comprehension of those late writings to which the name of some one of those primitive seers is prefixed. It is, of course, related to such an expression as the 'book of life,' or, 'of the living,' Ps. 69 28 [29], cp Dan. 12 1, but very much more closely to the conception of the 'heavenly tablets' (πλάκες τοῦ οὐρανοῦ, see Test. xii. Patriarch.; Enoch, 81 1 f.), which are the Jewish equivalent of the tablets of Marduk. The idea survives in the popular Jewish view of the Jewish New Year's Day (= the Zakmuk festival at Babylon), according to which God holds session on that day with a book before him in which he inscribes the fates of men (Jastrow, Karppe). For the later Jewish references see Charles, Enoch, note on pp. 131 ff., and for the origin of the tablets of Marduk see the Babylonian Creation-story, 1 33 4 131, and the first myth of Zu, KB, vi. pt. i. pp. 47 ff., and cp Jastrow, RBA 428, 540.

2. αἱ γραφαί (some eighteen times in NT—e.g., Jn. 5 39, of OT), see CANON, § 2; γραφαί ἅγιαι, Rom. 1 2; ἡ γραφή, Mk. 12 10 15 28(?) Lk. 4 21 Jn. 2 22 7 38 42 10 35 13 18 17 12 19 24 28 36 37 20 9 Acts 1 16 8 32 35 Rom. 4 3 9 17 10 11 11 2 Gal. 3 8 22 4 30 1 Tim. 5 18 Ja. 2 8 23 4 5 1 Pet. 2 6 2 Pet. 1 20; πᾶσα γραφή, 2 Tim. 3 16; τὰ ἱερὰ γράμματα (AV, the holy scriptures; RV, the sacred writings) 2 Tim. 3 15; cp 1 Macc. 12 9 (τὰ βιβλία τὰ ἅγια); 2 Macc. 8 23 (τὴν ἱερὰν βίβλον).

Observe that in 1 Pet. probably, and in Jas., Jn., and 2 Pet. certainly, ἡ γραφή is used of the Scripture as a whole. In 2 Tim. 3 16, however, RV is doubtless right in changing AV's 'all scripture (is given by inspiration of God, and is)' into 'every scripture (inspired of God is also).' γραφή means here, as also in Paul, any single passage of Scripture. 'The writer shares the Jewish view of the purely supernatural origin of the Scripture in its strictest form, according to which "theopneustia" is ascribed directly to the Scripture' (Holtzmann, Lehrb. der NTlichen Theologie, 2 261). Cp the Jewish belief in the heavenly origin of the Torah, the denial of which made a man an 'Epicurean' or apostate, and excluded him from the future age (Sanhedrīn, 90 a).

SCYTHIANS. The LXX contains some apparent references to the Scythians.

In 2 Macc. 4 47 Antiochus IV. Epiphanes is charged with such injustice as would not be found in a Scythian court, and in 3 Macc. 7 5 the servants of Ptolemy IV. Philopator are accused of cruelties after the fashion of Scythians. The city of BETH-SHEAN (q.v.) is called Scythopolis (Σκυθῶν πόλις) in Judg. 1 27 Judith 3 10 2 Macc. 12 29 f. Symmachus translated עילם (Elam) in Gen. 14 1 9, Σκυθῶν.

1. Σκύθης in 𝔊 and NT = Scythian?

Moreover 'Scythian' (Σκύθης) is mentioned with 'barbarian' in TR of Col. 3 11.

It is not certain that in any of these instances the reference is to the historic Scythians.

Jason of Cyrene in the days of Cæsar, and the author of 3 Macc. at the time of Caligula, may indeed have had in mind such descriptions as those in Herod. 4 62-69 or some proverbial sayings based on them. It is also possible, however, that they used the term 'Scythians' only as a synonym for 'barbarians.' According to Georgius Syncellus (Chron. 1 405) the origin of the name Scythopolis for BETH-SHEAN, also known to Josephus (Ant. xii. 8 5 [§ 348]), Eusebius (OS 237 55), and others, was the presence in that city of a body of Scythians remaining from the invasion in the time of Psammetichus. The name, however, does not occur on an inscription before 218 B.C. Pliny states (HN 5 74) that Scythopolis formerly had the name of Nysa. Whilst it is not in itself improbable that some Scythians in 625 B.C. remained as an enclave in Beth-shean and played as important a part there as the exiles from Cutha seem to have done in Samaria, it is also possible that the name is due to the settlement of some people deported by Ašur-bani-pal, such as the Parthian Dahae (Ezra 4 9, where Hoffmann's conjecture דהוא is more ingenious than convincing). Symmachus may have used Scythian for Parthian.

In Col. 3 11 the text is clearly not in order. It probably read originally 'Jew and Gentile' (Ἰουδαῖος καὶ ἐθνικός; Syr. Ihūdhāyē w-'Armāyē; Eth. Ayhūdawē wa 'Alamāwē; Lat. Gentilis et Iudæus), 'circumcision and uncircumcision, Greek and barbarian' (περιτομὴ καὶ ἀκροβυστία, Ἕλλην καὶ βάρβαρος; Syr. Yaunāyē w-Barbrāyē; cp Ignatius, Philad. 6, Ἕλλησί τε καὶ βαρβάροις, δοῦλος καὶ ἐλεύθερος); 'Scythian' (Σκύθης) seems to be a gloss to 'barbarian.'

It is exceedingly probable that in MT the Scythians are referred to as Ashkenaz[1] (𝔊 Ασχαναζ) in Gen. 10 3 1 Ch. 1 6 Jer. 51 27.

[1] [The question of the origin and meaning of the name 'Ashkenaz' and the related names needs to be re-examined in connection with the 'Jerahmeelite theory.' See Crit. Bib. on Gen. 10 2-4.]

SCYTHIANS

Originally the Hebrew word may have been pronounced Aškunza (אַשְׁכְּנֻז, אַשְׁכְּנוּ, אַשְׁכְּנוּ, אַשְׁכְּנוּ); it is as Delitzsch has pointed out (see ASHKENAZ) identical with Aškuza and Iškuza occurring in Assyrian inscriptions (see § 6). In the Behistūn inscription the Saka chief Shuka is called, in the Susian version, Iskunka. Already Vater (Comm., 1802, p. 100) observed that a name beginning with Sc would be suitable on account of the prosthetic A, E, or I. The essential part of the name seems to be Sku: cp Σκυ-λης, Σκο-λοτοι, Σκω-πασις, Chinese Szū, Persian Sa-ka. Aškuza-Skuza is apparently the origin of Σκύθης.

2. Ashkenaz = Scythian.

In Gen. 10 3 the Scythian is, then, regarded as a son of the Kimmerian (GOMER, Gimirra, Gamir, Κιμμέριοι) and a brother of Riphath and Togarmah, whilst in Jer. 51 27 he appears as the companion of the Mannæan and Urartæan. The author of Jer. 50-51 58, whose production is largely a patchwork of quotations, seems to have used in 51 27 some old writing now lost, since the connection of MINNI and ARARAT (qq.v.) with Ashkenaz reflects a definite historical situation centuries before his own time (cp JEREMIAH [BOOK], § 20, viii.). Whether Riphath and Togarmah were current designations of certain countries in the N. at the time of the priestly editor of the Pentateuch, or likewise drawn from some older source, must be left in doubt.

It has also been maintained that the Scythians are alluded to under the names Gog and Magog. Magog was interpreted as Scythians by Josephus (Ant. i. 6 1 [§ 123]), Jerome, Theodoret, and others. The fact that Gomer (Kimmerian), Madai (Mede), Javan (Greek), Meshech (Moschi), Tubal (Tibarenes), and Tiras (Turša, Tyrrhenians) are so manifestly names of famous nations renders it quite certain that, if the word has been accurately transmitted, or formed at all a part of the original text, Magog must also represent the name of a well-known people. It must be confessed that the absence of so important a name alike in cuneiform and classical sources makes one suspect the correctness of the name.

3. Gog and Magog.

This has led Cheyne to suppose a dittography of גֹּמֶר in Gen. 10 2, and a corruption of מִגְרוֹן in Ezek. 38 f. (see GOG AND MAGOG, n.). The interpretation of ARMAGEDDON (q.v.) by this scholar is indeed as plausible as it is brilliant. It seems doubtful, however, whether the new-found chthonic divinity will be of service in Ezek. 38 (cp textual corrections in col. 3881, n. 1, and for the opposite view that a great historic personage is reflected by the Gog of Ezek. 38 see § 5). A simpler suggestion as to Gen. 10 2 would be that Magog (מגוג) was miswritten for Gog (גוג) under the influence of 'Madai' (מָדַי), as a consequence of a changed conception of Gog, because at one time it was customary to contract the Assyrian māt Gag into Magag (Streck), or as a designation of a people akin to the Scythians and derived from Gog (מגוג), such as the Sarmatians or Massagetæ. It is interesting that Saadia in this place has יאגוג (ed. Derenbourg), the customary rendering of גוג at his time; cp Ḳur'ān 21 96 and Arabic writers quoted by Herbelot. In Ezek. 38 2, 'land of the Magog' (ארץ המגוג) is apparently an interpolation (Stade), and in Ezek. 39 6 the original seems to have been Gog (𝔊BQ). [On Ezek. 38 see further Crit. Bib.] In Targ. Jer. 1 to Nu. 11 26 מלכא סליק מן ארעא דמגוג, 'a king shall arise from the land of Magog,' depends on Ezek. 38 2, while in Targ. Jer. 2 גוג ומגוג וחילוותיה 'Gog and Magog and his armies,' ומגוג is probably an interpolation; but Magog seems to be the name of a king, as it certainly is in Targ. Jon. to 1 S. 2 10.

Amenḥotep III. (Am. Tab. 1 38 f.) mentions three countries—Gag, Ḫanigalbat, and Ugarit. Ḫanigalbat is probably Melitene, and Gog is likely to have been situated NE of Commagene (Streck, ZA 15 321). A people called Gag, or Gog, was thus known in the fifteenth century B.C. Concerning its ethnic relations we as yet know nothing. In view of the marked Iranian character of some names in the Amarna letters (see § 13), it is not too bold an assumption that Gag may have been a forerunner of Aškenaz in Anatolia belonging to the same family. Like the Muški, the Kaški, the Tubali, and the Ḫaldi, the Gagi may have been driven N. by new invaders; and it is significant that, in the days of Strabo, there was a province Gogarene immediately E. of the territory occupied by the Moschi, the Colchians, the Tibarenes, and the Chaldæans (Geogr. 11 14, pp. 452 f. ed. Didot). In the time of Ašur-banipal Gagi still lingered in the neighbourhood of Urarṭu as the name of a chief of Saḫi (Cyl. B. 4 1 f.). That the memory of Gog as a people was not lost is shown by Rev. 20 8. Ewald rightly felt that the phrase 'Gog and Magog' was not the creation of the NT apocalytic. After the name Gogarene had attached itself to the territory occupied by Scythians, at least since the beginning of the seventh century B.C., Gog naturally was understood as a Scythian people, whatever its original character may have been.

As, according to Ezek. 38 17, the coming of Gog, prince of Meshech and Tubal, had been predicted by the former prophets, Jerome looked for such a prophecy and found it in Nu. 24 7 where 𝔊 and Sam. with Aq. Sym. read 'his king shall be higher than Gog.'[1] There can be little doubt that this is more original than MT, though the whole verse is probably a late interpolation. [Cp OG, col. 3465.]

4. 'King Gog.'

Peyron (Sur les prophètes, 1693, p. 136 f.) called attention to Am. 7 1*c* where 𝔊 read 'and behold, one caterpillar, king Gog,' and made this passage refer to a Scythian invasion. Here, too, the Hebrew text gives no satisfactory sense, and Nowack rightly rejects it as a gloss.[2] 𝔊 probably reproduces more nearly the words of the glossator; but it may be questioned whether the original read מלך גוג, 'king of Gog,' or גוג המלך, 'Gog, the king.' If 'king of Gog' was the reading, 'Gog the king,' and with it 'king Gog' himself, may have originated in a misunderstanding of this marginal comment to Am. 7 1. But the idea of this king may also have been suggested by descriptions of Gagi, ruler of Saḫi, given by some of Ašur-bani-pal's Syrian colonists, unless it should ultimately prove to have its roots in Babylonian mythology, where a divine messenger Gaga figures in the Inuma ilîš epic, 3 2 f. 67. That the descriptions of Jer. 4-6 and Zeph. 2 (see § 6, and ZEPHANIAH, § 4) cannot by themselves have led to the definite conception of king Gog, is sufficiently evident from Jewish and Christian exegesis, which so long has been satisfied (but see § 27, and Crit. Bib.) with seeing in these passages references to the Chaldæans only.

That, with all its apocalyptic character, Ezek. 38-39 reflects the career of a great historic personage, was already felt by Polychronius (about 427 A.D.) who thought of Antiochus III. He was followed in this by Grotius, whose commentary gives a detailed application of the text to the history of the Seleucid king. Winckler most ingeniously interprets the prophecy as occasioned by the career of Alexander (AOF 2 160 ff.). But neither Antiochus nor Alexander would naturally be designated 'prince of Meshech and Tubal,' and there is in neither case any motive for the feeling of hostility displayed, whilst there is evidence of a different disposition toward these kings on the part of the Jews. The present writer would suggest that the conqueror whose career inspired this prophecy is far more likely to have been Mithridates VI. Eupator Dionysus of Pontus.

5. Mithridates = Gog of Ezek. 38.

Mithridates alone could rightly be entitled 'prince of Meshech and Tubal,' his seat of power being where the Moschi and the Tibarenes lived, and his sway extending over the territory once associated with those names. None could more aptly be considered as the coming Gog than the proud conqueror of Scythia who reigned over all the coast-lands of the Black Sea and brought from the farthest N. his armies. No other ruler of these realms had with him Paras, Cush, and Put, Gomer, Togarmah, and the extreme N. than Mithridates, whose general Pelopidas could justly boast of the Persian auxiliaries, Egyptian ships, Cappadocian troops, Armenian contingents, and Scythian, Sarmatian, Bastarnian, and Thracian hordes that swelled the king's forces. Mithridates' dark intrigues, his boundless ambition, his insatiable greed, the 'Ephesian vespers' with their 80,000 victims, the persecutions of the Jews in Cos and elsewhere, who were at the time warm friends and allies of Rome, must, in 88 B.C., have filled many a heart in Palestine with fear of an invasion, hatred, and abomination. But, in an age of eschatological hopes, the confidence could not fail that, should he invade the 'navel of the earth' where quiet and prosperity had been restored, and prove indeed to be the predicted Gog, he would there meet with a miserable end. By the sword of the faithful and the wrath of heaven he would perish, and his hosts would be buried during

1 MT אגג: the addition of the prosthetic א may be explained as in Arab. Ajūj for גוג in Ezek. 38 2 Ar.

seven months in 'the Valley of the Travellers to the Sea' (𝔊 of Ezek. 39 11), whilst for himself would be reserved a famous sepulchre in Israel in this valley of Hamon-Gog (Esdraelon), apparently in the city named after the foreign horde Hamonah (Scythopolis). Thus the king of Scythia would be buried in the city of the Scythians, the new Dionysus in the tomb where Dionysus-Oitosyrus buried Leucothea, his nurse (Pliny, 5 74), who was identified with Artimpasa, the Scythian Diana (Hegesippus 3 19).[1]

It is possible that already Photius understood Jeremiah as referring to the Scythians in 6 22 ff.

6. Scythians in Jer. and Zeph.

In his first homily on the Russian invasion in 865 Photius seems to regard himself as speaking of the same northern people that the prophet had in mind. He no doubt shared the view of his contemporary Nicetas who, in his life of Ignatius, speaks of the Russians as a Scythian people (Σκυθῶν ἔθνος λεγόμενοι 'Ρως), as does also the unknown continuator of Theophanes's chronography; see 'De Russorum incursione' in Lexicon Vindobonense, ed. Nauck, 203 f. and xxiv. f.

In modern times, Cramer, Eichhorn, Dahler, Hitzig, Ewald, and most recent critics have seen in Jer. 4-6 Zeph. 2 original references to the Scythians, though admitting subsequent retouching under the impression of Chaldæan invasions. It has seemed to them impossible that Jeremiah should have feared a Chaldæan attack in the thirteenth year of Josiah, whilst the Scythian invasion mentioned by Herodotus (1 103 ff.) seems to have occurred about that time. In JEREMIAH [BOOK], § 20, i., it has been suggested that Chaldæan designs upon Syria may have become apparent already in 625, and that the Scythian army may have contained a Chaldæan contingent by virtue of the agreement between Nabopolassar and the Umman Manda prince alluded to in the Nabuna'id inscription. That view must now be somewhat modified, as Winckler's researches have rendered it highly probable that the Umman Manda in this case are the Medes, and that there was an alliance between the Aškuza-Scythians and the Assyrians. A prayer to Šamaš, published by Knudtzon (Assyrische Gebete, no. 29), mentions the request of Bartatua of Aškuza for a daughter of Esarhaddon. Winckler identifies this chief with Protothyas, father of Madyas, king of the Scythians (Herod. 1 103), and reasonably supposes that there was effected an alliance which led Madyas to defend Nineveh against Cyaxares. If Madyas was the son of Bartatua who flourished about 675, he is likely to have taken just such a part in the events of 625 as Herodotus indicates. Phraortes had fallen in a battle against the Assyrians 625. To avenge his father, Cyaxares marched against Nineveh and invested the city. It is as natural that he should accept the aid of Nabopolassar as that this Chaldæan usurper should be eager to gain an alliance with him by sending an army. In this predicament Madyas came to the aid of Nineveh. The Medes were worsted in the battle, and the city was saved. Another ally of Cyaxares and Nabopolassar had, however, to be dealt with. Psammetichus had long been encroaching on Assyrian territory. Since 639 he seems to have laid siege to Ashdod. The Scythians, therefore, went on from Nineveh to invade Egypt. Their ostensible object was further to defend the endangered interests of Assyria. Hence the absence of any record of violence done. Even in the disorders in Ashkelon, it is distinctly stated that the mass of the army took no part, only a few individuals. Such treatment at the hands of Scythians could scarcely be expected. Prophets like Jeremiah and Zephaniah naturally watched their approach as a new scourge in the hand of Yahwè, amply justified by the moral condition of Judah. That these hordes should quietly come and go in peace, having received their tribute from Egypt, they could not dream. This line of conduct finds its explanation only in the political relations between Scythians and Assyrians. The editor of Jer. 1-20 (see JEREMIAH [BOOK], § 5 f.) had an important landmark to go by, and rightly put the beginning of his prophet's ministry in the memorable thirteenth year of Josiah (625).

7. Winckler's criticism.

Winckler assumes that the defence of Nineveh by Madyas occurred at the time when the city was finally destroyed (606), and that the Scythians were then routed. He correctly observes that a parenthesis begins after the statement of the appearance of Madyas, and concludes that only the beginning of Herodotus' account (1 103*a*) and the end of it (1 106, end) were drawn from an older source, the remainder being the historian's own work. But the parenthesis only tells how the Scythians happened to be in Asia, and the narrative manifestly continues with 'Then the Medes fought with the Scythians' in 1 104, end. The rest presents only one difficulty, which, however, may be satisfactorily met. If the twenty-eight years of Scythian rule fell within Cyaxares' reign (625-585), as 1 107 distinctly affirms, they must have extended from 625 to 597; yet the capture of Nineveh in 606 is mentioned after the recovery of the nations ruled before 625. But the restoration of Media's former territory is not unnaturally mentioned first, even though it had not been fully accomplished before 597, and the important addition of Assyria only afterwards with emphasis, though occurring already in 606. There is no evidence that Scythia lost anything but an ally by the fall of Assyria. If the king of the Umman Manda in the Nabu-na'id inscription is Cyaxares, there is no hint in that document of a Scythian army appearing for the defence of Nineveh in 606. Had the Scythian power in Asia Minor been crushed in that year, it is not likely that hostilities between Media and Lydia would have been so long deferred. In 597 the two allies, Media and Chaldæa, seem to have made a great attack upon the W., Media destroying the Scythian power in Armenia and Cappadocia, Chaldæa humiliating Egypt's Syrian buffer state, Judah. They were still united when in 586 Nebuchadrezzar put an end to the Judæan kingdom, and the next year secured for his 'helper,' Cyaxares, an honourable peace after the battle of the eclipse, Cilicia being then the heir to the position and policy of Scythia. Winckler's hypothesis apparently makes the distance too great between Madyas and his father Protothyas, and does not sufficiently recognise the importance of the political situation in 625.

8. Jerahmeelite theory.

Such doubts concerning the first siege of Nineveh by Cyaxares and its attendant circumstances (already expressed by We., Kl. Proph.[(1)] 156[(2)], 160), questions as to the reliability of Jer. 46 2 (cp JEREMIAH [BOOK], § 14), and particularly a searching and much-needed criticism of proper names in MT, finally led Cheyne to look for an invasion from the S. by the Jeraḥmeelites instigated by Nebuchadrezzar in the years immediately before 604 (see PROPHETIC LITERATURE, § 40). The Jeraḥmeelite theory unquestionably promises to throw much light on the obscure history of the Negeb. That the Arabian neighbours of Egypt, as well as the peoples E. of Judah, should have been inflamed by Nebuchadrezzar is altogether probable; and that Jeremiah, watching these repeated raids, should have felt behind them the master-hand of the Chaldæan is not incredible. Nor need it be denied that צפון has occasionally been understood as 'the North,' where, in reality, a place-name was intended. It is even possible that the reports of the prophet's earlier speeches have been coloured by the memory of more recent words of his occasioned by such raids by the neighbours. In view, however, of the account by Herodotus of a Scythian invasion of Palestine, following the relief of Nineveh by Madyas, the suggestion in a cuneiform letter of a Scytho-Assyrian alliance already in the time of Bartatua-Protothyas, the occasion for Scythian interference in the accession of [1] There is nothing in the history of the Hebrew canon that forbids so late a date; see the present writer's articles on the canon in the Jewish Encyclopædia and the New International Encyclopædia and 'Daniel among the Prophets,' Hibbert Journ. vol. i. Nor is there any evidence that this appendix already formed a part of the book that no doubt was translated a generation earlier (preface to Ecclus.).

SCYTHIANS

Cyaxares forty years before the eclipse of 585, the insurrection of Nabopolassar, dated by Ptolemy's canon in 625, and the united attack of Cyaxares and Nabopolassar upon Assyria, and the assignment of these prophecies to the same year by an editor apparently dependent on an early biographer, it seems safer to adhere to the construction of the history given above. [See, further, Crit. Bib.]

At most, little knowledge concerning the Scythians could be derived from these biblical references. If the identification of Aškuza is correct, the Scythians are mentioned in cuneiform inscriptions, such as 1 R. 45 col. 2 27, and Knudtzon, Ass. Gebete, 29, 35, in a manner that throws light upon the beginnings of Scythian rule in Asia Minor.

9. Cuneiform, classical, and Chinese sources.

In a Persian cuneiform inscription at Behistūn, Saka humavarka, and Saka tigrakhuda are referred to by Darius, who also speaks of the 'Saka at the ends of the earth' in a hieroglyphic list of nations at the Suez canal. The Scythians are not mentioned by name in the Homeric poems, though they may be referred to as ἱππημολγοί, Il. 13 5. Strabo (7 3) quotes a direct reference from Hesiod; but whether this was drawn from an otherwise unknown genuine γῆς περίοδος or from the third κατάλογος written about 600 B.C., as Kirchhoff emends the text, is uncertain. About 600 B.C. the name occurs in a fragment of Alcæus, and that is probably also the date of the poem of Aristeas of Proconnesus. Æschylus refers to the good laws of the Scythians (Strabo, l.c.), and Hecatæus of Miletus gave valuable information concerning them. The most important source is Herodotus. His fourth book is devoted to Scythia. Much of his knowledge is derived from native Scythians in Olbia, as well as from resident Greeks. Hippocrates also seems to have visited Scythia, and, like Herodotus, still confined the name Scythians to the Scoloti. Pseudo-Scylax (about 337 B.C.) and Ephorus begin to use it in a somewhat wider sense, though familiar with the character and history of the Scoloti. Some of the representations in art of Scythian life found at Kertsch (Panticapæum), Kum Olba and Altun Olba (see § 11) belong to the fourth and third centuries. The Greek inscriptions of Olbia containing Scythian names are not older than the second century B.C. Diodorus adds little to the earlier sources; but Strabo's geography throws much light upon the Scythia of his day. The changed conditions there inspired him with undue scepticism as to the accuracy of Herodotus. Trogus Pompeius in Justin, Ptolemy the geographer, Polyænus, Ammianus Marcellinus, and others acquaint us with some facts. For the history of the eastern Scythians Ktesias is not without value. Coins give the names of Scythian kings. Of great importance are the Chinese writings of Sse-ma-tsien (about 100 B.C.) translated by Brosset, Journ. As. ii. 8 418 ff., and of Panku (about 80 A.D.), both because of their sober descriptions of lands and peoples, and because of the aid they furnish to the chronology.

Whilst, in historical times, there have been important centres of Scythian life in Asia Minor and in Europe, in Margiana, Bactria, Kophene, and India, the people neither considered itself nor was regarded by others as autochthonous in any of these lands. Even in the territory between the Danube and the Don, which might properly be called Scythian, because for so many centuries the seat of a Scythian civilisation, a native tradition declared the Scoloti to be strangers. Many indications point to the region N. of Jaxartes, between the Aral Sea and Lake Balkash, in modern Turkestan and the adjoining Khirgis steppe, as the home of the Scythians in the days when their immediate Iranian kinsmen, the Aryan invaders of India, were still their neighbours S. and SE. in the old Airyanem Vaejo. The presence of Mongolian and Tibetan tribes on the NE. and E., and of the kindred Massagetæ on the SE., occasioned by the expansion of Chinese power, gradually forced a branch of the people across the Ural, the Volga, and finally the Don. The time of this invasion of Western Scythia cannot be determined with certainty; but it may have occurred as early as in the sixteenth century B.C. (see § 14). Another Iranian people, the Kimmerians,[1] occupying the land so far S. as to the Danube, were gradually driven into the Crimea or, at different times and by different roads, into Asia Minor. The Kimmerian invasion that followed the E. coast of the Black Sea in the eighth century was probably the last. Down the W. coast of the Caspian Sea the Scythian tribes E. of the Don followed and established themselves E. of the Kimmerians and N. of Mannæans and Medes, whence they apparently extended their power over all Armenia and Cappadocia. Their old places E. of the Azov Sea were taken by a Median people, the Sauromatæ or Sarmatians, possibly not before the return of Median power. On the plateau through which the Dniester (Tyras), the Bog (Hypanis), the Dnieper (Borysthenes), and the Inguletz (Panticapes) flow, and so far as to the Don (Tanais), the Scoloti took possession of the land, some settling down to agricultural pursuits, others retaining their nomadic life.

10. Home and migrations of the Scythians.

[1] Such names of Kimmerian kings as Teušpa, Tuktammi (Δύγδαμις = Λύγδαμις, Sayce) and Sandrakšatra, occurring in the seventh century, are clearly Iranian.

The arrival of Milesian colonists (Olbia founded about 650) created mixed Græco-Scythian tribes such as the Kallipidæ and Alizones. A kindred Thracian tribe, the Agathyrsi, was subdued. Northwards the territory extended into Ukraine. Beyond their own clans in that direction lived Slavonic tribes, the Neari, the Melanchlæni, and the Anthropophagi (wrongly so called). Up the Volga there were the Budinæ (Permians ?), and across the Ural the Thyssagetæ and Tyrkæ, Finnish peoples, whilst E. of these were the Turkish Argimpaei and the Tibetan Issedones, and their neighbours the Ariamaspæ, fighting with griffins for the possession of gold.

The Scythians do not seem to have been driven out of their home in S. Russia, but rather to have been absorbed in the Sarmatian and then in the Slavonic tribes.

The eastern branch of the people was not allowed undisturbed possession of its lands N. of the Jaxartes. Already in the time of Cyrus and Darius a part of the Scythians had been pressed into Margiana (see § 17), and at the end of the third century another part was forced by the Massagetæ into S. Sogdiana, and somewhat later into Bactria. In Bactria these Scythians found only a temporary home, as they were driven from there by the Massagetæ (Yuechi); but they maintained themselves longer farther east.

In S. Kabulistan, Arachosia, Drangiana, and Sakestan (Kipin), and in Kašmir, Nepal, and Punjab they established themselves. Finally, they were there also submerged by new powers and absorbed in the native population.

That the Scythians spoke an Iranian language, is already evident from Herod. 4 117, where the Sauromatæ, a Median people, are said to speak the Scythian language, though in an imperfect manner. The Scythian words explained by Herodotus are manifestly Iranian, and the many names of persons and places recorded by Greek writers and in the Olbian inscriptions leave no room for doubt. It is the merit particularly of Zeuss and Müllenhoff to have proved conclusively the Iranian character of Scythian speech. That the Eastern Scythians spoke substantially the same language is evident not least from the names of the Çaka kings in India (see Hoffmann, Syrische Akten persischer Märtyrer, 139 ff.).

11. Language and ethnic relations.

An occasional Scythian loan-word in a neighbouring Slavonic or Turkish dialect cannot affect this result. The discussions of Neumann, Cuno, Fressl, and others, who have tried to invalidate the arguments of Zeuss, would have proved quite futile even if their philological method had been more discriminating. Still, it should not be denied that neighbouring dialects of the same family have a tendency to shade off into each other.

For determining the ethnic relations of the Scythians the pictorial representations on objects found at Kertsch, Kum Olba, and elsewhere on the Kimmerian Bosphorus are of utmost importance.

As the best of these are not later than the fourth century B.C., and were probably made for Scolotian grandees (see Rayet, Études d'archéologie, 196 ff.), they may be taken to represent fairly the Scythian type. The similarity to Russian mujiks, in dress, hair, beard, and general appearance, due to climatic conditions and the same mode of life, cannot obscure the fact that the features are essentially Iranian. If they all should prove to be likenesses of Sarmatians, as the later ones probably are, this would not weaken the conclusion, since the Iranian character of the Sarmatians admits of no doubt.

Through Herodotus we know that the Scythians worshipped

Tabiti (Ἰστίη, Vesta), goddess of the fire; Papæus (probably Papai or Babai, Zeus), the heaven-father;

12. Religion. Api (γῆ), the earth; Oitosyrus (Apollo, possibly descriptive name of Mithra), the Sun; Artimpasa (Aphrodite Urania), Venus; Thamisadas (Poseidon), the Sea; Herakles and Ares.

The Scythians had no images, or altars, or temples. Their chief sacrifices were horses, which they offered in a peculiar manner; but prisoners in war were also at times offered. Only the god of war had a few great shrines. There is evidence of ancestral cults. Divination by rods or linden bark was practised, and the soothsayers formed distinct classes. A comparison with Persian divinities and religious customs shows a remarkable similarity. Whilst a heptad of divinities occurs (Ἀβδαρδα), there is no trace of Ahura Mazda. Whether any of the E. Scythians accepted the Mazdayasnian faith, is not known.

Buddhism may have made some progress among the Sse in Kipin and Punjab; but the Yuechi king Kaniška (78 A.D.) seems to have been the first monarch officially to embrace that form of religion.

13. Character and civilisation. The earlier Greek writers speak in terms of high praise of the character of the Scythians, giving instances of their justice, sincerity, love of truth, and sharp intelligence.

It is possible, however, that these descriptions have to some extent been coloured by à priori reasoning as to the virtues of a nomadic life, such as may still be found in modern works. On the other hand, the less flattering tone of later authors was, no doubt, due in no small measure to their confusion of the Scythians with their ruder Slavonic, Finno-Ugric, and Turkish neighbours. In Roman times, the conflicts with the Sarmatians naturally added bitterness to the references to Scythians.

The Scythians probably possessed, in addition to the general characteristics of all Iranian peoples, some qualities peculiar to that nomadic life so large a part of them continued to lead. The rôle which the Aškuza played in Asia, at a time when the Assyrian empire had reached its greatest extent, and in the days of its decadence, indicates a somewhat highly developed political organisation and a certain adaptability to conditions of settled life, sagacity as well as energy, diplomacy not less than enterprise.

In Russia the long contact of the Scythians with Greek civilisation, at a time when it had attained its very highest development, could not but exercise a profound influence upon them. The antiquities found on the Kimmerian Bosphorus, now in the Hermitage in St. Petersburg, amply prove what the tastes of Scythian lords were and what enviable means they had of gratifying them. One class of these finds probably represents the work of native artists trained upon Grecian models. These Scythian masters produced a type of art the influence of which may be traced beyond (N. of) the Baltic. Since some tribes had for centuries cultivated the soil, and large numbers of Scythians lived in cities, many nobles undoubtedly had their residences built by Greek architects. King Skyles had a palace in Olbia. Concerning their industrial skill, we have no information, except that they excelled in metallurgy. In Bactria the Scythians became the heirs of another Greek civilisation; and in India they evidently adapted themselves to native and Greek traditions, not without themselves exerting an influence upon the life of Punjab and Sindh.

14. History: earliest period. Concerning the period in which the Scythians still had for their neighbours in the Airyanem Vaejo (Vendidad, 1) the other branches of the Iranian family, before these had passed into Sogdiana, Margiana, Bactria, Hyrcania, Herat, and Kabul, we possess no direct information. The presence of Iranian names in the Amarna Tablets and early Assyrian and Egyptian inscriptions indicated by Ball (PSBA, 1882, pp, 424 ff.), Bezold-Budge (Tell el Amarna Tablets, 1892, p. xiv), Rost (MVAG, 1897), and especially Hommel (Sitz.-ber. Böhm. Ges. d. Wiss. 1898), seems to show that Anatolia, Mesopotamia, Syria, and Elam had already become acquainted with some members of the Iranian family in the sixteenth century B.C.

According to the native tradition of the Scoloti found in Olbia by Herodotus (4 7), the first king of Scythia, Targitaus, reigned 1000 years before Darius Hystaspis 'and no more.' We have no means of determining on what data this computation rests, and its historical value appears doubtful, Targitaus himself being probably a mythical personage. Hommel connects this story with the accounts of a Scythian conquest as far as the Nile and an invasion of Asia to the borders of Syria by an Amazonian queen (Diodorus, 2 43 46), and regards Strabo's (15 1 6) Idanthyrsus as a mistake for Targitaus. But it is probable that the accounts in Diodorus are only reflections of the invasion in the time of Psammetichus, and that Idanthyrsus has in Strabo received credit for the work accomplished by Madyas. The narratives of the conquest of Scythia by Sesostris (Ramessu II.) are clearly late exaggerations; but Hommel's notable theory, accounting for Iranian names in Kadavaduna (=Cappadocia, a country closely allied to the centre of Hittite power, Melitene, and Cilicia; see Müller, Asien, 288, 335) by the Scythian character of its people, also tends to explain this confusion of Hittite and Scythian. The people called Gag may prove to be akin to the Kimmerians and forerunners of the Aškuza. As regards the history of the Scoloti in Russian Scythia before their contact with the Greeks in the seventh century, we have no information.

15. Asianic rule: Protothyas, Madyas. From tablets inscribed in the reign of Esarhaddon (681-668) we learn that Scythians had established themselves N. of Lake Urumiah. Fear is expressed lest the Scythians should break through Mannæan into Assyrian territory, the chief Išpakai is said to be an ally of the Mannæans, and king Bartatua (Protothyas) is referred to as seeking an alliance and the hand of Esarhaddon's daughter. That the alliance was concluded is highly probable, since in 625 Madyas, Protothyas' son, came to the aid of Assyria by defeating Cyaxares, who was besieging Nineveh, and by checking the advances of Psammetichus in Syria. In consideration of these services, it is natural that the suzerainty of Assyria over Urartu acknowledged by Sarduris III. should pass to Scythia, and that such states as Cappadocia, Commagene, and Melitene should become tributary. What the relation of Cilicia to the new power was, it would be interesting to know; but it cannot yet be discerned. The Median border states Atropatene, Matiene, and others are likely to have been subdued. From 625 to 597 Scythian rule in Asia Minor continued. Then the power was broken by Cyaxares. In 591 Scythian refugees from the Median court fled to Lydia for protection; but Scythians continued to live under Median and Persian domination in Asia Minor. There was a Sacastene in Cappadocia as well as in Armenia.

16. Scythians in Russia. Darius claims to have conquered the 'Saka beyond the Sea.' By these he means the Scythians N. of the Euxine. He probably also refers to them as the saka tigrakhuda, since the pictorial representations from the Kimmerian Bosporus show that these wore the Phrygian cap. It is to Darius' campaign into Russia in 512 that we owe the elaborate account of the Scythians by Herodotus. That Darius marched as far as to the Volga may be doubted, and some other points in the narrative are manifestly unhistorical.

There is no reason, however, to question the important rôle ascribed to Idanthyrsus, through whose adroit management of the defence Darius was frustrated in his object. His father Saulius seems to have already impressed himself upon the colonists, as his name is especially mentioned. No events of any importance, however, have been recorded by the Greek writers before Herodotus who refer to the Scythians. Whether the use by them of the name Scythian (Σκύθης) shows that their knowledge of the people was derived from the Aškuza of Asia Minor, or that Sku-za was as much a native designation of the people as Sko-lot, cannot be determined.

The Milesian colonists were, of course, tributary to the Scythian suzerain; but the relations seem to have been cordial.

Only when a king like Skylas forgot his native traditions to the extent of taking part in the Dionysiac orgies in Olbia, the Scythians resented his proceeding. Friendly relations also prevailed between Ariapeithes and Teres of Thrace, in the beginning of the fifth century. It is doubtful whether Spartacus (438-432), the founder of the Bosporanian kingdom, was a Greek or of mixed race. There are some indications that the king whose skeleton was found in a tomb at Kertsch (Panticapæum) had Scythian blood in his veins. The Spartacidæ were not a serious menace to Scythian power in the fourth century. Danger threatened first from Macedonia, whose ambitious ruler Philip invaded Scythia and killed in battle king Ateas in 339, and subsequently from the Sarmatians who crossed the Don and made themselves during the third century the most important people in the territory once claimed by the Scythians. In the beginning of the second century the German Bastarnians made their appearance. A Scythian reaction seems to have occurred under Scilurus who, however, was defeated by Mithridates VI., 105 B.C. After Mithridates (132-163) had conquered the country N. of the Euxine, he could lead armies of Scythians as well as Sarmatians, Bastarnians, and Thracians against the Romans. Later, the legionaries of Rome found Sarmatians as soon as they had crossed the Danube. Finally, the Scythians were absorbed in the prevailing Slavonic population.

17. Eastern Scythians. From their old home the eastern branch of this people was also driven by invaders across the Jaxartes into Chorasmia, Margiana, and Bactria. According to Ktesias, Cyrus fought against these Scythians, and forced Amorges to aid him in his war upon Crœsus (546). There is probably also a nucleus of truth in his account of Cyrus' war with the Derbikkæ, though he has wrongly connected his death with this war. There is no reason for doubting the substantial accuracy of Herodotus' account of his death in the war upon Tomyris, queen of the Massagetæ, though there are as usual some embellishments. The grounds on which Duncker rejected this story are quite insufficient.

Darius had to fight with Scythians whom he designates as Saka humavarka. These are probably identical with the Amyrgian Scythians. Fressl may be right in connecting both these words with Margiana. According to Fr. Müller (WZKM 7 258) they are the 'Soma-preparing Scythians'; but Ed. Meyer (GA 3 110 f.) doubts this interpretation. Scythian archers took part in the battle of Marathon, and were also in the army of Xerxes. Where their home was, is not indicated. Alexander came into contact with Scythians only after he had crossed the Jaxartes in Sogdiana. For some time before 138, Scythians had held possession of Margiana.

Through Chang-kian's account of his mission (in Ssematsien), it is possible to trace the political situation in Iran in 128, and to discern some of the events that led up to it. Pressed by the Hiungnu, a Turkish people, the Yuechi (probably Massagetæ) had forced the Szü (Çaka, Saka, Scythians) across the Jaxartes. In 175 the Szü conquered Sogdiana from Eucratides of Bactria. This king defended Bactria against their attack with the aid of Mithridates I. in 160. In 130 the Scythians took most of Bactria from Heliocles. But they were in their turn driven from Bactria, and fled into Kipin, Kashmir, Nepal, and India, where they established kingdoms. Maues reigned in Kipin and Punjab (130-110), Azes (110-80), and Aspavarma, Aziles, and Vanones after 80. Between 70 and 30 Spalahoras, Spalagdames, Spalyris, and Spalyrisis reigned in W. India, though their power was much limited by Hermaios. They were finally overthrown by Kadphizes I. (Kiutsiu-Kio), the founder of the Yuechi dynasty. This dynasty (until 116 A.D.), whose most famous king is Kaniṣhka (70-90 A.D.), was also designated as the Scythian (Çaka), and the Çaka-era begins with the year 78 A.D. The E. Scythians were confused with their kinsmen, the Massagetæ, and other neighbours in India, as the W. Scythians had been confused with their kinsmen, the Sarmatians, and other neighbours in Europe. In India, as in Afghanistan, the Scythians were absorbed in the native population.

SEA (יָם, yām; ΘΑΛΑϹϹΑ). See GEOGRAPHY, § 4; also DEAD SEA, GALILEE (Sea of), MEDITERRANEAN, RED SEA, SALT SEA.

SEA, THE BRAZEN (יָם הַנְּחֹשֶׁת; ΤΗΝ ΘΑΛΑϹϹΑΝ ΤΗΝ ΧΑΛΚΗΝ 2 K. 25 13 Jer. 52 17 [om. A] 1 Ch. 18 8), THE MOLTEN SEA (הַיָּם מוּצָק; ΤΗΝ ΘΑΛΑϹϹΑΝ [B], Τ. Θ. ΑΥΤΗΝ [A], Τ. Θ. ΧΥΤΗΝ [L], 1 K. 7 23; Τ. Θ. ΧΥΤΗΝ [BAL], 2 Ch. 4 2), or simply THE SEA (1 K. 7 44, 2 K. 16 17, 2 Ch. 4 15), the large bronze reservoir which stood in the SE. angle of the court of Solomon's temple.

1. Size and form. The designation 'sea' is explained by Josephus from the size (Ant. viii. 3 5; ἐκλήθη . . . θάλασσα διὰ τὸ μέγεθος). According to the description in 1 K. 7 23-26 the 'sea' was round, measuring 10 cubits (17.22 ft.[1]) in width and 5 (8.61) in depth; 'and a line of 30 cubits (𝔊BAL 33 cubits) compassed it round about.' These numbers are of course only approximate—not given with mathematical precision, otherwise to a diameter of 10 cubits would have corresponded a circumference of 31.4159... cubits; failure to observe this has caused commentators needless trouble. The capacity of the 'sea' (1 K. 7 26; 𝔊BL om.) was 2000 baths = 16,010 gallons (see WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 3). 2 Ch. gives 3000 baths (= 24,015 gallons), certainly an impossible figure, even that of 1 K. being too large for the data; a hemisphere of the dimensions given contains only 6376 gallons and a cylinder 10,798 gallons.[2] Even if, in view of what is said about the 12 oxen, we come to the conclusion that the 'sea' must have been more or less cylindrical in shape, not, as Josephus (Ant. viii. 3 5, τὸ ἡμισφαίριον) will have it, hemispherical, we can hardly suppose it to have held much more than (say) 7000 gallons. There is, however, no recorded ancient parallel even for such a casting. It is one of very considerable magnitude (great bell of Moscow 198 tons; great bell of St. Paul's—largest in England—17½ tons). The ancients no doubt usually did their large castings in pieces; but where possible they preferred hammered work. Solomon's 'sea' may, therefore, it has been suggested, have been a wooden vessel plated with bronze. On the notice in 1 K. 7 46 see ADAM, 1; and for a different view, SUCCOTH, 2.

As to the form of the 'sea' the only further data we have are that the brass was an handbreadth thick, that the brim was wrought like the brim of a cup, like the flower of lily, and that below the brim ran two rows of gourd-like ornaments פְּקָעִים[3] (see GOURD, end). These ornaments, as distinguished from those of the brazen pillars, were cast when the sea itself was cast; in other words we have to think of them as in relief, not as undercut. The sea rested upon 12 brazen oxen arranged in four groups facing the four quarters of the heavens.

On every other point worth knowing—the height of the oxen, the shape of the basin, and so forth—the writer is silent. Nor are we told in what manner the water was supplied or drawn; one naturally thinks of the temple spring or a conduit from it.

Klostermann satisfies our curiosity as to the mode of filling by conjectural emendation of 1 K. 7 23 where he reads 'There were 30 cocks around the sea; 20 were under the brim and supplied it, and at the bottom of the sea were 10 which drained it; the cocks were in two rows and their flow was according to their measure.' The Vss., however, supply no sort of hint towards any such emendation.

According to the Chronicler (2 Ch. 4 6) the sea was

[1] [On the assumption that by ammāh is meant the long cubit; see WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 1.]

[2] [Prof. Unwin, F.R.S., in a private communication, says: 'I make out that a hemispherical cup, 15 ft. external diameter and 4 ins. thick would require 113.5 cubic ft. of brass, and would weigh 26¼ tons. It would contain 770 cubic ft. or 4805 gallons of water, and this would weigh 21½ tons. A cylindrical vessel would weigh more and contain more—but the spherical shape is the most favourable for possibility.'] for the priests to wash in (cp Ex. 30 19); as to this, all one can say is that the arrangement would be in the highest degree inconvenient for any such purpose. Almost inevitably therefore one comes back to the conjecture that the sea itself had a symbolical meaning, as well as the oxen on which it rested. The oxen are to be explained not by the consideration that the ox was the principal sacrificial animal (so Riehm, HWB, s.v. 'Meer, ehernes') but rather by the symbolic character of the ox as representing deity, in Canaanitish-Israelitish religion. Kosters (cp Th. T, 1879, pp. 455 ff.) explains the sea itself as a symbol of the subterranean ocean, the tĕhōm. He recalls the many traces to be found in the OT of acquaintance with the Babylonian creation-myth and the struggle of the gods with Tiāmat (cp Gunkel, Schöpfung, 153, and see DRAGON, LEVIATHAN, RAHAB, SERPENT). It is this Tiāmat—who was held to represent the waters of chaos, and to have been vanquished by the gods—that according to Kosters was represented by the 'sea' upon the oxen (these last symbolising Marduk). In view of the admitted fact that the Babylonian creation-myth determined the form of the Israelitish cosmogony, one cannot deny that such a view may be correct, even though the OT itself does not directly support it. Cp CREATION, §§ 13, 19, 22; NEHUSHTAN, § 2.

[3] עֶשֶׂר בָּאַמָּה in 1 K. 7 24 is usually rendered 'ten in a cubit' (so RVmg. and AV), and accordingly the total number of gourds in each row reckoned to be 300. The words as they stand, however, can only mean 'in a length of 10 cubits'; but this gives no sense. The clause is (with Stade) to be deleted as a gloss (cp Benzinger, ad loc.).

2. Significance.

[Gunkel refers to the apsu, or primæval sea, made by king Ursina of Lagaš and the tâmtu, or sea, of Agum (1500 B.C.); cp KB iii. 1 13 143; Del. Ass. HWB 114; Muss-Arn. Dict. 80; Jensen, Kosmol. 233 ff., 511, and pl. 3. See also Sayce (Hibb. Lect., 1887, p. 63, and RP(2) 1 65), who points out the connection between the sea and the large basins called apsi in Babylonian temples. What this acute scholar did not remark was the connection of these basins with the Babylonian creation-myth, in which apsu (the απασων of Damascius; see CREATION, § 15, end) designates the ocean which 'in the beginning' was, or filled, all things.]

At all events no other satisfactory explanation has been proposed. How the worshippers of Yahwè interpreted or (if it came from Babylon) adapted this symbol, we have also no information from the OT. But that the original meaning of the 'sea' did not quite accord with later Yahwistic ideas, may be inferred with great probability from the fact that the later period either explained it in an impossible manner (so the Chronicler; see § 2, begin.) or eliminated it altogether. In Ex. 30 18 40 7 30, instead of the molten 'sea' P has merely a brazen laver or basin (כִּיּוֹר) for the priests to wash their hands and feet. So also the post-exilic temple has only a basin of the same sort, not to be compared in point of size with Solomon's 'sea.' In Ezekiel it would seem as if the temple fountain were to take the place of the molten sea, which does not otherwise seem to be represented in the temple; in its place we find a fountain to the E. of the temple (note the agreement, partly verbatim, between the expressions of 1 K. 7 39 and of Ezek. 47 1). As regards this fountain too we can see that it is not primarily intended to provide an arrangement for the priests to wash their hands, but has a symbolical meaning (see the comm. ad loc.).

Of Solomon's brazen sea we are further told that King Asa took it down from off the oxen, and put it upon a pavement of stones (see PAVEMENT). Like other brazen appurtenances of the temple, the oxen were made available for paying the tribute exacted by the king of Assyria (2 K. 16 17). The sea itself fell into the hands of the conquering Babylonians, who broke it in pieces and carried off the fragments (2 K. 25 13 16 Jer. 52 17 20—where the twelve oxen also are erroneously reckoned among the spoils of the Babylonians).

Mentioned also in other late passages—e.g., Is. 43 3 (with Mizraim and Cush), 45 14 (in pl., with same companions); Ps. 72 10 (with Sheba), where, however, Bickell, Cheyne, Ps.(2), regard it as a later insertion. This last passage may simply indicate a locality in the far S.; the other passages favour Africa, and the neighbourhood of Ethiopia (but cp CUSH, 2). Dillmann (on Gen. 10 7) thinks it safest to regard Seba as a branch of the Cushites or Ethiopians settled eastward from Napata, on the Red Sea or Arabian Gulf, a view which Baethgen (on Ps. 72 10) and Duhm (on Is. 43 3) accept.

The name is not found in Egyptian; but Dillmann cites τὸ σαβαϊτικὸν στόμα, λιμὴν Σαβα, Σαβαι πόλις εὐμεγέθης, from Strabo, xvi. 4 8 10 and Σαβαστρικὸν στόμα, σαβατ πόλις ἐν τῷ Ἀδουμικῷ κόλπῳ from Ptol. iv. 7 7 f.; Josephus, and many following him, identify with Meroë; but this does not seem to be elsewhere distinguished from Cush. Assuming the ordinary view of the sites mentioned in Josh. 15 61 f. (see BETH-ARABAH), we might suppose Secacah to be the name of a fort erected (with cisterns) on the plateau above the W. coast of the Dead Sea to keep the nomad tribes in check (cp 2 Ch. 26 10).

The caution, however, given elsewhere (MIDDIN, ad fin.) may be here repeated. P may have led subsequent ages into a great misunderstanding by putting 'En-gedi' for 'En-kadesh.' Secacah was probably a place in the far south (Negeb); possibly Khalaṣah is meant. See NIBSHAN. T. K. C.

On the name, see NAMES, § 57, and for S. Ar. analogies, Hommel, Südarab. Altertümer (1899), 21. But the theory that it is an ethnic like Jair, Hezron, and Machir is attractive. 𝔊[3] in 1 Ch. 2 21 f. implies שְׂרוּג, and this comes probably by transposition from גְּשׁוּר (cp SERUG). Abiram, the brother of 2, also probably bears an ethnic name. The name 'land of Seir' (אֶרֶץ שֵׂעִיר) also appears in Gen. 32 4 (J) 36 30 (P; where, however, 𝔊 has εδωμ [ADEL, B lacking]), and (often) simply 'Seir,' Judg. 5 4 Gen. 33 14 16 (J), Nu. 24 18 (JE; where, however, 𝔊 has ησαυ [BAFL]), Dt. 1 44 etc.

The mountain region of Seir (mod. eš-Šarāh) extends 15 or 20 m. E. from the 'Arabah (S. from the Dead Sea), which it skirts nearly to the Gulf of 'Aḳaba (the terms 'land of Seir' and 'Seir,' are sometimes applied to the plateau W. of the 'Arabah); Zimmern (ZA 6 257 n. 13) doubtfully suggests a connection with the district of Šeri mentioned (with Gintikirmil) in an Amarna letter from Jerusalem (Wi. KB 5 182 [B 105] 26). On early traces of the name Seir, and on its meaning, see EDOM, §§ 2, 3.
F. B.

'Edom' and 'Seir' are terms which are often used interchangeably as the designation of a region occupied by Esau and his descendants (Gen. 32 3 36 1 8 f. 19 21 43 Nu. 24 18 Dt. 2 5 8 29 Josh. 24 4). 'Mt. Seir,' the range of mountains running S. from the Dead Sea, on the E. of the 'Arabah, was a main feature of 'Edom' (Gen. 14 6 36 8 f. Dt. 2 8 Josh. 24 4); but 'Seir' (Gen. 33 14 Dt. 1 44) and 'the land of Seir' (an ancient variant to 'the country [or field] of Edom,' Gen. 32 3), are terms which are clearly not limited to, nor, indeed, are commonly, if ever, identical with, 'Mt. Seir' in the OT text. Sometimes שעיר 'Seir' appears to be miswritten for מצור, 'Miṣṣur' [Che.]. The practical question therefore is, What portion of the country westward of the 'Arabah was included in 'Seir' and in 'the country of Edom,' in the days of the Israelites' wanderings?[1] Cp EDOM, § 5. Trumbull answers, 'The extensive plain eṣ-Ṣīr, bounded on the S. by Wādy el-Fiḳreh, a wādy which ascends south-westerly from the 'Arabah, from a point not far S. of the Dead Sea, and separates Palestine proper from the 'Azāzimeh mountain-tract, or Jebel Maḳrāh group. The northern wall of this wādy is a bare and bald rampart of rock, forming a natural boundary as it 'goeth up to Seir'; a landmark both impressive and unique, which corresponds with all the OT mentions of the Mt. Halak', Kadesh-barnea, 99 f.[2] Cp HALAK, MOUNT.

[1] Trumbull, Kadesh-barnea, 84 f.
[2] See, further, Palmer, Desert of Exodus, 404 (es-Sirr), and note that Rowlands (Williams, Holy City, 1 465) had already connected 'Seir' with es-Serr (sic).

SEIR, MOUNT (הַר שֵׂעִיר; ορος ασσαρ [B], ο. ασσαρες [B[ab]], ο. σηειρ [A], ο. σιειρ [L]), one of the landmarks on the boundary between Judah and Benjamin (Josh. 15 10), between Kirjath-jearim and CHESALON [q.v.], and therefore in the neighbourhood of the rocky point of Sārīs, 2 m. W. by S. from Ḳaryet-el-'enab (so Robinson). With Sārīs may be identified the Sores of 𝔊, Josh. 15 60 (εωβης [B], σωρης [A], -εις [L]); see Buhl, Pal. 91 167, and BENJAMIN, JUDAH.

SEIRAH, but AV Seirath (הַשְּׂעִירָתָה), the place to which Ehud fled, where he 'blew the trumpet in the hill country of Ephraim' (Judg. 3 26, σετειρωθα [B],[1] σεειρωθα [A], σηρωθα [L]). The name has greatly puzzled critics.[2] Winckler (Alttest. Unt. 55 ff.) even supposed some unknown place on the E. of Jordan to be meant; in GI 2 100 he prefers the 'Mt. Seir' of Josh. 15 10. If, however, we use the key supplied by a number of the narratives, in which, as the evidence tends to show, the scene has been transferred from the Negeb to the tribal territory of Ephraim, we shall see a way out of this perplexity. Eglon was king of Miṣṣur, and the city he took was a place called Jerahmeel—i.e., either Jericho (see JERICHO, § 2) or more probably the capital of the Jerahmeelite Negeb (possibly Kadesh). After his exploit Ehud escaped to Zarephath (צרפתה), and mustered the Israelites who dwelt in the southern Ephraim—i.e., the Jerahmeelite highlands. Ehud himself was probably a Benjamite of the Negeb.

SELA, or (AV 2 K.) Selah, or once [see § 2] PETRA (סֶלַע, πετρα in Is.; הַסֶּלַע, η πετρα in Judg. 2 K.), Judg. 1 36 (RV[mg.]) 2 K. 14 7 (EV) Is. 16 1 (AV[mg.] Petra) 42 11 (Hitz., Del., Duhm). Commonly supposed to be the Hebrew name of the later city of Petra (see § 2). The name of Séla' indeed is parallel to the Arabic name Sal', which Yāḳūt gives to a fortress in the Wādy Mūsā, where Petra stood (cp Nöld. ZDMG 25 259).[3] Wetzstein (in Del. Jes.(3) 696 ff.) thinks that Séla' is another name for BOZRAH [q.v.]; the full name of the Edomite capital being Bozrath has-séla', a view which has not much to recommend it. Nor is the simpler view that a city on the site of Petra was known to the Hebrews as Séla' or has-séla' ('the rock') exegetically tenable; there is in fact no city called Séla' mentioned in the OT. See, however, EDOM, § 7.

1. No city called Sela in OT.

'From Séla',' (מֵהַסֶּלַע), in Judg. 1 36 should rather be 'from the rock' (הַסֶּלַע); the reference may be to some striking cliff near the S. end of the Dead Sea, fitted to be a landmark, such as that now called eṣ-Ṣāfieh (so Buhl, Moore). In 2 K. 14 7, it may be 'some castle on a rock unknown to us' (Kittel) that is referred to. In Is. 16 1 מִסֶּלַע, 'from the rocks' (collectively; cp Jer. 48 28), is generally taken to describe the route taken by the Moabite ambassadors, which would run through the rocky country of Edom. Is. 42 11 should be rendered 'Let the inhabitants of the rocks (סלע collectively) sing'; cp Ob. 3. It should be added, however, that though as against 'Séla'' the above summary of current interpretations will stand, the views of the geography of the texts which are proposed seem open to question. The redactors themselves were sometimes the authors of confusion (see Crit. Bib.).

Of all these passages the only one which can with any plausibility be thought to refer to Petra is 2 K. 14 7. But in the ‖ passage, 2 Ch. 25 12, we only read of a 'rock,' nor does Joktheel occur anywhere as the name of an Edomite city; JOKTHEEL [q.v.] is very probably connected with 'Maacath' or 'Jeraḥmeel.' The misinterpretation (for such, as Kittel has shown, it is) arose partly from the supposed mention of the Edomites, partly from the comparatively early confusion between Petra and Kadesh. Eus. and Jer. (OS 286 71 145 9) distinctly assert that Petra, a city of Arabia in the land of Edom, surnamed Joktheel, is called Rekem by the Assyrians (so Eus., but Jer. 'Syrians'). Still, as elsewhere they appeal to Jos., they may not be speaking here on their own authority. Jos. (Ant. iv. 4 7 7 1) says that Petra, the capital of Arabia, was called αρκη or ρεκεμη from its founder Rekem, a Midianite king. But Targ. Onk. and Targ. Jon. apply רקם to Kadesh-'barnea,' Gen. 16 14 20 1. רקם is supposed to be connected with √רגם, 'to stone'; it is probably, however, as applied to Kadesh, a corrupt fragment of 'Jeraḥmeel,' whilst, as applied to Petra, it may perhaps, as Wetzstein suggests, be derived from the Greek ῥῆγμα, 'a cleft in the rocks.'

Wellhausen (De Gentibus [1870], 39, n. 2) doubts whether Rekem as the name of Petra is derived from the variegated colours of the rocks about Wādy Mūsā or from a tribe dwelling in the Edomite region called Rekem, and virtually mentioned in 1 Ch. 2 44. The present writer is convinced, however, that the REKEM of Chronicles, which is the name of a tribe of S. Palestine, is really a mutilation of Jeraḥmeel.

2. Petra. Petra (ἡ Πέτρα; αἱ Πέτραι), however, which gave its name to the province Arabia Petræa (ἡ κατὰ Πέτραν Ἀραβία, Agathemerus), became famous under the NABATÆANS (q.v.); but, to judge from the advantages of its situation, it was doubtless a city or fortress before that time. Its ruins are in the deep valley called Wādy Mūsā (from its connection in in Mohammedan legend with Moses), which is in the mountains forming the eastern wall of the great valley between the Dead Sea and the Gulf of 'Aḳaba. Wādy Mūsā lies just N. of the watershed between the two seas, in 30° 19′ N. lat. and 35° 31′ E. long.[1] Travellers coming up the 'Arabah usually approach the ruins from the SW. by a rough path, partly of artificial construction;[2] but the natural entrance is from the E. down a narrow defile more than a mile long called the Sīk ('shaft'). The Sīk is a contraction in the valley of a stream which comes down from the E., rising in the so-called Fountain of Moses ('Ain Mūsā),[3] and passing between the villages of Eljī and 'Aireh (Palmer). Both these places are ancient; the latter is the fortress Wo-'aira of Yāḳūt,[4] whilst Eljī, mentioned by Edrīsi, is the 'Gaia urbs juxta civitatem Petram' of the Onomasticon.[5] Below these and above the ravine the characteristic rock-cut tombs and dwellings of the Nabatæans begin to appear.

Not only was Petra a place of refuge and a safe storehouse, it was also the great centre of the Nabatæan caravan trade. It was the place where the Gaza road branched off from that to Bostra, Palmyra, and N. Syria, and it commanded the route from Egypt to Damascus. From Petra, too, there went a great route direct through the desert to the head of the Persian Gulf. Thus Petra became a centre for all the main lines of overland trade between the E. and the W., and it was not till the fall of the Nabatæan kingdom that Palmyra superseded it as the chief emporium of N. Arabia.

SELA-HAMMAHLEKOTH (סֶלַע הַמַּחְלְקוֹת; πετρα η μεριcθειcα [BAL]; cp Driver's note), the name of a mountain where Saul and David 'played hide and seek' (1 S. 23 28 f.). Saul hurries along on one side of the mountain, thinking to overtake the unseen David, and David on the other flies (as he thinks) before the unseen Saul. There is danger of their coming into collision, which is averted by the news of an inroad of the Philistines; Saul turns aside from the chase. The narrator must have explained Séla'-hammaḥlĕḳōth so as to suggest this 'hide and seek' game. But neither 'rock of divisions' (EVmg.), nor 'rock of escaping' (an unjustifiable rendering) can be right. Though the name is confirmed on the whole by the certainly corrupt form חכילה (see HACHILAH), we are almost driven to suppose that the original form was סֶלַע הַמְּחֹלוֹת, 'the rock of the mĕḥōlōth' (circling dances). Meholah, like Hachilah, may come from 'Jerahmeel.' T. K. C.

SELAH (סֶלָה) occurs seventy-one times in forty psalms, and three times in Habakkuk (3 3 9 13). Mostly

1. Data of MT and versions. it occurs in the middle of a psalm; but in four psalms (3 9 24 46) also at the end. Usually it occurs only once in a psalm; but there are several cases of two Selahs, and in some psalms we find three (3 32 46 66 68 77 140); Ps. 89 actually presents four. In 55 20 [19] 57 4 [3] Hab. 3 39 Selah occurs in the middle of a verse. The accents connect it closely with the preceding word; Aq., Jer., Tg. also imply that it forms part of the text. These three versions take it to mean 'always' (ἀεί, semper and jugiter, לעלמין, but also תדירא). So Ps. 9 17, Theod. and ἄλλος give ἀεί; Quinta εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας; Sexta διαπαντός. 𝔊, however, gives διάψαλμα, a word of somewhat uncertain signification (Theodoret, μέλους μεταβολή); it occurs more frequently than the Hebrew 'Selah.'

Various conjectures as to the etymology of Selah have been offered (see Ges. Thes. 955; and the commentaries

2. Use and meaning. of Delitzsch and Baethgen); even a Greek origin (ψάλλε) has been suggested (Paulus Cassel; see Siegfried-Stade, Lex.). Parisot (Rev. bibl., Oct. 1899) approves the theory that Selah represents a musical interlude. Briggs suggests that when a section of a psalm or a prayer was used apart from its context in liturgical service it was followed by a doxology, and that 'Selah' divides a psalm into sections for liturgical use.[1] By an inductive process Miss E. Briggs arrives at results of much interest (AJSL 16 1-29). These partly depend on the correctness of the MT; but Grimme has shown that in some cases (and the present writer, Che. Ps.(2), has added considerably to the number) the סלה of MT is due to corruption of the text.

Attractive as the view that סלה is properly a musical indication may be, it will have to be reconsidered if

3. Conjectured origin. the other so-called musical notes in the headings owe their existence to textual corruption. In that case it becomes plausible to hold that סלה is a corruption of šallēm (שַׁלֵּם), 'supplement,' or lĕšallēm (לְשַׁלֵּם), 'for supplementing.' The note may either be a direction to supplement the MS at a defective place from another MS, or an intimation that an editor at this point has made an insertion in the psalms. Possibly the old traditional interpretation 'always' points to a reading עלם or לעלם, which was itself a corruption of שַׁלֵּם or לְשַׁלֵּם. For another view see B. Jacob, ZATW 16 129 ff.

As to the meaning of 𝔊's διάψαλμα: for the opinions of the Fathers see Suicer, 1 890; Lag., Novæ Psalterii Græci Editionis Specimen, 10; B. Jacob, ZATW 16 (1896) 173-181. The result is that all the various explanations are pure guesses. What, then, is to be offered in place of them? We cannot suppose that the Alexandrian translators coined διάψαλμα; but it is very possible indeed that διάψ. only exists through textual corruption. διχάψαλμα and ἀνάψαλμα have been suggested (ap. Schultens, Lex. in LXX [1820] 1 146), but neither word exists. It remained to suggest that διάψ. may be a Græcised Hebrew word; לשלם (see above) might become first δασαλμα and then, for euphony, διάψαλμα. T. K. C.

[1] The latitude and longitude are taken from De Luynes's map. Ptolemy, who, according to Olympiodorus, spent some time in Petra, and doubtless owes to this fact his excellent information about the caravan-routes in Arabia, gives the latitude, with surprising accuracy, as 30° 20′.

[3] This seems to be the fountain mentioned by Nowairi (in Quatremère's Mélanges, 84), which flowed with blood and was changed to water by Moses. The name Od-demā, which gave rise to this legend, may possibly be a relic of the old name of Edom.

SELEUCIA (сελευкιа, Acts 13 4, Ti. WH; 1 Macc. 11 8). One of the four chief cities of northern Syria (the others being Antioch on the Orontes, Apameia, and Laodiceia) which together were spoken of as the tetrapolis of Seleucis (Strabo, 749). They were the foundation of Seleucus Nicator (died 280 B.C.). Seleucia lay on the southern skirts of Mt. Coryphæus (the Pieria of Strabo, 751)—a spur of Mt. Amanus[1]—separated from it by a ravine (see description in Pol. 5 59). The town extended to the sea, and was surrounded by cliffs, except towards the W., where the site was more open; here lay the mercantile buildings (ἐμπορεῖα). The upper town could be reached only, from the seaward side, by an artificial ascent cut in the rock like a stair (κλιμακωτήν). Seleucia was the port of Antioch, which was distant 16 m. by land; the distance by the Orontes, which fell into the sea about 5 m. to the southward of Seleucia, was still greater (Strabo, 751). Being strongly fortified (Strabo, 751, ἔρυμα ἀξιόλογον καὶ κρεῖττον βίας) Seleucia was the key of Syria (cp Pol. 5 58). In 1 Macc. 11 8 there is a reference to the capture of 'Seleucia which is by the sea' by Ptolemy Philometor VI. (146 B.C.). Its remains are still great. In consequence of the resistance it made to Tigranes, the Roman Pompeius declared it a free city, and this was its condition in Paul's time (Pliny, HN 5 18).

Paul, with Barnabas, sailed from Seleucia on his first missionary enterprise (Acts 13 4), and to Seleucia in all probability he returned (Acts. 14 26; for the expression 'sailed to Antioch' need not imply a voyage up the river: cp the expression 'sailed away from Philippi' in Acts 20 6). Probably also Paul's passage through Seleucia is implied in such places as Acts 15 39, and 15 30 (with which contrast the land journey summarised in 15 3). In this connection it is interesting to note that two piers of the old harbour bear the names of Paul and Barnabas, with whose work they are probably coeval. W. J. W.

[1] Hence the town was called Σελεύκεια Πιερία, or Σελεύκεια ἡ ἐν Πιερίᾳ, to distinguish it from other towns of the same name (Strabo, 749).

1. Origin.

'Seleucidæ' is the general name applied to the kings of Syria, who were so called from Seleucus I., the founder of the monarchy. This empire is alluded to as 'the kingdom of the Greeks' in 1 Macc. 1 10 8 18, and in the phrase 'the diadem of Asia' in 1 Macc. 11 13. The Syrian kings claimed to rule over the Asiatic portion of Alexander's empire, and to interfere in the affairs of every country from the Hellespont to India; but the territorial limits were gradually reduced, the border-lands of India being first lost, and then Asia Minor and Egypt effecting their withdrawal from Seleucid sway. Egypt under the Ptolemaic dynasty became in fact a standing rival, disputing with the Seleucidæ the possession of Palestine. The hold of the Seleucidæ upon Asia Minor was precarious, owing to the peculiar characteristics of the Greek cities there, and the rise of new powers (e.g., Pergamos and the Attalid dynasty). Here nothing can be attempted more than a few general remarks upon salient features of the monarchy. Syria was its intellectual centre; for Seleucus abandoned his capital at Babylon (which was in truth suitable only for the undivided world-wide empire dreamed of by Alexander), and transferred his permanent abode to Antioch on the Orontes (see ANTIOCH, 2). This transference also calls attention to the constant striving, as constantly thwarted, of the Syrian empire, to become, not so much a military, as a naval power. Its wealth, indeed, came from commerce, which partly depended upon command of the sea, and partly also upon keeping open the old trade routes leading into inner Asia. The latter condition was found to be more easily realised than the former, for the rise of Egypt and of Rhodes, with other powers, prevented the realisation of the designs of the Syrian dynasty. As regards its internal characteristics, the Seleucid empire is well described by Holm (Gk. Hist. ET 4 112) as an artificial creation—in its essence an attempt to found in the E. a state based on Greek views. 'That Seleucus tried to promote the Hellenising of Asia in the spirit of Alexander appears from the many cities (about 75) which he founded'; and the progress of Greek life is seen from the fact that eventually Syria proper breaks up into a number of city communities almost entirely. It is precisely through their continuation of Alexander's work on this line, of controlling Asia by a policy based upon a preference given to the Graeco-Macedonian civilisation, that the Seleucidæ come into violent contact with the peculiar institutions of the Jews. It was especially in Seleucia on the Tigris that the Greek life of Mesopotamia and Babylonia centred, to such an extent that this city completely overshadows the other Greek communities in these regions.

2. Seleucus I. 312-280 B.C.

Seleucus I., Nicator (312-280 B.C.), one of the best of Alexander's generals, was made chiliarch by Perdiccas upon Alexander's death. Perdiccas invaded Egypt, and being checked upon the Nile by Ptolemy was murdered by his own officers, among them being Seleucus. Subsequently Babylon was assigned to Seleucus; but he was soon compelled to flee for his life from his satrapy, to avoid Antigonus, and took refuge with Ptolemy (316 B.C., cp App. Syr. 53). In the war with Antigonus that followed, Seleucus bore a distinguished part, at first as commander of Ptolemy's fleet, and afterwards in the operations in Syria which culminated in the battle of Gaza (312 B.C.), in which Demetrius, the son of Antigonus, was completely defeated. Seleucus in consequence with a small force recovered his satrapy, and the era of the Seleucids dated from the capture of Babylon (1st Oct. 312 B.C.).

The career of Seleucus is very obscure during the ten years which followed; his name is not even mentioned in the peace concluded in 311 B.C. between Ptolemy Cassander and Lysimachus on the one side, and Antigonus on the other; but the record of that peace may be incomplete. It seems clear, at any rate, that Seleucus was left to extend his conquests in the E. undisturbed, and that in a series of successful campaigns he recovered all the eastern provinces of Alexander's empire between the Euphrates, the Oxus, and the Indus. He was obliged, however, to acquiesce in the cession of the territories beyond the Indus to king Tchandragupta (Sandracottus, Strabo, 724) in return for five hundred war-elephants.

In 306 B.C. Seleucus followed the example of Antigonus and Demetrius in adopting the title of 'king'; and from that date his coins are so inscribed, whilst Alexander's types are gradually abandoned in favour of new devices, such as his own head with bull's horn—an emblem of divine strength, probably also bearing allusion to the story told by Appian (Syr. 57); as an adjunct symbol in the field occurs an anchor, the badge of the family (cp Justin, 15 4).

When Ptolemy Cassander and Lysimachus again combined against Antigonus, Seleucus also joined the coalition, and was largely instrumental in winning the decisive victory at Ipsus in which Antigonus fell (301 B.C.). Seleucus consequently received a great extension of territory—all Syria, and Asia Minor as far as Phrygia (with the exception also of Cilicia). Hence the Seleucidæ are spoken of as kings of Asia (e.g., 1 Macc. 8 6; though in other passages, such as 1 Macc. 11 13, it is doubtful whether the term Asia should be restricted to Asia Minor).

Seleucus reigned over the largest kingdom that had been carved out of Alexander's empire. The direct government of the provinces beyond the Euphrates was in the hands of his son Antiochus. In 281 B.C., by the defeat of king Lysimachus at Korupedion in Phrygia, Seleucus became heir by gage of battle to the crowns of Thrace and Macedonia, and appears to have intended to hand over his Asiatic possessions to his son, and spend the remainder of his life (he was now about seventy-two years old) as ruler of his native country, Macedonia, from which he had been so long absent. He set out for Europe, but was murdered at Lysimachia by Ptolemy Ceraunus, the exiled elder son of Ptolemy I. Ceraunus took possession of Thrace and Macedonia; Antiochus succeeded to his father's Asiatic sovereignty.

Seleucus was undoubtedly an able administrator of what his generalship secured for him. He was a patron of art, fostered trade, and by his foundation of many cities encouraged the spread of Hellenic civilisation through his dominions; he was, in fact, perhaps the only one of Alexander's successors that showed an appreciation of Alexander's true policy ('I should be inclined to call him a true disciple of Alexander,' Holm, Gk. Hist., ET, 4 131).

Not much is known of the reign of his successor, Antiochus I., Soter (281-261 B.C.). It was occupied partly with attempts to assert himself in Asia Minor, as a prelude to making good his claims to the Macedonian crown, and partly in endeavours to render effective the Syrian rule over Cœlesyria, as against the claims of Egypt to those territories (the so-called First Syrian War).[1] In Asia Minor he was defeated by the Bithynians, at the beginning of his reign; and by Eumenes, king of Pergamum, towards the end of it.[2] The intermediate years show him engaged in warfare with the Gauls who poured into Asia Minor (277 B.C.) and founded the state of Galatia (see GALATIA, § 1). He won a victory over them (App. Syr. 65), and in consequence assumed, or was given, the honourable title of Soter ('Saviour') and a festival was founded in his honour.[3]

3. Antiochus I. (281-261 B.C.).

In 261 B.C. Antiochus was killed in battle by a Gaul (Celt); but whether he was actually then fighting the Celtic invaders is doubtful. He seems to have been a brave and energetic prince; history knows nothing to his discredit, and he deserves praise for his attempts to carry on his father's Grecising policy by means of city foundations.

Antiochus II., Theos (261-246 B.C.), son of the preceding and Stratonice, married Laodice, daughter of Antiochus I. by another wife (Polyæn. 8 50).

4. Antiochus II. (261-246 B.C.).

Practically our knowledge of him is confined to the statements that 'he was a debauchee and addicted to drink, that he left affairs in the hands of unworthy favourites, that he waged war in Thrace, that he earned his surname by liberating the Milesians from their tyrant Timarchus, and that he was generally popular in the cities of Ionia' (Holm, op. cit. 4 188).

Of the second Syrian war which he waged with Ptolemy Philadelphus, we know little. This led indirectly to his death; for to put an end to the strife Ptolemy gave his daughter Berenice in marriage to Antiochus, who put away Laodice. After a time, however, Antiochus changed his mind and recalled Laodice, who immediately poisoned him and murdered Berenice and her infant son, and her own son ascended the vacant throne. It has, however, been suggested that this dark history was an invention of the Egyptian partizans of Berenice, and that Antiochus really died a natural death. According to the traditional interpretation, Dan. 11 6 refers to this king (Jerome, in loc.); but the text is corrupt (see DANIEL, § 6 f.).

Seleucus II., Callinicus[1] (246-226 B.C.), was the eldest son of the preceding by his first wife, Laodice. From the moment of his accession Seleucus II. was engaged in warfare with Ptolemy III. Euergetes, who invaded Syria to avenge the death of his sister Berenice (the third Syrian War). This war is as mysterious in its course and results as the two previous conflicts between Egypt and Syria. Ptolemy, we learn, drove Seleucus beyond the Taurus, captured Antioch, made himself master of Syria and Phœnicia, and penetrated even beyond the Euphrates; the Egyptian successes are sketched in even more extravagant terms, which make them tantamount to the recovery of all Alexander's empire.[2] Seleucus summoned to his aid his younger brother Antiochus Hierax, promising him the regency of Asia Minor. Ptolemy was indeed obliged to consent to a peace; but Seleucus soon found himself at war with his own brother (Justin, 27 2). Antiochus was at first victorious, with the help of the Galatai (Celts); but they deserted him, and when their co-operation was again bought, both they and Antiochus suffered repeated defeats at the hands of Attalus of Pergamum, who seized the opportunity of the strife between the two brothers to strengthen his own position in Asia Minor. Antiochus Hierax was at last driven from the country into Egypt; but Ptolemy imprisoned him, and when he escaped he was slain by brigands (227 B.C., Justin, 27 3).

5. Seleucus II. (246-226 B.C.).

Seleucus apparently owed his title Callinicus to an eastern expedition in which he vanquished Arsaces of Parthia (Strabo, 513; Justin, 41 4). Afterwards, however, Arsaces defeated Seleucus in a great battle which the Parthians long celebrated as the foundation of their independence. 'The title to the surname of Callinicus was therefore as well made out as is necessary for an Oriental monarch, and the subsequent foundation of a city called Callinicum in his hereditary territory on the Euphrates by the hero who had been fortunate enough to escape from the Parthians, no doubt made a great impression on the surrounding inhabitants' (Holm, op. cit. 4 215).

In 226 B.C. Seleucus lost his life by a fall from his horse.

Seleucus III., Ceraunus, or Soter (226-223 B.C.), was the elder son and successor of Seleucus II. He invaded Asia Minor in order to put down Attalus. He was assisted by his skilful and energetic relative Achæus. Soon, however, he was murdered by one Nicanor and a Gaul named Apaturius (Polyb. 4 48).

6. Seleucus III. (226-223 B.C.).

Seleucus III. seems to have left a son Antiochus, mentioned only in an inscription, to whom are attributed coins bearing on one side the image of an infant Antiochus (see Head, op. cit. 640, and cp CIG 4458, and Droysen, Gesch. d. Hell. iii. 2 121).

Antiochus III., the Great (222-187 B.C.), the younger son of Seleucus Callinicus and Laodice (Pol. 5 40), was only twenty years old when he came to the throne, and for some time he was entirely under the influence of his minister Hermeas. The condition of Egypt, then governed by Ptolemy IV. Philopator, a weak and vicious monarch, invited attack. A rebellion in Persis and Media weakened the blow; but when that had been put down, and the king had freed himself from the evil influence of Hermeas by executing him (Pol. 5 56) the war with Egypt was resumed. At first

1 Alluded to only in Paus. i. 7 3.

2 See Strabo, 624. It occurred near Sardis.

3 See decree of thanksgiving from Novum Ilium, CIG 3595 = Hicks, Manual, no. 165, with notes thereto added.

1 He was also called Pogon, the Bearded, from his habit of wearing a beard, which, like Demetrius II., the only other bearded king of Syria, he probably adopted during his sojourn in Parthia (cp Head, Hist. Numm. 639).

2 See the Adule inscription preserved by Cosmas Indicopleustes in his Topographia Christiana = CIG 5127 (and cp Jer. on Dan. 11 5; also Polyæn. 8 50, who says that he pushed his conquests μέχρι τῆς Ἰνδικῆς).

Antiochus carried all before him, and made himself master of Phœnicia and the territory on both sides of the Jordan (Pol. 5 68 f.), and wintered in Ptolemais. In the following year, however, he was utterly defeated at Raphia, the most southerly Syrian city (217 B.C.), and compelled to cede to Egypt all Cœlesyria and Phœnicia. In the meantime Achæus had raised the standard of revolt in Asia Minor, and it cost a two years' warfare round Sardis to overcome him (Pol. 7 15 f.).

Then followed an expedition to the east, in which Parthia and Bactria were invaded; these successes gained the king his surname (209 B.C.). When Ptolemy Philopator died and Ptolemy V. Epiphanes ascended the throne (204 B.C.), Antiochus III. combined with Philip V. king of Macedonia, for the partition of the Egyptian kingdom (Livy, 31 14; Pol. 15 20). In pursuance of the scheme Antiochus invaded Cœlesyria and Phœnicia, and overran Palestine (Jos. Ant. xii. 3 3); and though a diversion caused by Attalus of Pergamum enabled the Egyptians to reoccupy Palestine, they were defeated (198 B.C.) by Antiochus himself near the sources of the Jordan, and driven out of the country. Jerusalem itself fell into the hands of Antiochus (Pol. 16 39). A peace was concluded in which it was agreed that Epiphanes should marry Antiochus' daughter, Cleopatra, who should receive Cœlesyria, Phœnicia, and Palestine as her dowry (on this peace, see Holm, op. cit. 4 339, and note on p. 368). Antiochus then commenced operations in Asia Minor, with a view of recovering the Greek cities there as a whole, and more especially those of the S. and W. coasts, which had long been reckoned to belong to Egypt, but had recently been occupied by Philip under the terms of the secret alliance with Syria above-mentioned.[1] The defeat of Philip by the Romans at Cynoscephalæ brought Antiochus also face to face with the power of Rome (197 B.C.).

Antiochus claimed not only sovereignty over the cities of Asia, but the throne of Thrace also, in virtue of the victory of Seleucus over Lysimachus a century before him. The tension between him and Rome was increased when Hannibal, a fugitive from Carthage, sought asylum at the Syrian court (App. Syr. 4). After long negotiations war was declared between the two powers in 191 B.C. The decisive battle took place in the autumn of 190 B.C. at Magnesia on the Hermus, and the motley host of Antiochus was utterly defeated; the Roman legions were never actually called upon, and the victory which gave them a third continent cost but 24 horsemen and 300 light infantry (Momms. Hist. of Rome, ET, 1881, 2 270 f.).[2] Allusion is made to these events in Dan. 11 10, and 1 Macc. 1 10 8 6 f. (see ANTIOCHUS, 1). Antiochus was compelled to renounce all his conquests N. of the Taurus range, which had in fact always been the boundary of effective Syrian power in this direction (Pol. 21 17; Diod. Sic. 29 10; Livy, 37 45). In consequence of this defeat and loss of prestige Armenia fell away from the Syrian empire (Strabo, 528). In 187 B.C. Antiochus himself, marching into Elymais, at the head of the Persian Gulf, in order to plunder a temple of Bel to replenish his treasury exhausted by the enormous war indemnity, was slain by the natives of the district (Strabo, 744).

8. Seleucus IV. (187-175 B.C.).

Seleucus IV., Philopator (187-175 B.C.), son and successor of Antiochus the Great, came to the throne in difficult times, when Armenia had already revolted and the prestige of his country was dimmed. The power of Rome also overshadowed the East, and freedom of policy was almost impossible. Thus he was compelled to forego the opportunity of interfering beyond Mt. Taurus, in assisting Pharnaces of Pontus against Eumenes of Pergamum (179 B.C., see Diod. Sic. 29 24). Yet he concluded a treaty of alliance with Perseus of Macedonia. With Egypt he lived outwardly at peace, though his minister HELIODORUS (q.v.) interfered in the affairs of Palestine. One APOLLONIUS (2), son of Thraseas, being governor (στρατηγός) of Cœlesyria and Phœnicia, induced the king to send Heliodorus his chancellor ('treasurer,' AV) to plunder the temple of Jerusalem.

[1] It was probably at this period, or perhaps earlier, that Antiochus sent 2000 Jewish families from Mesopotamia into the cities of Lydia and Phrygia, securing their loyalty by grants of land and immunity from taxation. See Jos. Ant. xii. 3 4.

[2] 'With the day of Magnesia Asia was erased from the list of great states; and never perhaps did a great power fall so rapidly, so thoroughly, and so ignominiously as the kingdom of the Seleucidæ under this Antiochus the Great' (Mommsen, l.c.).

SELEUCIDÆ

This attempt, and the supernatural (?) means by which it was baffled, are related in 2 Macc. 3 1 f. (cp 4 Macc. 4 1 f., where the attempt is ascribed to Apollonius himself). In 175 B.C. this Heliodorus murdered Seleucus, and tried to seize the Syrian throne, but was driven out by Eumenes and Attalus of Pergamum (Appian, Syr. 45; Livy, 41 24).

Seleucus IV. left two children, Demetrius, who subsequently ascended the throne (see § 11), and Laodice.

9. Antiochus IV. (175-164 B.C.).

Antiochus IV., Epiphanes[1] (175-164 B.C.), was the son of Antiochus III. and Laodice (daughter of the Pontic king Mithridates II.). After the battle of Magnesia he had been sent to Rome as hostage (Appian, Syr. 39). At Rome he remained nearly fourteen years, and then Seleucus IV. who was on the Syrian throne secured his exchange for the heir apparent, Demetrius (Appian, Syr. 45; cp Justin, 34 3).

On his way home Antiochus visited Athens, and displayed his phil-Hellenic sympathies by accepting the post of first strategus (στρατηγὸς ἐπὶ τὰ ὅπλα, see coins; cp Reinach, Rev. ét. Gr., 1888, p. 163 f.). He also contributed to the completion of the Olympieum (Pol. 26 1), and placed a golden ægis over the theatre (Paus. v. 12 4). He presented gifts to the temple of Zeus at Olympia, and to those of Apollo at Delphi and Delos, as well as to many Greek cities—Rhodes, Cyzicus, Tegea (theatre), and Megalopolis (contribution to walls). His favourite cult was that of Olympian Zeus (cp MAUZZIM), to whom he erected a temple at Daphne near Antioch on the Orontes (see ANTIOCH, 2), with a statue which was a replica of that made by Phidias for Olympia.[2] It was his thorough-going programme of Hellenisation which gained him his notoriety in Jewish annals (Tac. Hist. 5 8: 'rex Antiochus demere superstitionem et mores Græcorum dare adnisus').

While he lingered in Athens Antiochus received news of the murder of Seleucus IV. by Heliodorus and, being supported by the king of Pergamum, he expelled the usurper, and gained the crown in defiance of the rights of his nephew Demetrius (Appian, Syr. 45; cp Fränkel, Inscr. of Pergamon, 1 160; 1 Macc. 1 10). He showed himself soon even more enterprising than his father. For the death of his sister Cleopatra, the widow of Ptolemy V. Epiphanes (173 B.C.), opened the whole question of the ownership of Cœlesyria, which the Egyptians claimed as the dowry of the dead queen (Pol. 27 19), whereas she had only enjoyed a portion of the revenue derived from that country (Pol. 28 20). Antiochus forestalled the Egyptian attack (2 Macc. 4 21). At the end of 171 B.C. the contending powers came into decisive conflict on the Egyptian frontier between Mt. Casius and Pelusium (1 Macc. 1 17). The Egyptians were utterly defeated. Antiochus even secured the person of the young king Ptolemy Philometor, and was himself crowned king of Egypt at Memphis. There was a Seleucid party among the Egyptians themselves (Diod. 30 14); but upon the withdrawal of Antiochus (1 Macc. 1 20 f.) the national party in Alexandria rose and placed the young Ptolemy Physcon upon the throne of Egypt. Antiochus therefore invaded Egypt a second time (2 Macc. 5 1; Pol. 28 19), nominally at first in the interests of Philometor.[3] He demanded the cession of [1] Ἐπιφανής, 'illustrious,' called also Ἐπιμανής, 'mad,' from his actions, Pol. 26 1, Athen. 10 52. On coins his titles are Ἐπιφανής, Νικηφόρος, and Θεός. Cp Jos. Ant. xii. 5 5. See ANTIOCHUS, 2.

[2] The figure of Zeus Nicephorus enthroned appears on some of his coins in place of that of Apollo. He seems to have considered himself a manifestation of Zeus; and perhaps his name Epiphanes really means that. On some of his coins his own portrait occurs, in the character of Zeus. See Head, Hist. Numm. 641. The nimbus on the diadem of the Seleucidæ originates with him. See the remarks of Holm, Grk. Hist. 4 399.

[3] The wars of Antiochus IV. with Egypt are complicated, and it is doubtful whether he made three or more invasions (so

SELEUCIDÆ

Pelusium and of the island of Cyprus which was now practically his through the treachery of Ptolemy Macron (2 Macc. 10 13). Antiochus' victorious career in Egypt came to an abrupt ending. For at this moment the Roman victory at Pydna (168 B.C.) changed the whole face of affairs in the East.

Popilius Lænas, the Roman envoy, a harsh, rude man, demanded in the name of the senate that Antiochus should restore his conquests and evacuate Egypt within a set term. Antiochus asked time for consideration; but the envoy drew with his staff a circle round the king and bade him answer before he stepped beyond it (Pol. 29 27, Livy 45 12). Antiochus yielded. 'Like Macedonia in the war just waged by Perseus, the Seleucidæ had made in the war regarding Cœlesyria a final effort to recover their earlier power; but it is a significant indica ion of the difference between the two kingdoms, that in the former case the legions, in the latter the abrupt language of a diplomatist, decided the controversy' (Momms. Hist. of Rome, 2 309).

It was upon his return to Syria after finding the prize of Egypt, so nearly within his grasp, thus forever snatched from him, that Antiochus committed those outrages in Palestine which earned him the undying hatred of the Jews, and for which he is pilloried in the books of Daniel and Maccabees as the very personification of impiety. Already upon his first return, in 170 B.C., he had captured Jerusalem, slain and enslaved thousands of Jews, entered the Holy of Holies, and despoiled the temple (1 Macc. 1 20 f. 2 Macc. 5 11 f.; see ANTIOCHUS 2, JASON, MENELAUS). Now the king determined to carry through the Hellenisation of Palestine. A royal edict made the practice of Jewish rites punishable by death; the temple was dedicated to Zeus Olympios (168 B.C. See 1 Macc. 1 41 f., 2 Macc. 6 1 f.).[1] These persecutions led to the revolt of the Maccabees. The outbreak of Mattathias at Modin (167 B.C.) seems to have attracted little attention at the capital. It was not until the death of Mattathias and the assumption of leadership of the movement by his son Judas (166 B.C.), who defeated several detachments (that of Apollonius, 1 Macc. 3 10; that of Seron, 1 Macc. 3 13), that 'his name came near even unto the king,' and energetic measures were taken to suppress the insurrection (1 Macc. 3 27). The general conduct of the operations was entrusted to LYSIAS (q.v.), 'an honourable man, and one of the seed royal' (1 Macc. 3 32); but the victories of Judas at Emmaus and Beth-zur secured the practical evacuation of the country, and gave opportunity for the purification and rededication of the Temple (1 Macc. 4 36 f., 2 Macc. 10 1 f.). Antiochus was unable apparently to direct upon Judea the whole force of the empire, before which the Jewish national party must undoubtedly have succumbed. He was engaged beyond the Euphrates (1 Macc. 3 37), not, as the Jewish narrative puts it, to 'take the tributes of the countries, and to gather much money' (1 Macc. 3 31), but more probably in safe-guarding his frontiers against the growing power of the Parthians (cp Tac. Hist. 5 8: 'rex Antiochus demere superstitionem et mores Græcorum dare adnisus, quominus tæterrimam gentem in melius mutaret, Parthorum bello prohibitus est').

The sequence and extent of his operations in this quarter are unknown. After making an attempt to plunder a temple of Artemis in ELYMAIS (q.v., see also NANEA), Antiochus died of disease at Tabæ in Persia; some said that he died mad (Pol. 31 11, Appian, Syr. 66); the professedly circumstantial narratives of 1 Macc. 6 1 f. and 2 Macc. 9 1 f. are mutually contradictory and of no historical value (cp in general MACCABEES, FIRST, § 10, SECOND, § 2 f.). When, in fact, we compare the last episode of this king's life with that of his father, we may well doubt whether the tradition is not a confusion partly suggested by and founded upon the nickname Epimanes applied to Antiochus IV.

Wilcken, s.v. 'Antiochus' in Pauly's Realencyc., ed. Wissowa), or only two (so 2 Macc. 5 1; see Mahaffy, Emp. of the Ptolemies, 336 f.). His usurpation of Egypt was marked by the Seleucid anchor on the copper coins, and also by a new issue of copper coins with his own name.

[1] Perhaps the savage outbreak at Jerusalem upon the second occasion was due to some more personal grievance than mere resistance to innovations. The nationalists of Palestine may have been in part responsible for the delay and failure of his Egyptian expedition, as Mahaffy suggests, op. cit. 341.

10. Antiochus V. (164-162 B.C.).

Antiochus V., Eupator (164-162 B.C.), son of the preceding, was either nine or eleven years old at his father's death (Appian, Syr. 46; Eus. Chr. 1 253). In 166 B.C. Antiochus Epiphanes, on the eve of his departure to the east, appointed Lysias 'to be over the affairs of the king from the river Euphrates unto the borders of Egypt, and to bring up his son Antiochus, until he came again' (1 Macc. 3 32 f.); see LYSIAS. On the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, Lysias declared Antiochus his son king, with the title Eupator, 'on account of the virtues of his father' (1 Macc. 6 17; cp Appian, Syr. 46). The young king and his guardian then led an expedition to the relief of Jerusalem, where the citadel was hard pressed by Judas Maccabæus. The armies met at Beth-zacharias, near Beth-zur, and Judas was defeated and his brother Eleazar slain (1 Macc. 6 28 f., Jos. Ant. xii. 9 4; but 2 Macc. 13 16 f., representing the Jews as victorious, is clearly unhistorical). The victory of Antiochus enabled him to invest Jerusalem (1 Macc. 6 48 f.), and famine was already doing its work when the king's troops were recalled by the news that Philip, the foster-brother of Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Macc. 9 29), was approaching Antioch with an army (1 Macc. 6 55 f.). Philip had, in fact, been appointed by the dying Epiphanes as guardian of the young Antiochus (1 Macc. 6 55). Peace was made with the Jews on the terms that 'they shall walk after their own laws, as aforetime' (1 Macc. 6 59; 2 Macc. 13 23); but Antiochus in spite of this destroyed the fortifications of the city and imprisoned the high priest (1 Macc. 6 62, Jos. Ant. xii. 9 7). Returning to Syria, he found no difficulty in expelling Philip from Antioch (1 Macc. 6 63). In 162 B.C. Antiochus himself was betrayed, along with Lysias, into the hands of Demetrius, the son of Seleucus, and rightful heir to the Syrian throne, and was by him put to death (1 Macc. 7 2 f., 2 Macc. 14 1 f., Polyb. 31 19 f., Jos. Ant. xii. 10 1 f.). See ANTIOCHUS, 3.

Demetrius I., Soter (162-150 B.C.), son of Seleucus IV. Philopator.

11. Demetrius I. (162-150 B.C.).

As a boy he had been sent in 175 B.C. to take his uncle's place as a hostage in Rome (Polyb. 31 12, 1 Macc. 1 10). When his cousin inherited the crown which his father Epiphanes had usurped, Demetrius, who had then lived nearly twelve years practically a state prisoner in Italy, begged the Roman Senate to recognise his claim to the Syrian throne, but in vain. It suited the Senate better that a mere boy should rule, rather than one who had reached his twenty-third year. At last he made his escape in a Carthaginian vessel and landed in Syria (Jos. Ant. xii. 10 1, 2 Macc. 14 1). There seems no ground for the opinion that the Senate really connived at his escape (so Holm, Grk. Hist. 4 416 ET).

After putting to death Antiochus V. and Lysias (see above), the first object of Demetrius was to gain the recognition of the senate (Polyb. 32 4 f., Diod. 31 29). It was only after a long time that he gained the grudging and half-hearted recognition he sought. Timarchus, who under Antiochus Epiphanes had been satrap of Babylon (Appian, Syr. 47), revolted, and declared himself king, and ruled Babylon with an iron hand. Him Demetrius put down, being given for this service his title Soter ('Saviour') by the grateful Babylonians. The relations of Demetrius with the Jews are sufficiently set forth elsewhere (DEMETRIUS, 1, and in the references there given).

The foreign policy of Demetrius was not skilful; indeed it is difficult to see the object at which he aimed. First, he attempted to get his sister Laodice, the widow of Perseus, married to Ariarathes V. of Cappadocia, possibly in order to form an anti-Roman league in the east. Failing in this, he married her himself, and in revenge encouraged a claimant to the Cappadocian throne in the person of Orophernes, brother of Ariarathes (Polyb. 32 24). The only result was to raise against Demetrius the enmity of both Rome and Attalus of Pergamum (Polyb. 3 5). Attalus II. in return supported the claims of a pretender, Alexander Bala, or Balas, to the Syrian throne; ALEXANDER (q.v., 2) made himself out to be a son of Antiochus Epiphanes.

Alexander Bala appeared at an opportune moment, as Demetrius had completely alienated his subjects by his tyranny and excesses (153 B.C.), whilst at the same time he had given way to love of drink, the hereditary vice of his house (Polyb. 33 19). In addition to this, an attempt to secure the island of Cyprus by treachery had indeed failed, but had earned the Syrian monarchy the hostility of Ptolemy Philometor (Polyb. 33 5). The result was that, though a party at Rome (perhaps that of the Scipios) was favourably inclined to Demetrius, the Roman Senate, upon grounds of policy, and also upon more sordid grounds, was induced to recognise the impostor Alexander (Polyb. 33 18), who was also supported by Attalus Ariarathes and Ptolemy Philometor. Consequently, in 153 B.C., Alexander appeared with an army in Syria.

Both Demetrius and Alexander made bids for the favour of the Jews, who were now under Jonathan (1 Macc. 10 1 f.). The king recalled his garrisons from all the towns except Jerusalem and Beth-zur, and gave Jonathan power to raise an army and to liberate the hostages. The various taxes and royal claims upon the Jews were also remitted (see the instructive list given in Jos. Ant. xiii. 2 2 f.).[1] The impostor, however, was more successful in appealing to Jonathan's personal ambition, nominating him high-priest, and sending him the insignia of royalty, with the title of 'king's friend' (cp FRIEND). The decisive battle was fought in 150 B.C., and Demetrius fighting heroically was slain (Justin, 35 1, Polyb. 3 5, Jos. Ant. xiii. 2 4). In spite of the fragmentary and obscure character of the record, we may well doubt whether this Demetrius was not one of the most gifted of the Seleucid dynasty (v. Gutschmid, Iran, 43).

Demetrius II., Nicator (145-139 and 129-125 B.C.), the elder of the two sons of Demetrius I., had been sent by his father for protection to Cnidus when Alexander invaded Syria (Justin, 35 2), and remained there for some years in exile until he became aware that the usurper had forfeited the goodwill of his subjects by his negligence of state affairs and his self-indulgence (Livy, Epit. 50). In 147 B.C. he landed on the Cilician coast with a force of Cretan mercenaries (1 Macc. 10 67). Ptolemy VI. Philometor had given his daughter Cleopatra Thea ('one of the most impudent women produced by the Ptolemy line, which had no lack of such characters,' Holm, Grk. Hist. 4 417) in marriage to Alexander, and at first came to his assistance, but afterwards transferred his favour to Demetrius II., to whom also he transferred his daughter.

12. Demetrius II. (first reign: 145-139 B.C.).

Ptolemy's volte-face was accounted for by a story that Alexander had attempted his life (1 Macc. 11 10); but the true motive was probably the desire to take advantage of the intestine strife to annex at least Palestine and Cœlesyria (1 Macc. 11 1). According to Josephus (Ant. xiii. 4 5 f.), Ptolemy actually at Antioch assumed the 'diadem of Asia' (so also 1 Macc. 11 8 f., where, however, the motive assigned for Ptolemy's conduct differs). On this episode, see Mahaffy, Emp. of the Ptolemies, 364 f.

The opportune death of the Egyptian king on the third day after he had gazed upon the severed head of Alexander Balas, removed a formidable rival from the path of Demetrius (1 Macc. 11 18; was he murdered? Strabo, 751, says that he died from a wound received in the battle on the Œnoparas, near Antioch, fighting against Alexander). Having thus won back his father's kingdom by arms he received the title Nicator ('Conqueror'; Appian, Syr. 67, ὡς νόθον τοῦ γένους ἄνδρα νικήσας).[2] The entire country, in fact, had rallied to him, with the exception of Judæa, where the ambitious Jonathan had inflicted defeat upon his adherent Apollonius, governor of Cœlesyria (1 Macc. 10 69 f.). Demetrius was, indeed, fain to purchase the acquiescence of Jonathan by confirming him in the high-priesthood, and by the abolition of taxes (1 Macc. 11 20 f.), and the surrender to Judæa of three Samarian districts.

When peace was assured Demetrius disbanded the native troops and retained only his Cretan mercenaries. This led to risings in Antioch, which were put down by the mercenaries with the aid of 3000 Jewish troops sent by Jonathan. Confiscations and executions alienated the goodwill of the people (1 Macc. 11 38 f.). This emboldened one Diodotus, a native of Kasiana, brought up at Apamea on the Orontes (Strabo, 752; cp id. 668), to declare a young son of Alexander Bala king as Antiochus VI. Dionysus.[1] This was in 145 B.C. The Jews profited by this revolt, for Demetrius had not redeemed his promises to withdraw his garrisons from Judæa. The disbanded troops also rallied to the standard of his rival, and Demetrius was compelled to evacuate Antioch and to retire to Seleucia (Livy, Epit. 52) or to Cilicia (so Jos. Ant. xiii. 5 4). Jonathan and his brother Simon mastered all southern Syria (for the details of the operations, see 1 Macc. 11 60 f.).

Seleucia, near Antioch, remained true to Demetrius, along with Cilicia and the eastern provinces generally,[2] so that the young Antiochus never ruled over more than a small part of Syria. His reign soon came to an end, as he was murdered by Diodotus, who usurped the throne under the name of Tryphon.

13. Antiochus VI. (145-142 B.C.) and Tryphon (142-138 B.C.).

The date is disputed; probably it was in 143-142 B.C.; so the coins (see Babelon, Rois de Syrie, 131 f. and cp 1 Macc. 13 31). On the other hand, according to Josephus (Ant. xiii. 5 11 7 1) the murder of Antiochus occurred after the capture of Demetrius by the Parthians. (On this much disputed point see the authorities referred to in Schür. Hist. of the Jews, ET, i. 1 177, and Cambridge Bible, First Book of M. in l.c.).

The usurper made himself detested for his cruelties. Chiefly he alienated the sympathies of the Jews, and earned their active hatred, by the capture and execution of Jonathan when he had all but established the independence of his country (1 Macc. 12 39 f.).

The three or four years of the reign of Tryphon are almost destitute of incident, save for a few isolated notices. His headquarters seem to have been at Coracesium in Cilicia Aspera, a robbers' eyrie on a precipitous crag by the sea. Strabo (668) attributes to him the rise of the piratical power in Cilicia, which afterwards attained such extraordinary dimensions. The generals of Demetrius, in Mesopotamia and Cœlesyria at least, retained their ground before those of Tryphon, whilst Simon, who had succeeded to the leadership of the Jews (1 Macc. 13 8), entered into negotiations with Demetrius, who granted all his demands, including even exemption from tribute (1 Macc. 13 36 f.). Though the Jews thus did not gain absolute independence, but had still to recognise the suzerainty of the Syrian kings, they adopted a new era, and Simon ruled as ethnarch, or vassal prince (1 Macc 13 41 f.; cp Justin, 36 1 3).

14. Demetrius in Parthia (139-129 B.C.).

At this moment the attention of Demetrius was diverted to Babylonia, where he had to face a new peril. Mithridates I. of Parthia,[3] after displaying his power in the E., had conquered Media (147 B.C.), and even Seleucia on the Tigris two years later. The Babylonians appealed for assistance. Demetrius was joined by the Persians, Elymæans, and Bactrians; but in 139 B.C. he was defeated and taken prisoner by the Parthians, and carried about through their territories as a show[4] (1 Macc. 14 1, Jos. Ant. xiii. 7 1, Appian, Syr. 67. The actual capture was due to treachery). For ten years Demetrius remained a prisoner; but very soon after his capture his treatment improved, and he was even given the king's daughter Rhodogune to wife. Probably the promise of reinstallation in his kingdom would have been realised had not Mithridates himself died, and been succeeded

1 See the remarks of Mahaffy, Emp. of the Ptolemies, 182 f

2 On his coins he also calls himself Theos and Philadelphos.

1 The coins of this seven-year-old king also bear the title Epiphanes. His mother was the Egyptian princess Cleopatra Thea. In Appian, Syr. 68, he is wrongly called Alexander. See ANTIOCHUS, 4.

3 Mithridates I. reigned 174-136 B.C. He calls himself on his coins King of Kings, the Great, Arsaces, Epiphanes, Euergetes, Philhellen. He was the most considerable of the Parthian monarchs.

4 From this circumstance he was called mockingly Seripides (Eus. Chron. 1 256).

by Phraates II. as Arsaces Philopator Epiphanes Philhellen (reigned 136-127 B.C.). It seemed better to this monarch to retain Demetrius in order to be able to use him in case of threatening circumstances.

Whilst Demetrius was a captive in the hands of the Parthians (see above, § 14) his younger brother Antiochus Sidetes, who owed his surname to the fact that he had been brought up at Side in Pamphylia (see SIDE),[1] asserted his claims to the kingdom of Syria (1 Macc. 15 1 f.). He was now sixteen years old. His attempt succeeded, perhaps chiefly because he was joined by queen Cleopatra Thea, who, enraged at the union of Demetrius with the daughter of the Parthian king, went over to the side of Antiochus, and surrendered to him the strong tower of Seleucia, near Antioch, which during all these years she had held for Demetrius.

15. Antiochus VII., Sidetes (138-129 B.C.).

Tryphon was defeated and driven into the Phœnician town of Dora, where he was besieged. Thence he escaped to Apamea, but was again besieged, and compelled to end his life by his own hand (1 Macc. 15 10 37; Strabo, 668; Jos. Ant. xiii. 7 2; Appian, Syr. 68).[2]

Antiochus married Thea ('the objectionable but evidently inevitable adjunct of the Syrian throne,' Holm, Grk. Hist. 4 419), and acted very vigorously to unite again the severed fragments of the Syrian kingdom (Justin, 36 1). First and foremost came the necessity of dealing with Palestine, which in the turmoil of the past few years had absorbed large tracts of Syrian territory, and attained an almost completely independent position, even entering into diplomatic relations with distant and, in part, hostile powers (1 Macc. 10 59 f. 12 1 f. 14 16 f. 24). In 135 B.C. Antiochus invaded Judæa in person. Already, three years previously, the Syrian king had come into collision with the Jews, who, under Judas and John Hyrcanus, inflicted a defeat upon his general CENDEBÆUS. After the assassination of Simon and two of his sons by his son-in-law Ptolemy, the son of Abubus (1 Macc. 16 11 f.), John Hyrcanus had become high priest and prince of Judæa. Upon the invasion by Antiochus he was shut up in the citadel of Jerusalem for at least a year, and then forced to capitulate. The walls were destroyed, hostages demanded, with five hundred talents indemnity, and tribute for the cities which had been occupied by the Maccabees (Diod. 34 1, Justin, 36 1, Jos. Ant. xiii. 8 2).[3] Syrian suzerainty over Judæa was fully asserted.

Next occurred the final attempt of the Seleucidæ to overthrow the formidable Parthian power which had wrested from them so much of their eastern possessions.

In 130 B.C. Antiochus undertook an expedition against the Parthians. His brother Demetrius was still in their hands, having twice been recaptured when he attempted escape. Three victories gave the Syrian king the possession of Babylonia, and brought to his standard all the peoples who had been reduced under the Parthian yoke.[4] Phraates opened negotiations with Antiochus to amuse him, while he prepared once more to try his fortune in the field (Diod. 35 15); more effective still was the stroke by which Demetrius was at last released from captivity in order to cause the withdrawal of the Syrian forces. In the next collision with the Parthian troops Antiochus fell, bravely fighting (Appian, Syr. 68; Justin, 38 10). His entire army was cut to pieces.

The Parthian king, having thus won the victory by arms, keenly regretted having set Demetrius at liberty (see § 14), and tried to recapture him, but failed. He tried next to undo his work by sending into Syria a second pretender, a son of Antiochus, the late king, Seleucus by name, who had fallen into his hands. This also proved of no avail. Demetrius, however, did not long enjoy his change of fortune.

16. Demetrius II., Nicator (second reign, 129-125 B.C.).

[1] 'In Sida urbe educatus, quapropter Sidetes utique vocabatur' (Eus. Chron. 1 255). On his coins Antiochus VII. calls himself Euergetes, which was, therefore, his true official title. Jos. Ant. xiii. 7 1 calls him Σωτήρ. See ANTIOCHUS, 5.

[2] On his coins Tryphon calls himself Βασιλεὺς αὐτοκράτωρ, which no other Syrian ruler does.

[3] This Antiochus was not hostile to the Jewish faith, and for his tolerance was called Eusebēs ('pious'), Jos. Ant. xiii. 8 2.

[4] For these victories Antiochus received the title Great (Dittenb. Sylloge,(1) 244 and 245, Βασιλέως μεγάλου Ἀντιόχου, cp Justin, 38 10: 'Magnus haberi cœpit').

He was induced to enter into war with Egypt on behalf of Cleopatra II., sister-wife of Ptolemy Physcon,[1] and his own mother-in-law, who had taken refuge in Syria. The war with which he was thus threatened Physcon evaded by setting up Alexander Zabinas, a pretended son of Alexander I. Bala, to claim the Syrian throne.[2]

Supported by a strong Egyptian army the pretender invaded Syria, where several cities fell away from Demetrius. The decisive battle was fought in 125 B.C. near Damascus, and Demetrius was defeated. He fled to Ptolemais to his wife Cleopatra, who refused to receive him, and, when he tried to enter Tyre, had him murdered (Justin, 39 1, Appian, Syr. 68, Jos. Ant. xiii. 9 3).

Little is known of the rule of Alexander II.; but one authority at least passes a favourable verdict.[3] He entered into friendly relations with Hyrcanus, influenced largely, no doubt, by the desire to find support against Egypt, from which power he soon became estranged (Jos. Ant. xiii. 9 3). He was, in fact, not left to enjoy his usurped dignity long without rivals. Immediately upon the death of Demetrius II., Seleucus, the son of the murdered king, laid claim to the throne, only to be murdered after a few months by the infamous Cleopatra Thea, his mother, who was indignant that he should have taken such a step without her, and without sharing the power with herself.

17. Alexander II. and Seleucus V.

Cleopatra then put forward the second son of Demetrius II. as heir to the throne; his claim was also supported by Egypt. Alexander II. was defeated and fled to Antioch, and then to Seleucia (Diod. Sic. 35 28, Justin, 39 2). Finally he was captured and brought to Antiochus, who had him put to death. Thus from 125 B.C. Antiochus reigned, in association with his mother, after the fashion common in Egypt. Their joint reign lasted four years.[5]

18. Antiochus VIII., Grypus[4] (125-96 B.C.).

The queen-mother was thrown more and more into the shade, especially after the marriage of her son with Cleopatra Tryphæna, given to him by her father Ptolemy Euergetes II. as a pledge of Egyptian support, and also after 123 B.C. by the victory gained over Alexander II. (cp Justin, 39 2: 'Cleopatra cum huius [sc. Antiochi] quoque victoria inferiorem dignitatem suam factam doleret'). In 121 B.C. she tried to poison him, but was compelled instead to drink the draught herself (Appian, Syr. 69).

For some years Antiochus Grypus reigned quietly, and then there arose a claimant to the throne in the person of his half-brother and cousin Antiochus (IX.), son of Antiochus VII. Sidetes and Cleopatra Thea (see above, § 15). Antiochus owed his surname to his having been brought up at Cyzicus (his title on his coins is Philopator), whither his mother had sent him in 129 B.C. upon the return of Demetrius II., her second husband, from his Parthian captivity (Jos. Ant. xiii. 10 1). The poisoned cup with which his mother had made him familiar was employed in vain by Grypus to remove this rival. The attempt only precipitated the inevitable struggle (116 B.C.). In the first important battle of the war Grypus was victorious, and took Antioch, where he found his own sister-in-law Cleopatra IV., sister and divorced wife of Ptolemy Soter II. (Lathyrus); having been expelled from Egypt by her mother (i.e., Cleopatra III., Physcon's niece and former wife, who herself married Ptolemy Soter) Cleopatra had married Antiochus Cyzicenus. By command of her sister, Try-

19. Antiochus IX., Cyzicenus (116-95 B.C.).

[1] Ptolemy Euergetes II., or Physcon, reigned 146-117 B.C.

[2] Or, according to another and more probable version (Justin, 39 1), he claimed to be an adoptive son of the dead Antiochus VII. Sidetes. He was really an Egyptian, son of a merchant called Protarchus, though Jos. Ant. xiii. 9 3 calls him a genuine Seleucid. He also gives the title as Zebinas. It is translated 'slave' (ἀγοραστός) in Eus. Chron. 1 257.

[4] His titles are Epiphanes Philometor (!) Callinicus. The name Grypus = 'hook-nose'—a feature conspicuous on his coins. Grypus is, of course, not an official, but a vulgar title.

[5] Coins bear her portrait, with cornucopiæ. Her titles are Thea and Eueteria ('abundance').

phæna, the wife of Grypus, the unfortunate Cleopatra was put to death (Justin, 39 3). Soon the scale was turned, and Grypus was defeated, and compelled to retire to Aspendus (Eus. Chron. 1 257); Tryphæna was put to death in her turn by the victor. In 111 B.C. Grypus returned and won back northern Syria. The result of the struggle was that the Syrian empire, now sadly shrunken in size, was partitioned between the contestants, Grypus retaining northern Syria with Cilicia, and Cyzicenus taking Phœnicia and Cœlesyria with its capital Damascus. Apparently a state of peace did not long continue; but the details of the never-ceasing warfare are hard to trace.

It is clear that the brothers' war in Syria was intimately connected with a similar strife in Egypt, where also Ptolemy Alexander and Ptolemy Soter II. were at enmity, due to the intrigues of their mother the reigning queen Cleopatra III. (cp Journ. of Hell. Stud. 9 230; Justin, 39 4; Jos. Ant. xiii. 10 2; and see Mahaffy, Empire of the Ptolemies, 409 f.). Grypus held with the party of Alexander, and by way of attaching him more closely thereto Cleopatra sent him as his wife her youngest daughter, Selene, beforetime the wife of the exiled Ptolemy Soter II.

The confusion in Syria was an opportunity for surrounding powers. In 103 B.C. even Rome, by the victory of the Prætor M. Antonius over the pirates, gained a footing in Cilicia (cp Justin, 39 5). By the union of Laodice (Thea Philadelphus), daughter of Grypus, with Mithridates I. Callinicus, the dynasty of Commagene was founded, and the way prepared for the severance of that kingdom from Syria (cp Mommsen in Athen. Mitt. 1 27 f.). The Jews also, under John Hyrcanus, who had practically thrown off their allegiance since the death of Antiochus VII. (129 B.C.), made great strides forward, investing and destroying Samaria (about 108 B.C.) in spite of all that Antiochus Cyzicenus, even with the help of 6000 troops sent by Ptolemy Soter II., could do to save it (Jos. Ant. xiii. 10 2 f.). Such successes as the Syrian king won were entirely neutralised and torn from his grasp by the senatus consultum secured by Hyrcanus bidding 'Antiochus the son of Antiochus' (Jos. Ant. xiv. 10 22; cp id. xiii. 9 2) restore all his Palestinian conquests.

In 96 B.C. Antiochus Grypus died, or was murdered by Heracleon (Jos. Ant. xiii. 13 4; cp Eus. Chron. 1 259). He was forty-five years old at the time of his death, and left behind him five sons.

20. Seleucus VI. Epiphanes Nicator (96-95 B.C.).

Seleucus VI., Epiphanes, the eldest son of Antiochus Grypus, on his father's death laid claim to the undivided empire, and proceeded to assert his claims by arms. Antiochus Cyzicenus marched into northern Syria against him, but being defeated killed himself in the battle (Appian, Syr. 69; Jos. Ant. xiii. 13 4 seems not quite accurate). A sketch of the character of Antiochus Cyzicenus is given in Diod. 35 34. We are told that he had to wife Selene, the Egyptian princess, who had been married to his rival Grypus; but whether her marriage to Cyzicenus occurred before or after the death of Grypus is unknown. For a few months Seleucus VI. was master of the whole extent of the Syrian empire, as it then existed, but soon he was expelled by a rival, Antiochus X. Eusebes, Philopator, the son of Antiochus Cyzicenus. He was compelled to retire into Cilicia, where he took refuge in the town of Mopsuestia (mod. Missis).

By his violent and tyrannical behaviour, and his extortions, Seleucus raised the inhabitants against him; they fired the gymnasium in which he had taken shelter, and he either perished in the flames, or slew himself to avoid a worse fate (Jos. Ant. xiii. 13 4; Appian, Syr. 69). This was probably in 94 B.C. Mopsuestia was thereafter razed to the ground by Philippus and Antiochus XI., brothers of Seleucus.

21. Antiochus X. (94-83 B.C.).

'Syria now presented the spectacle of, firstly, a contest between two branches of the Seleucids, the descendants of the brothers Demetrius II. and Antiochus VII., but both having the same ancestress [Cleopatra Thea], and, secondly, of squabbles between the members of the first branch, the five sons of Grypus' (Holm, Grk. Hist. 4 542). The confusion prevailing is well illustrated by the fact that Antiochus X. married Selene who had first been the wife of Grypus and had then married Antiochus Cyzicenus, his own father.

First, Antiochus X. had to meet the opposition of Antiochus XI. and Philippus I., the third and the second sons of Grypus. After a battle on the Orontes, in which Antiochus X. was victorious, Antiochus XI. lost his life in the river in his flight (Jos. l.c.; Eus. Chron. 1 261). Philippus then assumed the royal title, and held part of Syria (from 94 B.C.). In the meantime, Ptolemy Lathyrus[1] had sent for Demetrius, fourth son of Grypus, from Cnidus, and had established him as king in Damascus.[2] After hard fighting Antiochus X. was expelled from Syria (or, according to Josephus, lost his life in battle with the Parthians).

According to Appian (Mithr. 105) this Antiochus was alive and ruling in 83 B.C. when Tigranes (see below, § 22, end) made himself master of Syria. If this is true, his death in war with the Parthians fell later (it had already occurred in 75 B.C.). Appian (Syr. 69) also tells us that he married Selene, his father's widow. His son was Antiochus XIII. (§ 23; cp Kuhn, Beitr. z. Gesch. der Seleukiden, 33 f.).

22. Philippus I. and Demetrius III.

In what way Philippus and Demetrius divided the kingdom is not known; but Demetrius probably ruled Cœlesyria and Antioch. Soon hostilities broke out between them. Demetrius was also engaged with the Jews, who in 88 B.C. called him in to aid them against their tyrant prince Alexander Jannæus. Demetrius defeated Jannæus (Jos. Ant. xiii. 14 1 f.); but in the moment of victory Jewish national feeling awoke, and 6000 Jews went over to Alexander from the army of Demetrius. The Syrian king must have shown signs of desiring to reduce Judæa once more to a dependency of Syria. Demetrius then turned his arms against his brother Philippus, whom he besieged in Berœa.[3] Straton, the ruler of Berœa, who supported Philippus, appealed for assistance to the Arab sheik Azizus and the Parthian Mithridates. By them Demetrius was himself beleaguered in his camp, and compelled to capitulate. He died in honourable confinement at the court of the Parthian king Mithridates II. (Jos. Ant. xiii. 14 3).

After the capture of Demetrius by the Parthians, Philippus made himself master of Antioch, and for a short time was sole ruler of what was left of the Syrian empire (88 B.C.). The intestine strife was soon renewed, for Antiochus XII. Dionysos,[4] the youngest of the sons of Grypus, claimed the throne, and established himself in Damascus (87/6 B.C.). Philippus, indeed, shortly afterwards took the town by the treachery of the governor Milesius, while Antiochus was engaged with the Nabatæans; but he was compelled to evacuate it again. When Antiochus resumed operations against the Arabians, the Jewish despot, Alexander Jannæus, attempted to bar the road through Judæa by constructing a great wall and trench from Joppa to Capharsaba, but in vain (Jos. Ant. xiii. 15 1). Ten thousand Arab riders surprised the forces of the Syrian king, who, true to the traditions of his house, fell fighting bravely (probably about 84 B.C.).

The end of Philippus is doubtful. In 83 B.C. the Armenian king Tigranes was invited to put an end to the long strife by making himself master of the Syrian kingdom. Neither Philippus nor Antiochus X. (if they were still alive; see above, § 21) could offer any real opposition, and Tigranes made himself master of the entire Syrian kingdom from the sea to the Euphrates, including also Cilicia (Justin, 40 1, Appian, Syr. 48). He so ruled for fourteen years, Syria being governed by a viceroy. In 69 B.C. the connection of Tigranes with his father-in-law Mithridates of Pontus led to his own defeat by Lucullus.

[4] Dionysos' coins bear also the titles Epiphanes Philopator Callinicus, the title Dionysos being also sometimes omitted.

After the defeat of Tigranes, Syria did not all at once come into the possession of the Romans. The royal house of Syria was not yet extinct, for Antiochus X. Eusebes and Cleopatra Selene had left a son Antiochus.

23. Antiochus XIII. Asiaticus[1] (69-65 B.C.).

The youth of Asiaticus had been passed in Asia Minor (Justin, 40 2, 'in angulo Ciliciæ'), from which circumstance he received his surname (Appian, Syr. 70). This Antiochus, along with a brother, appeared in Rome to urge their claim to the kingdom of Egypt, then under the sway of the illegitimate Ptolemy Auletes. This claim was disregarded, and the disappointed princes returned home by way of Sicily, where Antiochus was robbed by Verres of a rich present intended for the Senate (Cic. Verr. ii. 4 27). This was about 72 B.C. Three years later Tigranes had lost his Syrian possessions, and Antiochus was received with open arms as the heir to his kingdom (Appian, Syr. 49). Lucullus recognised his claim.

In 65 B.C. disturbances broke out in Antioch (Diod. frg. 34), and Philippus son of Philippus I. was encouraged to lay claim to the crown. Thus the old strife between the two rival lines was renewed in the third generation. The Arabian chief Azizus (cp § 22) supported Philippus, whilst Sampsiceramus, prince of Emesa (Strabo, 753), supported Antiochus. Into the details of the strife we need not enter. Pompeius, who had taken the place of Lucullus in 66 B.C., took in hand the reduction of this chaos to order. Antiochus, on requesting to be acknowledged as the rightful heir to the throne, 'received the answer that Pompeius would not give back the sovereignty to a king who knew neither how to maintain nor how to govern his kingdom, even at the request of his subjects, much less against their distinctly expressed wishes. With this letter of the Roman proconsul the house of Seleucus was ejected from the throne which it had occupied for two hundred and fifty years. Antiochus soon after lost his life through the artifice of the emir Sampsiceramus, as whose client he played the ruler in Antioch' (Mommsen, Hist. of Rome, 4 135). Syria now became a Roman province (63 B.C.).

24. Literature.

Besides the special articles devoted to Antiochus, Demetrius, etc., and collateral articles, in the present work, Schürer's Jewish People in the time of Jesus Christ, ET, should be consulted for a sketch of Syrian history, and for the authorities there cited. The literature of the subject is extensive. Most important are P. Gardner, Catalogue of Greek Coins in the British Museum: The Seleucid kings of Syria; and Babelon, Rois de Syrie. Extremely valuable are the articles under the various headings Antiochus, Demetrius, etc., in Pauly's Real Encyclopädie, now available in part in the revised edition by Wissowa; in it will be found the fullest collection of recent authorities, to which general reference must here suffice. Possibly the official title of this last of the Seleucidæ was Eusebes, which would account for his being confused with his father by our authorities.

SENNACHERIB[1] (סַנְחֵרִיב or [2 K. 19 20] סַנְחֵרִב; ϲεννaχηρ[ε]ιμ [BℵAQΓ] -ειβ [Q^mg. Sennacherib's own dated inscriptions, the Taylor Cylinder being the latest, give the events of the first fifteen years of his reign, in a chronological order, but arranged according to campaigns, not, like Sargon's Annals, according to years. The Canon Lists, of the second class, which fix some definite event for each eponymy, are defective after his first year. The Babylonian Chronicle, which was exceptionally full for this reign, deals chiefly with what concerned Babylon. The Kings List, a Babylonian document, records the succession of kings who ruled in Babylon during this reign. Some statements preserved in classical authors are to be regarded with suspicion until they are brought to the test of further inscriptions, still unpublished, of this king's. The many contracts of this reign and a large number of letters, now being published, give many incidental references. Hence the last word on the history of Sennacherib from the Assyrian side cannot yet be said. All that can now be done is to summarise the present state of knowledge.

1. Sources for history.

Sennacherib does not seem to have been in a position to proceed to Babylon directly after his accession to the throne of Assyria and there 'take the hands of Bêl,' or become legitimate king of Babylon. Polyhistor relates indeed that Sennacherib's brother reigned there at first, and, on his death, a man named Hagises reigned for one month, till he was killed by Merodach-baladan, who reigned for six months. The Babylonian Kings List assigns one month to Marduk-zâkir-šum, who may be Hagises, and then gives nine months to Merodach-baladan. Whatever means Sennacherib took to govern Babylon in his first two years—whether he ruled by a šaknu or governor, or whether he really sent a brother to act as sub-king—his rule was thrown off by an upstart, 'son of a slave.' Merodach-baladan, who had been expelled by Sargon in 721 B.C., although a Chaldæan, was evidently more welcome than Sennacherib, whom the Babylonian Kings List calls a member of the dynasty of Ḫabigal. According to Jensen, this means simply 'Great Rascal.'

2. Struggle for the kingdom.

Sennacherib's own inscriptions ascribe to the commencement of his reign the active hostility of Merodach-baladan, king of Karduniaš, the old name for Babylonia, whom Sennacherib defeated in his first expedition. Merodach-baladan was supported by an army from Elam. These allies were defeated at Kisu (now Hymer), about 10 m. E. from Babylon. Merodach-baladan fled alone to Guzumâni. Sennacherib immediately entered Babylon and took possession of Merodach-baladan's palace, acquiring great spoil. He then sent after Merodach-baladan an army which searched the swamps where he had taken refuge; but the wily Chaldæan escaped. Sennacherib then proceeded to conquer the country, city by city. He seems to have had to fight with a number of tribes, Urbi, Aramu, and Chaldæans, who had occupied Erech, Nippur, Kisu, Ḫaršagkalama and Cutha, and boasts of having captured 89 strong cities as well as 820 smaller cities in Chaldæa. On his return to Babylon he had to pacify the country, and rescue it from the hordes of Aramæan and Chaldæan peoples, who would not acknowledge him as king.

Sennacherib enumerates the Tu'muna, Riḫiḫu, Iadâḳu, Ubudu, Kiprê, Maliḫu, Gurumu, Ubulu, Damunu, Gambulu, Ḫindaru, Ru'a, Puḳudu, Ḫamrânu, Ḫagarânu, Nabatu, Li'tau, Aramu. The number of his captives he puts at 208,000. The nature of these tribes is indicated by the spoil taken from them: 7200 horses, 11,073 asses, 5230 camels, 80,100 oxen, 800,500 sheep. The country was clearly over-run by nomads.

It is evident that Assyria had completely lost control of the country. Sennacherib had to reconquer it. The Babylonian Chronicle and a fragment of the Canon List place a conquest of Larak and Sarabânu in 704 B.C. This doubtless marked the commencement of the reconquest. But the campaign clearly lasted beyond 702 B.C., when Sennacherib set Bêl-ibnî on the throne of Babylon. This prince had been brought up at the Assyrian court, but was of the old Babylonian seed royal, for all the sources acknowledge him as legitimate monarch, and the Babylonian Kings' List ascribes him to 'the dynasty of Babylon,' and gives him a reign of three years. He was, of course, a vassal king.

Sennacherib assigns to this period the submission of Nabû-bêl-šumâte, ḳêpu of Ḫararâti, and the destruction of Ḫirimmu. Some of Sennacherib's inscriptions follow the plan of presenting together the events connected with one district. Thus we learn that after Bêl-ibnî had proved faithless or inefficient, Sennacherib once more marched to Babylon and deposed him, setting Ašur-nâdin-šum, his own son, on the throne. The Babylonian Chronicle places the pillage of Ḫararâte and Ḫirimmu in 702 B.C., and associates the accession of Ašur-nâdin-šum with Sennacherib's pillage of Akkad, or Northern Babylonia. Bêl-ibnî was called away to Assyria. It was probably during Sennacherib's absence in the West that Bêl-ibnî became disgraced. Ašur-nâdin-šum was acknowledged king in Babylon according to all sources; but the Kings' List assigns him to the dynasty of Ḫabigal. He reigned six years, 699-693 B.C.

Sennacherib owed Elam a grudge for supporting Merodach-baladan against him. In his second campaign, as he calls it, before September 702 B.C., when the Bellino Cylinder is dated, he marched an army towards Elam. The Kašši, who had once furnished the ruling dynasty of Babylonia, about 1725-1155 B.C., and a neighbouring tribe, the Iasubigalli, on the borders of Babylonia and Elam, who had never been subjected to Assyrian rule, were now ravaged. The neighbouring kingdom of Ellipi, once subject to Sargon, was also pillaged. As in Sargon's case, some distant tribes of the Medes sent presents. Sennacherib boasts that his predecessors had not even heard the names of these peoples. But although Elam was threatened, it does not seem that Sennacherib made any direct attack this time. His hands were soon full in another quarter.

How long the West had been in rebellion does not appear; but Sennacherib calls the campaign in which he proceeded to bring the West to submission his third. This is ascribed by general consent to 701 B.C. Bêl-ibnî was settled in Babylon, and Sennacherib was free to attend to the West at that time; but we have no explicit statement of date from cuneiform sources. The first move was against Tyre. Eululæus, whom Sennacherib calls Lulî king of Sidon, according to Menander, as quoted by Josephus, had gone to Citium in Cyprus to establish his authority. He was thus committing a technical act of war against Sennacherib. The latter does not state the grounds of his quarrel. But doubtless all the West had become very backward in payment of tribute. Sennacherib says that Lulî fled from Tyre to Cyprus and that all his country fell into Assyrian hands. Great Sidon and Little Sidon, Beth-zait, Sarepta, Maḫalliba, Ušû, Achzib, and Accho are named as fortresses captured from Lulî. Sennacherib set up Ethobal as vassal king over a new kingdom of Sidon. Tyre he could not reduce.

The vassal kings and semi-independent rulers of Syria and Palestine now hastened to secure exemption from pillage by tribute and submission. Menahem of Samsimurûna, Abdi-li'ti of Arvad, Urumilki of Gebal, Mitinti of Ashdod, Pudu-ilu of Ammon, Kamuš-nadab of Moab, Airammu of Edom, all called kings of the Martu-land, submitted. Ṣidḳa of Ashkelon stood out, was captured and with all his belongings carried to Assyria. He had apparently come to the throne by a revolution which had expelled Šarru-lûdâri, son of Rukipti, whom Tiglath-pileser III. had set over Ashkelon, about 734 B.C. Hence he probably expected no mercy if he submitted. Šarru-lûdâri was reinstated. Sennacherib then reduced Beth-dagan, Joppa, Benebarḳa, and Azor which had been under Ṣidḳa's rule.

The nobles and people of Ekron had rebelled against their king Padî, a faithful vassal of Assyria, put him in chains, and sent him to Hezekiah, king of Judah, to keep in prison. When Sennacherib advanced against Ekron, he was faced by a great army of the kings of Muṣur, with troops, archers, chariots, and horsemen from Meluḫḫa. This army he defeated at Eltekeh, capturing the sons of the kings of Muṣur and the generals sent from Meluḫḫa. He then stormed Eltekeh and Timnath. Ekron soon submitted. After wiping out the conspirators and enslaving their supporters Sennacherib reinstated Padî, whom he says he 'brought forth out of Jerusalem.'

Sennacherib then proceeded to ravage Judah, capturing forty-six great fortresses and smaller cities 'without number,' 'counting as spoil' 200,150 people. He does not claim to have captured Jerusalem. He says of Hezekiah, 'him, like a caged bird, within Jerusalem, his capital, I shut in, forts against him I raised, and I repulsed whoever came out of his city gate and tore it up'; but there is no mention of capture. The captured cities were annexed to the dominions of Metinti of Ashdod, Padî of Ekron, and Ṣilli-bêl of Gaza. What caused Sennacherib to leave Judah we are not told: but it is nearly certain that troubles in Babylon were again pressing. The army left behind under the Tartan and Rabshakeh would be well able to carry on a siege; but Hezekiah would not push matters to the point of standing a long siege. He did submit, as is evident from the tribute which, Sennacherib says, was sent after him to Nineveh. It amounted to 30 talents of gold, 800 talents of silver, and an enormous amount of precious stones and palace furniture, besides Hezekiah's daughters, his eunuchs, musicians, etc. Sennacherib's account of the submission seems to imply that it was the Urbi, Arabs whom Hezekiah had received into the city to strengthen it, who really gave in, and so forced the king to submit. They may have been a garrison from Meluḫḫa. These events are recorded on Cylinder B, which is dated in the Eponymy of Mitunu, 700 B.C. That the account is complete no one can pretend. It makes no mention of Lachish, although the celebrated scene of Sennacherib receiving the submission of that city shows the great importance attached by him to its capture. Whether Lachish was one of the forty-six great fortresses, or not, it seems probable, as it was only 10 m. or so from Eltekeh, that it was captured in this expedition.

What was the exact nature of Bêl-ibnî's fault we do not know; but Merodach-baladan's activity in the Sea-land and the unrest of Marduk-ušêzib in Chaldæa caused Sennacherib to attack the southern portion of Babylonia. His principal enemies fled. Merodach-baladan, with his gods, escaped by ship to Nagitu on the Elamite coast of the Persian Gulf; but his brothers and the rest of his people, whom he had left in Bît Yakin, were taken captives. Sennacherib added 15,000 bowmen and 15,000 pikemen from these countries to his army. This was in 700 B.C. Sennacherib calls it his 'fourth campaign.'

Sennacherib now seems to have considered his empire thoroughly subdued, for he embarked on a fancy expedition, what he himself calls his fifth campaign. It can have brought little profit, but he dwells upon it with evident pride and delight. Some of the mountain districts of Cilicia, peopled by the Tamurru, Šarmu, Ezama, Kipšu, Ḫalbuda, Ḳûa, Ḳana, dwelling in cities perched like birds' nests on Mount Nipur, 'were not submissive to my yoke.' So, pitching his camp at the foot of Mount Nipur, with his bodyguards and picked warriors he scaled the mountain peaks, leading the attack in person, 'like a mighty bull.' He goes on to describe the hardships of this raid in a way that shows his own love of fighting. Then he turned to Mania, king of Ukki, at the Mount Anara and Uppa; then against parts of Cilicia, Tulgarimmu, and the borders of Tabal. Everywhere he succeeded, pillaged, burnt, and destroyed. This seems to have been in 699 B.C. Although there seems to have been small value in this move, Berossus seems to have known of Sennacherib's war in Cilicia and ascribes to him the foundation of Tarsus.

3. Other campaigns.

In his sixth campaign Sennacherib struck out a completely new plan. Merodach-baladan's elusive tactics had repeatedly foiled his enemy. He had taken to the ships, for which the Chaldæans were famous, and escaped to Nagitu, whither Sennacherib could not follow. Now Sennacherib determined to strike him even there. So he set his captives from the Phœnician coasts, skilled shipbuilders, to build ships at Nineveh. These he took down the Tigris to Opis, dragged them overland to the Araḫtu canal, and floated them on the Euphrates at Bît Dakkûri. He then embarked his bodyguards and picked warriors, stocked the ships with provisions for the men and fodder for the horses, and sent them down the river, while he marched beside them on land, as far as Bâb Salimiti. The fleet stretched on the shore of the river to the shore of the Gulf, 'two kaspu.' At the mouth of the river Sennacherib seems to have stayed behind. He sent on his fleet, however, and after five days and nights they reached a point where he caused sacrifices to be offered to Ea, god of the ocean, and threw a gold ship, a gold fish, and an alluttu of gold into the sea. The landing at Nagitu was opposed and the shore was difficult; but at the mouth of the Ulai, where the shore was practicable, a landing was effected and Sennacherib's army swarmed out of the ships 'like locusts.' The Chaldæans were utterly routed, Nagitu, Nagitu Dihibina, Ḫilmu, Pillatu, Ḫupapanu, Elamite cities, were captured. The gods of Bît Yakin that had been carried there, the people, with a number of Elamites, and immense booty, were brought back to Sennacherib at Bâb Salimiti. Sennacherib added to his army 30,500 bowmen, 30,500 pikemen. The rest of the spoil he distributed among his warriors.

In this campaign Sennacherib had violated the territory of Elam. Ištar-ḫundu of Elam had never crossed swords with Sennacherib since the defeat of his army sent to support Merodach-baladan. Probably he was regarded by the more warlike spirits in Elam as pusillanimous. At any rate in 699 B.C. his brother Ḫallušu imprisoned him and took the rule in Elam. How long Sennacherib was occupied over his preparations for the extirpation of Merodach-baladan is not clear; but it was in 693 B.C. that he pillaged Nagitu, Ḫilmu, Pillatu, and Ḫupapanu. This invasion was at once revenged by Ḫallušu. While Sennacherib was triumphing in the S., the king of Elam made a raid into Babylonia, captured Sippara, slew its people, defeated Ašur-nâdin-šum and carried him captive to Elam, whence he seems never to have returned. The king of Elam then set Nêrgal-ušêzib on the throne of Babylon. Nêrgal-ušêzib at once set to work, evidently assisted by Elamite troops, to occupy the country in Sennacherib's rear. In Tammuz he occupied Nippur. He attacked Erech and pillaged its gods and people. His Elamite allies carried off the gods and people. This was on the first of Tešrîtu; but on the seventh he met the victorious army of Sennacherib returning from the S. and was defeated, captured, and carried off to Assyria, after a reign of a year and six months. This was in 693 B.C. At the end of this year Ḫallušu of Elam was killed in a revolution and was succeeded by Kudur-naḫundi. Sennacherib is silent as to the troubles in Babylonia and the fate of Ašur-nâdin-šum. But he appends to the account of the sixth expedition the statement that on his return he defeated and captured Šuzub, son of Gaḫul, who had seated himself on the throne of Babylon. He ascribes this revolution to the Babylonians, who had fled with Merodach-baladan to Elam, and had returned thence to Babylon. Sennacherib then sent an army against the Elamite auxiliaries while he apparently pursued his way to Assyria. His army defeated that of Elam and slew the king of Elam's son.

It was clear that Sennacherib could not pass over such conduct as Elam had shown. In his 'seventh campaign,' Sennacherib raided the land. He claims to have captured thirty-four fortified cities and an endless number of smaller towns, 'the smoke of their burning lay over the land like a cloud.' But Kudur-naḫḫundi would not meet the invader, who seems only to have ravaged the lowlands. Sennacherib states that the king of Elam returned to Madaktu, a mountain fortress. Thither Sennacherib determined to follow and root him out. Kudur-naḫḫundi abandoned Madaktu and fled to Ḫidalu, a remote mountain fastness. Sennacherib attacked Madaktu; but in the hills winter came on so fast and the storms were so severe that he could not press the assault, and returned to Nineveh. Kudur-naḫḫundi did not survive more than three months, and was succeeded by a brother Umman-minânu, whom Sennacherib regarded as a man without sense or prudence.

Sennacherib with his plunder-laden army had passed Babylon by on his return from the S., and though he had captured its king Nêrgal-ušêzib at Nippur and driven the Elamites out of Babylonia, and subsequently raided Elam, he had not yet entered the capital. Doubtless his first efforts had been directed to an attempt to recover his son from Elam, and the place was hateful to him. Now, when he would enter Babylon, he found that the inhabitants had made themselves a new king, Mušêzib-Marduk, another Chaldæan. He is credited with reigning four years—692-88 B.C. Sennacherib calls him a felon who had fled from the prefect of Laḫiri and had collected a band of murderers and robbers, and taken refuge in the marshes. When surrounded by Sennacherib before, he managed to escape to Elam; but when he found there only danger and trouble, he had come back to Babylon and there found means to secure the throne. He broke open the treasure-house of Marduk's temple and sent a bribe to Umman-minânu. The latter giving no heed to the fate which Sennacherib had brought upon Elam in his last campaign, received the bribe and assembled an immense army, drawn not only from Elam, but also from many lands which had once acknowledged Assyrian power. It is interesting to note Parsua, Anzân (afterwards the land of Cyrus), Ellipi, Laḫiru, Puḳudu, Gambulu; also Samuna, son of Merodach-baladan. The forces reached Babylon and effected a junction with Mušêzib-Marduk. It was the greatest coalition that had yet faced Sennacherib. In his eighth campaign he met them at Ḫalulê on the Tigris, and the chronicler waxes eloquent over the immense array that faced the Assyrian army. They were 'like a great swarm' of locusts. 'The dust of their feet was like a heavy storm cloud which spreads over the wide heaven about to break in downpour.' The account of the battle given by Sennacherib is a masterpiece of description, but too long to quote. He claims to have defeated his enemies with tremendous slaughter and terrible butchery. The Babylonian Chronicle, however, claims the victory for Elam. At any rate Sennacherib returned to Nineveh for a time. It is not clear in which year the battle occurred; perhaps it was in 691 B.C. In 689 B.C. (Nisan the 15th), Umman-minânu had a stroke of paralysis and lost his speech. Sennacherib seized the opportunity to attack Babylon, which was without Elamite assistance. On the first of Kislimu the city was taken, Mušêzib-Marduk was carried away captive to Assyria, Marduk himself was taken to Ašur. Babylon was sacked, its walls razed to the ground, the greater portion of the houses burnt, its inhabitants driven out, or deported, and the waters of the Euphrates turned over the site. For eight years the Babylonian Chronicle and Ptolemy's Canon write the city down as 'kingless.'

Some time after this Sennacherib made an expedition to Arabia. This we learn from a notice by Esarhaddon. Aduma was captured and the gods carried off to Assyria. Winckler sees in this an excuse for postulating a second expedition of Sennacherib to the W., at any rate to Arabia and Egypt. Several fragmentary inscriptions have been published which are consistent with the supposition that there is a cylinder at least partly preserved, which narrated events occurring after 688 B.C. There is no means, however, of dating the events until the remaining historical inscriptions are published. The reference to Azekah, noted by Hommel, may belong to the reign of Sargon. No convincing evidence from cuneiform sources is available to support a second expedition of Sennacherib to the W. All sources are silent as to the last eight years of his reign.

4. Other details. Sennacherib was the maker of NINEVEH (q.v.). His inscriptions are very full on the subject of his great buildings there. Some think that it was with a view to make Nineveh supreme that he humbled Babylon so completely; but the trouble it had given him and the memory of his son amply account for his policy.

Besides Ašur-nâdin-šum, king of Babylon, 699-693 B.C., doubtless Sennacherib's eldest son, we know of a son Ardi-Bêlit, crown prince in Nineveh, in 694 B.C.; Ašur-šum-ušabši, a son for whom Sennacherib built a palace at Scherif Khān; Nêrgal-šum-(uṣur?), named in 693 B.C.; Šar-eṭir-Ašur, whom Winckler would make the Sharezer of 2 K. 19 37; and ESARHADDON (q.v.), who succeeded him. The mother of Esarhaddon seems to have borne the names Zakûtu and Naḳîa. For an account of a jewel belonging to this queen, see Scheil, Rec. des Trav., and see the article ESARHADDON for her rôle as regent in Assyria. Her sister was called Abirami. Sennacherib also left a daughter called Mattê.

Sennacherib was murdered by his son, according to the Babylonian Chronicle, and the Canon Lists, on the 20th of Ṭebêtu, 682 B.C. On the biblical account of the murder, see ADRAMMELECH, SHAREZER, and NISROCH. C. H. W. J.

5. Relations with Judah. With regard to the history of the relations between Sennacherib and the kingdom of Judah, there is much difference of opinion. The chief points in dispute are (1) whether the Hebrew narratives, except where they coincide with the cuneiform record, can be used at all for historical purposes, and (2) whether these narratives, if based upon facts, relate to one period, or to two, in the reign of Sennacherib. That the first of the three portions, into which Stade and his successors have analysed the Hebrew record, agrees in the main with the cuneiform record, is obvious. That portion consists of barely four verses (2 K. 18 13*b* [from עלה]-16), and probably comes from the royal annals of Judah. It states (so too Is. 36 1*b*) that Sennacherib took 'all' the fortified cities of Judah (Sennacherib himself says forty-six), and exacted a heavy tribute from Hezekiah as the price of forgiveness; two points of difference in the respective accounts, (1) as to the amount of the tribute,[1] and (2) as to the place to which the tribute was sent (Lachish? Nineveh?), need not be dwelt upon. The second and the third portion (i.e., 18 17-19 9*a* and 36 f. 19 9*b*-35), however, contain several statements which are unconfirmed by Sennacherib.[2] Thus (1) in 2 K. 19 9 (Is. 37 9)—i.e., in the second narrative—we are told that Tirhakah took the field against Sennacherib, and it is implied that this stood in close relation to the withdrawal of Sennacherib from Palestine. (2) 2 K. 19 35 (Is. 37 36) tells us that 185,000 men in the Assyrian army were destroyed in one night by pestilence—the explanation which the third narrative gives of the failure of Sennacherib's invasion of Judah. (3) 2 K. 19 8 (Is. 37 8) speaks of Sennacherib as engaged in the siege of Libnah when the news respecting Tirhakah reached him—i.e., the third narrative gives the prominence to Libnah which the first and the second (see 2 K. 18 14 17 Is. 36 2) give to Lachish. The first and the second of these statements are commonly supposed to be confirmed by the legend in Herod. 2 141, that when Σαναχάριβος, king of the Arabians and Assyrians, invaded Egypt and besieged Pelusium in the days of the pious king Sethōs, field-mice gnawed the quivers and shield-handles of the invaders, who precipitately fled. Even Winckler and Prašek accept this view, and they find in the passage of Herodotus a support for their theory (which is accepted by Guthe [Gesch. 205] and Benzinger) that Sennacherib made a second expedition to S. Palestine and NW. Arabia (in the course of which he actually besieged Jerusalem) some time between 690 and 681, which is referred to in the third narrative, whilst the second narrative relates to the expedition of 701, in the course of which Jerusalem was only blockaded, not besieged.

We shall do well in considering this theory to put aside altogether the material in the second and the third Hebrew narrative, for a close examination of them clearly shows that they are parallel. The two narratives are no doubt inconsistent in some respects; but upon the whole they interlace and are mutually complementary. All depends, therefore, on the justice of the inference drawn from Herod. 2 141. Prašek[3] conceives himself to have shown that the Sēthōs of Herodotus is no other than Tirhakah. That Egypt was a member of the coalition against Sennacherib is shown by the presence of 'kings of Egypt' at the battle of Altaḳu (Schr. KAT(2) 302 f.), and the designation of Σαναχάριβος as 'king of the Arabians and Assyrians' is thought to be a record of the fact (?) that after his successes against the NW. Arabian tribes Sennacherib assumed the title of 'king of Arabia'; lastly, the mouse is said to be the symbol of pestilence. The objection is threefold. (1) As Winckler has shown, it was the kings of Muṣri (מִצְרִים), not of Egypt (מִצְרַיִם), who fought at Altaḳu; (2) We have no occasion to assume that 'Sethos' is written in error for 'Tirhakah'; and (3) there is no trustworthy evidence that a mouse is the symbol of pestilence (see HEZEKIAH, § 2, col. 2059). The second of these criticisms may need some explanation. The reason why scholars equate Sethos with Tirhakah is simply that Herodotus gives his Arabian and Assyrian king the name of Σαναχάριβος. But how if Herodotus or his informant has made a confusion? And how if the king of Egypt really intended was Seti (the natural equivalent of Sethos)? As Brugsch relates:[1]—

'The wars of Seti towards the E. began in the first year of his reign. The scene of them was the districts and the fortresses on the territory of the Shasu, or Bedouin, "from the fortress Khetam, in the land of Zalu, to the place Kan'ana." . . . The fortress Kan'ana was stormed by Seti and his warriors, and so Pharaoh became the lord of the entire Edomite Negeb.'

The name of the Shasu chief is not given us. It is not unreasonable to suppose that the popular tradition caught up by Herodotus spoke of 'the chieftain of the Arabian Shasu,' and that this became to Herodotus' ears, '[Sennacherib] the king of the Arabians and Assyrians.'

The result, so far attained, is that the only historical accounts of the campaign of Sennacherib against Judah and its capital are to be found in the cuneiform inscriptions of Sennacherib and in the short extract from the Annals of Judah (2 K. 18 13*b*-16). But how is the rest of the Hebrew narrative to be accounted for? We are not bound to answer the question here at length; but some suggestions must be given. According to Marti (Jes. 259), the subject of the deliverance of Jerusalem from Sennacherib attracted imaginative and didactic writers. This, indeed, is about all that we could venture to say, as the text of the Hebrew narrative now stands. But it is not all that we can say, if we give due weight to critical considerations. We must not exaggerate the imaginativeness of later Hebrew writers, but rather dig deep down for the fragments of genuine tradition in their works. This is by no means a hopeless task because we know that the two powers constantly present to the minds of the peoples of Israel and of Judah were N. Arabia and Assyria; the works of the prophets of the 'Assyrian age' prove this conclusively. We have, therefore, something to direct and restrain us in our application of text-critical methods. Now in the account of the national extinction of Judah two invasions appear to be combined, an Assyrian and a N. Arabian. This leads us to suppose that such may have been the case in 2 K. 18 13-19 37. The king who invaded Judah may have been a king of Meluḫḫa—the same who sent troops to fight against Sennacherib at Altaḳu,—and the Cush, whose king interfered with the invader's progress, may have been the N. Arabian Cush (friendly to Judah?). The names Sennacherib and Tirhaḳah may be explained on the analogy of the erroneous Σαναχάριβος of Herodotus.

The pestilence, if at all historical, may have attacked the N. Arabian army. 'Nineveh,' as in some other passages, may have come from 'Jeraḥmeel,' 'Nisroch' from 'Nimrod,' 'Adrammelech' from 'Jeraḥmeel,' and 'Ararat' (as in Gen. 8 4) from 'Aram'—i.e., 'Jeraḥmeel.' The object of the Asshurite or N. Arabian invasion would be to form one strong united empire in opposition to Assyria. It may be added that the much-disputed and badly transmitted prophecy in Is. 22 1-14 refers most probably, not to an Assyrian, but to an Asshurite siege of the Judahite capital (see VISION, VALLEY OF, and Crit. Bib.).

It may be urged in objection to these conclusions that fresh inscriptions of Sennacherib are not past hoping for. That is true; but these inscriptions will not supersede the Hebrew traditions. To attempt to write the history of the Israelites simply on the basis of the uncriticised Hebrew texts and the uncriticised Assyrian inscriptions would be a very grave mistake.

SEPHAR (סְפָר; ϲωφηρα [AEL]) is mentioned in Gen. 10 30 as one of the boundaries of the territory of the sons of Joktan. It has not been identified with certainty. The usual identification—a very appropriate one—is with the σαπφαρα, σαφαρ of Ptolemy, Pliny, and the Periplus (i.e., the ancient Himyarite capital Zafar); this again is held by Karl Ritter, Gesenius, etc., to be the same with the seaport of Ḥadramaut, near Mirbāt, the name being now pronounced Iṣfār or Isfār. The possibility of this may be granted; but it is still uncertain (see Di. Gen.(6), 201; Del. Gen. [1887], 228). 'The mountain of the East' is too general an expression to give precision to the undefined geographical terms of this verse. From Prof. Keane we quote the following lines; his work only appeared as the article OPHIR was passing through the press. 'Dhofar [=Zafār], as Bent tells us, forms a sort of oasis, an extremely rich alluvial plain, extending some sixty miles along the coast a little to the W. of the Kuria Muria islands, and cut off by the Gara range from the sandy wastes of Hadramout. Here still flourish both the myrrh and the frankincense shrub, which have constituted the chief industry of the inhabitants for thousands of years. . . . The harbour of Moscha, now nearly blocked by a sandbank, is still deep, and extends inland about a mile and a half, and there are many ruins about it. Here we have the Portus Nobilis of the Periplus' (70 f.). Here Prof. Keane would place 'the elusive Ophir.' Moscha 'was in fact the port of Ophir, which itself stood a little inland, round about the head of the inlet, which Bent tells us is surrounded by many ruins and was reached "from Mesha as thou goest into Sephar"' (82).]

If the text is right, a place or country in which Jewish captives from Jerusalem resided when Obad. 15-21 was written (Obad. 20). That Sepharad (or Sephared?) is not Spain[1] (Tg. Jon. Pesh.), nor Šipar, or some other Babylonian city (Schr. KAT(1) 285; cp von der Hardt, De Sipphara Babyloniæ [1708]) need not now be shown. Schrader in KAT(2) 445 f. identifies it with Saparda, a region in SW Media towards Babylonia mentioned by Sargon (cp KGF 116-119). This view is also accepted as most probable by Fried. Delitzsch (Par. 249) and G. A. Smith (Twelve Prophets, 2 176); it harmonises with the theory that vv. 10 (15)-21 are to be referred to the time of the 'Babylonian exile.'[2] But it is also possible to identify Sepharad with Çparda, a province of the Persian empire mentioned in two inscriptions of Darius between Cappadocia and Ionia, and in a third (Behistun) at the head of the list of provinces, immediately before Ionia.[3] In the Seleucidan chronicles from Babylonia this name is applied to Asia Minor as a whole. According to Winckler, the origin of the Jewish captivity of Asia Minor is to be referred to 168 B.C. (Antiochus Epiphanes); if, however, the tradition of a captivity under Artaxerxes Ochus is historical, this period will naturally deserve the preference. W. R. Smith remarks,[4] 'Lydia was a great slave-market, and Asia Minor was a chief seat of the Diaspora at an early date (cp Gutschmid, Neue Beitr. 77).'

The text of Obad. 20, however, is very far from trustworthy, and the context does not favour the view that any distant place of captivity or indeed (see OBADIAH, § 5) any place of captivity at all is referred to. We expect some part of the Negeb to be mentioned. It is not too bold to take ספרד as a dittographed צרפת.[5] This is confirmed by 𝔊's reading εφραθα (so the Ar.

SEPHARVAIM (סְפַרְוַיִם; variously σεπφαρειμ, -ιν, -ειν, -ουαιμ, -ουαιν, ουμαιν [2 K. 18 34, B], -ουν, σεφφαρουαιμ, -ουαιν, -ουν, επιφαρουαιμ, επφ., επφαρενι, εμφαριν σεπφαρουεμ), whence the gentilic Sepharvites (הַסְפַרְוִים, 2 K. 17 31*a*, Kt. in v. 31*b* ספרים). The references to a place, or places, called 'Sepharvaim' are in 2 K. 17 24 (cp 31), 18 34 (= Is. 36 19), 19 13 (= Is. 37 13). Taking the passages as they stand, in contexts relating to the political intercourse between Assyria and Israel or Judah, we may venture to explain them provisionally as follows, reserving our own judgment to the end.

1. OT references.

1. The passage 2 K. 18 32*b*-35 (Is. 36 18-20), which is plainly an interpolation (see Marti, and cp Intr. Is. 218), seems to be based on 2 K. 19 13 (Is. 37 13), which may refer to the Syrian city called in the Babylonian Chronicle Šabarain, which was destroyed by Shalmaneser IV. (see SIBRAIM).

2. The Sepharvaim of 2 K. 17 24 31 (in which passages captives of war appear to be referred to), however, is more plausibly identified[1] with Sipar, or Sippar, the city of Šamaš the sun-god (Σιπφαρα, Ptol. 5 18; Σιππαρηνῶν πόλις, Abyden. ap. Eus. Præp. Ev. 9 41), famous from its association with the Deluge-story as given by Berossus, and regarded as one of the maḫazi rabûti, or 'great capitals.'[2] This place was one of the three cities which maintained the great Babylonian revolt against Ašur-bani-pal the longest. It was on the left or eastern bank of the Euphrates; the site was identified with the mounds of Abu Ḥabba, about 16 m. SE. of Baghdād, by the explorer H. Rassam, who found here a large stone with a representation of the shrine of Šamaš and short inscriptions, dating from the time of king Nabu-abla-iddina (about 800 B.C.). The builder of the temple was Naram-sin (about 3750 B.C.), whose original inscription was found by Nabu-na'id (about 490 B.C.), one of the royal restorers of the sanctuary. The temple was held in high honour; one of the most constant titles of Šamaš was, 'the great lord, dwelling in Ê-bara, which is within Sipar' (Pinches, TSBA 8 b 164 ff.). But there was also a second divinity, called Anunit, who was specially worshipped at Sipar. In the Synchronous History (2 18-21), Durkurigalzu is said to have conquered Sipar of Šamaš and Sipar of Anunitu (KB 1 199; Sayce, TSBA 2 131); the Anunitu referred to was the consort of the sun-god. We must not, however, use this statement to confirm Schrader's (very natural) explanation of ANAMMELECH (2 K. 17 31) as = Anu-malku, for if Anu (the heaven-god) were designated 'king' in Assyria, the word used would not be malku ('prince') but šarru.

2. Assyriological evidence.

Dr. W. H. Ward (Proc. Am. Or. Soc., 1885, pp. 29*f.*) thought that he had found the site of a double city of Sipar (Sepharvaim, dual?) at the mod. el-Anbar, a few miles from Sufeira, WNW. of Baghdād, where, from the appearance of the ruins, it is evident that a canal was conducted from the Euphrates into the heart of the city. Dr. Ward found there a small tablet on which three or four Sipars were mentioned, and he supposed 'Anbar to represent at once Sipar ša Anunitum and Agané (Peters, Nippur, 1 176 355 [Dr. Ward's diary]). If so, Sipar ša Anunitum was a more considerable city than Sipar of Šamaš (Abu Ḥabba). But we can hardly admit that the duality of the city which lies under the mound of el-Anbar is made out. Most probably the form Sepharvaim is erroneous. Either the editor confounded 'Sipar' with the 'Sepharvaim' of 2 K. 19 13, or, as Haupt proposes, we should restore the reading סִפַּר מַיִם (or סִפַּר), Sipar (or, Sippar) -maim[1]—i.e., 'Sipar on the stream.' Cp the phrase 'the stream of Sipar,' a title of the Euphrates (ZA 1 [1887], p. 267).

There is, however, a threefold difficulty in the above explanation of 'Sepharvaim' in 2 K. 17 24. (1) The Annals of Ašur-bani-pal do not affirm that the king transplanted people from Babylon, Kutu (Cuthah), and Sipar, but only that he 'commanded that they should remain alive, and caused them to dwell in Babylon.'[2] (2) The god specially worshipped at Sipar was neither 'Adrammelech' nor 'Anammelech' but Šamaš. On the other hand, it is equally true that Sargon, who as a fact brought captive populations to Samaria (KB 2 43 l. 20; cp SAMARIA), did not and could not include any captives from Babylon, Sepharvaim, etc., for the excellent reason that he made none there.[3] And (3) the theory in question requires us to suppose that Avva and Hamath have been introduced into 2 K. 17 24 from 18 34 by R_D,[4] which is a complicated procedure.

3. Objections to current theories.

The question of Sepharvaim is therefore no simple one. At present there is no current theory which satisfies the conditions of the problem. There is a strong a priori objection to distinguishing the Sepharvaim of 2 K. 19 13 and 18 34 (with the parallels in Is.) from that of 2 K. 17 24 31, and there are three considerable difficulties in this course, two suggested by Assyriology and one by literary criticism. Let us, then, approach the subject, bearing in mind the gradually accumulating evidence for the apparently destructive but in reality conservative theory that many passages both of the narrative and of the prophetic books have been recast, and provided with a new historical and geographical setting. It is by no means an impossible view that the passages in Kings and Isaiah here referred to have been recast by an editor to suit his own theory of the course of later Israelitish history (see SENNACHERIB, § 5). This view implies that the names of the cities mentioned there have come out of somewhat similar names of places on the N. Arabian border of Palestine.

4. Textual criticism.

Sepharvaim, like Rezeph in 2 K. 19 12 (Is. 37 12), will then be a distortion of Ṣarephath, one of the most important places in that region (see ZAREPHATH), or rather the final letters וים (MT וַיִם, vayim) are, together with לעיר (MT לְעִיר, 'to, or of, the city'), הנע (MT הֵנַע, 'Hena'?), and possibly ועוה (MT, וְעִוָּה, 'and Ivvah'?), representatives of ירחמאל (Jerahmeel). It is noteworthy that the god worshipped by the 'Sepharvites' receives the double name אדרמלך and ענמלך (2 K. 17 31). In the latter form נ has displaced ר (cp עכור and עכן); probably the best intermediate reading is ארמלך, the original of which is surely ירחמאל (Jerahmeel).[5] The rite of sacrificing children was apparently distinctive of some famous sanctuary in Jerahmeel (see MORIAH, and cp Crit. Bib. on Gen. 22 2 Jer. 2 34 11 15).

The other passages which have to be considered in this connection are Ezra 4 8-10 (see SHUSHANCHITES) and Is. 10 9 (see Crit. Bib.). See also REZEPH.

[5] The most plausible alternative original is מרדך 'Marduk' or 'Merodach' (cp NISROCH). This is favoured by 'Nergal' in the same list. But it must perhaps be owned that 'Nergal' is only a little less doubtful than ADRAMMELECH [q.v.].

'Heber' and 'Malchiel' (=Jerahmeel) both point to the south (cp ASHER, § 4); of Asher's original settlement in the Negeb we may perhaps still possess a record in an early poem (see Crit. Bib. on Judg. 5 17). 'Serah' too will be a southern ethnic name; cp זֶרַח, Zerah, and אַשְׁחוּר, Ashhur. We have also Sab. proper names אלשרח, שרחבאל, ישרהאל, with which we might compare יפתחאל (root, 'to open?') the origin of which need not be discussed here.

SERAIAH (שְׂרָיָה, once [Jer. 36 26] שְׂרָיָהוּ, §§ 35, 80, as if 'God strives'; CAPAIA[C] [BAℵL]. Gray [HPN 236] argues from the apparent formation with a perf. followed by יה that 'Seraiah' can hardly be an early name. The formation has indeed been questioned, though perhaps without sufficient reason. It is suggested that the name has been adapted from an old ethnic; cp שְׂרִי. Note that in 1 Ch. 4 14 Joab, b. Seraiah, is called the father of Ge-harashim, which is probably a distortion of the ethnic Geshurim, or of Ge-ashhurim [Che.]).

1. David's scribe (2 S. 8 17: ασα [B]), probably miswritten for SHAVSHA [q.v.].

2. b. Azriel, one of those whom Jehoiakim commanded to take Jeremiah and Baruch (Jer. 36 26: σαρεα [Bℵ]).

3. b. Tanhumeth, a captain, temp. Gedaliah (2 K. 25 23 Jer. 40 8).

4. b. Neriah and brother of Baruch, mentioned in a passage (Jer. 51 59-61, σαιραια [A*fort once v. 59], σαρεας [ℵ once v. 59]) which follows a prophecy (50 51 1-58) wrongly ascribed to Jeremiah. He is said to have gone up to Babylon with (or, see below, from) ZEDEKIAH [q.v.], carrying a prophecy of Jeremiah on the fate of Babylon, which he was commanded to bind to a stone and cast into the Euphrates, as a sign that Babylon would sink and not rise again. Seraiah bears a title which AV renders 'a quiet prince' and RV 'chief chamberlain' (so AVmg., Rashi, etc. שַׂר מְנוּחָה). 'Prince of Menucha' (AVmg.) is evidently a resource of despair; Menucha = Manahath (!) 1 Ch. 8 6. Another interpretation is 'officer of resting-place' = quartermaster (so Hi., Gr., Giesebr.); this strangely poetical title is assumed to have belonged to the officer who arranged the halting-places of the royal train.[1] More probably, however, Seraiah's office was that of commissary of the tribute (שַׂר־הַמִּנְחָה, 𝔊, Tg., Grä., Che.). This view implies a further correction of 'with' into 'from Zedekiah.' Note that Jeremiah's interest is entirely absorbed in Seraiah (v. 61, 'when thou comest, and seest,' etc.).

But is this story historical? It has the appearance of being Haggadic, i.e., an edifying romance. See JEREMIAH (BOOK), § 17, and cp Giesebrecht's commentary.

5. b. Kenaz, brother of Othniel and father of JOAB 2 (1 Ch. 4 13 f. σαρια [A v. 14]). See ad init.

6. b. Asiel of SIMEON (§ 9 iii.), 1 Ch. 4 35 (σαραιαν [B]).

7. A chief priest in the time of Zedekiah, who was put to death by Nebuchadrezzar (2 K. 25 18 ff. Jer. 52 24 ff. [BℵAΓ om.]). The Chronicler traces his origin to Eleazar b. Aaron (1 Ch. 6 4 ff. [5 30 ff.]); he is the son of Azariah b. Hilkiah (v. 13), and father of JEHOZADAK [q.v.]. In Ezra 7 1 ff. Ezra, who was perhaps not even a priest at all, is made a son of Seraiah, which betrays the desire of the priestly redactor to bring him into the high-priestly family (cp EZRA, GENEALOGIES i., § 7 [iv.]). The same fragment of genealogy springs up again in Neh. 11 11, where Seraiah b. Hilkiah is called נְגִיד בֵּית הָאֱלֹהִים (cp 2 Ch. 31 13), cp also 1 Ch. 9 11, where, however, the name is replaced by Azariah. In 1 Esd. 5 5 2 Esd. 1 1 SARAIAS, EV; but RV AZARAIAS, 1 Esd. 8 1.

8. One of those who came up from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2 2 αραιας [BA*?]), in Neh. 7 7 called AZARIAH (17). His name appears in 1 Esd. 5 8 as ZACHARIAS, RV ZARAIAS (ζαραιου [B], ζαρεου [A]).

9. Priestly signatory to the covenant (see EZRA i., § 7); Neh. 10 2 [3]; cp 12 1. In Neh. 12 12 the house of Seraiah is first on the list, whence we infer that in the mind of the Chronicler his family was considered to be of great importance, and perhaps therefore connected by him with Seraiah (7). See SAREA.

SERAPHIM (שְׂרָפִים, CEPAΦ[E]IM, -N [BℵAQΓ], CAP. [ℵ* once]), supernatural guardians of the throne of Yahwè, mentioned and partly described in the account of Isaiah's inaugural vision (Is. 6 2-4 6 f.).

1. References. 'Above him stood the sĕrāphīm'—i.e., they seemed to tower above Yahwè, who was enthroned in the most sacred part of the temple (the דְּבִיר). Each had six wings; a pair covered the face, another the loins, and the third served for flight, when Yahwè sent his servant on some errand. Responsively they proclaimed the antiphon, 'Holy, holy, holy is Yahwè Ṣĕbāōth; the whole earth is full of his glory,' and so powerful were their voices that the posts (read אַמּוֹת) of the doorway trembled. Then one of the seraphim flew to Isaiah with a 'hot stone' (see COAL, § 1) from the altar in his hand, and touched Isaiah's mouth with it, as a symbol of the purification of his lips. The seraphim are not mentioned again by name in the OT or the NT, though in Rev. 4 6-8 the four cherub-like beings (ζῷα) sing the anthem of Isaiah's seraphim. But in Enoch 20 7 'the serpents' (δράκοντες, Giz. Gk.)—i.e., no doubt the seraphim—are mentioned together with Paradise and the cherubim as under the rule of Gabriel, and in 61 10 71 7 with the cherubim and the ophanim; the latter classification also occurs in the Talmud (cp CHERUB, § 1). And in the Slavonic 'Secrets of Enoch' (first edited by Charles) we find not only cherubim and seraphim mentioned together as orders of angels (20 1 21 1), but also seven six-winged creatures overshadowing the throne of God and singing with one voice (19 6 21 1), who are obviously the same as the seraphim and certain flying creatures that sing called Chalkadri (= 'crocodiles'? cp COCKATRICE), with the feet and tails of lions and the heads of crocodiles, mentioned with the fabulous Phœnix-bird (12 1 15 1). These creatures have twelve wings, and attend the chariot of the sun; evidently they are a modification of the seraphim.

2. Explanations. Passing over the view that the seraphim are merely a class of 'high' or 'noble' angels (Ar. šarufa, to be high), we note three possible views as to the original meaning of the name.

1. Fried. Delitzsch and Hommel see a connection between sārāphim and Šarrāpu (the burner), which is given as one of the names of the Babylonian solar fire-god Nergal 'in the land of the west'—i.e., in Canaan (5 R. 46, 22, c.d.; Jensen, Kosmol. 62).

This suggests that Rešeph, the old Palestinian solar fire-god (CIS 1 38), also admitted (as Rešpu) into the Egyptian Pantheon, may possibly in early times have been called Śārāph. If Rekūb (one of the gods of Sam'al in N. Syria) were really, as Halévy thought, the same as Kĕrūb, 'Cherub,' this would supply a parallel. The Sārāphīm (not Sĕrāphīm) would in this case be a mythic rendering of the supernatural flames in which this god revealed himself (cp Cant. 8 6 Job 5 7?); the form which they took would naturally be that of the lion (cp NERGAL). And Isaiah's Śārāphīm (?) may have been suggested by mythic forms which perhaps existed in the temple, similar to the nergalli or colossal winged lions with human heads which, like the colossal winged bulls, guarded the portals of Bab.-Ass. temples and palaces. We find 'lions, oxen, and cherubim' mentioned together in 1 K. 7 29.

2. Another possibility is that the Śĕrāphim (not Śārāphim) were originally, in accordance with Nu. 21 8 Is. 14 29, serpents; Arabian and Hebrew folk-lore placed flying serpents, with burning venomous bite, in the desert, and Hebrew mythographers may have represented winged serpents as the guardians of the dwelling of the Deity. The place of honour given to living serpents in the Egyptian temples, is remarked upon elsewhere (see SERPENT, § 3 [f.]), and though to Isaiah the seraphic guards of Yahwè have assumed a higher form of being (see SBOT, 'Isaiah,' 139), yet no one who remembers the frequency with which in folk-lore serpents are transformed into human beings, can pronounce such a development impossible. It is true, there is no mention of the seraphim in the Hebrew story of Paradise as it has come down to us. But it is quite possible (see PARADISE, § 11) that the serpent

[1] Several Palmyrene inscriptions state that they have been set up 'in honour of the leader of the caravan (רב משריתא) by the senate and people.'

(nāhāš) who held discourse with the first woman was originally represented as the guardian of the wonderful tree in the midst of God's garden. There may have been originally only one seraph just as there may have been only one cherub (cp Ezek. 28 14 16 Ps. 18 10 [11]).

3. It is also possible to regard the seraph as a nobler development of a bird of prey. H. G. Tomkins long ago suggested a comparison with the Egyptian seref, which appears as the guardian of graves and as the bearer of the Egyptian kings to heaven on their decease.

The seref is met with as early as the pyramid texts; in a late papyrus he is said to 'seize [his prey] in his claws in an instant and take them above the top of the clouds of heaven.'[1] It is a composite animal, and bears a close resemblance to the Hebrew cherub and to the γρύψ or griffin (part lion, part eagle).

The arguments in favour of the second of these views preponderate. It is against the first that we find no trace of שָׂרָף as a divine name, and against the third that it leaves no real distinction between the seraph and the cherub. And it is against both that שרפים is so much more naturally rendered 'serpents' than either 'burning ones' or 'serefs.' It may seem strange that the symbolism of the temple decoration made no use of the seraphim. But the temple did contain one sacred object closely analogous to the original seraphim—the so-called 'brazen serpent' (see NEHUSHTAN). Hezekiah broke it in pieces. The Jewish and Christian imagination did something better with the seraphim inherited from folk-lore; it transformed and ennobled them. See CHERUBIM, § 1. T. K. C.

The Sermon on the Mount is the conventional title given to an address variously reported by the first (Mt. 5-7. ἀνέβη εἰς τὸ ὄρος) and the third (Lk. 6 20-49) canonical evangelists, assigned by both to the early Galilean mission of Jesus. The remarkable divergencies and as remarkable coincidences between the reports constitute a problem of some nicety which is bound up with the general synoptic question. How far free editorial revision upon the part of each author extended in the case of these reports of the Sermon, and how far it is feasible not simply to reconstruct the original address as that lay in the Matthean Logia (= Q) or in the Greek recensions of Q used with other material by each writer, but also to estimate its historicity and actual situation in the life of Jesus—these are questions to which no answer can be attempted until a firm foothold has been obtained upon a critical examination of each report and a comparative analysis of their contents.

1. Critical presuppositions. Evidently unknown to the original Mk. ('Ur-Marcus'), the sermon transmitted in Q seems to have simply borne the title 'to disciples' and a general reference to the Galilæan period—to judge at least from the unfettered way in which Mt. and Lk. make a place for it in their narratives.

[1] Revillout, Révue égyptienne, 1881, p. 86; see Proph. Is.(2) 284, (3) 296.

The idiosyncrasies of the reports, too marked to be explained from the separate use of Q by each editor, necessitate the hypothesis that they had at their disposal different recensions of Matthew's vernacular logia-collection, which had originated in various circles of faith and practice. Translation such as Papias mentions certainly would involve editing; the fluidity of interests in the primitive church, together with the absence of any definite authority upon the biography of Jesus, exposed evangelical collections to considerable vicissitudes, even before they came under the free but neither arbitrary nor doctrinaire handling of an editor with religious aims and prepossessions of his own (see GOSPELS, §§ 120 f.), to say nothing of the diverse needs of edification. Upon the characteristics of the recension used by Lk. see P. Ewald, Das Hauptproblem der Evang.-frage (1890), 212 f., 216 f.; Soltau, Eine Lücke der synopt. Forschung (1899), 3-5, and Feine, Eine vorkanon. Ueberlieferung des Lucas (1891), 142 f.

The place assigned to this oratio montana[1] in our first gospel illustrates the literary method which here as

2. In Mt.: setting. elsewhere leads Mt. to produce his effects by means of massing together alternate groups of incidents and of sayings, not infrequently taken from various quarters without strict regard to what may have been their original setting or chronological sequence.

As in Mk., which (substantially) lay before Mt., the baptism and the temptation of Jesus are followed by his return northwards to Galilee and the choice of the first disciples (Mt. 3 1-4 22 = Mk. 1 1-20). So far the two writings generally agree. But whilst Mk. proceeds to narrate the healing ministry of Jesus in detail, Mt. either postpones this till he reaches his cycle of miracles (Mt. 8 14-17 = Mk. 1 29-34 Lk. 4 38-41) or omits part of it altogether as irrelevant to his plan (Mk. 1 35-38 = Lk. 4 42 f.), hurrying on to elaborate an impression of Jesus as the prophet and authority of the new religion. The description of a preaching tour in the Galilæan synagogues, which fell here in the primitive document underlying the synoptists (Mk. 1 39 = Lk. 4 44), is expanded by Mt. (4 23-25) somewhat vaguely[2] in order to form an introduction to two separate cycles of (a) instruction, and (b) healing. The author's plan thus is to represent Jesus successively as teaching and preaching (διδάσκων καὶ κηρύσσων: 5-7) and as healing (θεραπεύων: 8-9 34, a cycle, for the most part, of ten miracles). The exigencies of this method postpone to the latter phase all the incidents narrated in their proper place by Mk. (1 40-3 12) and Lk. (5 12-6 11 17-19). In historical order these ought to form a prelude to Mt. 5-7, upon which they serve to throw occasionally rays of light.

The inner structure of the address corresponds in part, but only in part, to its setting.[3] Out of the

3. Structure. crowds, Galilæan and non-Galilæan, who thronged Jesus on the border of the lake, his adherents gathered to him as he retired to the hill-slope (5 1 f.). What follows is represented as an address delivered to them directly, in the hearing of the larger throng (7 28 f.). Jesus seizes the opportunity to proclaim vividly and openly his aims and methods in a magna charta of the new reign of God. With large and divine utterance (ἀνοίξας τὸ στόμα αὐτοῦ), he at once lays bare the continuity of his message with the religious tradition of the people, and explicitly differentiates what made up the original element in his own ideal as compared with that of current Judaism.

The address opens with a reflective but glowing description of the genuine religious character, in its demands and privileges. The eight beatitudes (5 3-10), of which the last is repeated and specially applied to his hearers (5 11 f.), define a spirit of chastened and unselfish devotion towards God and man, rather than a robust attitude to the world.[1] But Jesus the rabbi hastens[2] to explain that his ideal, so far from being parochial or pusillanimous, involves an unflinching stand before hardship and duty (5 13-16);[3] so little was it a relaxed method of piety,[4] that it demanded from men a loftier and more exacting conduct than that taught or practised by the conventional rabbinical religion of the day (5 17-20).[5] This avowal naturally suggests the new and final attitude of Jesus[6] to the Jewish Law, which is exemplified with brilliant and effective paradox in five or six crucial instances (5 21-48) of the radical antithesis between the new legislation and the old jurisprudence with its ethical limitations. The new rests on motive and inner disposition, summed up in ungrudging charity to one's enemies; thus Jesus rounds off the circle of thought started in the beatitudes, cutting up the poisonous growths of evasion and quibbling by unconditional precepts of incisive brevity.

[1] For the question of the Sermon's ethical originality, which does not fall within the scope of the present article, see especially Titius, Die NTliche Lehre von der Seligkeit (Erster Theil, 1895), 197-199; for the teaching on marriage, ibid. 67-72, and on man's consciousness of God, ibid. 114-117. [2] The incident in the Capernaum synagogue (Mk. 1 21-28 = Lk. 4 31-37) and the flight of Jesus (Mk. 1 35-38 = Lk. 4 42 f.) are both omitted.

[3] Jesus as the deliverer of a new law speaks from a hill at the opening (5 1 f.), as at the close, of the gospel (28 16, equally vague). Mt.'s moderate concern for chronology renders it uncertain how far an expansive passage like 4 23-5 1 (Ss. om. 4 24*a*) rests upon some hill-tradition, or is derived and modified from the narrative of Mk. (see the doublet 9 35-10 1). Certainly in 5 1 there is no tinge of contempt for the crowd as composed of χάμαι συρομένων (Chrys.).

The principle of inwardness and sincerity is then expounded (6 1-18), pointedly and strongly like all effective principles, in the shape of a triple antithesis to the Pharisaic praxis of almsgiving, prayer, and fasting, which, by their externality, develop ostentation. Jesus then recurs[7] to the positive relation of man to God's fatherly providence (6 19-34, cp 5 45) as a motive for singleness of heart and for freedom from undue worldly anxiety (cp O. Holtzmann's Neutest. Zeitgesch., 1895, p. 229). The loosely joined aphoristic logia which follow (in 7 1-20), are partly resumptive and in the main accessory rather than vital to the body of the address. Warnings against censoriousness (7 1-5) with its attendant hypocrisy, and the opposite (though less common) fault of an undiscriminating temper which is blind to the differences of men (7 6); an encouragement to prayer, based on God's fatherly goodness (7 7-11); a reiteration of the golden rule (7 12); a call to personal effort and independence in seeking life (7 13 f.); a warning against being misled by false prophets, whose conduct is to be made their test (7 15-20); these lead up to the epilogue (7 21-27), in which spurious discipleship[8] is exposed, and (by means of a parable) the responsibility of hearers and the wisdom of practical obedience to Jesus' commands are vividly depicted.

4. Characteristics. In style, conception, and arrangement, Mt.'s elaborate and prolonged Sermon shows traces of his workmanship and characteristic traits. It is a composition rather than an actual address. That it was carried in some retentive memory as it now stands, is a perfectly unmanageable hypothesis. The well-known habit of compiling material, which stamps Mt.'s Gospel, is legible all through the oratio montana; earlier and later logia are massed together, and even their dexterous union cannot obliterate their heterogeneous nature and foreign sites.[1] Mt.'s Sermon, to a much larger degree than Lk.'s, is neither consecutive in trend nor a unity in time; internal evidence, and the comparative evidence gained from Lk., put this beyond the reach of doubt. The very style shows how the source has been worked over.

In Mt. 5-7 we have the author's favourite 'come unto' (προσέρχομαι) in the introduction (like Lk.'s 'as he was' [ἐν τῷ infin.] 11 1 etc.), and favourite or characteristic phrases throughout the whole—e.g., '(and) then' ([καὶ] τότε: 5 24 7 5 23), 'verily' (ἀμήν: 5 18 etc.), 'say . . . against . . .' (εἰπεῖν τι κατά τινος: 5 11 12 32), 'again' (πάλιν: 5 33 etc.), 'be seen' (φαίνομαι: 6 5 16 18), intrans. 'do' (ποιεῖν) with adverb (5 47 6 2 7 12 = Lk. 6 31), 'be done' (γενηθήτω: 6 10, not in Lk.; Acts 1 20 𝔊), 'it was said' (ἐρρέθη: 5 21 etc., non-Lucan), verbs in -ευειν (νηστεύειν, προφητεύειν, φονεύειν, ἀγγαρεύειν), 'go thy way' (ὕπαγε: 5 24), 'whoever' (ὅστις: 5 39 41 7 15 24 = ὅς, Lk. 6 48), 'till' (ἕως: 5 18 26), 'before [men]' (ἔμπροσθεν: 5 16 24 6 1 f. 7 6), 'for so' (οὕτως γάρ: 2 5 3 15 5 12), the simpler pron. for the reflexive (5 29 6 19), πρὸς τὸ ('to') with infin. (5 28 6 1), 'that . . . may' (ὅπως [6 times]), 'as' (ὥσπερ: 6 2 etc.), 'it is profitable' (συμφέρει: 5 29 f., non-Lucan), πονηρός (-όν) of evil (one) = 5 37 39 6 13 (cp 13 19 38; Lk. 6 45 only of men), δῶρον a sacrificial gift (5 23 f.), 'raiment' (ἔνδυμα: 6 25 = Lk. 12 23 Mt. 6 28 7 15 etc.), 'in danger of' (ἔνοχος: 5 21 f., non-Lucan), 'altar' (θυσιαστήριον: 5 23 f. 23 18-20 35), 'be hid' (κρύπτω; 5 14 etc.), 'reward' (μισθός: 6 1 f. etc.), 'only' (μόνον, adv.: 5 47), 'swear' (ὀμνύω: 5 34 36 etc.), 'profess' (ὁμολογέω: 7 23 etc.), 'for this is' (οὗτος γάρ: 3 3 7 12; cp 11 10 AV), 'bring . . . to' (προσφέρω: 5 23 f. etc.), 'hypocrite' (ὑποκριτής: 6 2 5 16 7 5), 'wise' (φρόνιμος: 7 24 etc.), besides, of course, the famous kingdom of heaven (5 3 10 etc.) instead of kingdom of God, and the distinctive (except Mk. 11 25) usage of Father (in heaven, or heavenly) as applied to God (your Father occurs in Lk. only 6 36 = Mt. 5 48 and 12 30 = Mt. 6 32, besides 12 32; it is Matthæan). Of Mt.'s 120 hapax legomena the Sermon alone contains 12 (βαττολογέω, βροχή, διαλλάσσω, εἰρηνοποιός, ἐπιορκέω, εὐνοέω, ἰῶτα, καταμανθάνω, κρυφαῖος, μίλιον, πολυλογία, ῥακά, ὅρκοι (plur. = vows, 5 33), πληρόω (absol.), ἐθνικός (5 47 6 7 18 17), [βασ. τῶν οὐρανῶν] and ῥαπίζω (5 39 26 67). Phrases like on that day (7 22), κρίνειν -μα -σις (in sense of final judgment, 5 21 f. 7 1 f.) are more frequent in Mt. than in the other synoptics, and traces of the apostolic (Pauline?) age have been more or less reasonably found in expressions such as ἐργαζ. ἀνομίαν (7 23), ἀνομία (7 23), ἀπώλεια (7 13), δικαιοσύνη (5 6 etc.; Lk. 1 75 in OT sense), μωρός (5 22 7 26, etc.), ὀφειλήματα (6 12), παραπτώματα (6 14 f.), περισσεύειν (5 20), ἀγαπᾶν τὸν ἕτερον (6 24 Rom. 13 8), etc.

5. In Lk.: structure. Following in the main Mk.'s order during the narrative of the Galilæan mission, though with one characteristic (see below, § 9) transposition (Mk. 3 7-12 = Lk. 6 17-19, Mk. 3 13-19 = Lk. 6 12-16), which was introduced to provide an audience and situation for the non-Marcan address to be inserted at this point, Lk. narrates the choice of the Twelve and the subsequent position of Jesus on some level ground where he was surrounded by (a) the Twelve, (b) a large crowd of disciples, and (c) a large multitude of non-Galilæans.[2] Abbreviating Mk.'s account of Jesus as a healer of diseases, Lk.

[1] Achelis ingeniously traces missionaries (9) and martyrs (10) suffering, the latter (11 f.) generally, the former inside (12) and outside (14-16) Israel. The temper of vv. 3-10 resembles, with less eschatological emphasis, that of passages like En. 5 7, 'but for the elect there will be light and joy and peace, and they will inherit the earth.' Cp Taylor's Ancient Ideals, 2 257 f. (1896).

[2] The connection of 5 12 and 5 13 f. seems to be: as successors to the noble and devout company of the prophets, you must be prepared for hardships which flow from an open stand for religion among the people. Fear of such peril is not to deter you from taking your place, any more than the subtler temptation of false modesty. On the continuity, of which Jesus was conscious in his preaching of God's reign, between himself and the OT psalmists and prophets, see Barth, Die Hauptprobleme des Lebens Jesu, 58-67 (1899).

[3] Zahn (Einl. 2 277 287) actually makes 5 16 the theme of the sermon, emphasising the apologetic aim of the whole Gospel as a defence of Jesus and his religion against current Judaism. Grawert ingeniously tries to detect in the beatitudes a reversed programme of contents: 5 10 = 5 11-16 5 9 = 5 17-26 5 8 = 5 27-37 5 7 = 5 38-48 5 6 = 6 1-34 5 5 = 7 1 f. 5 4 = 7 3-6 5 3 = 7 7-11.

[4] The curious variation of 5 15-17 in an early Talmudic story ('I am not come to take away from the law of Moses, but to add to the law of Moses am I come,' accompanied by 'Let thy light shine in the candlestick') is supposed by Güdemann to have been derived from Mt.'s Logia. Cp Studia Biblica, 1 57-59 (Neubauer), Philol. Sacra, 45 (Nestle), and Laible, Jesus Christus im Talmud (1891), 62 f.

[5] The good works of v. 16 are simply the higher righteousness of v. 20, which (it is implied in vv. 26 and 45) reflects and reproduces on earth the character and conduct of the Father in heaven; cp Holtzm. NT Theol. 1 71 174 f.

[6] Although, in conformity to the historical situation, the claim of Jesus upon the personal life of his followers is not emphasised at this inaugural period of the ministry, and his Messianic rôle is still obscure (cp on 7 21 f.), his commanding authority and self-consciousness are evident in words like 'I come . . . I say.' Such language is the utterance of 'a superhuman self-consciousness which, as the secret of Christianity's origin and growth, must be grasped first and foremost as a fact. . . . It is quite impossible for us to conceive such an inner life. Revelation, redemption, forgiveness, help—he has it all within himself and offers it to those who yield to the impression of his personality' (Wernle, Anfänge uns. Religion, 24 f., after Baur).

[7] Mt. may, however, have meant 6 19-34 to continue the anti-Pharisaic polemic (cp Mk. 12 40 Mt. 23 25 Lk. 16 13 f.).

[8] To imitate God's ungrudging love towards men (5 43-48) or to obey his will (7 21) is as impossible along the road of legal crupulousness (5 20) as it is for mere profession and empty words. On 7 21-23 cp the (too conservative) essay by Schlatter in Greifswalder Studien, 85-105 (1895). The citation in 2 Clem. 4 accentuates the logion, 'even though ye be gathered with me in my bosom and do not my commandments, etc.'

[1] Some logia would by their nature be associated with certain places and certain people. Others would be somewhat timeless, either owing to their repetition or to their less local content. Introductory and explanatory comments, by way of setting, must have been retained by many of the primitive logia in passing from oral to written form, just as earth clings to the roots of a plucked plant. But a comparison of Mt. and Lk. shows that whilst Lk. frequently found no setting for his logia, and generally tried to furnish them with a site, Mt. is much less concerned to preserve the local and chronological position even of logia which he found equipped with such a habitation. His Sermon consists of several smaller collections of logia, already compiled, perhaps in part by himself, for catechetical purposes. These, welded more or less skilfully together, make up the splendid summary of the Sermon as it now lies in the gospel.

[2] Mk.'s Galilæans and (so Ss.) Idumæans are omitted. Just as the force of Mt. 5 14-16 is felt when one realises that it was addressed to a crowd drawn primarily from Galilee (4 25), that traditionally inferior and ignorant province (4 15 f.), so Lk.'s omission of the logion from his Sermon becomes significant when one recollects that he wrote for a public in the Roman empire when memories of the desperate part played by Galilæans in the recent war (66-70 A.D.) made it inadvisable to dwell upon their connection with the new religion. Jerusalem and Judæa bulk largely in Lk. 2-3; Lk. alone narrates the Galilæans' punishment hastens to incorporate an address of his to the disciples (6 20, not to the Twelve).

The address opens with a quartette of beatitudes, apostrophising literal poverty, physical hunger, and actual tears as destined to secure eventually bliss and benefits for disciples in such a present plight of social want and oppression. These beatitudes breathe a spirit of intense sympathy with the poor and downtrodden, which is characteristic of the third gospel. Dives, for example (16 19-31), is not sent to hell simply because he is rich. Yet his riches, it is implied, have not merely aggravated his guilt, but proved a barrier to the conduct which would have saved him. Better without them, is the inference. Better bestow them in alms upon the needy. Lazarus, as this scriba mansuetudinis Christi assumes, being a poor man is pious. Similarly, in the good time coming, Jesus promises a complete revolution of the social order, when the destitute will receive compensation for their present ills[1] (cp the deliberate 'now' [νῦν] repeated in v. 21; 'is' [ἔστιν], v. 20, implies certain, not present, possession). As 6 27 indicates, vv. 20-26 are spoken in the hearing of the disciples rather than addressed to them directly. They represent an impassioned monologue addressed to two general classes of individuals whom Jesus, here 'one of the prophets' indeed, sees in his mind's eye. Among the many disciples (μαθηταί) standing round him, there were probably poor men, poor by circumstances or by choice (5 11), hungry people (6 1 f.), and sufferers (6 17 f.). But at this juncture it would have been neither an appropriate nor an exhaustive description to classify the disciples as a whole under these categories.

This is corroborated by the quartette of woes (אוֹי לָכֶם), in which the reverse side of the picture is sketched (Is. 5 8-23, cp 65 13-16). Like the rest of what is peculiar to Lk. in the Sermon, it is mainly concerned with the perils of authority (37*b*), popularity (26), and especially money (24 f. 33 f. 38*a*). The second woe is unaccountably omitted in Ss. There is no woe corresponding to the third beatitude, and the fourth woe is addressed to the disciples, rather than to an objective class, thereby resuming vv. 22 f. and paving the way for the transition in v. 27. In his second volume Lk. has stories illustrating the joy felt by disciples under persecution (6 23 = Acts 5 41, etc.), while at the same time he points out that popularity is not invariably (Rom. 14 18) a proof of disloyalty (6 26, cp Acts 2 47). Although the first three beatitudes and woes are rather external and eschatological,[2] the fourth touches a deeper note of experience; yet all are controlled by the same sense that the religious question is bound up with the social, as the OT prophets were never weary of reiterating.

In quieter tones Jesus now proceeds to address not the twelve apostles but the wider circle (6 13 20) of his disciples or immediate hearers (6 27 f.), passing from the vehement denunciation of prosperous and proud folk into a persuasive appeal for charity and forbearance among his adherents.[3] The introduction, 'But I say unto you' (ἀλλὰ ὑμῖν λέγω), where 'you' is defined by 'who hear' (τοῖς ἀκούουσιν), corroborates the impression that hitherto in 6 20-26 Jesus has been describing, rather than addressing, certain types of men. At this point the contrast is almost equal to a dropping of the voice. The substance of the discourse, in its second phase, is love to one's enemies or opponents. According to Lk., this humane disposition is to be expressed not simply in blessing and prayer, but heroically in (a) a patient, uncomplaining endurance of violence and robbery, and in (b) lending money freely—so freely, indeed, that it is a loan merely in name. As usual, the question of money bulks largely in Lk.'s mind. He represents Jesus as counselling the disciples in effective and unqualified aphorisms never to make money an occasion of quarrelling; if it be stolen from them, better acquiesce than retaliate and attempt to recover the loss; if borrowed, neither money nor property is to be demanded back. To this passive rôle, an active side is added; money is to be ungrudgingly lent[4] even to one's enemies. One does not need to be rich in order to be robbed or to lend money; but it is obvious that reiterated and prominent injunctions like these would lose much of their point, if the society to which they were addressed consisted of poverty-stricken outcasts. This enforces the view that 6 20 f. is not intended to describe the actual condition of the disciples round Jesus, to whom 6 27 f. is spoken.

The third phase of the address (39-45) opens with some loosely set logia; the thread upon which Lk. has strung them seems to be as follows. Turning from one's duty to enemies, Jesus dwells on the duty, especially of teaching and instruction, which one owes to the brethren. To give safe guidance (6 39 = Jas. 5 19 f.) one must be clear-eyed oneself; to give adequate and complete assistance to the untrained and inexperienced, one must be equipped adequately first of all (6 40). Self-criticism (6 41 f.) is the necessary prelude to any sincere and useful criticism of other people. It is the inner state of a man's own heart (6 43-45) that determines the value and virtue of what he contributes to the world. See MINES (col. 3098).

6. Characteristics.

Finally, the epilogue (6 46-49) in parabolic form (which 'might constantly inhabit both the memory and the judgment,' Sir Philip Sidney) sums up the responsibility of hearers; a stable character is built up not on mere verbal admiration of the teacher, but on practical obedience to such commands as he has laid down.

Whatever be Lk.'s method elsewhere in dealing with his sources, the Sermon exhibits traces of considerable freedom on the part of the editor, whose general characteristics of style, conception, and arrangement are fairly conspicuous in 6 20-49. Not merely in the beatitudes and woes (Feine, pp. 112-120), but throughout the whole, the Jewish-Christian circle reflected in Lk.'s sources becomes visible and audible. Whilst Mt. reflects the early church under the strain of opposition at the hands of Pharisaic religion, Lk. reveals indirectly the fortunes and hopes of Palestinian Christians, possibly within the Jerusalem-church (Feine, pp. 142-145) itself, under the overbearing rule and bitter animosity of the wealthy Sadducees (see Renan's l'Antéchrist, chap. 3). His sources vibrate with feeling similar in many points to that felt in the Epistle of James, Hermas, etc.[1] Formally, too, his pungent report of the Sermon is shaped into a homily, whereas Mt.'s is built up out of didactic pieces used by catechists of the apostolic age.

In the Lucan beatitudes etc. (6 20-26), the poor (πτωχοί) are first of all blessed (as already in 4 18 Jesus is represented as quoting Isaiah 61 1 f. and placing in the forefront of his mission —'to preach the gospel to the poor' [εὐαγγελίσασθαι πτωχοῖς]), several of the Lucan hapax legomena occur (e.g. γελάω and σκιρτάω), and in the introductory formula (ἐπάρας κ.τ.λ.), as throughout the rest of the address, the style is predominantly Lucan. Favourite or characteristic Lucan terms recur; e.g., κλαίειν (more external than Mt.'s πενθεῖν), κατὰ τὰ αὐτὰ ποιεῖν (6 23), πλούσιος, νῦν, παράκλησις (6 24 of selfish worldly satisfaction, as opposed to messianic bliss, 2 25, cp 16 25), ἐμπίπλημι (6 25, contrast similarly 1 53), πεινάω (6 21 1 53), πᾶς with ptc. (6 30 47 etc.), πλήν (6 24 35), ἀπαιτεῖν (6 30 cp 12 20), ἀπολαμβάνειν (6 34), καθώς (6 36), κόλπος (6 38), ὁμοίως (6 31, etc.), σαλεύω (in unique sense 6 38), ἐκπίπτειν (6 39, cp Mt. 15 14), ἴδιος (6 41, cp Mt. 7 4; 6 44, cp Mt. 12 33), ἔρχεσθαι πρός (6 47 14 26), ὑποδείξω (6 47 12 5), one instance of his preference for compounds with ἀντί (6 38), ἰσχύω [οὐκ] (6 48), δὲ καί (6 39), εἰμί with dative (6 32 f.), the Hebraism ἰδοὺ γάρ (6 23, etc., never Mt.), εἶπεν-αν δέ (6 39, etc.; Mt. 12 47 ?), εἶπεν παραβολήν (6 39, etc., only Mk. 12 12), καὶ αὐτός (6 20, etc.), προσεύχεσθαι περί (6 28 Acts 8 15), ὕψιστος of God (1 32 35 76; 6 35), the common Lucan and Pauline constr. of the article (6 42; only in Mt. once, 7 3), etc. Notable hapax legomena are: ἀπελπίζοντες[2] (6 35), ὑπερεκχύννω (6 38), πιέζω (6 38), πλημμύρης (6 48), σκάπτω (6 48), βαθύνω (6 48), τιθ. θεμ. (6 48 14 29), συμπίπτω (6 49), προσρήγνυμι (6 48 f.), and ῥῆγμα (6 49). In 6 27 f. ἐχθροί and μισοῦντες are paralleled as in 1 71, by Pilate (13 1-3) and the false charge of sedition (ἀπὸ τῆς Γ. 23 5) made against Jesus by the priests; Galilee plays no part in his Resurrection stories.

[1] Lk.'s Sermon is less true than Mt.'s to the normal position of Jesus towards the future of God's reign on earth; in rightly reproducing the somewhat catastrophic side, which Jesus held in common with his age, he fails to give sufficient prominence to the inner spiritual side, which formed the real contribution of Jesus to the time. Hence the impression left by his Sermon is vivid but limited. See Titius, 177 f., 185 f.

[2] This is so far in keeping with the first preaching of Jesus in Galilee, which echoed the eschatological note of the Baptist (Mk. 1 14 f. Mt. 4 17 23 f.). Both 'holy spirit' (ἅγιον πνεῦμα) and 'fire' (πῦρ) are in the Sermon; but, particularly in Mt., the gracious heavenly spirit predominates, even although Lk. has little or nothing of Mt.'s sweeping anti-legal criticism. Both versions are, from different standpoints, to be regarded as 'good news' (Mt. 4 23).

[3] The connection would be still closer if the wealthy oppressors of vv. 24 f. were the enemies of v. 27.

[4] On the religious economy of alms see 16 1-14, and contrast 12 33 = 18 22 with Mt. 6 19. Like the Epistle of James, Lk. reflects the trading atmosphere of early Palestinian Christians; the dangers presented by property and wealth to the faith (GOSPELS, § 40) are vividly present to his mind. See Peabody's Jesus Christ and the Social Life (1901), 197 f., and especially L. Paul's study (ZWT, 1901, pp. 504-544), 'Welcher Reiche wird selig werden?' Also Hastings' DB 4 19 f.

[1] Cp the second-century interpolations in Test. Jud. 25; καὶ οἱ ἐν πτωχείᾳ διὰ Κύριον πλουτισθήσονται καὶ οἱ ἐν πενίᾳ χορτασθήσονται . . . οἱ δὲ ἀσεβεῖς πενθήσουσι καὶ ἁμαρτωλοὶ κλαύσονται. The preceding saying (οἱ ἐν λύπῃ τελευτήσαντες ἀναστήσονται ἐν χαρᾷ) reflects an outlook alien to either of the synoptic versions of the beatitudes—a fact which incidentally confirms their historic verisimilitude. When the Sermon was spoken, Jesus had not yet emphasised his second coming or even his death; all the future for him and his lay within the horizon of his lifetime, as yet hardly clouded by opposition culminating in tragedy or delay. Even the allusions to excommunication from the synagogue and other apostolic ills do not obliterate this primitive feature, although they qualify it.

[2] The idea is one of several anticipated in Ps. Sol. (cp 5 15 f.). See further, on the meaning, Reinach, Revue des études grecques, 1894, pp. 52-58.

SERMON ON THE MOUNT

and ill-will[1] defined as speech (καταρ.) and act (ἐπηρ. cp 1 Pet. 3 16).[2] Similar phrases recalling the apostolic age may be seen in the use of Lk.'s favourite (eleven times) ἅγιον πνεῦμα (11 13), ἀγαθοποιεῖν (6 9 33 35, never in Mt.; cp 1 Pet. 2 15 20 3 6 17), and θεμέλιον (6 48, cp 1 Cor. 3 10, etc.), besides phrases like 'Father' 'pitiful' (6 36, cp 2 Cor. 1 3), παρέχειν (6 29), χάρις (6 32-34, for Mt.'s μισθός), ἁμαρτωλοί (generic for Mt.'s ἐθνικοί, τελῶναι), ἀχάριστος (6 35 = 2 Tim. 3 2; cp 8 13 with 1 Tim. 4 1), ἐλπίζειν (6 34, etc., only once in quot. in Mt. 12 21), and blind guides (6 39 = Rom. 2 19, which is perhaps a reminiscence of the logion). Similarly, the two other passages (11 1-4 9-13 12 22-34) where Lk. has reproduced matter included in Mt.'s Sermon, show evident traces of the author's style in favourite or characteristic expressions, such as:—ἀναστάς, ἀναστάντες (11 7 f.), καθ' ἡμέραν (11 3), πρός of address, very common in Lk. (11 1 12 22), εἶπεν δέ (11 2 12 22), τις with a noun (11 1 12 16, etc., only once in Mt. 12 11), ὡς = where (11 1, never in Mt.), βαλλάντιον (12 33), εἶναι with prep. and art. (11 1).

These linguistic phenomena bring Lk.'s version of the Sermon into line with the rest of his gospel. It cannot be said that Hebraisms or Aramaisms are at all characteristic of the passage, and the inference is that Lk. has either translated from Q with a freedom which makes his rendering something of a paraphrase, or (as is more probable) that like Mt. he has edited and in part rewritten a Greek recension of Q. In this Q, to all appearance, the Sermon lay between the choice of the Twelve and the healing of the centurion's child at Capernaum (Mk. 3 13-19 = Lk. 6 12-16 Mt. 8 5-13 = Lk. 7 1-10). Near (NW.) Capernaum and about midway in the Galilæan period Jesus may be conjectured to have spoken this address. It is much less probable that Lk. had before him not merely the logia but also another independent document containing a discourse which he confused with the Sermon on the Mount.

7. Sermonic logia in Mk.

In three instances our canonical Mk. contains logia equivalent to passages in the Sermon: on retribution 4 24 = Mt. (6 33*b*) 7 2 Lk. (12 31*b*) 6 38, on saltless salt 9 50*a* = Mt. 5 13*a* Lk. 14 34, and on a forgiving spirit with prayer 11 25 [26] = Mt. 6 14 f.

The presence of these in Mk. may be due to a redactor of the primitive 'Mk.,' who had become acquainted with the logia; certainly the first two Marcan passages occur in extremely difficult contexts and are in themselves not particularly apposite, whilst the third is distinctly inappropriate to its surroundings (cp Mk. 11 23 from Mt. 17 20). Even were this hypothesis rejected, however, it would not be necessary to presuppose Mk.'s acquaintance with Q. There may have been identical or substantially identical logia in Q and in the Petrine narrative which is practically equivalent to the primitive 'Mk.' There is no reason to believe that these documents were mutually exclusive, and it is natural to suppose that occasionally the same logia in divergent historical settings and linguistic shapes lay in both: e.g., Mt. 5 29 f.[3] (Q) = 18 8 f. Mk. 9 43 45 47; Mt. 5 32 Lk. 16 18 (Q) = Mt. 19 9 Mk. 10 11 f. Similarly it is possible that even within Q itself logia lay in two different connections preserved from heterogeneous traditions. A capital instance is the saying on the lamp and the bushel, which is a pendant to the parable of the seeds (Mk. 4 21 = Lk. 8 16, Jülicher, Gleichnisreden 2 86 92; cp GOSPELS, § 134, col. 1875), and also connected with a disciple-logion (Mt. 5 15, repeated and misplaced by Lk. in 11 33). This seems on the whole a preferable hypothesis to that which would confine the logion to the former setting and make its employment elsewhere by Mt. and Lk. an arbitrary displacement and application. Mt. 7 16-18 and 12 33-35 form independent variations of a common idea rather than a doublet, and passages like 3 10 = 7 19 3 7 = 12 34 23 33 may reasonably be taken as reminiscences by a younger man of his first leader's phraseology. These are cases where pure literary criticism requires to be conscious of its limitations.

Happily, in the absence of direct parallels[4] to the Sermon in the fourth gospel, the comparative phenomena of the third gospel enable us sometimes to analyse Mt.'s version of the Sermon, which is obviously composite, into its component parts.

8. Mt.'s Sermon a compilation.

At least seven passages set in Mt. 5-7 appear throughout Lk., although differently edited and applied, in connections which are not merely superior but intrinsically probable from the historical standpoint. These are the logia on (a) coming to terms with an opponent (Mt. 5 25 f. = Lk. 12 57-59),[1] (b) the model prayer (Mt. 6 9-15 = Lk. 11 1-4), (c) God and mammon (Mt. 6 24 = Lk. 16 13), (d) worldly anxiety (Mt. 6 25-33 = Lk. 12 22-31),[2] (e) encouragement to prayer (Mt. 7 7-11 = Lk. 11 9-13), (f) the narrow way (Mt. 7 13 f. = Lk. 13 23 f.), and (g) the final rejection (Mt. 7 21-23 = Lk. 13 25-27).[3] Upon the other hand, it must be admitted that Lk. is possibly inferior to Mt. in his setting of other four logia which occur in Mt. 5-7 (5 15 = Lk. 11 33, 5 18 = Lk. 16 17, 5 31 f. = Lk. 16 18, 6 22 f. = Lk. 11 34-36); although this does not imply that even Mt. preserves them in their original strata. Two instances are neutral—that is to say, Jesus might have uttered the saying upon either occasion or upon both, so far as the evidence available is concerned (Mt. 5 13 = Lk. 14 34, 6 19-21 = Lk. 12 33 f.; so e.g., Lk. 6 44*a* = Mt. 12 33*c*, 6 45*c* = Mt. 12 34*b*). In three instances of a doublet in Mt. affecting the Sermon (5 29 f. = 18 8 f. 5 32 = 19 9 and 7 19 = 3 10 Lk. 3 9), the historic probabilities seem to favour that setting of the logion which is extra-Sermonic.

The Sermon also exhibits several curious instances of transposition (e.g., the temptation-narrative Mt. 4 5-10 = Lk. 4 5-12, Jonah and Solomon Mt. 12 41 f. = Solomon and Jonah Lk. 11 31 f., etc.) in passages like Mt. 5 40 (χιτ. . . . κ. . . . ἱμάτ.) = Lk. 6 29 (ἱμ. κ. . . . χ.), 5 42 44 (liberality and prayer) = Lk. 6 28 30 (prayer and liberality), 5 45 f. (sonship and reward) = Lk. 6 32-35 (reward and sonship), Mt. 6 19 f. (moth and thief) = Lk. 12 33 (thief and moth), Mt. 6 19 f. 33 (treasure in heaven and seeking kingdom) = Lk. 12 29 f. 33 f. (seeking kingdom and treasure in heaven), Mt. 6 28 (neither labour nor spin) = Lk. 12 27 (neither spin nor weave [Ti. WH$^{mg.}$]), Mt. 7 16 (grapes and figs) = Lk. 6 44 (figs and grapes). Such transpositions occur throughout the three synoptists. If literary variety be considered too artificial a motive to explain their phenomena, we must have recourse to the hypothesis that such divergencies grew up unconsciously during the period of oral transmission, although the freaks of

9. Transposition in Sermon.

[1] Justin Martyr's apology is offered (1 5) ὑπὲρ τῶν ἐκ παντὸς γένους ἀνθρώπων ἀδίκως μισουμένων καὶ ἐπηρεαζομένων.

[2] Similarly, in expanding the warning against censoriousness (6 37 f. Mt. 7 1 f.), Lk. redoubles it by adding καταδικασθῆτε (of which, as of ἀπολύω = let off, Mt. 18 27, Mt. is content to give a practical illustration 12 7), and presents the positive side as the special form which appealed to him, viz. charity in the sense of liberality or benevolence. The ground of v. 35 is shifted; charity now is advocated as certain to win ample return.

[3] V. 30 is textually suspect, however (om. D, Ss), and with v. 29 is probably placed here by the editor.

[4] The parallels in Jewish thought (e.g. Hillel, the Essenes, the Pirḳē Ābōth, and the earlier wisdom-literature, including the negative form of the law of love) may be seen in Wünsche, J. Lightfoot, Wetstein, or Rodrigues' Les origines du Sermon de la Montagne (for Mt. 6 9-13 see LORD'S PRAYER), and are worked out in more or less detail by critical editors. So far as the Sermon is concerned, the resemblances only serve to accentuate the profound difference between Jesus and the contemporary piety of his age, even when he is using the latter's language and developing germs already present on the higher levels of the OT and of pre-Christian Judaism. Here, from the historical standpoint, Jesus appears engaged not merely in clearing away accumulated rubbish to permit the stream of piety to have free course, but in opening fresh fountains for its supply as well as in disclosing a reach and flow for its waters larger than had been hitherto imagined—much less attained.

[1] As Lk. plainly reproduces the original setting of this logion (cp Weiss, Matth. Evglm. 158 f.), and as Mt. 5 21-48 represents a homogeneous and fairly coherent address, it is probably right to regard 5 25 f. as an interpolation (e.g., Holtzmann, Bruce, Réville). Its insertion was mediated by the well-known connection of debt and sin in the ethnic mind (Exp.T 10 54, cp Mt. 6 12 14 f.).

[2] The unique 'the nations of the world' (τὰ ἔθνη τοῦ κόσμου: Lk. 12 30), translating an Aramaic or Hebrew rabbinical equivalent (אֻמּוֹת הָעוֹלָם, Dalman, Worte Jesu, 1 144 f.), is one proof that Lk. stands nearer than Mt. to the original source. Lk.'s retention of Lk. 12 32 balances his omission of Mt. 6 34. Similarly the un-Matthæan kingdom of God in Mt. 6 33 (as in 12 28 19 24) shows that Q is reproduced here verbally, as by Lk.; 'and the righteousness' (καὶ τὴν δικ.: cp Jas. 1 20) is an editorial explanation (like πρῶτον) or gloss upon 'kingdom.' Even were the variant order adopted (his righteousness and kingdom), still 'kingdom' would remain as the predominating term. Lk. 12 31 is plainly more faithful to the original. Cp Titius, 82.

[3] Lk. preserves, in an altered and somewhat expanded form, the original reference to unbelieving Jews. Mt., who applies the logion to antinomian adherents of Jesus (possibly ultra-Pauline Christians), is obliged to use the sequel elsewhere (8 11 f. = Lk. 13 28 f.), as it would not have suited his purpose in the Sermon.

SERMON ON THE MOUNT

memory do not seem quite adequate to account for inversions so repeated. Intentional or accidental, they are to all appearance destitute of significance.

Assuming these results and continuing to employ the larger report as more convenient for the purpose of comparative analysis, we now pass to its divisions. As a working hypothesis we may provisionally surmise that the original scheme[1] of the Sermon in Q embraced (a) beatitudes, (b) a statement of Jesus' relation to the Jewish law, followed by (c) a definition of his own nova lex, and (d) a warning against unreal, idle adherence to it and to himself. If Lk.'s level spot (6 17) meant a plateau among the hills, a comprehensive designation of the Sermon both in Lk. and Mt. might be 'the teaching on the hill-side' or 'the hill-teaching.'

10. The beatitudes and woes.

(a) The divergence of the beatitudes in style and spirit accentuates at the very outset the general variation of the two reports. Lk.'s four beatitudes are followed[2] by four woes (after Dt. 27 11 f.); Mt.'s eight[3] stand alone, save for an expansion or application of the eighth. Lk.'s are more vehement (sec. pers. plur.), Mt.'s (exc. 5 11) employ the quieter third plur. Lk.'s order (poor, hungry, weeping, persecuted) differs from what verbally corresponds to it in Mt. (poor in spirit, mourners, meek,[4] hungry for righteousness, merciful, pure in heart, peacemakers, persecuted), much more his general atmosphere and colour. The original Sermon in Q probably contained beatitudes and woes in the second person corresponding to those preserved with somewhat heightened ascetic colouring by Lk.; their number it is impossible to ascertain with any certainty; their nature is as elusive, except that it was less restricted and external than Lk.'s report (see below, on the audience). Mt. 5 11 f. = Lk. 6 22 f. is apostolic in its present form (cp for my sake, the Name, and terms of persecution[5]); especially in Mt. 5 11 f. it is a comment such as Mt. loves, added here to lead over from the beatitudes into 5 13-16.

As the crucial instance of the first beatitude indicates, the discrepancies of the two reports run back not only to the predilections of the final editors, but to variant renderings of the vernacular in Q: πτωχοί and ταπεινοί are 𝔊's equivalents for עֲנָוִים in Is. 61 1, a passage applied by Lk. elsewhere to Jesus and his career (4 17 f., where Mt. places the Sermon), and πραεῖς is similarly used. Mt.'s beatitudes, therefore, represent variations upon the leading idea of 'the poor being blessed'—'poor' being the devout lower classes in the main. Lk.'s rendering is truer to the letter, Mt.'s to the spirit, of the original.[6] No doubt, language such as that preserved by Lk. would appear ambiguous and unsatisfactory to those who had lost touch with the primitive situation in which the words were spoken, or who had not the same intellectual sympathies. Mt.'s version, figurative and traditional in its use of language hallowed by religious associations, would appeal to a larger circle.

11. Jesus and the law.

(b) The attitude of Jesus to the Jewish law would naturally form a cardinal topic in any such inaugural address, especially as popular curiosity must have been already whetted and misunderstanding created by the conflicts between Jesus and the religious authorities. The prospect of a revolutionary attitude upon his part towards the law must have stirred hopes and fears alike unfounded. But the original form of the passage in Q seems to have been expanded by Mt. and abbreviated by Lk. The latter had an obvious motive for omitting anti-legal polemic from his narrative as unsuitable and irrelevant to his audience; his familiarity with most of the logia underlying Mt. 5 13-16 17-20 21-48 is proved by his reproduction of several elsewhere in more or less apt situations (see above, § 8 f.). Mt. 5 21-24 27 f. 31-48, therefore, is in all likelihood substantially reproduced from Q, filled out by the incorporation of two logia from other places (25 f. 29 f.).[1] From this passage in his edition of Q, Lk. has merely taken the climax[2] (i.e., the superseding of retaliation by unstinted love), in order to preserve the distinctive assertion of the new law. The linguistic variations seldom affect the sense of the parallel passages materially. Nor does the catechetical form of Mt.'s version with its careful structure, reproduced from the church catechism of Q, imply that Jesus did not use such a method of instruction. He taught as a rabbi. The apostolic churches arranged and used his sayings for catechetical purposes, but in this Jesus had to some degree anticipated them; the five commandments of the lawgiver in Mt. 5 21 ff. may well be a specimen of the preaching which Jesus already practised in the synagogues,[3] where part of the service consisted in the reading of OT scriptures from the law and the prophets, followed by comments (Lk. 4 17, cp Acts 13 15; Schür. Hist. ii. 2 63 f. 81). Cp SYNAGOGUE, §§ 8 ff.

12. Mt. 5 13-16.

The transition from the beatitudes into the relation of Jesus to the law was probably mediated in Q by logia (corresponding to those substantially preserved in Mt. 5 13-16 17 20) upon the sphere and function of those whose character had just been described, as well as upon the personal attitude assumed by their leader to the conventional religion. Whether 5 13-16 in whole or part belonged to the original Sermon is doubtful. Were the Sermon addressed to the Twelve (so, e.g., Hahn, Resch, and [Lk.] O. Holtzmann), the passage would be quite in line with 10 41, where the Twelve are also prophets (cp 5 12 and 5 13). Even with an audience of many disciples, as Mt. and Lk. both describe the scene, the appropriateness of the passage is defensible (the prophets as in Jas. 5 10 f.). The connection of 5 12 (Lk. 6 23) and 5 17 is excellent; but the intervening sentences may have been an aside

[1] Feine ('Ueber das gegenseitige Verhältniss der Texte der Bergpredigt bei Mt. und bei Lk.,' JPT, 1885, pp. 1-85) finds the original Sermon in Mt. 5 3-10 17 20-22 27 f. 33-48 6 1-6 16-18 7 1-5 12 15-18 21 24-27. The Hebrew and Greek reconstruction attempted by Resch (Aussercanon. Paralleltexte, 1893-7, 2 62-65 81-102 113 f. 3 62-98 101-6; Die Logia Jesu, 1898, pp. 18-29) traces the Sermon in 5 1-6 11 f. 20-22 27 f. 31 33-35*a* 37-48 7 1-5 12 16-18 20 f. 24-27; whilst Wendt's outline consists of Lk. 6 20-26 Mt. 5 17-20 21-24 27-29*a* 31-42 7 12 5 43-47 Lk. 6 34 Mt. 5 48 6 1-18 7 1-5 15-19 7 21 (Lk. 6 46) 24-27.

[2] Fourfold woe in En. 95 4-7. Ss. om. Lk. 6 25*a*, κατηρτισμένος . . . αὐτοῦ 40, and softens beatitudes from second to third person plural. See J. Weiss, Predigt Jesu, 179-187.

[3] Or seven (as e.g., 4 Esd. 7 78-99, where seven woes follow), if 5 10*b* (= 5 3*b*) is supposed to mean a fresh start. It is quite fanciful to see a counterpart to the decalogue in ten beatitudes (Delitzsch, Edersheim). On Mt. 5 3, with its secondary form, cp Klöpper, ZWT, 1894, pp. 175-191, with the essay of Kabisch in St. Kr. (1896) 195-215; on the general superiority of Lk.'s report, Adeney, Expos. 5th ser. 2 361-376.

[4] The alternative order (meek, mourners), even if better attested, would not affect this point.

[5] There was a reasonable ground for anticipating persecution, although Mt. either ignores or fails to emphasise it, in the recent arrest of Jesus' master (Mt. 4 12), as well as in the conflict which had taken place between Jesus and the religious authorities (JESUS, §§ 22 f.). The Sermon by no means portrays the flush of an absolute Galilæan success. See § 6, n. 1.

[6] Lk.'s fundamental idea is (cp Feine, 25-35) that no satisfaction will be got in the present age, such are its contradictions and oppressive manners; Mt.'s view is, no satisfaction will be got in this or any age of the world, since the inner needs of the soul cannot be satisfied outside of God. Lk.'s report suits the original situation better. But Mt.'s is truer to the central teaching of Jesus; his beatitudes give rich and vigorous expression to the purest ideal of the Christian consciousness, even although, upon critical grounds, they may not justify their claim to be regarded as the prelude to the historical Sermon.

[1] Possibly v. 23 f. are also foreign to their context, as that stood in the original Sermon. The superior position of 5 32 at 19 9 might, but does not necessarily, involve that 5 31 f. did not belong to its Sermonic context. The omission of 5 47 (with k, Ss.) would contribute to the terseness of the context.

[2] Thus failing in the Sermon to establish (with Mt.) the historical continuity of Jesus with the religious tradition of the past. He had done this already and otherwise (4 16 f.). But with Lk. the disciples of Jesus within Judaism have 'somewhat to become' rather than 'somewhat to cast off,' in taking their course of obedience to him.

[3] On the significance of this early ministry among the synagogues of Galilee (Lk. 4 15 4 44 = Mk. 1 39 Mt. 4 23), which was interrupted and checked by the scribes, see Bruce, With Open Face, 80-106 (1896). 'Great temporary popularity, little permanent fruit' sums up its effects; but, as the Sermon indicates, it enabled Jesus to come to an issue with the current legal religion, besides inducing him to turn his attention specially to the susceptible disciples (μαθηταί) who showed some capacity of mind and soul for the new teaching.

SERMON ON THE MOUNT

(for which Mt. has prepared by the words τοὺς πρὸ ὑμῶν), after which Jesus resumed the tenor of his speech. Function depends on character, and privilege implies responsibility; the disciples are an Israel within Israel,[1] whose raison d'être is to permeate the people as a whole, instead of preaching an esoteric piety or an Essene-like retirement. The horizon of Jesus was primarily Judaism at this period (Rom. 15 7-9); with a high and devout consciousness of his mission, which was partly to be achieved through his adherents, he sets himself and them (in these logia) to the regeneration of Judaism.[2] Whatever be the origin[3] of 14*b*, the logia 13 and 14*a* (15-16) may quite well have lain side by side (otherwise GOSPELS, § 134) in the original (cp the Roman proverb, nil sale et sole utilius), though not exactly in their present form. The traces of editorial handling, however, do not affect the substance of the passage; its parts fit in here at least as well as, if not better than, in their arrangement by Mk. and Lk.; and as a whole this didactic piece vindicates its position in the Sermon. If any 'definite historical situation' (Weizs.) needs to be sought for the passage, its present site affords a motif of sufficient psychological and historical importance.

13. Mt. 5 17-20.

Whilst 5 17 20 is not only an authentic saying but also in its proper place as a vindication of Jesus against the suspicion of laxity and undue mildness raised[4] by his free, daring attitude to the law, 5 18 f. is widely accepted as representing a Jewish-Christian gloss which evidently (cp its partial retention in sharper form by Lk. 16 17, Mt.'s ἰῶτα being secondary, Dalman 4-5) belonged not merely to Q^mt but to Q. See GOSPELS, §§ 34 a, 112 c, 128 e; Feine, pp. 25-35; also Moffatt, Historical New Testament ((2) 1901, pp. 645 f.).

The aim of the OT religion, as expressed by the phrase 'the law or the prophets,'[5] was to be realised by Jesus in the higher Christian 'righteousness' (δικαιοσύνη), not (as 18 f. imply) through the permanent validity of the Mosaic code with its statutory and ritual elements, although the more conservative circles of Jewish Christianity believed that the latter was not merely legitimate but essential to the new faith. It is one thing to say that the law contained a divine revelation; it would have been quite another thing for Jesus to say that the Mosaic law (Leviticus and all) with its injunctions had still a future and a rôle. The very qualifications and repudiations of 5 21-44 indicate the irrelevance of 5 18 f. to the original context.[6] On the other hand, 5 17 20 define not merely the theme of the Sermon but the permanent attitude of Jesus towards possible abuses and misunderstanding of his gospel (cp Klöpper, ZWT, 1896, pp. 1-23). The critical attitude which a reformer finds it necessary to assume towards orthodox opinion and habit in order to clear the road for positive and healthy progress, is generally mistaken for mere iconoclasm; he is impugned as a mover of old landmarks, and one of his first and hardest duties is to show that valid change and advance in religion only knit the bonds of moral claim more tightly on the conscience.

14. The new law.

(c) The abruptness with which the nova lex is introduced in Lk. (6 27-36) contrasts unfavourably with the fine climax of Mt. (5 43-48),[1] which comes after a smooth and clear series of antitheses to the traditional legislation (21-42).

In Mt. 5 43-48, which Mt. has correctly preserved as the kernel of the Sermon, the new 'righteousness' already sketched is elucidated with respect to (i.) murder and anger (21-24); see RACA and SYNEDRIUM.[2] The form of denunciation (ἔνοχος with gen. of punishment or punishment's source, in Mk. 3 29 of the crime) is said to be common in inscriptions against guilty persons in Asia Minor (Rams. Exp. T 10 55 f.); v. 23 f. reflect Palestinian Christianity previous to 70 A.D. and emphasise the duty of reconciliation as paramount, superseding even the claim of sacrifice. Cp Epict. Diss. 2 10, 'if you go and blame your brother, I tell you, you have forgotten who you are and what you are called' (i.e., a brother). The same inwardness breathes in the treatment (ii.) of adultery and divorce[3] (27 f. 31 f.); cp GOSPELS, § 145 d; MARRIAGE, § 6. (iii.) Laxity in oaths (33-37), as well as in marriage, had already been checked by the Essenes, and 34 f. is a Jewish commonplace (cp, besides Wetstein, ad loc., Charles on Slav. En. 49 1, also Harnack or Conybeare on Acta Apollon. 6). A remarkable parallel from a pagan inscription of the Katakaumene is cited by Rams. Exp. T 10 109, and Doughty (Ar. Des. 1 264-269) notes the frivolous, lavish use of oaths among the Arabs. (iv.) 'Retaliation superseded by beneficence' (38-42) is put in characteristically Oriental and paradoxical form, though Epictetus also (Diss. 3 22) teaches the cynic to practise forbearance, and when flogged to love those that flog him, even yielding his body to the free pleasure of anybody. (v.) Love to one's enemies (43-48), with prayer for them, constitutes the distinctive spirit of the new reign (cp v. 20 with v. 46 f.); the divine ideal is magnanimity, which Jesus inculcates on his adherents as their duty; in short a 'love imperturbable' (Beyschlag), which is not deterred from serving other people by their ingratitude or active opposition,[4] but finds its motive in ardent desire to be like God, and its method in instinctive activity, not in punctilious performance of set duties. See LOVINGKINDNESS, § 4, and NEIGHBOUR.

Lk.'s indifference to the critical attitude of Jesus, which dictated his omission of the logia corresponding to Mt. 5 21-48, leaves him with a report of the nova lex (6 27-36) which is, upon the whole, less admirably arranged[5]

1 5 14, with an instance of Mt.'s partiality for 'the world' (ὁ κόσμος), reflects (as it stands) the universalism which forms one trait of Mt. Originally in Aramaic the logion had a range consonant with the historical situation of Jesus and the disciples (so γῆς, 13 = land, not earth). Cp Dalman's Worte Jesu, 1 136 144. The selection of the twelve shows that Jesus already contemplated a vocation on the part of his disciples, which was not confined, of course, to the Twelve (cp Lk. 8 39 Mk. 9 38). Unfortunately Mt., who preserves the logion on vocation, omits to narrate beforehand the incident which helps to elucidate its aptness.

2 It is needless, therefore, to regard 5 13-16 (with Réville, 2 128-130) as a patriotic address to the Jewish people ideally represented by the crowd, whom Jesus exhorts to be faithful to their historical vocation and to show themselves worthy of their religious superiority to the surrounding world. No direct preaching as yet (except for the Twelve? Mk. 1 17 = Mt. 4 19); only the expression of an upright and exceptionally pious life. Cp Titius, 12-17.

3 The Oxyrh. Logion 7 ('a city built upon a high hill and established cannot either fall or be hidden') blends 5 14*b* and 7 24 f., and 5 14-16 was known to the author of the Pastorals (1 Tim. 5 25) as well as to Justin (Apol. 1 16).

4 Perhaps already in his younger brother James, who appears in tradition (cp von Dobschütz, Die urchristlichen Gemeinden, 112 f. 272 f. [1902]) as an austere and strict Jewish Christian; certainly in the Scribes and Pharisees, who felt themselves responsible for defending the faith against unsettling tendencies. Even the disciples may already have needed a warning of this kind against rash inferences from sayings like Mk. 2 22*c*.

5 Unless (Wernle) 'or the prophets' (ἢ τοὺς προφήτας) be an editorial gloss (om. Clem. Hom. 3 51). But if Paul could appeal from 'the law' to 'the law and the prophets' for anticipations of that 'righteousness of God' which was realised in the gospel (Rom. 3 21 f.), surely Jesus could have done the same. Chrysostom's discovery of a certain reserve and guarded tone in 5 17 (οἰκονομία λόγων) is imaginary. On 'the righteousness of Christ's kingdom' (Mt. 5 17 f.), cp Dods, Expos. 4th ser. 9 70 f. 161 f., also Gardner's Explor. Evangelica, 192 f.

6 As it stands, however, 5 17-20 reflects Mt.'s apologetic temper, especially in its effort to show the Jews of the Diaspora the spiritual continuity between esteem for the Law as an ethical code and devotion to Jesus its 'end' (τέλος); see Wernle, ZNTW, 1900, p. 47 f. This tendency has led Mt. to preserve traditions and logia which often seem rather alien to the catholic spirit of his own mind. See Manchot, Prot. Monatsh., 1902, pp. 211-227.

1 'This is not by any means an ideal such as could be derived from the hopes of the future cherished by the Jews, or from their law; it is in the truest sense the possession of Jesus alone' (O. Holtzmann, Leben Jesu, 192). Whilst this is true of 5 48, 5 44 f. is not unparalleled; cp, e.g., Seneca (de Benef. 4 26, 'si deos imitaris, da et ingratis beneficia; nam et sceleratis sol oritur, et piratis patent maria'), and, earlier still in Judaism, Ecclus. 4 10 ('Be as a father to the fatherless. . . . So shalt thou be as a son of the most High'). See O. Holtzmann, Neutest. Zeitgesch. (1895) 226 f., Lightfoot, Philippians, 283-287, and HC 1 61-62 214 f.

2 On 5 22, Field's Otium Norvic. (pars tertia, 1899), 3-5; and for Lk. 6 35, ibid., 59. The opprobrious terms of Mt. 5 22 may have been actually thrown at Jesus by the Pharisees and their followers in the heat of controversy.

3 When these are treated separately, the antitheses against the Scribes fall into two sets of three (5 21 f. 27 f. 31 f.; 33 f. 38 f. 43 f.), followed by three anti-Pharisaic in 6 1 f. 5 f. 16 f., followed by three others in 7 1 f. 4 f. 12. It is doubtful whether this trim scheme was present to the mind of the editor of Mt.; but even if it was, the arrangement seems artificial rather than spontaneously natural, and forms one reason for doubting whether the connection of 6 1-18 with what precedes is anything more than literary. The last-named passage is certainly less spontaneous than, e.g., Mk. 11 24 f. 2 18 22. But the methods of Christ's teaching were versatile, and whilst the passage is misplaced and possibly edited, it seems hardly safe to argue back to 'ecclesiastical piety' as its basis (Carpenter, First Three Gospels(2), 1890, p. 356).

4 Another genuine reflection of this evangelic tradition occurs in the two logia (preserved by Jerome) of the 'Gospel to the Hebrews': (a) et nunquam læti sitis, nisi cum fratrem vestrum videritis in caritate, (b) inter maxima ponitur crimina, qui fratris sui spiritum contristaverit. Jesus left it to common sense to apply the logion on indiscriminate charity; the necessary qualification is explicitly appended in Did. 1 6.

5 Resch suggests for 6 40 a place in the address at the Last Supper (after Mt. 20 28 Mk. 10 45). At any rate 6 39 f. is irrele-

and less definite in content (cp, e.g., sinners for pagans and tax-gatherers, χρηστός [6 35] for Mt. 5 45, sons of most High[1] for Mt. 5 48, the omission of 5 38 f. 41 43). He has taken Mt. 5 44*a* (in its logia form), expanded it (6 27*b*-28*a*), and reproduced Mt. 5 44*b*-47 in his own style, substituting for 45 logia (6 29 f.) roughly answering to Mt. 5 39*b*-40 42. Starting afresh from 5 44*a* he expands it independently, though Mt.'s climax[2] (5 48) becomes with him a transition to what follows (6 36 f.), and love is not thrown into relief against the background of formalism. The variations in expression are seldom significant; the main alteration of colour is robbery (Lk. 6 29) for legal proceedings (Mt. 5 40) as an opportunity for displaying the habitual mood of disinterested love.[3]

The law of unflinching love carries with it, as a corollary, abstinence from censoriousness (Mt. 7 1-5 Lk. 6 37 f. 41 f.). Mt., however, has interpolated two long sections at this point:

15. Mt. 6 1-18 19-34.

(i.) an exposure of the Pharisaic praxis (6 1-18, incorporating unchronologically the Lord's Prayer; see LORD'S PRAYER and Cary, 114-120), which is undoubtedly genuine but misplaced, and (ii.) an appeal against worldly anxiety (6 25-34), which Lk. (indifferent to the former) has preserved elsewhere in a superior context (12 22-31 f.), where it is followed by the more positive logion on heavenly treasures (12 33 f. = Mt. 6 19-21) used by Mt.[4] rather aptly to connect 6 18 and 6 25.[5] The catechism (i.) upon a Christian's duty to his neighbour, his God, and himself (expressed in rhythmic form, 6 2-4 5 f. 16-18), which has a title,[6] 6 1, and a logion, 6 7-9*a*, introductory to the specimen prayer, 6 9*b*-13 (14 f.), describes the trinity of normal religious practices for an early Christian,—alms (ALMS, § 4; COMMUNITY OF GOODS, § 5; cp GASm. HG 634), prayer[7] (see PRAYER, §§ 6-7), and fasting (FASTING, § 4)—the two latter combined in Did. 8 and Test. Jos. 3, etc. (ii.) The following counsel[8] of idealism formed a unity in Q (Lk. 12 22-34 = Mt. 6 19-34). The significant element in the material peculiar to Lk. is μὴ μετεωρίζεσθε (EV 'Be not of doubtful mind': 12 29), the more accurate because simpler form of 31 (= Mt. 6 33), and 32 (originally between Mt. 6 33 and 34). Upon the other hand, 12 33 is Lucan, generalised in order to introduce what follows; 26 is possibly editorial (om. D); while Mt. has preserved 6 34 and the truer Father in 6 26.

Of these two pieces (i.) is less certainly than (ii.) foreign to the original Sermon; 6 1-6 16-18 might lie conceivably between the anti-Pharisaic 5 21-48 and 7 1-5 (so, e.g., Neander, Keim, Weiss, Feine, Bruce), but it has all the appearance of an independent piece. And 7 1-5 flows readily out of 5 43-48—so, e.g., Resch after Keim, who regards 6 19-34 as the nucleus of the inaugural popular Sermon (also 7 24-27) which he strangely sees combined with a later sermon to disciples on the Law.

In 6 37-42 Lk.'s expansion of Mt. 7 2*a* is secondary and his insertion of 6 39 f.[1] (between 38*c* = Mt. 7 2*b* and 41 = Mt. 7 3) only confuses the original context. Otherwise this injunction to pursue a quiet, inoffensive life (cp Test. Issach. 3)[2] lies visibly enough behind the subordinate linguistic variations of the two reports, and in Mt. closer to the original. Jesus speaks in the figurative and proverbial language of popular wit against the vice of censoriousness, suggested by the Pharisaic type of character. Lk. thinks rather of the inner life of the churches, and applies the warning specially to niggardliness or lack of 'charity' in the narrower sense of the word (Ecclus. 29 10 f. etc.).

The loose series of sententious aphorisms in Mt. 7 1-14[3] has no connection with the Sermon; 7 6 is evidently an erratic boulder (possibly apostolic), 7 7-11 should follow 6 9 f. (as Lk. 11 9 f.) or 6 33 f., and 7 12 connects with 5 42 (as Lk. 6 31: Holtzmann, Wendt) better than with 7 1-5 (Weiss), although as it lies it is meant to round off 5 17. Similarly 7 13 f. belongs to a later context (Lk. 13 23 f.); Mt. has inserted it here for dramatic reasons as a logion[4] suitable for an opening address, adding some expansions (ἡ ἀπάγ. εἰς τὴν ἀπώλειαν, ἡ ἀπάγ. εἰς τ. ζωήν) to bring out his customary eschatological interest (cp Dalman, 130 f.).

(d) The finale of the Sermon, a warning against spurious forms of discipleship (Mt. 7 16*b*-27 = Lk. 6 43-49), has been expanded by Mt.'s insertion of an apostolic logion against false prophets[5] (7 15, which 16*a* connects with what follows) and another logion (7 21-23) presented by Lk. in its true setting (13 26 f.). The latter, which represents Jesus as Messianic arbiter of human lives, is plainly proleptic and cannot have been uttered before 16 16 f.; like several other passages of the kind, if not apostolic (cp 2 Ti. 2 19, etc.) it is an unhistorical anticipation (at least in its present form, for 'lord' [κύριε] etc. in Lk. 6 46 may represent some Aramaic or Hebrew term for 'master'). Cp GOSPELS, § 20 (iv.). On the other hand, Lk. 6 45 is not specially homogeneous with its context (cp Mt. 12 35), and Mt.'s opening (7 16*b*-18) is superior. The identity and outline of the closing parable[6] are quite vantly introduced; its logia are correctly placed by Mt. (15 14 = Lk. 6 39, 10 24 f. = Lk. 6 40). It is difficult to discover (with Hahn) seven commandments in 6 27-38, or four parables in 6 39-49.

1 On this term see Che. OPs. 83 f., Dalman, 162 f., HC 1 342.

2 The supposed originals שלם or חסיר, of which τέλειος and οἰκτίρμων are held to be variant translations, do not seem convincing. On Lk.'s superior connection in 6 36 37 see Bousset 82 f.

3 The original form of the beatitudes, the presence of traits denoting social oppression and an atmosphere of strain, even of worldly perplexity, together with the absence of Mt. 6 25-34 from the Sermon, render it impossible to regard it as the echo of a Galilæan idyll with pastoral charm, although Mt. lends itself to this impression of summer teaching among the hills. On the real state of Galilee and its population, see GALILEE, § 6, Schür. Hist. ii. 1 3-5. It is remarkable that the polemic of the Sermon omits any reference to the Sabbath question, upon which the bitter enmity of the Pharisees had already come to a head against Jesus (Mk. 3 6 Lk. 6 11). Mt. prefers to postpone the Sabbath disputes unhistorically (12 1-8 9-14).

4 The real treasure (6 4 6 18) is secured, not by ostentation, but by inwardness and single-minded devotion to God. Unfeigned and undivided desire for heavenly wealth (6 19-24) is sure of satisfaction (cp Ja. 1 5-8), whatever else fails.

5 The gap is further filled up by means of logia (6 22-24) which—to judge from their erratic and less happy situation (11 34-36 16 13) in Lk.—seem to have had no historical setting in Q. See EYE (col. 1453), also Wernle, Synoptische Frage (1899), 74, and O. Holtzmann's Leben Jesu (280-2). Mt. 6 24 is echoed in 1 Cor. 10 20 f., and cited in 2 Clem. 6 1, Orig. c. Cels. 8 15.

6 The possible interpretation of 'righteousness' (δικαιοσύνη) as 'alms' (ἐλεημοσύνη: 2 Cor. 9 9 f. = Ps. 112 9) would make 6 1 specifically part of 6 2-4.

7 'The house of God abhors much speaking. Pray thou with a loving heart; the petitions of all are in secret. He will do thy business, He will hear that which thou sayest, and accept thine offerings' (from the Ani papyrus, Exp.T 6 537). Prayer, fasting, and alms in Tobit 12 8.

8 Epictetus, in urging the same trust in providence, adduces the odd consideration that runaway slaves (not birds or flowers) get a livelihood somehow (Diss. 1 9 3 26). It is one trace of a certain historic fitness in the evangelic sources or their editors, that figures drawn from the vine (Judæa's characteristic plant) are confined to the Judæan ministry, whilst the corn flourishes naturally enough in the Galilæan tradition. See Bousset 44.

1 Neubauer quotes a Galilæan proverb similar to 6 39 (Studia Biblica, 1 52, n. 3). 6 42 corresponds to Oxyrh. Logia 1, and 6 37 echoes a saying of Hillel. No doubt many of these sayings were suggested to Jesus by what he had heard on the lips of Galilæan neighbours and during his recent tour throughout the synagogues.

2 Cp Jas. 4 11 f. On Lk. 6 41 Cheyne quotes from a satirical poem in the Arabian Ḥamāsa 5 37: 'I indeed see in thine eye a beam set across, and thou marvellest if thou beholdest in mine eye a mote' (Exp.T 4 402).

3 Resch groups 7 6 with a later set of logia on the service of the kingdom, following the agraphon 'be ye wise bankers' (γίνεσθε δόκιμοι τραπεζῖται: cp 1 Thess. 5 21*a*) and 1 Thess. 5 21*b*-22. The lapidary style of Mt. 7 1-14 represents one characteristic method of Jesus as a teacher, derived from the gnomic literature of Judaism and practised by most rabbis of his day. The other method, resembling that of the prophets, was a longer impassioned harangue, with sustained appeal and thrust. These, with the dialogue-method, represent the characteristic styles adopted by Jesus, the Sermon being a combination of the first two.

4 For instances of this famous figure in the first century, cp Test. Asher 1, Test. Abrah. 11, and Epict. Diss. 2 11 3 22; for the roads of Galilee, GASm. HG 425 f.

5 Lk.'s sole mention of 'false prophets' (ψευδοπροφῆται: 6 26) refers to the past; in keeping with the 'political' or social tendency of his eschatology, he omits this trait in describing the apocalypse of Jesus (Mt. 24 24 Mk. 13 22).

6 According to the Talmud (Neub. Géog. du Talm. 185, recognisable under the characteristic style of each editor, Mt.'s version being superior in accuracy. The impression of originality and authority produced by the Sermon (Mt. 7 28 f.) naturally corresponds to the weight and length of it in Mt., who has transferred to this place what Mk. (1 22) and Lk. (4 32) narrate as the result of Jesus' earlier teaching in the synagogue.

Much of the discussion upon the audience of the Sermon is misplaced. The dual nature of its contents

17. Audience.

—now touching disciples specifically, now broadening out to the public—together with the deliberately dual description of its hearers (which is not the result of composite tradition), may serve to indicate that too rigid a distinction is usually drawn between teaching (διδαχή) and preaching (κήρυγμα) at this early period of Jesus' ministry. The alternative 'disciples or crowd' is as imaginary as the harmonising expedients are unsatisfactory. A solution of the problem is visible when the collocation of crowds (ὄχλοι, ὄχλος) and 'disciples' (μαθηταί) in the description of the audience (Mt. 5 1 f. 7 28 f. Lk. 6 19 f. 7 1) is held to imply that in Q the 'disciples' were not the restricted inner circle of the twelve, whose election preceded the Sermon, but a wider circle of adherents more or less devoted to the new prophet. His instructions they followed, and to his teaching they professed attention and obedience. This ordinary sense of 'disciples' (μαθητής; cp Mt. 10 24 Acts 6 2 etc.), as employed if not retained by Mt.[1] and Lk., would cover people of varied enthusiasm and position (cp Mt. 10 42 Jn. 6 66), and even men with extremely imperfect ideas of what their new faith involved (Acts 19 1-3). The characteristic which distinguished them in general from the ordinary multitude was sympathy with the propaganda of Jesus—due in many cases to gratitude for the healing received from him—as well as a disposition to favour the new religious leader. Naturally the line between 'disciples' and 'crowd' would not be rigid; although there had been a certain sifting which helped to define the groups more clearly, they did not always lie noticeably apart as yet, like oil and water. Among the crowd there were usually some who were attracted by other motives than mere curiosity or the desire to range themselves behind a fresh and promising and popular guide; these Jesus in the Sermon and elsewhere[2] designed to reach and win.[3] Particularly among the 'quiet in the land,' susceptible and devout souls unspoiled by the hot fanaticism of Galilee with its semi-political zeal for God, or by the chilling formalities of the Pharisaic legalism, Jesus seems to have found congenial spirits.

This unobtrusive piety of the 'meek' (עֲנִיִּים, or עֲנָוִים) is sketched in Enoch 108 7-10, and its resigned semi-ascetic temper breathed through circles of pre-Christian Judaism outside Essenism; see Ps. Sol. 5 13 f., the Assumptio Mosis, the character of Simeon and Anna in Lk. 2 and of Nathanael in Jn. 1 45-49 (Rhees, JBL, 1898, pp. 21-30), and the later mansueti et quiescentes of 4 Esd. (11 42), with the suffering lower classes of James (1 9 27, etc.; Spitta on Ja. 2 5). The picture of poor and needy ones sketched in the earlier wisdom-literature and apocalypses of Judaism reveals a disposition which had certain affinities with that of Jesus and yet was capable of development under his hands. His patient endurance, as taught to these people in the Sermon, was equally devout, but more cheerful; alert rather than resigned. With the quietists, as with the Essenes, Jesus stood in evident if partial sympathy; they were the Gottesfreunde of the age. Affinities, however, do not imply alliance or dependence, and the data of the gospels referring to the Galilæan period show that Jesus drew adherents from all classes, particularly from the poor, but not to the exclusion of that middle class which, as Graetz argues (History of Jews, ET 2 151 f.), was not conspicuously lacking in piety or morals and might have echoed honestly the young ruler's apologia (cp also Mk. 12 32-34). See NAZARETH, § 2, POOR, § 2.

At any rate, the Sermon assumes most of the fundamental principles of the religious consciousness; it was not addressed to a people 'sitting in darkness,' much less to the twelve. Neither esoteric, nor official, nor a call to repentance, it may be presumed to have reached an audience of people morally disposed (owing partly to temperament and circumstances, partly to his preaching) to start on the new road, if they had not already started, people whose cardinal need was encouragement and instruction upon the differentia of their new course. That Jesus taught the contents of the sermon during the course of several days (JESUS, § 12), is not impossible. The real Sermon, however, is short enough to have been delivered upon one occasion, and the gospels plainly intend to convey this impression of a single address, although the indefiniteness of Q and the evident absence of supplementary oral tradition did not permit them to sketch any concrete situation for it in time or place.

Perhaps the outstanding features of the address, from the point of view of historical and ethical progress in 18. Historical significance.

Judaism and primitive Christianity (ISRAEL, § 93), are (a) the close union between the mutual love of man and man, and the devout aspiration of the soul towards God; (b) the genial tenderness with which the conception of God is developed, free from rabbinic intellectualism or mere nationalism; and (c) 'the spiritual nomism' (Toy), which conserves the moral essence of the Law and at the same time frees it from legal dryness (JESUS, §§ 11-13, 17 f.). The last-named point is of cardinal importance to the historian, as the pivot upon which the relation of Jesus to Judaism finally turned. 'The expansion of the law quantitatively amounts,' as Baur remarked, 'to a qualitative difference.' There is no reason to doubt that even during the Galilæan period Jesus was conscious of issues in his message which transcended the current and traditional environment of religion among the Jews. But revelation, like nature, is never brusque. As yet the transition had not become so acute as it did at a later stage, and one main concern of Jesus in the Sermon, while defining and urging the new revelation with perfect decisiveness (Brandt, Die Evangelische Geschichte u. der Ursprung des Christenthums, 1893, pp. 449-455), is to avoid needless misunderstanding and prevent his freer views from being abused to the detriment of morality.[1] Both in the apocalyptic and in the nomistic Stud. Bibl. 1 52), Galilæans were noted as wandering preachers who excelled in expositions of the biblical text, couched in parabolic form. Whilst Lk.'s access to a Jerusalem-cycle of traditions or even sources enables him to give Jerusalem a considerable rôle in the account of Jesus' early days, as indeed suited his literary predilections, Mt. singularly ignores the capital. So far as Mt. is concerned, Jesus had never been there when he delivered the Sermon; his ministry had been purely Galilæan. Jerusalem in Mt. 1-4 (cp 4 5) is merely indifferent if not antipathetic to Jesus (2 3), though susceptible to John (3 5, from Mk. 1 5).

[1] Mt.'s characteristic 'to disciple' (μαθητεύειν: elsewhere in NT only in Acts 14 21) includes (28 16-20) instruction in the words of Jesus (e.g., 5 21 f.) as the norm of life (cp 6 21-24); in 27 57 the word is substituted for 'awaiting the reign of God,' in the description of Joseph of Arimathæa, and the important logion of Mt. 13 52 indicates the continuity and advance of Jesus' teaching (Dalman, 57). Thus the conception of discipleship, especially in Mt., corresponds to the aim of the Sermon (as in Mt. 5-7); it means adherence to the teaching of Jesus as the consummation of Judaism and the independent rule of a new faith. See further J. Weiss, Nachfolge Christi (1895) 2-13.

[2] Cp Mt. 23 1 and Mk. 8 34 (Lk. 9 23, yet Mt. 16 24), although the latter allusion to the crowd has its own difficulties (Carpenter, 227, Wrede, Das Messiasgeheimnis in den Evangelien, 1901, pp. 138 f.). The less determinate conditions of Jesus' actual ministry may, of course, have been somewhat sharpened in the process of tradition.

[3] Even although Jesus is proleptically represented in the Sermon as Messianic judge, the fidelity of the evangelic sources appears in the fact that as yet the adherents or disciples are pointed not to himself but to God as the supreme object of imitation (cp Xen. Mem. i. 6 3, ὥσπερ καὶ τῶν ἄλλων ἔργων οἱ διδάσκαλοι τοὺς μαθητὰς μιμητὰς ἑαυτῶν ἀποδεικνύουσιν).

[1] Cp L. Jacob, Jesu Stellung zum mosaischen Gesetz (1893). The sensitiveness of Jesus upon this point has been already noticed (see above, § 13). Max Nordau quotes Mt. 5 17 as the last word in his exposure of modern Degeneration (ET 1898, p. 500); it is to him a profoundly penetrating maxim upon the truth that 'whoever preaches absence of discipline is an enemy of progress.' The preservation of such logia in Mt. and Lk. was necessary in view of their audiences in the Diaspora and the outside empire, to whom the Law was an ethical ancient code. Now that the Pauline strife had passed, the later generation (cp 1 Tim. 1 8 f.) tendencies of the age he found support.[1] Neither of these wholly anticipated his genius, and to neither did he yield himself; yet in each material lay ready for the new reconstruction of religion to which, in 'the Sermon on the Mount,' Jesus is represented as having for the first time seriously addressed himself.

(especially Weiss, Das Matthäus-evang. u. seine Lukasparallelen, 1876, pp. 130 f. 202 f., also in Meyer's comm.,(9) 1898; and Die vier Evangelien im berichtigten Text, 1900; Schanz, *Komm. über des Ev. des heilig. SERPENT. Serpents abound in Palestine, as well as in Egypt, in the Sinaitic peninsula, and in the Arabian desert (Doughty, Ar. Des. 1 328). The OT writers use eleven different words for serpents of one kind or another. It is often difficult to determine which species of the order Ophidia is meant, and yet could regard the Law with equanimity, and, indeed, it was advisable to emphasise Jesus' positive approval of it to avoid misconceptions.

[1] The apocalyptic was not wholly destitute of a legal basis, for a right to the Messianic bliss frequently was traced back to loyalty to the Law. Nor, on the other hand, did the Law entirely reject a Messianic outlook. So Ehrhardt (37 f.) rightly, as against Baldensperger's thesis. See further W. Mackintosh, The Natural History of the Christian Religion (1894), 133-225, and Caird's Evolution of Religion, 2 88 f. 137 f.

clearness requires that we should vary our renderings, and not translate all these eleven words 'serpents.'

1. אֶפְעֶה, 'eph'eh (ὄφις Job 20 16; ἀσπίδες, Is. 30 6; βασιλίσκος [Aq. ἔχιδνα, Sym. Th. ἀσπίς], Is. 59 5 †), EV VIPER, which is also the rendering of ἔχιδνα in NT. The root of the Hebrew word (and its cognate in Arabic) means to utter a groaning or hissing sound: the verb פָּעָה occurs once in OT (Is. 42 14) in reference to the groaning of one in pain.[1] That 'eph'eh as well as Ar. af'a means the 'viper,' was shown long ago by Bochart (Hieroz., Bk. iii., chap. 2); the deadly nature of the viper's poison well suits the allusion in Job 20 16. Objection has been taken to the mention of a viper issuing from an egg (Is. 59 5 b): but it is to be remembered (1) that vipers are in a sense oviparous, the young being hatched at the moment of birth, and (2) that such Hebrew words as 'eph'eh are not like scientific terms for genera and species, and may easily be extended from the animals they properly denote to others which externally resemble them.

2. Zōḥălē 'āphār, זֹחֲלֵי עָפָר (Dt. 32 24 †), and z. 'éreṣ, זֹחֲלֵי אֶרֶץ (Mi. 7 17 †), 'they that glide on, or into, the earth'—a phrase which needs no comment. Cp ZOHELETH.

3. nāḥāš, נָחָשׁ (many times: 𝔊 everywhere ὄφις, except Job 26 13 Amos 9 3, where δράκων), EV 'serpent'—the most general word (probably used also in Ecclus. 25 15, where the Greek translator has so strangely taken the wrong meaning of rōš—'head' should be 'venom' [see GALL]).

Its connection with the verb נחשׁ (Gen. 30 27 44 5 15 Lev. 19 26 1 K. 20 33 etc.), which means 'to divine by omens,' is obscure:[2] a plausible theory is that of Boch. (Hieroz. 1 3), that the verb has obtained this meaning because of the belief, widespread in antiquity, that the serpent possessed the power of such divination, and that this power could be gained through contact with serpents (as in the case of Helenus and Cassandra) or by partaking of their flesh. Against this it is urged by Robertson Smith (Journ. Phil. 14 115) that the noun nāḥāš is confined to Heb., whilst the verb is common to all the Semitic dialects (cp Barth, ES, 48). In any case, considering the common use of the root in Arabic and Syriac (ib. 113 f.), we cannot suppose, as has been held (e.g. by Lag. Uebers. 188), that the verb is a denominative from nāḥāš and so referred primarily to whispered incantation, connected with the idea of the serpent's hiss.[3] See DIVINATION, § 3 [3].

We find nāḥāš combined with other terms in the phrases (a) nāḥāš śārāph, נָחָשׁ שָׂרָף (ὄφις θανατῶν, Nu. 21 6; ὄφις δάκνων, Dt. 8 15), 'fiery serpent'; see below, 9; (b) n. bārīăḥ, נָחָשׁ בָּרִחַ (Job 26 13 δράκων ἀποστάτης Is. 27 1 ὄφις φεύγων †), AV 'piercing serpent,' RV 'swift serpent'; and (c) n. 'ăḳallāthōn, נָחָשׁ עֲקַלָּתוֹן (Is. 27 1, ὄφις σκολιός), 'crooked (RV^mg. 'winding') serpent.' Both epithets are applied to the mythical Leviathan in Is. 27 1;[4] the reference in Job is similar. See LEVIATHAN.

4. עַכְשׁוּב, 'akšūb (Ps. 140 3 [4], † ἀσπίδες, cp Rom. 3 13 [Aq. probably βασιλίσκος]), 'adders.' This word, which in form resembles the word עַכָּבִישׁ, 'spider,' seems in the Mishnā to denote a kind of spider, perhaps the tarantula (Lewysohn, Zool. des Talmuds, 309; Levy, NHWB, s.v.), and was so understood by Rashi in the single instance where it occurs in the OT. But the authority of nearly all ancient versions (the Arabic renders 'vipers') and of the NT citation (Rom. 3 13) is in favour of the rendering 'adders'; and, as Bochart has shown (Hieroz. 3 5), this rendering harmonises with its probable derivation from the root represented by Ar.

[1] In Syr. the verb is used for the bleating of sheep.

[2] naḥs is the Ar. term for infaustus; but whether it is legitimate to connect this with נָחָשׁ is doubtful. See We. Heid.(1) 147, n. 1.

[3] Lag. (Mitth. 1 230; cp Barth, ES 48) identifies נָחָשׁ with Ar. ḥanaš. This seems very plausible, though ḥanaš is used for flies and worms as well as serpents (cp We. Heid.(2) 152). A shiny black serpent (Zamenis carbonaria) of Palestine, often carried about in bags by dervish serpent-charmers, is called ḥānāš (PEFQ, Jan. 1894, p. 29 f.).

[4] Smend (ZATW 4 213) thinks that two different creatures (δράκων and ὄφις) are meant. This seems unlikely.

SERPENT

'akasa, to 'invert' or 'turn round,' as describing the motion of a serpent.[1]

5. פֶּתֶן, péthen (ἀσπίς, Dt. 32 33 [Aq. βασιλίσκος], Job 20 14 Ps. 58 4 [5] Is. 11 8; δράκων [Aq., Sym., Th. ἀσπίς] Job 20 16; βασιλίσκος [Sym. probably ἀσπίς], Ps. 91 13 †[2]), EV 'asp' or 'adder.' The word evidently denotes a highly poisonous snake, perhaps of the cobra kind (cp Arab. bathan; Forskål, Descriptiones Animalium, 15).

The particular sort intended cannot be determined. There is no ground for connecting the name (Boch. 3 5) with Greek πύθων.

6. צֶפַע, ṣépha' (Is. 14 29, † ἔκγονα ἀσπίδων), AV 'cockatrice,' RV 'basilisk,' EV^mg. 'adder.' From Is. 14 29 it appears that ṣépha' denotes a more deadly animal than nāḥāš, though itself less formidable than śārāph (see Dillm. ad loc.). The Vg. renders regulus, and it is possible that the fabled 'basilisk' is intended; but the 'asps' brood' of the LXX seems equally likely.

7. צִפְעֹנִי, ṣiph'ōnī (ἔκγονα ἀσπίδων, Is. 11 8; ἀσπίδες, Is. 59 5; κεράστης, EV 'adder,' RV^mg. 'basilisk,' Pr. 23 32; נְחָשִׁים צ׳, ὄφεις [cp no. 3] θανατοῦντες [EV], Jer. 8 17 [3] †), AV 'cockatrice,' RV 'basilisk,' EV^mg. 'or adder' except in Pr. 23 32 where 'adder' is in the text. Perhaps, as Tristram (NHB 275) and Cheyne suggest, a large viper like Daboia xanthina (FFP 147) is intended by both ṣiph'ōnī and the kindred ṣépha'. Cp COCKATRICE.

The eggs mentioned in Is. 59 5 are an objection to this identification. Hence the cat-snake (Ailurophis vivax, now called Tarbophis fallax) has been suggested by Furrer (HWB(2) 1423*a*); and this, it is true, may formerly have extended S. of 'N. Syria.' The eggs of the monitor lizard Varanus niloticus (still eaten) would produce creatures fairly like vipers.

8. קִפּוֹז, ḳippōz (ἐχῖνος, Is. 34 15), AV 'great owl.' Ar. ḳafaza means 'to spring,' and Ar. ḳaffāz (=קִפּוֹז) and its fem. ḳaffāza are both quoted (P. Smith, Thes. Syr. 1375, Lag. Uebers., 89) as meaning a kind of serpent. The etymology would suggest some rapidly springing snake, such as Eryx jaculus (FFP 146); though the ḳippōz cannot be either this or (RV Bochart, Ges., etc.) the 'arrowsnake' (ἀκοντίας: cp Lucan, 6 675 'Arabum volucer serpens' and 9 822 'jaculum vocat Africa'), since only pythons 'hatch' (Is. l.c.).

The context of Is. 34 15 would be appropriate to any oviparous species; but there are no pythons now in Palestine or Babylon, nor are they known to have lived in Persia or Mesopotamia in historical times, being confined, with one exception, to the Palæotropic and Australian regions (cp Houghton).

𝔊 and most ancient interpreters confused ḳippōz with ḳippōd; but etymology and context show them to be distinct. AV's 'great owl' is not supported by etymology or ancient tradition (see Boch. ii. 3 11); but there is force in the contention that a bird is suggested by the description (Houghton, Acad., 1886, 1 292 f.; Post, Hastings' DB 3 637).

9. שָׂרָף, śārāph (Nu. 21 8), נָחָשׁ שָׂרָף (Nu. 21 6 Dt. 8 15), and שָׂרָף מְעוֹפֵף (Is. 14 29 30 6). The rendering 'fiery serpent' of EV is due to the derivation from שָׂרַף, 'to burn' which still remains the most probable explanation of the name.

The name thus refers either to the fiery appearance of the serpent and especially of its eyes[4] or to the inflammation caused by its venom. On the relation of the śārāphs to the seraphim of Is. 6 2 6, see below, § 3 (e).

10. שְׁפִיפֹן, šĕphīphōn (ἐγκαθήμενος, Gen. 49 17 †), EV renders 'adder,' AV^mg. 'arrowsnake,' RV^mg. 'horned snake,' the Cerastes (see § 2 [b]), cp Ar. siff.

11. תַּנִּין, tannīn (Ex. 7 9 10 12), RV^mg. 'Any large reptile'; Ps. 91 13 RV, AV 'dragon'; Deut. 32 33 (EV 'dragon'; Dr. 'reptiles'); cp DRAGON.

As we have seen, snakes are no rarity in Palestine, a country which, by climate, soil, and geographical position, is well adapted to sustain a large ophidian fauna. Tristram enumerates thirty-three species, of which the most venomous are:—(a) The Naja haje, or Egyptian Cobra, found in Southern Palestine and common in Egypt. Its habit of swelling and flattening its neck when irritated, and gliding along with its posterior two-thirds on the ground, its head and neck being erect, are well known. It usually forms part of the stock in trade of snake charmers, and it is said that the cobra is readily thrown into a rigid or mesmeric condition, which G. St. Hilaire says is induced by pressure applied to the neck. The remaining venomous snakes all belong to the family Viperidæ. They are (b) Cerastes cornutus (hasselquistii), the horned viper, which is exceptionally poisonous; it frequents the sandy deserts of South Palestine, and hides in the sand or in the hollow caused by a horse's or camel's foot (Gen. 49 17). It is an object of great terror to horses, and is thought by some to be the asp of Cleopatra. (c) Vipera lebetina, syns. V. euphratica and Daboia xanthina. (d) V. ammodytes, the long-nosed or sand-viper, mainly nocturnal and found on hills. (e) Echis carinatus, syns. E. arenicola, found in the desert near the Dead Sea. It is said to produce a characteristic hissing or grating sound by rubbing its serrated scales together.

3. Magic, folk-lore, and mythology.

(a) The art of serpent-charming, still practised in Egypt, Palestine, and India, was known to the ancient Hebrews (see Ps. 58 4 f. Jer. 8 17 Eccles. 10 11 Ecclus. 12 13 Ja. 3 7), who, however, like the dervish snake-charmers of to-day, found venomous serpents deaf to incantations (cp PEFQ Jan. 1894, p. 29 f.). In Ex. 7 9-12 (P) we hear of Moses and Aaron turning their rods (by the divine power) into serpents, and the Egyptian magicians (did the original story say, 'the magicians of Miṣrim'?—see MOSES, § 6) performing the same feat. The converse of this (serpents stiffened into rods) is still common (see above on the cobra) with Eastern jugglers. J however, so far as we know, only told of Moses turning his rod into a serpent (see Ex. 4 3); its supernatural power must surely (in the oldest form of the tradition) have excluded the competition of the Egyptian sorcerers, though it is true that in the end, according to P, 'Aaron's rod swallowed up their rods.' Cp PLAGUES (TEN), § 4.

(b) Another element in Hebrew folk-lore was probably a veneration for the supernatural character of certain serpents. Of course we need not credit the Israelites with the full Arabian superstition respecting serpents. On the other hand, we can well imagine that much was popularly believed in Israel which has found no record in the OT (the names Dragon's Well, Serpent's Pool [Jos.], and Zoheleth confirm us in this view; see DRAGON, § 4). Those who regard the narrative in Gen. 3 as of native Palestinian or even Jerahmeelite origin (see § 4) may therefore be excused if they look for illustrations of it in Arabian folk-lore. The most accessible sources of information are Robertson Smith's Rel. Sem. (see 120, 133, 168 n. 3, 172), and Wellhausen's Reste Arab. Heid.(2) 152 ff.

In the light of these facts it becomes very natural that the serpent in Gen. 3 (or rather the δαίμων within it) should know the qualities of the fruit of the sacred tree. He might indeed conceivably have been regarded as the spirit of the tree, for such a spirit would become visible in serpent form. Or until lately we might plausibly have held that he was originally thought of as the protective δαίμων of the Ḥavvah-clan (serpent-clan; on Wellhausen's theory as to Eve, compare EVE, HIVITES, and PARADISE, § 12). The present writer now regards this theory (once so natural) as definitely set aside. Not less certainly may we affirm that the serpent of the Paradise story was neither a shaiṭān nor the Satan—i.e., neither one of the pernicious snake-dæmons called shaiṭāns nor the Jewish-Christian Satan who is the shaiṭān par excellence.[1]

[1] For final ב cp Ar. tha'lab=שׁוּעָל, 'fox'; see SHAALABBIM.

[2] [In Ps. 91 13 we may doubt the combination 'lion' (שַׁחַל) and 'adder,' 'young lion' (כְּפִיר) and 'dragon.' 𝔊's ἐπ' ἀσπίδα presupposes זָחֵל (cp 2 above), and in Job 4 10 𝔊's δρακόντων (for כפירים) presupposes כְּרָפִים, an otherwise unknown word for 'asp' (Syr. kurfa).—T. K. C.]

[3] Here Aq. seems to render צפענים in one edition by βασιλίσκους, and in another by σκοπεύοντας; Sym. by πονηρούς.

[4] An Arabian poet (Ṭarafa, Mu'all. 83) speaks of the 'fiery head of the serpent' [G. Jacob, Altarab. Parallelen, 10]; cp also Verg. Aen. 2 210, Ardentisque oculos suffecti sanguine et igni.

[1] According to Sprenger, Goldziher, and van Vloten (in Feestbundel aan Prof. de Goeje, 1891, p. 38 ff.) shaiṭān is an old Arabic word. This is extremely plausible, but it is possible that corrections have been introduced into old texts by Moham-

(c) The belief (implied in Nu. 21 9) in the power of a serpent of brass to check the ravages of venomous serpents can also be illustrated from Arabic sources. Ḳazwīnī (2 373) tells of a golden locust which guaranteed a certain town from a plague of locusts, and of two brazen oxen which checked a murrain among cattle.[1] More remote is the consideration that the serpent was the symbol of the divine power of healing, and sacred therefore to Asklepios.

(d) The belief in the special wickedness of a person who has died from a serpent's bite, ascribed to the 'barbarous' people of Melita in Acts 28 3-6, is well illustrated from the experience of Doughty in Arabia (Ar. Des. 1 313 f.).

(e) On the flying saraphs of Is. 14 29 30 6 much need not be said. We find them again in the dragons of Arabia mentioned in 4 Esd. 15 29, where their wings are apparently represented figuratively as chariots, and their hissing (so RV, reading sibilatus for sic flatus, with Bensly) is said to be borne over the earth. They are among those fancy creatures with which folk-lore peoples desert regions where, as Ašur-bāni-pal says, 'the birds of heaven fly not, and wild asses and gazelles do not feed' (KB 2 221). To this day the folk-lore of the fellahīn of Palestine recognises such creatures (PEFQ, 1894, p. 30)—as indeed Herodotus (2 75), giving credence to travellers' tales, had long ago recognised them in Arabia. Delitzsch remarks (Gen.(5) 99) that the 'flying seraphs' have their counterparts in the SERAPHIM, with which Wellhausen agrees (Ar. Heid.(2) 153).

(f) The serpent (nāḥāš) at the bottom of the sea, mentioned by Amos (9 3), might also until lately have been explained from Arabic sources. The legendary sea-serpent or tinnīn (= Heb. tannīn) of the Arabs is described in such a way as to show that the waterspout is the phenomenon referred to[2] (Mas'ūdī 1 266 f.; Ḳazwīnī 1 132 f.; Damīrī 1 186 f.). Recent investigations, however, leave the present writer no doubt that the 'serpent' of Amos is a pale reflection of Tiāmat, the famous mythic enemy of the Light-god[3] (see CREATION, DRAGON). It need only be added here that the Babylonian Tiāmat is represented in two forms: (1) as a composite monster, with tail, horns, claws, and wings ('like the mediæval devil,' Sayce),[4] and (2) as a serpent, and that, according to Fr. Delitzsch,[5] the serpent form considerably predominated. As early as 1500 B.C. we find Tiāmat described in a Babylonian inscription as a 'raging serpent'[6]—evidently the conception is similar to that of the serpent-myth which had almost faded away for a time when Amos wrote, and when unknown narrators produced the story of the brazen serpent in the wilderness as an explanation of the so-called NEHUSHTAN (q.v.).

In conclusion we have to speak briefly of certain other serpent myths, and to return to the subject of the narrative in Gen. 3. Such myths were specially abundant in Egypt and Babylonia. Among guardian serpents in Egypt may be classed the uræus (οὐραῖος, Egypt. 'ar'at; asp or cobra), represented on the crowns of the gods and of the Pharaohs, which was endowed with a mysterious vitality, and was supposed to vomit flames when angry;[7] also those which were kept in shrines in temples[8] and were the embodiments of the tutelary deities, and open-air sacred serpents protective of districts,[1] besides the fairy-tale serpents which mariners professed to have seen in the Fortunate Isles.[2]

Besides these, we hear of the sacred Sata-serpent of the other world, which describes itself in these terms, 'I am the serpent of many years; I am buried and born (again) continually; I am the serpent at the utmost ends of the world; I am buried and born; I renew myself, I make myself young continually.'[3] Of the evil serpent Apopi enough has been said elsewhere (see DRAGON).

In Babylonia it is sufficient to mention the symbolic serpent of Ea (the god of the deep and the atmosphere), who was early connected with Babylon and the Euphrates—itself called the 'river of the snake.' This is an example of the beneficent serpent. But there was also an 'evil serpent'—the 'serpent of darkness' and 'of the sea'—and it would not be unnatural if this serpent of darkness were often identified with the dragon Tiāmat.[4]

4. Serpent in Paradise.

We now return to Gen. 3. Is it sufficient to explain the part played by the serpent (nāḥāš) from the war with hurtful creatures naturally referred to in an imaginative picture of man's early state? Surely not. In the story on which Gen. 3 is based (it is no doubt only a very pale reflection of it which we possess) the serpent must have been a mythological one. The facts of Arabian folklore (see § 3 b) are favourable to this view, and Jensen (Kosmol. 227) finds a suggestion of it in the Babylonian Flood-story, which makes Pir-napištim give a fragment of the sacred plant (called 'In old age the man becomes young') to Gilgameš, from whom it is taken by a serpent. Here, however, the serpent (representing the jealous-minded gods) grudges the man the attainment of immortality;[5] the connection with the serpent of Gen. 3, suggested by Jensen, is surely as precarious as the theory of the late George Smith (Chaldæan Genesis, ed. Sayce, 88), energetically opposed by Oppert, Halévy, and Tiele, that the temptation was represented on a certain Babylonian cylinder. Indeed, though the 'tree of life' in Gen. 2 3 (which must be the original sacred tree [cp Rev. 22 2] of the Hebrew legend) is of Babylonian and not Iranian origin,[6] it by no means follows that the story of the serpent tempting the woman comes from Babylonia. We have as yet no evidence that the Babylonians had a moralised Paradise-story, and it is conceivable that the writer of Gen. 2 4*b*-3 24 (one of the later Yahwists) may have drawn from different sources. What these sources are, may now, with some confidence, be conjectured. See PARADISE, § 6.

The immediate source of the Paradise-story, including the chief details about the serpent, was most probably Jerahmeelite—i.e., the N. Arabian kinsfolk of the Israelites, a part of whom had entered Canaan before the Israelites, while a part remained in N. Arabia and in the Negeb, where they became to a large extent the religious tutors of the Israelites (see MOSES, §§ 6 ff.), had a Paradise-story upon which the Israelitish tale is based. It is no doubt true that the Phœnicians (influenced, as Philo of Byblus rightly states, from Egypt) recognised the serpent as the symbol of wisdom and immortality;[7] but this does not warrant the theory of a Phœnician or Canaanitish origin of our narrative. And if an ultimate Babylonian origin for the detail of the serpent (as a friendly adviser, not as a tempter) be thought probable, yet we need not look to the Babylonian Paradise for its germ. Ea, the god who formed and was specially interested in man, and who was also the lord of wisdom and bringer of culture to Babylonia, was imagined, not only as a fish (cp the culture-bringer Oannes[8] in Berossus), but sometimes as a serpent.

A primitive form of culture-myth may have reached

N. Arabia in which this divine serpent brought the knowledge of useful arts, and out of this crude material Hebrew moralists may have constructed the episode of the serpent in Gen. 3. It was natural that the sea-serpent (Ea) should become a land-snake, and that its divine character should disappear.

At any rate, the serpent is not to be identified with the pernicious serpent called by the Iranians Azi-Dahāka, which 'sprang like a snake out of the sky down to the earth to blight (Ahuramazda's) creation,' nor of course with the serpent Ahi or Vritra, which is a pure nature-myth of the ancient Aryas of India. We must not therefore illustrate the saying in Gen. 3 15 by the temptation of Krishna in the Bhagavata Purana, which winds up with the overthrow of the great serpent, or by the slaying of Azi-Dahāka by Keresaspa.[1] It is a similar distortion of the sense which identifies the shrewd and friendly serpent of Gen. 3 with the Babylonian dragon of chaos, overcome by the light-god, but allowed to work ruin for a time in the latter days (Rev. 12 9; cp DRAGON).[2] The curse pronounced upon the serpent (Gen. 3 14 f.) is of course quite separate from the main story. When the divine or semi-divine serpent of the old myth had suffered partial degradation, it was natural to connect the action by which (undesignedly) it had injured the first men with a new ætiological myth to account for the physical peculiarities of ordinary serpents and the truceless war between serpents and men. In doing so, however, the narrator clearly implies that originally the serpent had been erect; this was a survival from the time when it was thought to be divine.[3]

What then was the serpent's offence? It consisted not in ill-will to God's noblest creature, man, but in exciting intellectual pride—i.e., in aspiring to the possession of divine wisdom and of that eternal life which goes together with the highest wisdom. It is this pride which is abased in the serpent. Man on his part is to keep up the war against temptation to pride as vigorously as he prosecutes his war against the serpent, now become his deadly foe.[4] Such was the moral meaning of the serpent-story suggested by the original narrator. The unfortunate corruption of the text indicated and perhaps not unplausibly healed elsewhere (PARADISE, § 11) is responsible for the jungle growth of inconsistent interpolations which has gathered round the fairly simple story of Gen. 3 1-24.

SERUG (שְׂרוּג; ϲεροyχ [BAEL], -ɼ [L in Ch.]; in Lk. 3 35 ϲεροyχ [Ti. WH], AV SARUCH) b. Reu, in P's genealogy connecting Shem and Abraham (Gen. 11 20-23 1 Ch. 1 26), is the well-known district and city Sarūg, between Bīrejik on the Euphrates, N. of Carchemish, and the two cities just NE. (Urfa, i.e., Edessa), and SE. (Ḥarrān) from it, both on the river Baliḫ (cp Di. Gen., loc. cit., and reff.). Glaser and Hommel (AHT 209) connect the name with the Aram. district Birtu (fortress) ša saragîti (cp KB 2 10 f.).[1] F. B.

[2] Zahn (Einl. 2 600) connects the mention of the serpent as the symbol of the evil one (Rev. 12 9 20 2; cp 2 Cor. 11 3) with the reference to Pergamum in Rev. 2 12-17. The serpent was the symbol of Asklepios, the god of healing, who was specially worshipped at Pergamum, and whose commonest epithet was σωτήρ (also ὁ σωτήρ, and σωτὴρ τῶν ὅλων). To the Christians this might appear a diabolical caricature of the true σωτὴρ τοῦ κόσμου.

[4] 'Eating dust' (cp Mic. 7 17) need not be taken literally. It may be a conventional expression for the deepest humiliation as in Am. Tab. L 42 35, 'May our enemies see it and eat dust' (Wi. AOF 1 291). The gloss in Is. 65 25 (see SBOT, 'Isa.') seems to misunderstand the passage in Gen. 3. Dust is also said to be the food of the shades (Descent of Ištar, obv. l. 8); this too may be a hyperbole.

SERVANT. The words are :—

1. עֶבֶד, 'ebed (παῖς, παιδάριον, οἰκέτης, θεράπων, δοῦλος); (a) slave, Gen. 12 16 39 17 Ex. 21 2 20, etc.; (b) with reference to a king, a royal official, Gen. 40 20 2 S. 10 2 4, or even a common soldier, 2 S. 2 12 ff. 3 22 8 7.

2. שָׂכִיר, śākīr (μισθωτός, μίσθιος) 'hired servant,' Ex. 12 45 Lk. 15 17 19; 'hireling,' Job 7 1 f. 14 6 Mal. 3 5 Ecclus. 7 20 Jn. 10 12 f.

3. נַעַר, na'ar (παῖς, παιδάριον, θεράπων, δοῦλος), properly 'boy,' 'lad'; hence 'attendant,' 'retainer' (BDB); see Nu. 22 22 1 S. 25 5 2 S. 2 14 f., etc.

4. מְשָׁרֵת, mešārēth (λειτουργός, διάκονος, θεράπων), better rendered 'minister,' 2 S. 13 17 f. 2 K. 4 43, also Joel 1 9 2 17 (of the priests).

5. פלח [Aram.] (λειτουργός), Ezra 7 24.

EV weakens the sense of עֶבֶד and δοῦλος by constantly rendering 'servant.' Only six times is the word 'slave' found in EV. In four passages it renders δοῦλος, viz., Judith 5 11 14 13 18 1 Macc. 3 41. In Jer. 2 14 'home-born slave' is given for יְלִיד בַּיִת, and in Rev. 18 13 'slaves' for σώματα.

The use of παῖς and παιδάριον for עֶבֶד hardly needs comment; it is a natural extension of the meaning of terms which are more strictly equivalent to נַעַר. In Mt. 8 9 we find δοῦλος, but in vv. 6 8 13 παῖς; similarly in Lk. 7 7, cp v. 3. Of special interest are Acts 4 27 30 because AV there renders παῖς by 'child,' in spite of the undoubted reference to passages in II. Isaiah where the 'Servant of the Lord' is spoken of in 𝔊 by the title παῖς, corresponding to עֶבֶד. RV correctly substitutes 'Servant'; the phrase is 'thy holy Servant Jesus.' See SERVANT OF THE LORD. It is also noteworthy that where 'Servant' (עֶבֶד) is used to express the special relation of Moses (Ex. 14 31 Nu. 12 7 f.) and of Job (Job 1 8 [A; but Bℵ παῖς] 2 3) to the true God, 𝔊 renders by θεράπων—a more honorific term than δοῦλος. Nevertheless, in a similar case the translator of Isaiah, as we have seen, adopts a different course. Note also that Joshua, the מְשָׁרֵת (Ex. 24 13, EV 'minister') of Moses, is called in 𝔊 ὁ παρεστηκὼς αὐτῷ. On διάκονος and λειτουργός see DEACON, MINISTER.

SERVANT OF THE LORD

Use of title (§ 1). In Jer., Ezek., II. Isa. (§ 2 f.). In Is. 42 49 50 53 (§ 4). State of text (§ 5). Jerahmeelite theory (§ 6). Literature (§ 7).

The phrase 'servant (servants) of Yahwè' (or 'of God') is applied to various persons and groups of persons.

1. Use of title. It is applied to Abraham (Dt. 9 27 Ps. 105 6 42); to Isaac and Jacob (Dt. 9 27); to Moses (Dt. 34 5 Josh. 1 1 1 Ch. 6 49 2 Ch. 24 9 Neh. 10 29 Dan. 9 11); to Joshua (Josh. 24 29 Judg. 2 8); to David (Ps. 18 and 36: titles); to the prophets (Jer. 7 25 25 4 etc.); to Isaiah, (Is. 20 3); to Job (Job 1 8 2 3 42 8), and even to Nebuchadrezzar, (Jer. [25 9] 27 6 43 10); of the usage in passages of Ezekiel and Is. 40-55 and in cognate passages of Jeremiah we shall speak presently (§ 2).

That the phrase is honorific and not disparaging, is obvious. Precisely so, Mohammed in the Koran (Sur. 2 31) is called 'our (God's) servant'; plainly the highest honour is thereby supposed to be conferred upon him. There is, however, a lower degree of this honourable estate. A 'servant' of God is primarily a worshipper of God. By sacrifice, members of the clan or the people were brought into the family of the protecting

[1] [Upon the theory (see Crit. Bib.) that the geography of the Hebrew documents was to a large extent misunderstood and misstated by the redactors, 'Serug' will represent a clan or place of residence, not in the N., but in the far S. Just as by transposition [א]שחו[ר] seems to have become Ḥeres (and, in MT of Is. 19 18, Heres), so 'Geshur' (the southern 'Geshur') may have become 'Serug.'—T. K. C.]

God, and a relation was established which might almost equally well be called that of servants[1] and of sons (cp 2 K. 16 7 Mal. 3 17, and note, with Mozley, the sense of ownership which pervades Abraham's conduct to Isaac in Gen. 22). To be advanced to a higher degree of service, a worshipper of Yahwè must receive from him some special mission. This could also be the lot of a whole people. A time was doubtless coming when all mankind would become the worshipping servants of the true God; but there would still be one people which was Yahwè's servant by election for a special object (cp Is. 49 1-6), viz. Israel. In the olden time, the people of Israel was God's servant only through its highest representatives—patriarchs (typically), prophets, and the idealised David. But in the post-exilic age the noblest portions of the people assimilated more and more the elevating idea that Israel itself was in the highest sense Yahwè's servant. See ISAIAH ii., § 18; cp MESSIAH, §§ 3 ff.

None of the passages containing the phrase 'ĕbed Yahwè (Servant of Yahwè) presents any special difficulty except Jer. [25 9] 27 6 43 10, and some of those in Is. 40-55. These passages we have now to consider.

2. Jer. 27 6 43 10.

(a) As to those in Jer. relative to Nebuchadrezzar (the phrase in 25 9 has been interpolated),[2] there is of course nothing peculiar in the idea that the movements of the great conquerors known to the Israelites were fore-ordained by Yahwè (cp Is. 10 5 f. 15 37 26). There is, however, some strangeness in Nebuchadrezzar's being called by Yahwè 'my servant,' considering that whatever else the phrase 'Yahwè's servant' may mean in any special case, it means everywhere, except apparently in these passages of Jer., Yahwè's worshipper. It is possible for moderns to find good points in Nebuchadrezzar;[3] but there is no evidence that the Israelites were ever tempted to do so, and in particular that they ever looked forward (cp Is. 45 3 6) to Nebuchadrezzar's becoming a convinced worshipper of Yahwè; indeed, the narratives of Daniel and of Judith appear to make this king a symbol of the opponent of the God of the Jews, Antiochus Epiphanes. Besides this, it is probable that when Jer. 27 (in its present form) and 43 were written, the title 'my servant' was already a standing appendage to 'Israel' (cp Jer. 30 10 46 27 f.). Are we prepared to reconcile the double assignment of this title to Nebuchadrezzar and to Israel by the assumption of Duhm that the title 'my servant' was conferred, according to Hebrew thinkers, on Nebuchadrezzar for the period during which Israel's claim to be Yahwè's earthly representative was in abeyance? There surely ought to be some more satisfying theory than this.[4]

(b) As regards the passages, Ezek. 28 25 37 25[5] Jer. 30 10 46 27 Is. 41 8 42 19 ff. 43 10 44 1 f. 21 45 4 48 20, there is no doubt that the title 'my servant' is here applied to the people of Israel (Is. 41 8 44 21) or—the synonymous term—Jacob (Ezek. Jer. Is. 44 1 f. 45 4 48 20). It is also plain from the passages in Is. 40-55 that the title suggested this idea—that Israel was not only devoted to the worship of Yahwè, but also 'chosen' by God to receive certain unique marks of favour (‖ בְּחִירִי, Is. 43 20 45 4[6] 'called' 'formed,' 'made' are also used), beginning with the deliverance from Egypt and the journey under divine guidance into Canaan and closing with the deliverance from Babylon (?) and the wonderful events which were to follow. Did the title also suggest the idea of a mission entrusted to Israel? It is true that in 41 11-16 Israel is described as a conqueror; that in 44 3-5 it is promised that Yahwè's spirit (rûăḥ) shall be poured out upon Israel's offspring, and that even foreigners shall aspire to become adopted members of Israel, also that in 43 10 f. the servants of Yahwè whom he has chosen (read עֲבָדַי) are called upon to act as witnesses to the prophetic veracity of their God. But these statements can only be said to contain germs which might develop into the idea of Israel's mission; upon the whole the Israel of these passages (and of the cognate ones in Ezek. and Jer.) has to manifest Yahwè's glory (cp Is. 43 7) rather by being than by doing, and to receive God's blessing for itself rather than to make them fruitful for other peoples, though certainly the three passages, 41 11-16 43 10 f. and 44 3-5, if read in the light of other passages, seem to suggest that a second stage in Israel's renewed life may be preparing, characterised by earnest activity and the exercise of moral influence.

3. Cognate passages in Ezek., Jer., and II. Isaiah.

Israel, then, as it passes out of the furnace of captivity, receives honourable titles from its God. We must not, however, exaggerate the merits of the bearers of these high titles. Israel is highly favoured; but the description of Israel in Is. 40-55 is by no means altogether idealistic. First, as regards the past. It will be necessary to leave out of account the strong statement in 42 24*b*,

> 'Was it not Yahwè—he against whom we sinned,
> And in whose ways they would not walk,
> And to whose law they were not obedient,'

and also the stern, damnatory clauses of chap. 48, inasmuch as all these are certainly later interpolations, and are therefore only interesting for the history of the expansion of the prophetic writing. But we may and must refer to 40 2 42 24 f. 43 23-28 47 6 50 1 51 17, as implying grievous failures on the part of Israel. In fact, the prophet of consolation could only carry out his object by making the calamities of Israel intelligible—i.e., by reminding Israel of its earlier infidelity towards its righteous God.

Nor is this description idealistic as regards the present. According to the Second Isaiah, it is weakness of faith that is Israel's chief fault, and since faith is the stretched-out hand which receives God's blessings, it is necessary for the heralds of deliverance to arouse men out of the torpor of despondency by rebuking their distrust of God. To Israel at large 'it seemed as if Yahwè's recent action had been aimless, as if he had begun by spending great pains on the education of Israel, and then forgotten Israel's right to protection (40 27 49 14 63 11-14), and as if the source either of Yahwè's compassion or of his heroic deeds had been dried up, so that he tamely "gave his glory to another god" (42 8 48 11 63 15).'[1] Kindly and persuasive instructions were therefore essential to prepare the exiled Israelites for their high destiny. Idealism was permissible in pictures of future salvation, but not in descriptions of the state of Yahwè's people either in the past or in the present.

It may be doubted, however, whether such kindly persuasiveness would have been consistent with calling the whole body of exiled Israelites 'blind' and 'deaf.' The commentators seem here to have fallen into error. They tell us that the words (42 18-20, RV),—

> 'Hear, ye deaf; and look, ye blind, that ye may see. Who is blind, but my servant? or deaf, as my messenger that I send? who is blind as he that is at peace [with me], and blind as the Lord's servant? Thou seest many things, but thou observest not; his ears are open, but he heareth not,'— refer to the Israelites, whom Yahwè reproaches for their spiritual insensibility (chap. 29 18). And this is supposed to be confirmed by 43 8, where we read (EV),—

> Bring forth the blind people that have eyes, and the deaf that have ears,—

a difficult passage certainly, as the differences of the commentators show. It must be remarked, however, that in 42 16 the Israelites are called 'blind' in quite another sense; what is meant there is simply (to use Skinner's words) that the travellers cannot see their path. It is surely not very likely that the Second Isaiah would have applied the same epithet to the same people in two different senses within a few lines.

It has been lately pointed out (SBOT 'Isa.' [Heb.] 131 f.) that 42 19 forms, properly speaking, no part of the discourse, but is a gloss on the words 'deaf' and 'blind' in v. 18. But the text still appears to require some criticism in the light of fresh researches into the history of the Exile. Very probably the gloss or glosses already recognised should run thus:—

Who is blind but the Arabian, and deaf as the Jerahmeelite?
Who is blind but the Ishmaelite, and deaf as the Arabian?

These glosses are not merely an attempt to save the credit of the Israelites; they involve a correct interpretation of v. 18. The persons addressed are most probably the N. Arabian captors and oppressors of the Israelites (cp PROPHET, § 27) together with those false Jews who had gone over to their side, and the prophetic writer bids them learn the right lesson from the history of Israel—viz., that those who disobey Yahwè's law (one of the chief parts of which was a prohibition of idolatry—cp v. 17) are on the way to ruin. As for 43 8, a comparison of Ps. 115 5 f. 135 16 f. suggests that the 'blind people that have eyes,' etc., is an ironical description of the idols of Israel's oppressors, which the speaker commands to be brought up to the tribunal in order that their claims may be considered (cp 41 21). The peoples referred to in 43 9 are probably (as in the former case, and in 41 1 21) those of N. Arabia. But we will not omit to warn the reader that these criticisms form part of a connected radical revision of the text which is here made use of under the pressure of grave exegetical difficulty.

It is only necessary to add that the strange word מְשֻׁלָּם (mĕšullām), rendered variously in RV 'he that is at peace [with me],' 'made perfect,' and 'recompensed,' occurs as a proper name in 2 K. 22 3 and elsewhere, and has already been recognised as a distortion of the Hebrew ethnic meaning 'Ishmaelite' (see MESHULLAM).

4. The four great Servant-passages: Duhm or Budde?

(c) We now turn to another group of passages (Is. 42 1-4 49 1-6 50 4-9 52 13-53 12) in which, according to some critics, the interpretation of the phrase 'Servant of Yahwè' as a title of Israel is inapplicable, or, if applicable at all, only in a restricted sense with reference to the true Israel. These critics are of opinion that the characteristics of the personage called the Servant in these passages differ in some important respects from those of the Servant (i.e., Israel) spoken of in the passages already considered. Some of them go so far as to hold that the Servant of Yahwè being sometimes apparently distinguished from Israel, and sometimes, especially in 52 13-53 12, being described as only an individual could be, we have to look into history for some great religious hero who might conceivably be intended in these striking descriptions. Sellin,[1] Winckler,[2] and Kittel[3] have selected Zerubbabel; but Sellin has himself abandoned Zerubbabel, and substituted the exiled king Jehoiachin (cp Rothstein, Die Geneal. d. Jehoiachin), whilst Bertholet[4] explains 53 1-11*a* with reference to the martyred scribe Eleazar (2 Macc. 6 18-31). Duhm, however (Jes. 377; (2) 367), holds that the problem which engages the critics is insoluble, and that Jewish history (so far as it exists) knows nothing of such an individual.

[2] AOF 2 452.

[3] Zur Theologie des AT (1899) 2, 'Jesaja 53 und der leidende Messias im AT.'

[4] Zu Jesaja 53; ein Erklärungsversuch (1899). Bertholet's theory is that the passage 52 13-53 12 is made up of two small poems of different origin, (a) 52 13-15 53 11*b*-12, in which the typical teacher of the Tōrāh is glorified, and (b) 53 1-11*a*, which refers to Eleazar.

But, he adds, this is much less surprising than that it tells us nothing of an Amos, an Hosea, or a Micah, and that we do not know the name of the Second Isaiah. His own view is that the hero of the group of passages referred to was a teacher of the Torah, who lived probably (not certainly) between the Exile and the arrival of Ezra at Jerusalem, and devoted himself to true pastoral work among his people, but was seized by a terrible sickness, and after death shared the ignominious burial of criminals.[1]

It may be noted in passing that, according to Ibn Ezra, Saadia interpreted the whole section 52 13-53 12 of Jeremiah, a hypothesis which Ibn Ezra finds attractive (Driver and Neubauer, The Fifty-third Chapter of Isaiah, 'Translations,' 43), while not a few moderns suppose that the colouring, at least, was derived from the idealised life of Jeremiah. Also that Kraetzschmar thinks that Ezekiel may be the historic model of the suffering and glorified servant, referring to Ezek. 4, where Ezekiel, by divine command, bears the guilt of his sinful people, and suffers grievously in consequence (Der leidende Gottesknecht, 1899). The present writer has supposed that the last of the passages in question was 'largely modelled on the Book of Job' (Jewish Relig. Life, 1898, p. 162).[2]

It will be clear that, from the point of view represented above, the passages in question differ in essential respects from the other passages of Is. 40-55 relative to the 'Servant of Yahwè.' If this is a fact, it is alike important for the criticism and exegesis of II. Isaiah and for the history of religion. Of late, however, there have been signs of a growing reaction against Duhm, whose theory had at first won considerable favour. Elsewhere (ISAIAH [BOOK], § 18, col. 2205), a view has been taken akin to that of this able critic. But fairness requires us now to take account of an earnest protest (Minoritäts-votum) raised by Budde[3] against Duhm's theory—a protest with which Marti in his commentary, Giesebrecht (Der Knecht Jahves), and König (The Exiles' Book of Consolation) more or less completely agree. It will then be our duty to inquire whether there is any way of approaching the subject which will enable us to remove some of the chief causes of perplexity in earlier investigations.

1. Is. 42 1-4. The Servant is here entrusted with a mission to the heathen world. The method which he employs (so Duhm expounds v. 2) is radically different from that of the prophets; he is even unlike the Second Isaiah in his avoidance of loud, emphatic, exciting declarations. His task is simply to expound the Law of Yahwè to all who seek it, whether Jews or heathen, in the school or the private chamber, at Jerusalem, especially to those who are bowed by trouble. He is destined to become a recognised international authority, and as such his highest aim will be the establishment of the true religion on the whole earth. Duhm thinks that in order to be just to this description we must suppose the poet to refer to an individual, the greatest and most influential of the teachers of the Torah. With this result, Sellin (though he differs from Duhm in important details) agrees, in so far as the reference to an individual is concerned. Budde, however, protests: 'We ask in vain how such things could be stated of an individual; Is. 2 2-4 alone is sufficient evidence of the existence of the conception that Israel has a mission of instruction to the heathen.' Budde thinks, too, that the following verses (42 5-7) confirm this interpretation.

For, however we explain the difficult ברית עם (EV 'a covenant of the people') in v. 6,[4] it is plain that it can only apply to the people not to an individual, and in spite of Duhm[5] few will doubt that the phrase in the parallel line, אור גוים, 'a light of the nations,' also refers to the Jewish people as a teacher, as in 49 6 51 4. It should be observed that 42 5-7 and 51 4 are, on Duhm's own showing, the work of the Second Isaiah. How, then, can it be said that there are in Is. 40-55 two inconsistent views of the Servant, which must have come from different writers, one much deeper religiously than the other? Such is Budde's argument.

[5] Duhm's explanation of אור גוים in 42 6 as = 'a pattern of the other states,' has not found supporters. [During the correction of

2. Is. 49 1-6. The Servant of Israel summons the distant peoples to hear something in which they are specially concerned. From his very birth he has been singled out and endowed with a sharp, incisive speech, such as befits the expounder of Yahwè's word (cp Jer. 23 29). Till the right moment for his appearance shall come, he has been carefully hidden from the world that he may ripen in seclusion. Such was the honour put upon him; such the strength which was at his disposal as Yahwè's Servant. But his recent experience has been so sad that he has seemed to himself to have lived in vain and to be near his end. But whenever these thoughts have plagued him,[1] tokens have come to him from above that his God both justifies and is rewarding him. And now a fresh revelation visits him. The God who had originally given him a mission to Israel alone, now extends that mission to the Gentile world. It is Yahwè's purpose, not only to restore Israel as a people, but also to save or deliver the other peoples through the Servant's instrumentality. The restoration of the twelve Tribes will be the work of Yahwè, but not a purely miraculous work (as the Second Isaiah[2] thought), and the Servant of Yahwè can co-operate with him by persuading as many Jews as possible to migrate to the Holy Land. And the illumination or instruction of the 'peoples' devolves upon the Servant. They are to be saved from destruction by becoming converted to the true religion—that of Yahwè. This is the highest function of the Servant (note the significant נָקַל), and it is entirely his—except, of course, that Yahwè himself has trained and equipped his servant for his noble work.

There are two points in Duhm's 'extended discussion' of this passage to which Budde takes special exception: (1) the omission of 'Israel' in v. 3 as an interpolation,[3] and (2) the explanation of שובב (v. 5) as meaning a spiritual bringing-back of the Israelites to God by instruction, exhortation, consolation. On the first point, Budde remarks that 'the Servant is here addressing the heathen (v. 1*a*), to whom he is under obligation to state his name, as would not be the case were he an Israelite, addressing his own people'; ישראל is therefore simply the second predicate of אתה.[4] On the second, he points out that in Ezek. 39 27 Jer. 50 19 שובב means the physical restoration of Israel from exile, precisely as הֵשִׁיב. He also emphasises the fact that the active and the passive conceptions of the Servant are combined in this monologue of the Servant, just as they are in the undisputed work of II. Isaiah. It is a mistake to say that the Servant in II. Isaiah plays only a passive, and in the 'Songs of the Servant' only an active part. 49 4 f. shows that the Servant in the 'Songs' was not and could not be free from a 'wise passiveness'; he had to wait for Yahwè to recompense him, and his restoration to his home was to be Yahwè's work. And not less clear is it from 49 7 ff., where Yahwè informs the Servant (i.e., unquestionably, Israel) of the honour which he shall receive as the result of his successful mission to the nations.

the proofs appeared Duhm's second edition, in which he comes over to the more natural view, that the phrase means 'a teacher of the nations.' The parallel phrase, he thinks, is פדות עם, 'a redemption of the (Jewish) people.' See, however, § 5 (1).]

[1] According to Duhm, v. 4*a* is the protasis to v. 4*b*. Most, however, e.g., Budde, suppose the meaning to be that the Servant had been attacked by despondency, which he overcame by calling to mind the faithfulness of Yahwè (cp 40 10*b*).

[2] Duhm quotes Is. 43 5 f. 49 22.

[3] Marti also retains the word.

[4] Budde not only keeps ישראל here, but inserts יעקב and ישראל in 42 1 from 𝔊 (533).

3. Is. 50 4-9. The Servant (whose title, however, is not expressly mentioned) describes the persecution which he has suffered, and his sure confidence that Yahwè will soon appear to put down his enemies. In the preface to this monologue he represents himself as one who expounds Yahwè's word (i.e., the Torah?) to the weary, in accordance with the revelations which come to him afresh every morning. The collectivistic interpretation appears to Duhm plainly impossible.

To this Budde answers that what the Servant says of himself in 50 7-9 agrees with what Yahwè utters in 51 7 f. as an encouragement to the people, while, he might have added, the language of v. 6*a* resembles that in 51 23 Ps. 129 3. And even if the monologue of the Servant makes no mention of a mission to the heathen, who are indeed, so far as they are enemies of Israel, to be destroyed, yet the experiences described in 50 4 f. are just those which would be necessary for mission work among the heathen. The passage is, therefore, not inconsistent with the other passages, and Ley and Laue do wrong to omit it from the series of passages.

4. Is. 52 13-53 12. Wondrous is the contrast between the Servant's future exaltation and his past humiliation. See the kings paying reverence to him whose distorted visage once struck all observers with horror! But who can believe[1] the marvels revealed to us? Only those who can see the invisible operation of God in history (53 1). Mean were the circumstances in which the Servant grew up, nor had his person any external attractions. For society apart from his daily vocation he cared not (cp Jer. 15 17); he was despised and, as it would seem, in the latter part of his life afflicted with sickness and with pain. It was the punishment for sin, and the sufferer not only knew it but inwardly gave full assent and consent to it. He himself was innocent; no sins of speech or of act could justly be imputed to him. But his fellow-Jews (including the poet) assumed that such sins he must have committed, for was not sickness the punishment of sin? And this man's affliction was nothing less than leprosy (v. 5*a* is metaphorical); how great, then, must his sin have been! But the strange truth was that for high reasons the punishment deserved by the Jews in general was diverted to this willing substitute. Before this, afflictions may have fallen on those guilty ones; but they had no moral effect. The time came, however, when the eyes of men's understandings were opened to the meaning of the sufferings of the innocent one, and so 'by his stripes we were healed.' But while the sad spectacle was before them, the poet and his companions confess that they lived purely selfish lives, like wandering sheep. The sufferer, too, was like a sheep, but in another sense—he bore his lot without a murmur, even though by the manifest judgment of God he was cut off. His dishonoured body was laid apart with the wicked and the deceivers,[2] but he himself was graciously released—'taken' by God to some unknown place of sojourn. For very different in this case were God's thoughts from those of man. For the servant himself, those sufferings were a purification. He was to come back to the world, to reach a good old age (cp Job 42 12 ff.), and see his children prolonging their days. Having had his innocence recognised, he should live in the light of joy and prosperity.[3] As a reward for his atoning work he should 'inherit among the great, and divide spoil with the strong'—a proverbial phrase meaning 'he shall hold intercourse as an equal with the mighty ones of the earth.'

[1] מִי הֶאֱמִין; Duhm, 'who can believe?' The imperfect was impossible; it would have denied that anyone would believe. Marti, more plausibly, 'Who would have believed' (cp מִי מִלֵּל, Gen. 21 7). See also Giesebrecht, Beiträge zur Jesaiakritik (1890), p. 159, and cp Dr. Tenses,(3) 19.

[2] Duhm reads the Aramaising עָשִׁיק for the difficult עָשִׁיר.

[3] Duhm's radical corrections are partly based on 𝔊's καὶ κύριος βούλεται καθαρίσαι αὐτόν and δεῖξαι αὐτῷ φῶς.

To this exegesis Budde objects that it covers over the variety of expressions in the picture of the Servant's sufferings. As in the case of certain psalms, this variety seems rather to point to a metaphorical description of the distress of the nation in exilic or post-exilic times. Still more conclusive is the statement in vv. 8 ff. of the death and revivification of the Servant. Such statements are common in the later literature, beginning with Ezek. 37. On the other hand, if we try to make the description fit the case of an individual, we shall find ourselves hopelessly baffled. Who, for instance, are the long-lived descendants (זֶרַע) whom the revivified martyr, himself very old, is to see? Are they literal or spiritual children?[1] Both solutions have insuperable difficulties. Surely the children are those of the nation personified. It is true, the atoning character ascribed to the sufferings of the martyr seems to most to imply that the martyr is to be distinguished from the mass of the Jewish people. Budde, however, affirms this to be impossible. With Hitzig,[2] Giesebrecht[3] (especially), Wellhausen, König,[2] Marti, and [in 1899, but not in 1893] Smend, he takes up the tradition of rabbis such as Rashi, Ibn Ezra, Ķimḥi, that the confession in chap. 53 is uttered by the 'nations' referred to in 52 15; the martyr, therefore, both can and must be the people of Israel. One important part of his argument may be quoted here; he is meeting Dillmann's objection to Giesebrecht's view that II. Isaiah always makes the sin of Israel the cause of its sufferings (42 24 f. 43 27 f. 47 6 50 1; cp 42 13 49 25 f. 51 5 23, etc.).

'Whatever justifying grounds Yahwè may have had for the chastisement of Israel, as respects the heathen, who are here the speakers, not these grounds, but Yahwè's purpose, comes into consideration. Though Israel may have sinned, yet in the conscience of the heathen the only worshipper of the true God appears as the only innocent one. But, further than that, it is a well-known fact that, compared with other prophets, II. Isaiah lays very little stress upon Israel's trespass, that the tone of sympathy predominates throughout and strongly. Nor does he fail to state expressly that Israel has suffered more punishment than its sins have deserved. He begins his entire book with the statement [40 2] that his people, that Jerusalem, has received a double retribution for its sins. This is not, as Duhm thinks,[4] an allusion to Jer. 16 18, where a doubling of the punishment is announced, only, however, for renewed offences. On the contrary, II. Isaiah distinctly says that half of the punishment is undeserved, and on the basis of general prophetic premises we have a right to ask what may have been the occasion of this second undeserved portion; and when we find the figure of Yahwè's Servant already introduced in 41 8, and his mission—that of carrying the true religion to the heathen—stated in 42 1, we cannot avoid the conclusion that even here the prophet already has reference to the suffering which was indispensable to the fulfilment of that mission. The problem of theodicy is for the entire century the really vital one. The people solve it, not without a feeling of bitterness, by applying the doctrine of suffering for the sins of the fathers—i.e., for the sins of Manasseh (Ezek. 18 2 etc.)—while Ezekiel tries to solve it by enormously exaggerating his accusations in an endeavour to balance guilt and punishment. II. Isaiah alone finds a really satisfying solution by associating with the cause of the punishment its purpose, and we can understand all the more readily that this solution was beyond the comprehension of the masses of the people, as well as of most of its leading spirits, because his hopes and predictions were not realised. The glorious restoration of his people did not come to pass, neither were its sufferings or its teachings able to lead the heathen to Yahwè.'[5]

It is a part of Budde's theory that the 'we' in chap. 53 is not a collection of individual men but of individual nations. This, according to him, makes the marked individualisation of the people of Israel more intelligible; the same individualisation of peoples underlies the 'we.' It is no doubt at first sight fatal to his theory that in 53 8 we find the phrase מִפֶּשַׁע עַמִּי, 'for the rebellion of my people' (which Ķimḥi has to explain as referring to each of the nations which will unite in this confession); but Budde has a remedy—he cleverly emends the text.[1] It may be added that he also emends the text of 52 13, where for יַשְׂכִּיל he proposes to read יִשְׂרָאֵל,[2] 'behold, Israel my servant.'

According to Budde, then, there are points of contact between 52 13-53 12 and the undisputed II. Isaiah which forbid the assertion that two different views of the Servant are represented in these two writings, and the individualistic interpretation of the Servant is hardly more tenable in chap. 53 than in other parts of the prophecy.

See also Giesebrecht, Beiträge zur Jesaiakritik (1890), 146 ff., a 'fundamental work' (Budde), and his Der Knecht Yahves; König, The Exiles' Book of Consolation (1899), 54-56 etc.: Smend, AT Rel.-gesch.(2) 355; and, against the nationalistic theory, Sellin, Studien zur Entstehungsgeschichte der jüd. Gemeinde (1901), 1 34 ff.; Smend, AT Rel.-gesch.(1) 257 f.

The differences of interpretation which we have been considering are largely due to the manifold obscurities of the text, not only of the four passages, but also of many other parts of Is. 40-66.

5. Text.

These obscurities may in turn be traced, not so much to lacunæ in the Hebrew lexicon or to the disturbing effect of the grandeur and novelty of the ideas on the mind of the writers, as to corruption. In the four passages corruption is, according to Duhm, specially marked in 50 4 52 14 53 10 f. Budde also fully grants that 'the second half of chap. 53 has suffered serious corruption of text'; but this critic impairs the value of this concession by the statement that 'the only corruption which interferes with a proper interpretation is the עַמִּי ('my people') in v. 8'; this, he says, 'admits of no explanation whatever' (5 10). It is to be feared that any considerable approach to agreement among critics will be impossible as long as this comparative confidence in the MT continues, and as long as sounder principles of textual criticism are not recognised both in theory and in practice. It is not that a large number of acute exegetical suggestions have not been made, but a decision of the important points at issue seems out of the question until a more thorough and more methodical examination of the text of the whole of Is. 40-66 has been carried through.

We have perhaps been so long accustomed to read Isaiah in the light of commentaries that real obscurities may not always strike us.

1. Who that reads Is. 42 1-4 with a fresh mind will say that this passage is easy? What is the meaning of 'he shall not cry nor lift up, nor cause his voice to be heard without' (v. 2)? W. E. Barnes[3] explains the first part, 'he shall not cry (his war-cry), nor lift up (his battle-shout)'; G. A. Smith[4] thinks that the prophet 'cannot be referring to the means and art of the service, but rather to the tone and character of the Servant'; Sellin (Studien, 1 85) sees an allusion to the loud publication of royal edicts; Duhm, to the vehement demeanour of prophets; Marti, however, finds the renunciation on Israel's part of a political rôle among the nations. Not less obscure is the next statement (v. 3),

The broken reed he breaks not off,
The failing wick he quenches not.

We all know how this is explained; the commentaries with one voice refer to the Christian ideal of the pastoral office. But what place has this here? and why did not the poet express himself distinctly? And why should any reference be made in v. 4 to the circumstance that

[1] See Di.-Ki. Jes. 456 (cp 461, foot), 'such as are brought by him to righteousness' (v. 11 60 21), 'the numerous citizens of the new Zion' (54 1 f. 49 19 f.).

[2] Hitzig and König, however, assign 53 1 to the prophetic writer.

[3] Beiträge, 146 ff.; Knecht Yahves, 59 ff., 71 ff.

[4] So Jes. 264. But in his comm. on Jeremiah (1901, p. 141) Duhm maintains that the writer of Jer. 16 18 lived long after II. Isaiah.

[5] Amer. Jour. of Theol., 1899, p. 509 f.

[1] Reading מִפְּשָׁעֵינוּ. ע was dittographed; נו became ם, and י was transposed. Giesebrecht's emendation (cp G. A. Smith, Isa. 2 349) is less plausible.

[2] Marti approves. But an emendation at once more obvious and more favoured by parallelism is יַצְלִיחַ, 'shall have success.' Duhm (Jes.(2)) unfortunately adheres to יָרוּם.

[3] Exp. T 8 (1896) 29; the whole passage is applied to Cyrus. Sellin, however (Studien, 1 86), thinks it a designed contrast to the description in 41 2 ff., which is usually applied to Cyrus.

SERVANT OF THE LORD

the Servant himself will never pass through the sad experience of the persons described in v. 3?

With regard to 42 6, the difficult ברית עם (EV 'a covenant of the people') should almost certainly be עמים . . .; the uncertain word which begins the phrase should most probably be לתפארת; thus the line becomes, 'for an ornament (glory) of the peoples, for a light of the nations'; cp 13 18 46 13 62 2 f. See Crit. Bib.

2. In 49 5 what is the meaning of 'to bring back Jacob unto him'? Why 'unto him'? And how can 'Israel' (v. 3) have been 'formed' to bring back Israel? And how can the restoration of Israel be referred to with equal elaborateness twice over in successive stanzas? Budde (521) proposes, as an explanation of v. 5, 'in that he brought Jacob again (out of Egypt) to him, and drew Israel to him (into the desert).' This at any rate is better than omitting the words altogether as Giesebrecht does. It is difficult, however, to interpret לְשׁוֹבֵב ('to bring back') differently, so far as grammar goes, from לְהָשִׁיב in v. 5, and the reference to Egypt and the desert, if intended, would surely have been at least hinted. The grammatical objection also applies to Marti's rendering of v. 5*a*, 'but now has Yahwè resolved, etc., to bring back Jacob to himself, and Israel will I gather.' Next, why this extraordinary side remark, 'and I was honoured (pointing וָאֶכָּבֵד) in the eyes of Yahwè, and my God became my strength'? The words are clear enough, but not their sense in this context. Lastly, what is the meaning of 'too insignificant for thy being to me a Servant'? (נָקֵל מִהְיוֹתְךָ לִי עֶבֶד). A most awkward and improbable construction! To excise מה' לי עבד as a gloss, is hazardous. So-called glosses often arise out of genuine readings of the original text.

3. In 50 4-9 the difficulty is almost entirely confined to v. 4 f., where neither the language nor the thought is at all clear. At first we seem to catch a glimpse of a beautiful thought, and the phrase 'he wakens mine ear' pleases the fancy. But the plural 'disciples' (לִמּוּדִים) is strange, and the phrase so pleasing to fancy becomes insecure through the manifold disorder of the text and the obviously corrupt לָעוּת. Above all, the opening stanza, which refers apparently to the vocation of a prophet, is not a satisfactory preface to the description of persecution which follows.

4. In 52 13-53 13 the easy passages are the exception, not the rule. Emendation of the text has been tried, not without excellent results. But the passage as a whole, even as explained by Marti, is not clear. There is, perhaps, no better proof of the extreme corruptness of the text than the obscurity of 53 1*a* as the context at present stands, and the vehement controversy which it has called forth. In spite of all the acuteness of Budde and (especially) Giesebrecht, it remains highly improbable that a Hebrew poet of the late exilic or early post-exilic period should have accounted for the sufferings of Israel on the ground that they were the atonement for the sins of the heathen.

As Skinner justly remarks: 'That the idea of Israel suffering for the good of the world is foreign to the OT is not perhaps a decisive argument against it, for there is a truth in the idea (see Rom. 11 11 f.). . . . But the insuperable objection to this explanation is the unnaturalness of the assumption that the speakers in 53 1 ff. are the heathen. There is nothing in the language to suggest this; and the religious attitude expressed in these verses is such as no prophet could have attributed to the heathen world.'[1]

If another proof of deep-seated textual corruption is required, we may justly refer to v. 9. The theory that the great sufferer is an individual rests ultimately (putting aside 53 1) on this passage, and the difference between critics is perhaps simply this—that while some say, the burial so emphatically stated in v. 9 proves that an individual is meant, others say, v. 9 cannot mean what it at first sight apears to mean, because the more natural explanation (viz., that in chap. 53, as elsewhere,[2] 'Servant of Yahwè is a title of Israel) presents no difficulty apart from this passage. It may be doubted, however, whether either position is sound. On the one hand, very little importance can be attached to the traditional text of any part of vv. 8-11 (or 12) because of the manifold obscurities and the more than probable corruption of this passage. And on the other, the parallelism between 53 9*a* and Ezek. 37 12 f. is incomplete. In Is. 53 9 (if correct) the point is not so much the burial of the Servant as his burial with the wicked; but in Ezek. 37 12 f. the phrase, 'cause you to come up out of your graves' is simply an equivalent for 'cause you to come up out of Shĕōl.'[1]

[1] Is. 40-66 (Cambr. Bible), 234.

[2] To assume that the nationalistic interpretation has been proved for the three preceding passages on the Servant.

We have said 'apart from v. 1,' because since (as we have seen) the confession in the following verses cannot be assigned to the heathen nations, and since the parallelism between the chief expressions in the confessions and a number of psalms which cannot reasonably be made to refer to an individual forbids us to adopt Duhm's theory, it follows that the speakers in 53 1 ff. must be the Israel within Israel. This theory is indeed impossible, according to Budde, who thinks that the whole of Israel suffered equally, and that the exaltation of the Israel within Israel could not make an impression on the heathen world. A fuller consideration, however, of this theory in the light of a keener criticism of the later history of Israel, shows that the whole of Israel did not share the same lot, and so removes the apparent ground for Budde's objection. We have therefore a right to set aside 53 1, and to refer to v. 9 as the only solid textual basis for the individualistic interpretation of the Servant in this notable passage.

How, then, shall we proceed in order to restore a text sufficiently correct to admit of large exegetical inferences?

6. Jeraḥmeelite theory. The methods of the most progressive textual criticism are good enough for our purpose; but there are many textual possibilities to which we could not open our eyes without the clue furnished by a critical examination of a very large group of passages outside of II. Isaiah. In fact, it is only the 'Jeraḥmeelite theory' which will enable us to detect the readings that underlie many obscure and some apparently clear passages of II. Isaiah. The result of a renewed investigation of the text of II. Isaiah closely resembles that to which we are perhaps being driven by the textual phenomena of other prophetic writings (see PROPHET, §§ 35-45)—i.e., the original text in many passages had a different historical and geographical setting from that which now appears, and our exegetical results are correspondingly modified. The truth is, according to this theory, that the influence of N. Arabia on Jewish history has been greatly under-estimated. In particular, it was in N. or NW. Arabia that the mass of the Jewish exiles languished, and even after the fall of the Babylonian power (commonly supposed to be the great source of trouble to the Jews) N. Arabian oppression continued to be the chief subject of complaint to Jewish poets.

The four passages on the Servant, in their original form, would seem to have lacked almost all that we are wont to admire in the adaptation of them which both MT and 𝔊 present to us. The ardent universalism which distinguishes them in their present form is due to a later editor, who had before him a text which was already corrupt, and which, apart from this, did not answer to his own spiritual aspirations. Let us continue to read them as they stand in MT and 𝔊 as monuments of the loftiest pre-Christian Jewish piety. When such a purely academic thinker as Vatke can say that 'the intuition of the sufferings and glorification of the Servant of Jehovah forms the most remarkable presentiment of redemption in the OT, and so is a prophecy, not a prediction, of Christ,' academic critics who would fain be also men of the people may surely use the same expressions, for the people see in chap. 53 a prophecy of the Jesus of the evangelic tradition, and we would gladly go with the people, as one of them, so far as we may. Nor need we—from this point of view—any longer trouble ourselves to translate these passages with an extreme exactness.

[1] Cp Ezek. 32 22 ff. On the close connection between the conception of Sheol and that of a burial-place, see ESCHATOLOGY, § 10; Smend, AT Rel.-gesch.(2) 152

An exact translation is in fact often difficult and sometimes impossible, owing to the fact that the old Jewish editor has had to work upon an already existing corrupt text. But let us also be just to the claims of critical history, the results of which, when fully mature, must be for the good of the religion of the many as well as of the few. This requires us to trace out, so far as we can, the original form of these familiar but, in parts, very obscure passages, and of the rest of Is. 40-66, not as a mere exercise of ingenuity, but for this important reason—that if we can but read this work as a monument of its own special time or times, we shall understand the course of Jewish history as we could never have done before. This need not make us unappreciative of those pious and most unselfish editors of old time, who ventured to treat their Bible as a living plant, still capable of sending out fresh shoots, and of putting forth undreamed-of flowers, and who, as some will say, almost transfigured the original conception of the Servant of Yahwè.

For the original text (see Crit. Bib., 'Isa.') gave a much less advanced conception of the Servant of Yahwè. The title here is a personification of the body of Jewish exiles in N. Arabia, who were by no means semi-Christians, but had higher religious ideas and ideals, and correspondingly greater material and moral hardships to bear, than their brethren in Palestine. The poet looks forward to the time when these exiles will be delivered from their miseries and privations and become the recognised leaders of the regenerated Jewish people. He calls (49 1) on the Arabians and Jerahmeelites to take warning while there is yet time (cp Ps. 2 10, emended text). Like some, at least, of the psalmists, he has no desire that all Jerahmeelites should be blotted out of existence, but wishes that under Jewish rule and in the practice of the true religion they may still live in the expanded land of Israel, and be saved from the judicial destruction which will fall upon all irreclaimable foes of Yahwè. At present, the Servant still suffers persecution; he has borne it without a cry or a murmur as God's appointment. But he knows that his 'justification' or redress is at hand (50 8); indeed, before now, under prophetic inspiration, he has announced (52 13-15) the coming change in his fortunes—an announcement which his kinsmen in Palestine (those 'rebellious ones' of whom the poet speaks) received with contemptuous incredulity (53 1). He can already imagine those unworthy Israelites confessing their blindness and folly, their wickedness and selfishness (53 2-9). And again a prophetic vision comes to him. He sees exiled Israel rescued from its oppressors, according to that earlier prophecy. The light of joy—a joy in the establishment of the divine rule with Israel for its earthly organ (cp 42 1-4), the sight of an offspring 'prolonging its days,' and enjoying the inheritance of Jerahmeel and Ishmael—these are the varied but closely connected rewards granted to him (53 10-12).

Into the changes of critical positions which this view necessitates this is not the place to enter. Nor need the reader be assured that no claim to an immunity from error is put forward by the present writer. Details may doubtless be improved; but the general theory, when fully assimilated, will be found to stand the test of prolonged consideration. Would that the spade of the explorer might bring to light some hidden record of an age so little known and so largely misinterpreted by legend!

7. Literature. Besides the works named in col. 2207 f., the following recent treatises on the criticism and exegesis of Is. 42 1-4 49 1-6 50 4-9 and 52 13-53 12 (or some one of these passages separately) may be here mentioned: Schian, Die Ebed-Jahwe-Lieder in Jes. xl.-lxvi. (1895); Laue, *Die E.-J. SETH, rather SHETH (שֵׁת; σηθ; SETH), son of Adam, father of Enos, and grandfather of Cainan or Kenan, according to the Sethite genealogy (Gen. 5 3-8 [P]), with which, so far as his relation to Enosh is concerned, Gen. 4 26 (J) entirely agrees. In Gen. 4 25 (J_R), it is stated that 'Adam knew his wife again, and she bore a son, and called his name Sheth; for (she said) God has set for me another seed instead of Abel, for Cain killed him.' 𝔊, however, does not recognise עוֹד, 'again,' and inserts וַתַּהַר, 'and she conceived,' which suggests the possibility that in an earlier form of the text the birth of Sheth was related without reference to the existence of Cain. Budde (Urgesch. 154 ff.) thinks that the text originally ran, 'and Adam knew his wife, and she bore a son, and named him Sheth, for "God has set for me a seed."'[1] There are, however, three difficulties in this view; (1) the unnatural use of שָׁת, 'posuit'; (2) the use of אלהים, 'Elohim,' instead of יהוה, 'Yahwè' (contrast Gen. 4 1, though here 𝔊 has διὰ τοῦ Θεοῦ); and (3) the improbability that Adam's grandson should have been called Enosh, 'man,' or 'frail man' (cp ENOS), assuming, of course, that 'Ādam' and 'Enosh' are the two familiar Hebrew terms for 'man.' There is only one way of surmounting these difficulties, viz., to criticise the traditional readings of the names. ארם (ādām) or הארם (hā-ādām) and חוה (Ḥawwah) have probably arisen out of ירחמאל (Jerahmeel) and חרת (Ḥōrīth) = ירחמאלית (Jerahmeelith) respectively. Cp PARADISE, § 12 (c). These parallels suggest that 'Sheth' and 'Enosh' are also corruptions of ethnic names. The conjecture that אנוש (Enosh) is a fragment of יִשְׁמָעֵאל will surprise no one who has had experience of the shifting phases of 'Ishmael' and other ethnic names, and it is only slightly less probable that שת (Sheth ??) is a fragment of שְׁתָאֹל (= Eshtaol), which the narrator connected with שְׁתִיל, 'plant, shoot' so that שָׁת־לִי is miswritten, by metathesis, for שְׁתִיל. It is a part of this theory that אלהים and אחר together represent ירחמאל.[2] The passage will then become, 'And Jerahmeel knew his wife, and she bore a son, and named him Shethāōl, for (he is) a shoot (shĕthīl) of Jerahmeel.[3] And Shĕthāōl in turn begot a son, and named him Ishmael; it was he who began to call upon the name of Yahwè' (see ENOS). Shĕthāōl is possibly the eponym of the population called in MT ESHTAOL and ESHTAULITES,[4] whose seat was certainly not confined to the lowlands of Judah. The etymology is, of course, quite 'popular'; a truer connection may perhaps be supposed with the widely-spread clan-name שָׁאוּל, Sha'ūl (see SAUL). Even if the explanation here given of the strange name Sheth be in some degree doubtful, the discovery of the true name of Sheth's son at any rate appears on

[1] So Stade (ZATW, 1894, p. 262 f.), Holzinger (KHC 'Gen.' 57 [1898]); Gunkel (HK 'Gen.' 49 [1901]).

[2] To these corruptions there are abundant parallels throughout the OT literature.

[3] ידע is here taken to be an insertion of J_R necessitated by the corrupt readings, already in existence, שָׁת־לִי and אַחֵר.

[4] In 1 Ch. 2 53 the Eshtaulites are connected with Kirjath-jearim—i.e., not improbably Kirjath-jerahmeel.

critical grounds to be nearly certain. Thus understood, the name supplies another beautiful Israelitish commentary on the name Ishmael (cp Gen. 16 11). It is as if the narrator told us that the first prayer was as great an epoch in the history of man as the building of a city. See SETHITES.

Later post-canonical writers knew much more about Seth. His wife's name was Azūrā (Jubilees, 4 11; ed. Charles, 32). Both he and his descendants, who were extremely good, had that heavenly wisdom specially connected with the name of ENOCH [q.v.]; see Jos. Ant. i. 2 3 (§§ 68-71). On the gnostic sect of the Sethians see Hippol. Philosophumena, 5 19; Epiphan. Adv. hær. xxxix.; Lips. Der Gnosticismus, sein Wesen, Ursprung und Entwickelungsgang (1860), 154; Smith-Wace, Dict. of Christian Biography, 487 f.

We have ventured to reject the plausible conjecture of Frd. Delitzsch and Fritz Hommel referred to in the next article. That the theory connecting Sheth with Suteḫ, 'the god of the Hyksos,' no longer needs criticism, is obvious; see Lenormant, Les origines, 1 [1880] 217 f., and on the other side, Kö. PRE(2) 163. For the facts relative to Set and Suteḫ see EGYPT, § 52, n. 2, and cp § 16.

On the gradual transference of the functions and achievements of Enoch to Seth, as a consequence of the later tradition making the Sethites the representatives of goodness and the Cainites of wickedness, see Charles's note on Jubilees, 4 15. T. K. C.

SETHITES, the name given to the descendants of Seth mentioned in Gen. 5 (P). We shall deal with this subject almost entirely as one belonging to the history of early Hebrew beliefs respecting primitive humanity; the intricate study of the later exegesis on Gen. 5 f., to which R. H. Charles has recently made such valuable contributions, lies too much apart to be treated here.

1. Term criticised. We venture to begin with a criticism of the term 'Sethites,' which presupposes that there are two separate genealogies of the patriarchs—i.e., of the heroes of the primitive age. Now, we may readily grant that, as the text now stands, this presupposition is not destitute of plausibility. Gen. 4 25 f. is obviously the link between two genealogies (Gen. 4 17-24 and 5), one of which, as it now stands, starts from a son of Adam named Cain, the other from Adam and a son of Adam named Seth or Sheth (שֵׁת, σηθ). The two linking verses, in their present form, appear to account for the double genealogy by stating that Seth was born to fill the place of Abel. When, however, we look into the genealogies we quickly see that there is a strong affinity between them, and a critical examination of the two 'linking verses' shows that the passage is no longer in its original form, but has undergone both corruption and editorial expansion. We have also found reason elsewhere to suspect that the story of Cain and Abel and the Cainite genealogy came from separate traditional sources (see CAIN, § 4; CAINITES, § 2); if this is correct, the Yahwist (J) cannot have represented Seth as a substitute for the murdered Abel. Instead of 'Cainites' and 'Sethites,' therefore, it would be better to speak of the members of the two parallel genealogies due respectively to J and to P.

It is the genealogy in Gen. 5 that is mainly to occupy us. We may assume that it is parallel to, and

2. One genealogy: its origin. in its present form later than, the genealogy in Gen. 4. We may also regard Stade's view (Akad. Reden, 247) as fairly probable, that in its original form the genealogy in Gen. 4 was Sethite as well as Cainite, that v. 25 f. in a simpler form, including the words, 'and Enos begot a son, and called his name Cain,'[1] once stood before 4 17, also that in the original Yahwistic genealogy, of which we possess only an extract, the tenth place was occupied by Noah.[2] If this be so, the Israelitish circles represented by J had a genealogy of primitive heroes which agreed in all essentials with the genealogy given by P. We may put the two lists, harmonised as proposed in CAINITES, § 12, and without any attempted emendation of the names, over against each other.

J.		P.
	Adam		Adam
	Sheth		Sheth
	Enosh		Enosh
	Cain		Kenan
	Enoch		Mahalalel
	Irad		Jared
	Mehujael		Enoch
	Methushael		Methuselah
	Lamech		Lamech
	Noah		Noah

Even if we doubt whether the genealogy of the Yahwist in its original form contained as many as ten names, it is a fact that that of the Priestly Writer (P) has come down to us with ten, and it is natural (when we consider that P, as often as he can, uses old material) to connect this with the fact that Bērōssus places ten antediluvian kings at the head of the history of Babylonia. The names of these kings (see Müller, Fragm. Hist. Gr. 2 499 f.) are Ἄλωρος, Ἀλάπαρος, Ἀμήλων, Ἀμμένων, Μεγάλαρος, Δάωνος, Εὐεδώραχος, Ἀμεμψινός, Ὠτιάρτης, Ξίσουθρος. Now the solidarity of the early Oriental culture, under Babylonian influence, was such that we could not be surprised to find some of the names given by Bērōssus, in their original forms (when these forms can be traced), underlying names in the two Hebrew genealogies which lie before us. The idea is suggested by the coincidence of number between P's list and that of Bērōssus, but, of course, we have to compare the names in both the Hebrew lists, so far as they seem to be akin.

It is remarkable, however, how extremely few of the Hebrew names can even plausibly be connected with names in the Berossian list. To compare Ἀμήλων with אֱנוֹשׁ, 'Enosh' (so Delitzsch, Hommel, and even Gunkel) seems plainly wrong, (1) because such a name as 'man,' as the proper name of a primæval hero, is in the highest degree improbable; (2) because, if אדם is correct, and means 'man,' it is not likely that another name in the list also means 'man'; and (3) because, if Ἀμήλων is correct, analogy justifies us in supposing that it is a mutilated theophorous name (Amil-x). But we may at least provisionally compare (1) Ἀμήλων with Mahalalel (= Mehujael), assuming the final syllable el (אל) to represent some Babylonian divine name, and (2) Ἀμεμψινός (= Amil-Sin, 'liegeman of Sin?') with Methušelaḥ (= Methušael), assuming šelah (שלח) to be a Hebraised form of šarḫu, which is an epithet of various Babylonian gods (see Ass. HWB 690 a, CAINITES, § 7). Two names out of ten in the respective lists, plausibly but not certainly combined, are perhaps scarcely a sufficient basis for a theory that the Hebrew list in its earliest form was borrowed from Babylonia.[1]

It is, however, still important to ascertain, if possible, whether statements made in either of the Hebrew lists respecting any one of the primitive heroes are derived from Babylonian lore. That Noah who, as the text stands (both in J and in P passages), is the hero of the Hebrew Deluge-story is, in virtue of his connection with that story, parallel to Xisuthrus, cannot be doubted. Zimmern (Beiträge, 116, n. a) and Gunkel (Gen. 121 f.), however, add a comparison of Enoch, who 'walked' with God and was taken to God, with the Εὐεδώραχος of Παντίβιβλα (= Sippar) in Berossus—i.e., En-me-dur-anki,[2] a mythic king of Sippar, to whom the guild of Babylonian bārū-priests traced its origin. This king is designated 'the favourite of Anu, Bel, and Ea,' and said to have been 'called (?) by the gods Šamaš and Adad into their fellowship,' also to have been initiated into the 'secrets of heaven and earth' (Ritual-tablet, no. 24). Now it is true that both Enoch and Εὐεδώραχος occupy the seventh place in the respective lists. This, however, is not important; in J's list, as

[1] It may be presumed that this represents Stade's meaning, though he only says that '4 25 f. once stood before 4 17 ff.'

[2] Stade's reconstruction of the genealogy, however, which makes it begin with Enos and close with Jabal and Noah, has this against it—that there are very strong reasons for holding that 'Adam' (rather hā-ādām) and 'Enos' are not the forms which originally stood in the genealogy, and therefore not to be treated as synonyms meaning 'man,' or, as Stade expressed it, that Adam and Enos are 'doppelgänger.'

[1] Gunkel (HK 'Gen.' 121) omits Methuselah but includes Kenan (= Cain), which, with Delitzsch and Hommel, he regards as a translation of אָמָּן = Bab. ummānu (cp Ges.(13) s.v. אָמָּן). The number two therefore remains.

[2] Dur-anki is the name of a mythic locality (Zimmern); cp Jastrow, RBA 539.

it now stands, Enoch comes third, and even in the hypothetical expanded form of the list given above he only fills the fifth place. In opposition to Zimmern's learned and ingenious theory we would point out (1) that the initiation of Enmeduranki into the 'secrets of heaven and earth' is by no means as distinctive a feature as the deliverance of Xisuthrus from the perils of the Deluge. For other mythic personages besides Enmeduranki enjoyed this initiation, and among them Xisuthrus himself, as his name (Atra-ḫasis, 'the very wise') implies, and as his fortunes also sufficiently indicate. It was, in fact, the highest form that the divine favour could assume, and it is only natural that the feature or 'motive' of temporary or permanent translation to the abode of the gods should characterise different myths both in Babylonia itself and in the various countries where Babylonian mythic germs were deposited. And (2), we may further remark that probably Enoch, not Noah, was the hero of the Hebrew Deluge-story as written by J (see § 3, and cp NOAH, § 1, DELUGE, § 17). If this be so, there is scarcely even a superficial appropriateness in the comparison of Enmeduranki with the Hebrew Enoch.

Whilst therefore we do not deny the possibility that those who (at some Hebrew sanctuary?) shaped or reshaped the Hebrew story of the primitive heroes may have been led to reckon them as ten (P certainly made ten, and J, too, may perhaps have done so) under Babylonian influence, we cannot say that there is any strong necessity for such a view, and all must admit that it is much more important to comprehend the statements of the Hebrew narrators. One of the chief obstacles to such a comprehension is the apparent duality of some of the heroes mentioned. At first sight, there seem to be two Cains, two Lamechs, two Noahs; and if Budde's theory respecting Gen. 4 17 (see col. 623, n. 3) be correct, two Enochs.

The grounds for supposing that there are two inconsistent pictures of Cain, or in other words, two Cains,[1] are given elsewhere (CAIN, § 2).

3. Duality of Cain, Lamech, Noah.

It is clear that the passage, Gen. 4 2-16*a*, which accounts for the custom of exacting blood for blood, implies that Cain is a nomad, and with this the statement in v. 16*b* partly agrees, for it states that Cain (after hearing the divine sentence) dwelt 'in the land of wandering (Nod), eastward of Eden.' In Gen. 4 17, however, this hero is represented as a city-builder, in other words, as a leading promoter of a settled form of life and of civilisation, and if we criticise the text of v. 16*b* in accordance with the results attained elsewhere (see PARADISE, § 6) we shall have to correct the enigmatical Hebrew text of MT and 𝔊, so as to read 'and [Cain] dwelt in the land of Eden-jeraḥmeel' (וַיֵּשֶׁב [קַיִן] בְּאֶרֶץ עֵדֶן ירחמאל)—the district in which as we have seen Gen. 11 2 places us. We need not, however, deny (cp CAINITES, § 3) that even in 4 17 'Cain' (קין) is the eponym of the Kenites (קיני קין); there were both more and less advanced branches of the Kenites and Jeraḥmeelites; hence sometimes these tribes are spoken of as nomads, sometimes as having 'cities' (1 S. 30 29).

Are there also two Lamechs? There is a song ascribed to Lamech, in which the far-reaching sweep of tribal vengeance for blood is eulogised[2] (Gen. 4 23 f.). But we find his three sons taking important steps forward in civilisation; can they possibly have been represented as the offspring of a fierce nomad? The truth is, however (as comparative textual criticism justifies us in holding), that 'Lamech' (לֶמֶךְ) is one of the popular distortions of 'Jeraḥmeel.' Lamech is therefore a tribal eponym,[1] and represents both the more and the less advanced sections of the Jeraḥmeelite race. It is remarkable that in P's genealogy Lamech appears as the father of Noah, who, not less than Jabal and his brothers, is a 'hero of culture' (see NOAH).

For certainly there are two Noahs—there is Noah the first vine-planter, and there is Noah the head of the one family that was rescued from the Deluge, at least if we are content to follow the traditional Hebrew text. That the unpleasing story of what happened to Noah the vine-planter was ever told of Noah the hero of the Deluge, whose earthly history was bound to cease with his marvellous deliverance, is incredible (see NOAH), though certainly it can hardly be called very probable that it was said of two of the traditional Hebrew heroes that they 'walked' or had close converse 'with the Godhead' (Gen. 5 22 24 6 9).

How to remove this difficulty we have seen already (§ 2), and before the end of this section we shall return to the subject.

4. Why sporadic Babylonian influence?

At present we would seek to account for the singular fact that there is no distinctively Babylonian material in the account of the primæval heroes (after Adam) except in connection with Enoch and Noah. It will be observed that while Enoch the city-builder and Noah the vine-planter are certainly tribal heroes (Noah should probably be נַחַם or נַחְמָן = נֹעַם or נַעֲמָן, cp ינחמנו, Gen. 5 29, and Enoch [Ḥănōk] appears as a son of Midian, Gen. 25 4 1 Ch. 1 33),[2] the hero of the Deluge-story in its present form is obviously not a mere hero; he is in the fullest sense an individual. How is this to be accounted for?

To understand the bearings of this question we must remember that, with the possible exceptions of Mahalalel and the latter half of Methuselah (see CAINITES, § 7), all the names in the genealogies of J and P are demonstrably of non-Babylonian origin, and with the increase of evidence for the great frequency of references to N. Arabian ethnics in the OT it becomes possible and even highly probable that 'Mahalalel' is a corruption of ''Jeraḥmeel' and 'Methuselah' of 'Ishmael.' Thus the names in the Sethite and Cainite genealogy,[3] when restored to their original form, become—

Jeraḥmeel (ירחמאל)
Eshtaol (אֶשְׁתָּאֹל)
Ishmael (יִשְׁמָעֵאל)
Kain = Kenites (קַיִן)
Ḥanōch (חֲנוֹךְ)
Arvad (אַרְוָד = ערוד = עֲרָד?)
Jeraḥmeel (ירחמאל)
Ishmael (ישמעאל)
Jeraḥmeel (ירחמאל)
Naḥman (נַחְמָן)

The probability of most of these restorations is very high. Both P and the Chronicler in their lists often repeat the same name in different forms. Even if one or two of the restorations be doubtful, the present writer cannot doubt that the Sethite-Cainite names have a N. Arabian reference. How, then, came the notices of Enoch and (?) Noah to be enriched with Babylonian

[1] Gunkel (Gen. 49) actually makes four Cains: (1) the son of the first man, (2) the brother and murderer of Abel, (3) the father of Enoch and city-builder, and (4) the eponym of the Kenites.

[2] See CAINITES, § 8; Nestle, Marg. 59.

[1] It is of course very possible that the tribe called Lamech or Jeraḥmeel really took its name from a deity. This deity was probably the moon-god Jarḥam (ירח with the Arabic 'mimation).' The non-Semitic divine title Lamga (doubtfully referred to in col. 626) need not be relied upon.

[2] Enoch also appears as the eldest son of Reuben (Gen. 46 9 Ex. 6 14 Nu. 26 5 1 Ch. 5 3). But we can hardly doubt that Reuben was originally a S. Palestinian tribe.

[3] If we prefer to hold that Lamech-Jeraḥmeel's son in J's version was originally Tubal[-cain], we are still constrained to admit that the last member of the list bears a N. Arabian ethnic name. 'Jabal' and 'Jubal,' like 'Abel,' are perhaps also most naturally viewed as corruptions of the widely-spread ethnic name 'Jeraḥmeel.' 'Zillah' (צלה) may come from חלצה (Ḥalūṣah) = צקלג (Ziklag); Na'amah, of course, = Na'ami or Na'amani. Adah (עדה) is obscure; perhaps it may come from עֲרָד עררה.

material, as if they were individuals? What claim had Enoch and Noah to be treated with more respect than other N. Arabian tribal heroes, and raised to the rank of individuals, whose wonderful fortunes gave them a place by themselves which only Elijah in a later age was privileged to share with them? The question is greatly simplified if we identify Enoch and the greater of the two Noahs as proposed already (CAINITES, § 6; NOAH)—i.e., if we read in Gen. 6 8 (J), 'But Enoch (חנך) had found grace in the eyes of Yahwè,' and in 6 9 (P), 'Enoch was a righteous man . . ., and Enoch walked with God.'

The theory here maintained is that the Hebrew legend of primæval times, as told by the writer or writers known as J_1, had no Deluge—i.e., they accepted the Jerahmeelite legend as their basis, but without a Deluge-story.[1] When, however, the Deluge-story was adopted from the Jerahmeelites, and converted (under direct Babylonian influence?) into the story of the universal Deluge, it had to be provided with a hero who was not a mere tribal eponym, and (for a reason suggested below) 'Enoch' was selected to be converted into an individual, and even to assume something of the appearance of a solar hero, as was fitting for the hero of a story which in its origin was most probably an ether-myth (DELUGE, § 18). But a misfortune happened to him. At an early period (perhaps) after the Deluge-story had been committed to writing, חנך became corrupted into נח, which in turn was editorially altered (under the influence of a desire[2] to work the story of Noah the vine-planter into the legend) into נח (Noah) or נחם[3] (Naḥam?). Thus Enoch lost his connection with the Deluge, unless indeed we care to recognise the statement of Jubilees 4 23 that Enoch, in Paradise, wrote down all the wickedness of men, on account of which God brought the waters of the flood upon all the land of Eden.' But at any rate he retained his superhuman wisdom, and in later years attracted to himself more and more mythical elements (see ENOCH, § 2). Nor were the earlier traditionists unfair to him. When the list of ten heroes was constructed, he was placed (probably) at the end of the first pentad, while Noah or Naham, his supplanter in the Deluge-story, was placed at the end of the second.

The reason why Enoch—alone among the Hebrew heroes—was raised to the rank of an individual whose fortunes were such as to mark him off from all the rest of mankind, is plain. It is not enough to point to the fact that the Hebrew root of Enoch (חנך) means 'to train, instruct, initiate.'[4] The real reason probably is that the Enoch-tribe was a branch of the Jeraḥmeelites, and like the Jeraḥmeelites had a high reputation for wisdom. From Ezek. 28 (see Crit. Bib.) we gather that 'Jeraḥmeel' was supposed to have derived his wisdom from Elōhīm, in whose sacred garden he had dwelt; now from Ezek. 14 14 20 we learn that Noah (i.e., Enoch), Daniel (i.e., Jeraḥmeel), and Job were classed together for their extraordinary righteousness. This exceptional goodness implies exceptional wisdom. The first Jeraḥmeelite is commonly known to us as Adam (see PARADISE, § 12), but it is very possible that the first Jerahmeelite was also in some sanctuaries spoken of as Enoch (Ḥanōk), and that his wisdom (cp Job 15 7 f.) was specially eulogised in the legend.

If P does not tell us much about the fortunes of the patriarchs—'the youthful world's gray fathers' (H. Vaughan)—he is at least fully acquainted with their ages. The chronological principle which underlies the numbers in P's genealogy has not, however, been found. There is much that is very peculiar about them. The Babylonian tradition only gives the number of years that each king reigned; e.g. the first king Alorus reigned for six sari = 36,000 years, and so on. The enormous numbers assigned arise from the astronomical training of the scholars of Babylon. The Hebrew system in P gives the years of the life of each hero, first those which he lived before, and then those which he lived after the birth of his eldest son. Unfortunately, the three great authorities, the Hebrew, the Samaritan, and the 𝔊 texts differ considerably, as the accompanying table will show.[1]

5. The numbers.

	MT			Sam.			LXX
Adam . . .	130	800	930	130	800	930	230	700	930
Seth . . .	105	807	912	105	807	912	205	707	912

Kenan . . .	70	840	910	70	840	910	170	740	910
Mahalalel . .	65	830	895	65	830	895	165	730	895
Jared . . .	162	800	962	62	785	847	162	800	962
Enoch . . .	65	300	365	65	300	365	165	200	365

To the flood . .	100			100			100
Total	1656			1307			2262 (L 2242)

It will be noticed that 𝔊 agrees with MT, except in the case of Lamech (where 𝔊 and Sam. show an affinity), in the totals of the several ages, but differs from MT (except as to Jared, Methuselah, and—almost—Lamech) as regards the age of the heroes at the birth of their first sons. $𝔊^L$ is peculiar at Methuselah. The result is that in 𝔊 the Deluge is given as in the year of the world 2262 ($𝔊^L$ 2242), but in MT as in 1656. It can hardly be doubted any longer that MT is nearer to the original than 𝔊.

Geiger has expended great learning and earnestness in behalf of the numbers of MT. But most critics, since Bertheau, agree in preferring the Sam. numbers (with which Jubilees agrees) even to those of MT, as the calculation is simpler, and the deviations of the texts are more easily explained on the hypothesis of the priority of Sam. See especially Budde, Urgesch. 100 ff.

Comparing the Sam. numbers with those of MT we find that for the first five patriarchs they agree. After that Sam. partly adopts much smaller numbers, bringing the Deluge into the year of the world 1307. Budde thinks that we may draw detailed inferences from the [1] It has been already pointed out (DELUGE, § 12) that according to 𝔊 the duration of the Deluge was 365 days (a solar year), corresponding to the 365 years of the life of Enoch.

[2] See Budde, Urgesch.; cp NOAH.

[3] Nahum (נחום) probably belongs to the same group of names (see Crit. Bib.).

[4] There is no allusion to this in the fragments of the Hebrew legend preserved to us. Gen. 6 8, if we may replace חנך for נח (see above), possibly alludes to a popular etymology connecting חנך with חֵן, 'favour' (Philo actually explains the name as χάρις σου, cp OS 164 49).

[1] The first column on the left gives the age of the patriarch at the birth of the first son; the second, the number of his remaining years; the third, the total.

numbers of Sam. For instance, Jared, Methuselah, and Lamech die in the year 1307, i.e., probably, not in the 1½ months of this year before the flood, but in the flood; therefore they are sinners. Enoch is translated in 887, because he walked with God—i.e., was not a sinner. The age of the first five patriarchs and of Noah is about 900; the earlier deaths of Jared, Methuselah, and Lamech are punishments for wickedness. That two men—Enoch and Noah—'walked with God' in the midst of sinners, is due to P's religious optimism. It is also noteworthy that in Sam. all the earlier patriarchs are witnesses of the translation of Enoch. Budde even finds this theory confirmed by the names of the patriarchs, at least so far as Mahalalel, Jared, Methuselah, and perhaps Lamech are concerned; but in this he goes too far. He also conjectures that the numbers of MT (according to which only Methuselah dies in the Deluge) were substituted for the original ones from the presupposition that the Sethites were the holy line, which represented the theocratic tradition, as opposed to the Cainite. These glimpses at possible speculations in Jewish schools (from P onwards?), which are somewhat in the style of the Book of Jubilees,[1] are of great interest. From a text-critical point of view the evidence supplied by Sam. of the late date at which alterations were made in the Hebrew text is even more striking.

SETHUR (סְתוּר, § 56; see also below; ϲⲁθⲟⲩⲣ [BAF], θⲁϲⲟⲩⲣ [L]), an Asherite spy; Nu. 13 13 [14] (P).

'Sethur' or [L] Thesur may come from 'Pathros' (פתרום), which is most probably a corruption of 'Zarephath' (צרפת), a place-name of the Negeb (cp PATHRUSIM). Sethur's father is MICHAEL—i.e., Jerahmeel. Cp Sithri [ZITHRI]. T. K. C.

SETTLE, meaning in English a seat, bench, or ledge, is employed in Ezek. 43 14, etc., to render עֲזָרָה, 'ăzārāh, which in the prophet's description seems to denote the two ledges, 'the smaller' and 'the larger,' between the base and the hearth. See SBOT 'Ezek.', Eng. ad loc.

SHAALBIM (שַׁעַלְבִים, a corrupt place-name, see below). A site in the territory of Dan, mentioned (Josh. 19 42) between Beth-shemesh and Aijalon.

Judg. 1 35 (ἐν ᾧ [οὗ] αἱ ἀλώπεκες [Bb. vid. AL], ἐν ᾧ αἱ ἀλώπηκες[2] [B], and θαλαβειν [B; om. AL], a corruption of σα. [Aq., Sym., Theod.]. See Moore, ad loc.). 1 K. 4 9 βηθαλαμει [B], ἐν σαλαβειμ [A], θαλαβειν [L], but in Josh. 19 42 Shaalabbin (שַׁעַלַבִּין, σα[α]λαβειν [BL], -μειν [A]); whence the patronymic Shaalbonite (שַׁעַלְבֹנִי 2 S. 23 32, σαλαβωνειτης [BA], σαλαβανι [L]; 1 Ch. 11 33, σαλαβωνι [AL], ὁμει [B], σωμει [ℵ]. See HASHEM).

Some (including Conder and Steuernagel) identify with Salbīt, 3 hrs. SE. from Ramleh towards Yālō (Aijalon); the situation suits, but not the phonetic phenomena (see Kampffmeyer's article, ZDPV 15 f.). As in the case of MAKAZ [q.v.], between which place and Beth-shemesh Shaalbim is mentioned in Kings, corruption is highly probable. We have the place-names Sha'ul (in Gibeath-shā'ūl), Shu'al, Sha'alim, and Shalisha, and it is difficult not to class Shaalbim with these. In 1 K. 4 9 𝔊B gives βηθαλαμει, which may have arisen, not out of a misapprehension of ב in שעלבים (which 𝔊A takes as a preposition), but out of a true sense that the name began with בית. If, as the present writer thinks, Beth-shemesh, wherever it occurs, is a distortion of Beth-cushim (='a Cushite settlement'), it is reasonable to explain Shaalbim, not as 'place of foxes,' but as Beth-sha'alim ('place of Sha'alim'), or Beth-yishme''elim ('place of Ishmaelites')—surely a better explanation. [1] Cp Jubilees, 4 30, 'And he (Adam) lacked seventy years of one thousand years; for one thousand years are as one day . . ., and therefore was it written concerning the tree of knowledge, "On the day that ye eat thereof ye will die." For this reason he did not complete the years of this day, for he died during it.'

[2] From this rendering it has been inferred that Heb. like Ar. had a noun שעלב (=fox) as well as שועל. So evidently W. R. Smith (J. Phil. 9 92) who compares the Ar. tribe-name Tha'laba. It is worth considering, however, whether, even if we assume that 𝔊 read שעלבים, we ought not to explain ἀλώπεκες on the analogy of Gen. 17 4 where אברהם apparently=אַב הָמוֹן.

SHAAPH (שַׁעַף; ϲⲁⲅⲁⲉ [B], -ⲅⲁφ [A], ϲⲁⲁφ [L]) occurs twice in the Calebite genealogy: (1) as name of a son of Jahdai (1 Ch. 2 47), and (2) as name of a son of Maacah (1 Ch. 2 49). In the latter passage he is called father of Madmannah.

1. A city in the lowland of Judah (Josh. 15 36, σακαρειμ [B], σαργαρ. [A], σεβαρ. [L]), which Conder, on the assumption that it is mentioned in 1 S. 17 52 (so Di., Dri. [?], H. P. Smith; but 𝔊BAL τῶν πυλῶν) and was therefore situated W. of Socoh and Azekah (see 1 S. 17 1), has identified with Tell Zakāryā, a huge conical hill 'which must be passed by any one escaping to Gath.' The site of GATH (q.v.) has yet to be determined, however, and the names have no resemblance (but cp 𝔊B). Perhaps Shaaraim has arisen by mistake; 1 S. 17 52 should close with 'and the mortally wounded of the Philistines fell in the way' (the rest is dittographed). See Exp. T, Aug. 1899, and cp SOCOH. As the name stands, it might mean 'one born on the Sabbath (§ 72). [Most probably, however, Shabbethai, like SHAPHAT and SHEPHATIAH, 'is a modification of the ethnic Zephathi, 'Zephathite' (=Zarephathi, 'Zarephathite.') SHADDAI (שַׁדַּי; for renderings, see NAMES, § 117), a divine name of disputed interpretation, given in RVmg. wherever El Shaddai (EV 'God Almighty') occurs in MT, and also in Is. 13 6 Joel 1 15 (EV 'Almighty').[1]

1. Biblical usage.

In MT Shaddai occurs more frequently than it does in RVmg.—viz., in Gen. 17 1 28 3 35 11 48 3 (all P), Ex. 6 3 (P), Gen. 43 14 (E), 49 25 (Blessing of Jacob), Nu. 24 4 16 (Balaam), Ezek. 1 24 10 5 Ruth 1 20 21 Ps. 68 15 [14] 91 1 Job 5 17 (and thirty times besides). In the first six passages and in Ezek. 10 5 El (God) is prefixed; אל שדי should also be read in Gen. 49 25 (Ges., Ew., Di., Kau., Ball, with Sam., Pesh., Vg., and some MSS).

If we examine these passages, we shall find that only two of them are commonly regarded by critics as pre-exilic[2]—viz., Gen. 49 25, and Nu. 24 4 16 (originally no doubt vv. 4 and 16 were identical)—and of the remaining references all but those in Ps. 91 1 and the four prophetic passages (where the text is disputed[3]) may be accounted for by an archaising tendency in the writers; e.g., the author of Job means to describe a primeval as well as a non-Israelitish society, and takes the divine name שדי from P (in its present form). To ascertain the original meaning of Shaddai we must therefore confine our attention to the two pre-exilic passages. In Gen. 49 25, which is more certainly pre-exilic than Nu. 24 4 16, El Shaddai (?) is evidently the God of the land of Israel, viewed especially as the giver of fertility; in Nu. 24 4 16 (see v. 16) he is, in addition, [El] Elyon, 'the most high God,' who compels a foreign soothsayer to bless Israel, and will make Israel victorious over its foes. What sense can שדי bear, so as to make it a suitable name in these contexts? We must of course remember that the oracles of Balaam are Israelitish poems.

Passing over plainly inadequate explanations (see NAMES, § 117.), we may mention three as at any rate not unplausible; it is the third which seems to the present writer preferable. (a) A connection was suggested by Frd. Delitzsch (Hebr. Lang. 48) with šadû = šaḳû, 'to be high' (see 5 R. 28, 82 h), and šadû, šaddû, 'mountain.' Delitzsch also quoted the phrase, Bel šadû rabû ('Bel the great rock'), and Ilu šadû'a, 'God my rock.' In Prol. 96, retaining MT's pointing, he suggests the meaning 'the exceedingly high' (cp 𝕲 in Psalms); but the sense now given by Delitzsch to the divine title šadû rabû (see Ass. HWB 642), viz., 'great lord,'[4] is apparently more defensible, and certainly more suitable to the biblical passages. It may be possible that šadû in the sense of 'lord' (or 'mountain'?) is cognate with the Hebrew divine name Shād (?), 'Lord,' Shādī (?), 'my Lord.' Frd. Delitzsch in Job renders שדי 'Allherr' (All-lord). (b) However, it is not less possible, with Nöldeke and G. Hoffmann (see NAMES, col. 3325, n. 2), to read שֵׁדַי, šēdi, still rendering 'my Lord'; the pronoun would refer to the people worshipping the divine 'Lord'; cp Baali (Hos. 2 16 [18]). (c) Lastly, it is possible and (in conformity with the present writer's estimate of P's proper names elsewhere) even probable, that שדי is corrupt. To restore the true name with certainty is impossible; but it is plausible to correct שדי (MT Shaddai) into ישראל 'Israel' (cp Gen. 49 25, אל שדי ‖ אביך). We may suppose that this was originally written by the Priestly Writer 'ישר,

2. Three plausible explanations.

[1] 𝕲 omits in Gen., Ex. unless the genit. of the pers. pron. is taken to represent it (once ὁ ἐμός, Gen. 49 25), θεός in Nu. 24 16 Is. 13 6; in Joel 1 15 𝕲 reads שֹׁד for שדי; in Ruth 1 20 f. ὁ ἱκανός (L omits in v. 20, A in v. 21), in Ezek. 1 24 𝕲BQ om., 𝕲A ἱκανός (so Theod. in Q), 10 5 σαδδαι; in Ps. 68 15 ὁ ἐπουράνιος, 91 1, ὁ θεὸς τοῦ οὐρανοῦ; in Job κύριος nine times, παντοκράτωρ sixteen times, κ. παντ. once, ἱκανός three times, ὁ τὰ πάντα ποιήσας once.

[2] The pre-exilic date, however, of the oracles of Balaam is questioned by Diehl and von Gall.

[3] On Ps. 91 1 (and 68 15) see Che. Ps.(2) In Is. 13 6 Joel 1 15 כשׁר משׁדי should, in the opinion of the present writer, most probably be כשׁר ישמעאל, 'like destruction wrought by Ishmael.' In Ezek. 1 24 10 5 also the present writer believes that שדי comes from ישמעאל (in 1 24 ‖ המלה—i.e., ירחמאל). See Crit. Bib.

[4] Cp Hommel, AHT 110, 'The word šadû has come now and then to mean "lord" or "commander."' and that an editor misunderstood this, and corrected it into שדי. That in all the passages where שדי occurs the writer is directly dependent on our P, is a perfectly defensible proposition. It is equally plausible to hold that El-'elyon at any rate in Gen. 14 19 22 (see SODOM, § 6 [c]) and El-'olam in Gen. 21 33 are corruptions of El-jerahmeel, 'the God of Jerahmeel.' Cp also El-bethel (Gen. 31 13 35 7), originally perhaps El-tubal; TUBAL (q.v.) is an ethnic and place-name of the Negeb.

The names supposed to be compounded with Shaddai are עמישדי, שדיאור, and צורישדי. It is doubtful, however, whether this widely accepted theory is correct. See SHEDEUR, ZURI-SHADDAI.

Hommel (AHT 109 ff.) confirms the second view given above by comparing the Babylonian names Ammi-satana, Šamšu-satana (dynasty of Hammurabi), and the Assyrian names Marduk-šadûa, Bel-šadûa, Bel-Harran-šadûa. That -na in the two former words is the first plur. suffix seems highly probable (Jensen compares Old Bab. sudurāna). T. K. C.

SHADES (רְפָאִים), see DEAD, § 3, and REPHAIM.

SHADOW OF DEATH (צַלְמָוֶת; ϲκια θανατογ; umbra mortis), or, as RV, 'deep darkness,' a title of SHEOL (q.v.) in the Book of Job (e.g., 10 21 f. 'the land of the Shadow of Death,' 𝕲 γνοφερος and γην ϲκοτογϲ αιωνιογ; 38 17, 'the Gates of the [city of the] Shadow of Death,' 𝕲 πγλωροι αδογ). Probably, too, passages like Job 3 5 24 17 (cp 𝕲) Ps. 44 19 [20] should also be classed with these passages, and, by probable correction of the text, Ps. 94 17 115 17 (see below). The didactic explanation 'shadow of death' proceeds from a very old but probably incorrect tradition. It suits the preceding passages, however. Elsewhere (e.g., Am. 5 8 [𝕲 σκιάν without θανάτου] Job 3 5 Ps. 107 10 14 Is. 9 1 [2]) 'deep darkness,' or rather 'gloom' is perhaps more favoured by the context.

On the pointing צַלְמוּת, or צַלְמוֹת, see Barth, NB 259*c*: on the traditional reading צַלְמָוֶת, Nöld. GGA [1867] 456; ZATW 17 [1897] 182 ff. On the emendation צלמות for דּוּמָה (conjecturally rendered 'silence') in Ps. 94 17 115 17, see Che. Ps.(2)

SHADRACH (שַׁדְרַךְ; ϲεδραχ [𝕲BAQΓ Theod.]) and Meshach (מֵישַׁךְ; μ[ε]ιϲαχ [𝕲BQΓ Theod.] -ϲακ [A]), names given at Babylon to two of Daniel's Jewish companions, otherwise called Hananiah and Mishael (Dan. 1 7 2 49 3 12 ff.). Very un-Babylonian-looking names. The termination can hardly be Aku, a name of the moon-god (so Frd. Del. formerly, but see now Calwer BL 575 b), but might be the Elamite name Šutruk (Lenormant; Jensen). If, however, we admit that the story of Daniel, like so many others in the OT, has been altered by a redactor, and that the scene of part of it at least lay in the land of Jerahmeel, we may conjecture that Shadrach is a distortion of Asshur, Meshach of Cusham, and for completeness let us add, comparing Rab-shakeh from 'Arab-cush, and Rab-saris from 'Arab-asshur, Abed-nego from 'Arab-negeb—i.e., the Arabia of the Negeb. Cp NISROCH. T. K. C.

SHAHARAIM (שַׁחֲרַיִם; ϲααρηλ [B], -ρημ [A], ϲεωρειν [L]), a Benjamite name (1 Ch. 8 8†). Either a corruption, through Ahishahar, from Aher (so Marq.,[1] see BENJAMIN, § 9, ii. a, b) or, much more probably, a corruption, equally with Ahishahar, of Ashhur, a name which, modified as Asshur, designates the N. Arabian population of the Negeb. Cp SHIHOR. Shaharaim's home was in 'the field [highland] of Moab,' or rather 'of Miṣṣur'; his wives are named Ḥushim and Baara—i.e., Cushim and 'Arāb. T. K. C.

SHAHAZIMAH (שַׁחֲצִימָה, Ḳr., but שחצומה, Ktb., whence RV Shahazumah), a place on the border of Issachar towards the Jordan—if the text is correct (Josh. 19 22; ϲαλειμ κατα θαλαϲϲαν [B], ϲαϲειμαθ κ. θ. [A], ϲαϲειμα [L]; sehesima [Vg.]; sasima, saasim [OS(2) 30 18 152 21]).

Dillmann supposes a place-name Shahazim, which is usually connected with שחץ, 'to be high' (Ges.-Bu.(13); cp Gray, HPN 95). Analogy, however, favours the view that either 'שׁ is a miswritten form of the following word בית שמש, or שמש in 'ב' שׁ is a corruption of the name which underlies 'שח. Now שמש in MT is sometimes a corruption of כֻּשָׁם or כֻּשִׁים (e.g., probably Ps. 72 5 121 6), סוּס of כּוּשׁ (Ps. 76 7 [6]), and סוּסִים of כּוּשִׁים (Is. 66 20, Crit. Bib.). שחצים may therefore come from כּוּשִׁים, either directly (ח=כ), or through the form סוסים. Similarly Beth-shemesh comes from 'Beth-cushim'; in v. 38 it is grouped with Migdal-el and Horem, both of which names come from 'Jeraḥmeel' (virtually a synonym of 'Cush'). Old Cushite or Jeraḥmeelite settlements are meant. T. K. C.

SHALEM (שָׁלֵם; ειϲ ϲαλημ [ADEL]; so Pesh., Vg.; Jub. 30 1 gives 'to Salem . . . in peace'; Sam., שלום; 'in peace' RV), Gen. 33 18. Accepting the MT and AV's rendering, we must look for a place called Shalem near Shechem, where in fact Robinson found a village called Sālim, in the hilly region to the E. of the Vale of Shechem. No such place, however, is mentioned elsewhere, and many prefer to render 'safe and sound' (Tgg., Saad., Rashi, Ges., Di., Del.; cp Sam.). The truth, however, is quite different. It is probable that the geography of the original narrative has been altered by the redactor. See SHECHEM, 2.

'Came in peace' is not natural. Wellhausen (CH(3) 317), Kautzsch-Socin (Gen. 78), and Ball suspect corruption. שכם, however, is not a plausible emendation of שלם. T. K. C.

SHALIM, RV Shaalim, Land of (אֶרֶץ־שַׁעֲלִים, τηϲ γηϲ εαϲακεμ [B], τ. γ. ϲααλειμ [A], τηϲ γηϲ γαδδι τηϲ πολεωϲ ϲεγαλειμ [L]), 1 S. 9 4†. According to Ewald (Hist. 3 19), Wellhausen (TBS 70), Driver, and Löhr, 'Sha'alim' should rather be 'Shaalabbim' (a Danite place). The account of Saul's route is, however, by no means clear, and 'Sha'alim' may be a corruption either of Shalishah or of Shaul (with which SHUAL [q.v.] may also be connected; cp H. P. Smith); in this case the second clause in v. 4 disappears. T. K. C.

SHALISHA(H), LAND OF (א׳ שָׁלִשָׁה; τηϲ γηϲ ϲελχα [BL], τ. γ. ϲαλιϲϲα [A]), mentioned in the description of the route taken by Saul, after leaving his home, to the 'land of Zuph' in the hill-country of Ephraim (1 S. 9 4).

The name Shalisha(h) also occurs in the compound place-name BAAL-SHALISHA and possibly underlies the corrupt words ZELAH and ZELZAH (qq.v.), BARZILLAI (see MEPHIBOSHETH), and also LAISH and LAISHAH; on the affinities of the name cp ASHER, § 4, ii., end.

The district referred to in 1 S. 9 4 would seem to be that in which the headquarters of Saul's clan were situated—i.e., probably Beth-gallim (cp GALLIM) or Beth-gilgal, or (originally) Beth-jeraḥmeel.[1] It must also have contained the place called Gibeah of Saul, which might probably with equal accuracy be called Gibeah of Shalisha, the names of Saul (Shaul) and Shalisha being perhaps connected (see SAUL, § 1, MEPHIBOSHETH). If, therefore, 'Gibeah of Saul' is rightly identified with Tell el-Fūl, 2½ m. N. of Jerusalem, we know the situation of the Land of Shalisha.

The geography of 1 S. 9 4 has caused much perplexity. The difficulty lies not only in the position of the clause, 'And he passed through the hill country of Ephraim,' but also in the final clause referring to אֶרֶץ יְמִינִי (RV, 'the land of the Benjamites'). ארץ ימיני must be taken together with אִישׁ יְמִינִי in 2 S. 20 1. In both passages ימיני is very probably a corruption of

[1] In explanation, see MEPHIBOSHETH, ROGELIM, ZELZAH.

יְרַחְמְאֵלִי, and the last member of the sentence in 1 S. 9 4 is to be regarded as a correction of the carelessly written first clause, so that the whole verse becomes (cp SHALIM) 'And he passed through the Jeraḥmeelite land (i.e., the district of Beth-Jeraḥmeel), but they found them not, and passed through the land of Shalisha (i.e., the district of Gibeah of Saul), but they found them not.' For a parallel to the emendation of הר־אפרים in clause 1, see Josh. 24 33, and cp PHINEHAS; and for another view, see Marq. Fund. 12, n. 1.

BAAL-SHALISHA (2 K. 4 42) has been considered elsewhere, and the identification mentioned will still perhaps be the most plausible one, even if we explain the second part of the name and also the 'Gilgal' in 2 K. 4 38[1] on the analogy of the 'Gilgal' and 'Gallim' disclosed to us in 2 S. 9 4 f. 17 27 19 32, and the 'Shalisha' of 1 S. 9 4. We may also provisionally hold that Shalisha is a less correct form than Shaul (cp SAUL, § 1). T. K. C.

SHALLECHETH, GATE OF (שַׁלֶּכֶת), apparently one of the gates of the temple, 1 Ch. 26 16†. See HOSAH ii. That it is a synonym for the 'dung-gate' (cp RVmg.), is very unlikely. Cp, however, Thenius on 2 Ki. 26 16.

SHALLUM (שַׁלּוּם, either from a clan-name akin to Ishmael, or='retribution [of God],' cp § 56 and see MESHULLAM; analogous are מְשֻׁלֶּמְיָה ,שֶׁלֶמְיָה, and Ph. שלם, בחשלם, יכנשלם, Palm. שלמא [ϲαλμηϲ] and שלמן, the Nab. שלמו and Sab. סלם, etc., cp Berger in Rev. d'Assyriol. et d'Archéol. 1895, p. 75; ϲελλουμ [BAL]).

1. Son of Jabesh (EV), or rather 'a Jabeshite' (see GINATH), who killed Zechariah b. Jeroboam, the last of the dynasty of Jehu, in IBLEAM [q.v.] and usurped the throne of Israel. After one month's reign he was killed by Menahem (2 K. 15 10-15; σελλημ [L]). M'Curdy (HPM 1 357) sees a reference to this in the statement of Zech. 11 8 that Yahwè 'cut off the three shepherds in one month.' It is difficult, however, to justify this theory (which is that of Hitzig and Ewald) in all points from the Hebrew records, and the view that Zech. 9-11 is pre-exilic is unsatisfactory (see ZECHARIAH [BOOK], § 5). It has been thought that Shallum's bold deed may be referred to in Hos. 10 14 (see BETH-ARBEL, but cp SALMAH).

2. b. Tekoa (MT TIKVAH, q.v.), i.e., a Tekoite, 'keeper of the wardrobe,' and husband (𝔊BA 'son') of the prophetess Huldah (2 K. 22 14 σελλημ [BL] 2 Ch. 34 22 σελλημ [BAL]); see below, 14.

3. b. Sismai, a descendant of Sheshan (1 Ch. 2 40 f.) σαλ[λ]ουμ [BAL]). Kittel (SBOT ad loc.) illustrates the combination of ססמי and שלום by (σεσμαος) בעלשלם בן [ס]סמי in a Ph. inscription from Larnax Lapethus (CIS 1 95); but cp SISMAI.

4. b. Josiah (Jer. 22 11, σελλημ, 1 Ch. 3 15 σαλ[λ]ουμ [BA]), generally known as JEHOAHAZ [q.v.].

5. b. Shaul, of SIMEON (§ 9), 1 Ch. 4 25 (σαλεμ [BA] σελλημ [L]; sellum [Vg.]).

6. b. Zadok, in the genealogical list connecting Eleazar with Ezra, 1 Ch. 6 12 f. [5 38 f.] (σαλωμ [B], Ezra 7 2, σαλουμ [B])=1 Esd. 8 1 (SALUM, RV SALEM σαλημου [BA] a diminutive?)=4 Esd. 1 1 SADAMIAS, RV SALEMAS. In 1 Ch. 9 11 Neh. 11 11 his name appears as MESHULLAM (q.v., no. 7).

7. b. NAPHTALI (§ 6), 1 Ch. 7 13 (σαλωμων [B], σελλημ [L]). He and his brother are called 'the sons of Bilhah' (the mother of Naphtali and Dan); possibly some of these were Danites (see Be. Chron. ad loc.). According to L βαλααμ (for Bilhah) was the son of Shallum. The name appears also under the form SHILLEM[2] (Gen. 46 24, συλλημ, שלום Sam. Nu. 26 49, שלום Sam. σελλη [B], σελλημ [AF] σε[λ]λημ [L]), whence the family of the Shillemites (Nu. loc. cit. הַשִּׁלֵּמִי, שלומי Sam. ὁ σελλημ[ε]ι [BAFL]).

8. The b'ne Shallum were one of the six groups of the 'children of the doorkeepers' (Ezra 2 42 σαλουμ [B] Neh. 7 45, σαλουμ [Bℵ]) in 1 Esd. 5 28 SALUM (σαλουμ [A] [B om.]). Of these, three (Shallum, Akkub, and Talmon) are mentioned as individuals in a list of doorkeepers (1 Ch. 9 17, σαλωμ [B twice, A once], σαλλωμ [A once]). In Neh. 12 25 his name appears as MESHULLAM (q.v., no. 20, and see below, no. 11). 'Door-

9. Shallum the Korahite (1 Ch. 9 19, σαλωμων [B], σαλωμ' [A]), see MESHELEMIAH.

10. An Ephraimite (2 Ch. 28 12 σελλημ [BA] -ειμ [L]).

11. A door-keeper (or Asshurite? Che.), Ezra 10 24 (γελλημ [B], γαιλλειμ [א], σολλημ [A], σε. [L]) = 1 Esd. 9 25 SALLUMUS (σαλλουμος [B*bA], -μου [Ba? c?]). From the fact that Telem (cp Talmon) occurs alongside his name, it is probable that he is to be identified with no. 8, above.

12. One of the b. Bani, Ezra 10 42 (σαλουμ [Bא]) = SAMATUS 1 Esd. 9 34 (σαματος [BA]).

13. b. HALLOHESH (הַלּוֹחֵשׁ), one of the repairers of the wall at Jerusalem (Neh. 3 12 σαλ[λ]ουμ [BA], σαλουμ [א]).

14. The father of Hanameel and uncle (דּוֹד) of Jeremiah (Jer. 32 [𝔊 39] 7, σαλωμ [BAQ], σαλμων [א*], adnot. ειρηνη [Qmg.]), possibly the same as 2 (above).

15. Father of Maaseiah (Jer. 35 [𝔊 42] 4 σελωμ [BAQ], αιλωμ [א*] σαι [אc.a]).

SHALLUN (שַׁלּוּן), b. COL-HOZEH (q.v.), ruler of the district of Mizpah, who repaired the fountain-gate and part of the pool of Shiloah (Neh. 3 15; 𝔊BאA om., ΕΜΜΩΝ [L]).

SHALMAI (AV in Neh. 7 48 = Ezra 2 46†; שַׁלְמַי [= SALMAI in RV] in Neh. with no varr. [except σαμαει (א) against σαλαμει (B), σελμει (A), σελεμει (L)], and in Ezra, Kr. SHALMANESER (שַׁלְמַנְאֶסֶר; ΣΑΜΕΝΝΑΣΑΡ, ΣΑΛΑΜΑΝΑΣΣΑΡ [B]; ΣΑΛΜΑΝΑΣΑΡ [A], ΣΑΜΑΝΑΣΣΑΡ [Avid., in 2 K. 18 9]; ΣΑΛΜΑΝΑΣΣΑΡ [L]; in Tob. 1 2 13 15 f., Enemessar, ΕΝΕΜΕΣΣΑΡΟΣ, -ΑΡ [BאA]; in 4 Esd. 13 40 SALMANASAR, Salmanassar), named as king of Assyria in 2 K. 17 3-6 18 9-11, is obviously the king who succeeded Tiglath-pileser and preceded Sargon. Hence he must be identified with Šulmânu-ašarid IV., successor and possibly son of Tiglath-pileser III. He was king of Assyria, 727-722 B.C. He seems to have left no monuments, probably because his reign was so short. He was succeeded by Sargon II., who appears to have founded a new dynasty. Very little is known of him. The Babylonian Chronicle, KB 2 276, narrates that 'he sat on the throne, 25th of Ṭebêtu [727 B.C.]. The city Šamara'in (or Šabara'in) he destroyed (cp SAMARITANS, § 2). In his fifth year Šulmânu-ašarid, in Ṭebêtu, met his fate. Five years had Šulmanu-ašarid reigned in Assyria.' The existing copies of the eponym canons give the names of the eponyms for the five years of his reign, and the additional information that in the first two years there was no military expedition, but that there was one in each of the years 725-722 B.C. Unfortunately the objective of these expeditions is not known. Some of the standard lion weights found at Kalah bear this king's name, KB 2 33 f. A boundary stone inscription, published by Peiser (Keilinschriftliche Actenstücke, 7 ff.), refers to private transactions in the second year of this reign, at Dûr-ili, which town was then under his rule. For another private transaction of this reign, in or near Nineveh (?), see KB 4 108. Sargon, in one of his inscriptions, accuses Shalmaneser of forcibly dispossessing the old capital Aššur of its ancient rights and immunities (see Wi. AOF 1 402 ff.). It seems certain also that, before he came to the throne, his father (?) Tiglath-pileser had placed him as his lieutenant over the city and district of Ṣimirra, conquered in 738 B.C. (see Wi. AOF 2 4). That he actually took Samaria is rendered doubtful by Sargon's claim to have done so, see SAMARITANS, § 2. See HOSEA for his relations with that monarch.

The Shalman of Hos. 10 14 has been identified (e.g., by Wellhausen, who regards v. 10 as an interpolation) with Shalmaneser IV.; against this see BETH-ARBEL, and Crit. Bib.[1]

SHAMA (שָׁמָע; ΣΑΜΑΘΑ [Bא], ΣΑΜΜΑ [AL]), b. Hothan the Aroerite, one of David's heroes (1 Ch. 11 44). Cp Elishama—i.e., probably Ishmael (Che.). His brother is Jeiel—i.e., Jerahmeel [Che.] (see JEIEL, 2).

SHAMARIAH (שְׁמַרְיָה, 2 Ch. 11 19). See SHEMARIAH (2).

SHAMBLES (Old Eng. scamel, from the late Lat. scamellum, a small bench), though now generally used in the sense of a slaughter-house, formerly signified a bench or stall on which goods, and particularly meat, were exposed for sale, and then a meat or flesh-market (κρεοπώλιον). In this sense shambles is used in our later English versions to render μάκελλον (1 Cor. 10 25), the Lat. macellum,[2] or provision-market, for which earlier translators have 'market' (Tindale) or 'fleshe market' (Coverdale and others). 'Shambles' first appears in the Rheims version of 1582. The Roman colonists who founded the Corinth of Paul's day (see CORINTH) in all probability brought the name with them.[3] The salesmen were named macellarii and dealt not only in the flesh of domestic animals but also in venison and other game, as well as in the various secondary articles of diet classed by the ancients under the head of ὄψον, obsonia (references in Marq. Das Privatleben d. Römer, 450 [1879]).

Dio Cassius defines τὸ μάκελλον as τὴν ἀγορὰν τῶν ὄψων (61 18). In Athens the provision-market (ὀψοπωλία) was divided into sections, termed κύκλοι (circles), and named after the special wares offered for sale, εἰς τὸ ὄψον, εἰς τὸν οἶνον, etc. (Poll. 9 47 10 29).

In 1 Cor. 10 25 the Corinthian Christians are advised to purchase whatever is offered for sale in the provision-market of the city, asking no question on the score of conscience, 'for the earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof.'

SHAMED, RV SHEMED (שֶׁמֶר), b. ELPAAL (q.v.), in a genealogy of BENJAMIN (q.v., § 9, ii. 8), 1 Ch. 8 12; perhaps same as Ishmerai in v. 18, see JQR 11 103, § 1. Recent editions (Bä., Ginsb.) read שמד, in preference to שמר (final d, not final r); the latter, however, is followed by ordinary Hebrew Bibles, Pesh. and 𝔊 (σημηρ [B], σεμμ. [A], σαμαιηλ [L]).

SHAME, SHAMEFUL THING (הַבֹּשֶׁת), Hos. 9 10 Jer. 3 24 11 13. See IDOL, § 3.

SHAMGAR (שַׁמְגַּר; ΣΑΜΑΓΑΡ [B], ΣΑΜΕ- [L, and BA in Judg. 5 6]; Jos. ΣΑΑΓΑΡΟΣ, ΣΑΜΑΓΑΡΟΣ; on the addition in some MSS of 𝔊 after Judg. 16 31, see Moore, 'Judges,' SBOT [Heb.], 59).

1. Judg. 3 31. An early Israelitish hero, Judg. 3 31 5 6; or, as others think, a foreign oppressor of Israel or of some part of Israel whom the writer of Judg. 3 31, through a misunderstanding of the allusion in Judg. 5 6, mistook for a patriotic warrior. The notice in Judg. 3 31, however, is, according to the most recent commentators, a very late insertion, later not only than the deuteronomistic elements in Judges, but also than the editor to whom the chronological system of Judges in its present form is due. It stands altogether outside that system, and is evidently unknown to the author of Judg. 4 1, which connects the oppression of Jabin with the death of Ehud. The author of the notice was poorly provided with suitable details for a fictitious story; he takes a hint (it may perhaps be held) from Judg. 15 14 f., where a similar exploit is assigned to Samson.[1] When we consider that the legend (2 S. 23 11 f.) of Shammah ben Agee, one of David's heroes, has also been influenced by the Samson-story, such license would not be surprising. Note also that all these names begin with שמ (sh-m). The chief object of the insertion of Judg. 3 31 would be to explain the obscure phrase 'in the days of Shamgar ben Anath' in Judg. 5 6.

[2] Macellum was also adopted into the Hebrew of the Talmud and Midrash under the forms מַקְלוֹן, מוּקְלִין, etc. (see the lexicons of Levy and Jastrow).

This critical theory can only be right in part.[2] Certainly Shamgar ben Anath comes from the song in Judg. 5 (in a corrupt form, so far as v. 6 is concerned). But the late writer of 3 31 ventured on no account of 'Shamgar's' exploits. Unless our experience elsewhere is altogether illusory, the passage (3 31) has suffered both by corruption and by editorial manipulation. On the analogy of similarly corrupt passages, we have to restore it thus: 'And after him arose Shamgar ben Anath; he smote the Pelištim [Ishmaelites, Jeraḥmeelites]; he also delivered Israel.' The corrector of the MS evidently felt that 'Pelištim' occurred too early; he wrote in the margin 'Ishmaelites,' 'Jeraḥmeelites,' as alternative corrections for 'Pelištim.' 'Ishmaelites' seems to be the right word; the preceding narrative in its original form probably closed with the words, 'and the land had rest from the Ishmaelites,' just as the narrative of Jabin or Sisera probably closed with the words, 'and the land had rest from the Arabians.'[3]

2. Judg. 5 6. But who was the true 'Shamgar' (Judg. 5 6)? Moore (Judges, 106) and Marquart (Fund. 3) have suggested that he may have been a Hittite king. Sangara was the name of a (Hittite) king of Carchemish in the time of Ašur-nasir-pal and Shalmaneser II. Moore also refers, in illustration of 'Sisera,' to the numerous Hittite names in -sira (e.g., Htàsira, WMM As. u. Eur. 332), whilst Marquart compares the name Pi-siri(s), borne by the last king of Carchemish (cp Del. Par. 270), and Ball[4] refers (for 'ben Anath') to Bur-anati, the name of the king of Yasbuk whom Shalmaneser II. mentions as an ally of Sangara (KB 1 159; cp ISHBAK). The song, however, is so often corrupt that the question of the names Shamgar and Sisera needs to be re-examined in connection with a thorough critical revision of the text of Judg. 5. The main historical result of such a revision appears to the present writer to be that the foes by whom the Israelites were oppressed were N. Arabians, variously called Jeraḥmeelites, Ishmaelites, Cushites, Asshurites, and Kenizzites, and that v. 6 should run thus:

In the days of Jeraḥmeel son of Anak,[5]
In the days of Cusham and Ishmael.

שמגר, 'Shamgar' (?), is in fact a scribe's mixture of ישמעאל and ירחמאל, and the scribe himself corrected his error,[6] while סיסרא is a corruption of the ethnic name אַשּׁוּר, 'Asshur,' a collateral form of which was probably גְּשׁוּר, 'Geshur' (see GESHUR, 2). Now perhaps we can see how 'Jabin' and 'Sisera' both appear in the story. 'Jabin' (𝔊[A], twice Jamin) is one of the corruptions of 'Jeraḥmeel,' so that the king of Kenaz (קנז, not כנען), whose capital was Kadesh[-barnea], might equally well be called 'Jeraḥmeel' and 'Asshur.' That 'Sisera' represents a N. Arabian ethnic name may also be presumed from its occurrence in the list of the families of the Nethinim (=Ethanim, 'men of Ethan'—a N. Arabian region). See SISERA, and Crit. Bib.

Cp G. F. Moore, Judges, 105 f., 142 f., and 'Shamgar and Sisera,' in Journ. Am. Or. Soc. 19 b 159 f.; Wi. GI 2 124 (Šem-gêr, two divine names). T. K. C.

[1] Moore points out (SBOT, l.c.) that in some forms of 𝔊 the notice of Shamgar stands after the story of Samson, and conjectures that this was the original place of the brief account.

[2] Winckler (GI 2 124), too, expresses dissatisfaction with the current theory; but he has no light to throw either on 3 31 or on 5 6.

[3] There are quite sufficient parallels for these and the preceding emendations. שמ frequently springs out of ישמעאל, and chronological statements have several times (e.g., Nu. 14 33 Am. 2 10 5 25) arisen out of misread ethnic names. See MOSES, § 11. The difficulties arising out of מלמד (cp 𝔊), and out of the six hundred men, who 'have always taxed the credulity of the commentators' (Moore; cp Wade, Old Test. History, 198, n. 1), now disappear.

[4] Smith's DB(2), s.v. 'Ishbak.' 'Bur' may have been taken by the scribe to be =בַּר ('son'); cp the reading proposed in col. 163, n. 1.

[5] ת and ק confounded. But cp ANATH.

[6] יעל in בימי יעל represents ירחמאל; ע stands for א. The rest of 'ירח was expelled by the following word חדלו which resembles ירחל. Line 2 now appears in a much altered form in v. 7*b*. See Crit. Bib.

SHAMHUTH (שַׁמְהוּת), 1 Ch. 27 8; in 2 S. 23 25 SHAMMAH (5).

SHAMIR (שָׁמִיר). 1. a city in the highlands of Judah (Josh. 15 48; CAMEIP [B], CAΦEIP [AL]). It may possibly be identified with Umm Sômerah, 2000 ft. above sea level, 2 m. N. from 'Anāb (cp v. 50) and 5 hrs. SW. from Hebron. So Guérin, Conder, Buhl. But note σαφειρ of 𝔊[AL].

2. A place in Mt. Ephraim, the seat of the clan of Tola, in Issachar, see ISSACHAR, § 7 (Judg. 10 1 f.; σαμειρ [B], σαμαρεια [AL]).[1] A site to the extreme N. of the hill-country seems possible (Moore). But see TOLA, where it is suggested that we should transfer the tradition of Tola to the Negeb. Observe, too, that Shimron (q.v.) is both a name of Issachar, and, according to the present writer's theory of Josh. 11 1 and Am. 3 9, etc., the Negeb. T. K. C.

SHAMIR (שָׁמִיר, Ktb. שָׁמוּר), b. Uzziel, a Levite (1 Ch. 24 24; CAMHP [BA], CEMMHP [L]).

SHAMLAI (שַׁמְלַי, Kt.; שַׂלְמַי, Kr.; CAMAAN [B], CEΛAM[E]I [AL]), Ezra 2 46 = Neh. 5 48, SALMAI.

SHAMMA (שַׁמָּא), b. Zophah, in a genealogy of ASHER (q.v., § 4, ii.), 1 Ch. 7 37 (CEM[M]A [BL], CAMMA [A]).

SHAMMAH (שַׁמָּה, § 51; abbrev. from SHEMAIAH).

1. Son of Reuel b. Esau, and a 'duke' or 'clan' (?) of Edom; Gen. 36 13 17 1 Ch. 1 37 (σομε [BADEL], but 1 Ch. 1 37 σομμε [A], σαμμα [L], and Gen. 36 17 σομαι [D]). See EDOM, § 4.

2. Son of Jesse (see DAVID, § 1*a*, n.); (1 S. 16 9, σαμα [B], σαμμα [A], σαμαα [L]); but 1 Ch. 2 13 RV (AV SHIMMA), 20 7 SHIMEA (שִׁמְעָא); 2 S. 13 3 σαμαα [BAL]; 2 S. 21 21, Kr. SHIMEAH (שִׁמְעָה); ib. Ktb. and RV SHIMEI, שִׁמְעִי, σεμεει [BA] σαμαα [L]). His sons were JONADAB and JONATHAN [q.v.]. See no. 5, below.

3. b. AGEE [q.v.], one of David's 'first three' (2 S. 23 11 f.; σαμαια [B], σαμμεας [A], σαμαιας [L]), a HARARITE [q.v.] or perhaps an ARCHITE [q.v.], for 𝔊[BA] calls him ὁ ἀρουχαῖος, 𝔊[L] ὁ αραχι. The exploit attributed to him in 2 S. is, with slight variations, assigned in 1 Ch. 11 13 f. to Eleazar, another of David's 'first three.' In L he appears as 'son of Ela,' which may imply identifying him with Shimei, son of Ela (1 K. 4 18 RV; see ELAH, 6). He had a son named Jonathan. See JONATHAN (ben Shage) and SHAMGAR, § 1.

4. A Hararite (σαμναν [B*b], σαμνας [Ba vid. A]; σαμαα [L]; see also JONATHAN b. Shage), who appears in 2 S. 23 33 as one of David's thirty, and as a distinct person both from Shammah b. Agee the Hararite one of the 'first three,' and from Shammah the Harodite also one of David's thirty, is really to be identified with Shammah b. Agee, and comes into the list in 2 S. 23 33 merely as father of JONATHAN ('ben Shage') [q.v.].

5. The HARODITE [q.v.], another of David's thirty (2 S. 23 25; σαιμα [B], σαμμαι [A], σαμαιας [L]). In 1 Ch. 11 27 the name is SHAMMOTH (שַׁמּוֹת; σαμαωθ [Bא], σαμωθ [A], σαμμωθ [L]), the Harorite (הַהֲרוֹרִי, ὁ αδι [Bא], θαδι [A], αρωρι [L]); and in 1 Ch. 27 8 SHAMHUTH (שַׁמְהוּת; σαλαωθ [B], σαμαωθ [AL]) the 'Izrahite,' which, according to Marquart (Fund. 19), stands for שמהות הַחֲרוֹרִי לַזַּרְחִי, 'Shamhuth, the Harodite, belonging to the Zerahites'; see ZERAH (1).

SHAMMAI (שַׁמַּי, § 52; cp SHEMAIAH).

1. A Jerahmeelite; 1 Ch. 2 28 32 (σαμαι [B]; αχεισαμας for 'brother of Shammai,' v. 32 [B], αχισαμμα [A]; σαμμαι [A] σεμεει [L]). See JERAHMEEL, § 2.

2. 'Son' of REKEM (q.v.) b. Hebron, and 'father' of Maon, 'father' of Beth-zur; 1 Ch. 2 44 f. (σαμαι [B only once L], σαμμαι [A once]).

3. Son of MERED [q.v.] of Judah, by his 'Egyptian' (more probably 'Misrite') wife; 1 Ch. 4 17 f. (σεμεν [B], σεμμαι [A], σαμι [L]).

SHAMMOTH (שַׁמּוֹת), 1 Ch. 11 27 = 2 S. 23 25, SHAMMAH (5).

[1] The fortress Sānūr, with which some have identified BETHULIA (q.v.), has been thought of by Schwarz for Shamir, but can hardly have come within Issachar. Cp Moore, ad loc.

SHAMMUA (שַׁמּוּעַ, perhaps 'heard,' § 56, but cp SHEMAIAH, which might be an expanded clan name).

1. A chief of REUBEN, § 13, end: Nu. 13 4 (σαμουηλ [B], σαμαλιηλ [A], σαμμου [F], σαλαμιηλ [L]).

2. Son of David (1 Ch. 14 4); see SHIMEA (2). In 2 S. 5 14 SHAMMUAH (AV).

3. A Levite; Neh. 11 17 (σαμου[ε]ι [BN*A], σαμμουε [Nc.a ?]), in 1 Ch. 9 16 called SHEMAIAH.

4. A priest, contemporary with Joiakim, Jeshua's successor; Neh. 12 18 (om. BN*A, σναμουε [Nc.a mg. inf.], σαμουε [L]).

SHAMSHERAI (שַׁמְשְׁרַי, ΙϹΜΑϹΑΡΙΑ [B], ϹΑΜϹ. [A], ϹΑΜΨΑΙΑ [L]), b. JEROHAM in a genealogy of BENJAMIN (q.v., § 9, ii. β) (1 Ch. 8 26†). Should the name be SHIMSHAI (q.v.)? Shehariah (cp Shihor, Ashḥur) follows. T. K. C.

SHAPHAM (שָׁפָם; ϹΑΒΑΤ [B], ϹΑΦΑΜ [A], -Ν [L]), a Gadite, 1 Ch. 5 12†. Perhaps originally a name of the Negeb (where Gad once dwelt); see SHAPHAT, SIPHMOTH (Che.).

SHAPHAN (שָׁפָן, either an animal name, or the name of a district, borne originally by a clan and subsequently by individuals [see below]; ϹΑΦΑΝ [BAL], but in 2 K. 22 ϹΑΦΦΑΝ [BA]), b. Azaliah b. Meshullam, a scribe, temp. Josiah, who was sent to take an account of the expenses for the repair of the temple (2 K. 22 3 ff.; v. 3 ϹΕΦΦΑΝ [A], v. 14 ϹΑΦΦΑΘ [B] = 2 Ch. 34 8 ff.; v. 15*b* ΑϹΑΦ [A]). It was on this occasion (the eighteenth year of Josiah's reign) that Hilkiah the priest gave him the newly-discovered 'book of the law' which he read before the king; see JOSIAH, and cp DEUTERONOMY, § 2 end. Shaphan was probably aged, since he was soon after displaced in favour of Elishama (Jer. 36 12). There is no valid reason why he should be kept distinct from Shaphan the father of Ahikam (2 K. 22 12, cp Jer. 26 [𝔊 33] 24), who, in turn, was the father of the well-known GEDALIAH [q.v.] (2 K. 25 22 Jer. 39 [46] 14 40 [47] 5 [ib. 9 11 BNAQ om.], 41 [48] 2 [σαφαν (Qmg., BNA om.)], 43 [50] 6 (BNAQ om.)]), also of a prominent personage called ELASAH, mentioned together with Gemariah b. Hilkiah (Jer. 29 3), and possibly of the JAAZANIAH [q.v.] mentioned in Ezek. 8 11 (but see Kraetzschmar, ad loc.).

Ezek. 8 11 ff. is such a remarkable passage for the history of Jewish religion, and the name 'Shaphan' (in 'Jaazaniah son of Shaphan') has been brought into such close relation to the extraordinary religious rite described, that we shall give a brief consideration to it from the point of view of onomatology. (1) The precedence among theories is due to the totemistic. W. R. Smith (J. Phil. 9 97 f., cp Kin. 201) sees in the passage 'an account of Gentile or family idolatry in which the head of each house acted as priest. And the family images which are the object of the cult are those of unclean reptiles and quadrupeds [v. 10]. The last point is important. The word שֶׁקֶץ is, in the Levitical law, the technical term for a creature that must not be used as food. That such prohibitions are associated with the totem system of animal-worship is well known. . . . Thus in the fact that the animals worshipped were unclean, in the Levitical sense, we gain an additional argument that the worship was of the totem type. And finally, to clinch the whole matter, we find that among the worshippers Ezekiel recognised Jaazaniah the son of Shaphan—that is, of the rock badger, which is one of the unclean quadrupeds (Dt. 14 7 Lev. 11 5), and must therefore have been figured on the wall as his particular stock-god and animal ancestor. It so happens that the totem character of the shaphan, or, as the Arabs call him, the wabr, is certified by a quite independent piece of testimony. The Arabs of the Sinai peninsula to this day refuse to eat the flesh of the wabr, whom they call "man's brother," and suppose to be a human being transformed. Were a man to break this rule he could never look on his father and mother again (Palmer, Desert of the Exodus, 198).' To this G. B. Gray (HPN 103 f.) replies that even if with W. R. Smith we see in the Shaphan of Ezek. the name of a still existing totem clan, this only explains the clan-name Shaphan, and leaves personal names of the same period—Huldah (weasel), Achbor (mouse), and Shaphan itself in 2 K. 22 3 unaccounted for: 'So far as the evidence of the names goes the occurrence at this time of three names at least which are certainly personal, and but one at most of which is tribal, does not favour the view that totem clans were then in existence. On the other hand, Ezek. 8 11 testifies to the worship of unclean animals at about this period; and in this Robertson Smith saw, not without good reason, the survival—perhaps rather the revival—of superstitious practices originally derived from totem belief and organisation.' G. B. Gray, therefore, with Davidson (Ezek. 56) and Cheyne (Intr Is. 368 f.), gives only a partial assent to W. R. Smith's theory. He grants that in the late regal period superstitious practices which were originally derived from totemism revived, and that this accounts for the three strange personal names referred to; this is all. Jos. Jacobs (Studies in Bibl. Archæol. 84 ff.) and Zapletal (Der Totemismus und die Relig. Israels, 1901, p. 73) take a different view of the name Shaphan, which, especially in Ezek. 8 11, is pronounced to be a contemptuous invention (as if 'Jaazaniah ben shaphan' meant 'Yahwè hears ben rock-badger'), indicating, with a bitter irony, the discrepancy between those bad practices and Israel's true religion. The director of the ceremony is named after Yahwè, and yet he can bring himself to offer worship to the figure of an animal; the prophet, therefore, calls him a 'ben šaphan,' as one might say 'ben Kemōš'—i.e., a worshipper of Chemosh. All these scholars presuppose the ordinary text and the usual explanation of names ending in יָה. Of the inconsistency of supposing that a man whose family cultivated totemistic superstitions with such ardour as to call some of its members by the name of the totem, and others by names which not only contain (as is held) the name of Yah or Yahwè, but even express a true moral conception of the nature of the Deity, they appear to have no satisfactory explanation. (2) A second theory (the present writer's) demands a more searching criticism of the text of the passages containing these three names Shaphan, Achbor, Huldah, in connection with a thorough textual revision of other parts of the OT. The result is (a) that not only the history but also the geographical and personal names of the OT are found to be monuments of long-continued N. Arabian influences. From the time (probably) of the Amarna Tablets there was (we may suppose) a large Jeraḥmeelite element in the population of Palestine, especially in the S., and at the close of the regal period (and afterwards) the danger to Judah from the side of N. Arabia was so great that numbers of Jews fell away to N. Arabian heathenism. (b) What Ezekiel saw on the wall of the chamber in the temple precincts was 'the form of every idol (lit. abomination) of the house of Ishmael' (וְהִנֵּה תַּבְנִית כָּל־שֶׁקֶץ בֵּית יִשְׁמָעֵאל);[1] the material on which the current theories as to the cult of the worshippers are based is simply due to a late editor, who had perforce to make some sense of a corruptly transmitted text, 'Ishmael,' 'Jeraḥmeel,' and 'Miṣrim' (cp Ezek. 20 7 f., גִּלּוּלֵי מִצְרִים, 'the idols of Miṣrim,' not גּ׳ מִצְרַיִם, 'the idols of Egypt'). The worshippers who thus profaned the temple of Yahwè were religious men; but their true names were devoid of religious significance. 'Jaazaniah' is merely an expansion of Azani, which also underlies the Rechabite name 'Jaazaniah' (Jer. 35 3), and the Jeraḥmeelite-Levite name 'Azaniah' (Neh. 10 9, cp Ezra 2 40). The final ה is simply formative; the initial י may be editorial. 'Azan' (אזן) is probably a place-name (cp ארן, ערן, also Negeb place-names). 'Shaphan' seems to be a modification of 'Zaphan' (צפן), which can be shown to be the name of a N. Arabian district, and appears in personal Hebrew names such as צפני[ה] (see ZEPHANIAH, 2-4); cp צפוני, Joel 2 20, etc. Similarly 'Azaliah' and 'Meshullam,' the father and grandfather of Shaphan in 2 K. 22 3, probably come respectively from Aṣali (אֲצַלְי), 'a man of Azal,' and Ishmael (ישמעאל); El'asah may also come from 'Ishmael,' and 'Ahikam' from 'Jeraḥmeel.' Thus the Shaphan connections are accounted for. For completeness' sake, it may be added that from this point of view 'Huldah' (חלדה) is miswritten for רחל,[2] and that רחל (Rachel, 'sheep') and עכבור (Achbor, 'mouse') are early popular distortions of ירחמאל. But the reader will not forget the warning πάντα δὲ δοκιμάζετε, τὸ καλὸν κατέχετε (1 Thess. 5 21). Cp NAMES, § 68, and last section.

To treat this subject with completeness would require us to consider the right interpretation of Is. 65 4 66 3 17. It must suffice, however, to say that all these passages are beyond question deeply corrupt, but that the redactor has proceeded so methodically that it is easy for any one who knows the redactor's methods to restore the true text. In this text the Jerahmeelites are clearly mentioned as the enemies of the Jews, and no reference is made to unclean animals. Cp SWINE, and see Crit. Bib. T. K. C.

SHAPHAT (שָׁפָט; a corruption of some tribal or place name; most naturally [cp 1] of צפת = Zephath—i.e., צָרְפַת, ZAREPHATH [q.v.]). The names ELISHAPHAT, JEHOSHAPHAT, and SHEPHATIAH (שפטיה), would seem, therefore, to be modifications of a traditional older name.

1. A Simeonite, b. Hori, one of the 'spies' (Nu. 13 5† [P]: σαφατ υιος σουρ[ε]ι [BA], -αν υἱ. σ. [F], σαφαθ υἱ. σουδρι [L]). 'Hori' may mean 'Horite,'

[1] ובהמה רמש probably comes from ישמעאל (written too soon), and perhaps גלולי (if this is not a gloss on שקץ) from ירחמאל (a variant to ישמעאל).

[2] Cp חלדי, Zech. 6 10, חלם, v. 14; both = ירחמאל (Crit. Bib.).

but almost more probably comes from Jeraḥme'eli; a similar origin for Shaphat then becomes plausible.

2. The father of ELISHA [q.v.] (1 K. 19 16 19†, σαφαθ, σαφατ [B vs. 19; AL]). His residence, Abel-meholah, is usually thought to have been in Issachar. But if the arrangement in MT is correct, it was when Elijah 'departed thence' (i.e., from Horeb) that he 'found Elisha b. Shaphat' (1 K. 19 19). The reader will probably be aware (see KINGS [BOOK], § 8) that critics have been inclining to the belief that MT's arrangement is not correct, and Kittel, in his commentary (HK 154), gives a blank space between v. 18 and v. 19 to indicate that a section of the narrative has been omitted. The matter, however, is not so clear as to require no reconsideration. We know that Elijah had a close connection with the far S. of Canaan (see PROPHET, § 6). It is plausible, therefore, to suppose that Elisha was originally called, not 'b. Shaphat,' but either 'b. Ṣĕfath'—i.e., a Zephathite, or 'b. Ṣefāthī'—i.e., the son of a Zephathite. In the former case Elisha, in the latter Elisha's father (a more probable view), was represented as a man of Zephath or Zarephath who had established himself at Abel-meholah—i.e., Abel-jeraḥmeel (cp MEHOLATHITE). The site of this Jeraḥmeelite place (cp 1 S. 30 29) we do not know. The site of Zephath (or probably Zarephath) has probably been identified: see ZAREPHATH.

3. A late descendant of David (1 Ch. 3 22†; σαφαθ [B], σαφατ [AL]). The name was presumably suggested by SHEPHATIAH, 1.

4. A Gadite, in Bashan (1 Ch. 5 12†; 𝔊, however [Ιανειν] ὁ γραμματεύς [B], [ιαναι] ὁ γρ. [A]; [ιωανι] ὁ γρ. καὶ σαφαν [L]). Here ὁ γραμματεύς = (ה)סֹּפֵר, a variant to שפט. The common original of both readings is צָרְפָתִי, 'a Zarephathite.' The list originally referred to the Negeb and בשן was originally כושן (Cushan).[1]

5. The overseer of David's herds in 'the valleys' (1 Ch. 27 29†: σωφαν [B], σωφατ [A], σαφατ [L]). He is called b. Adlai; but עַדְלַי is possibly a corruption of עדלם (Adullam). A Zephathite or Zarephathite (if Shaphat = Ṣephāthī) might easily be a native of Adullam—i.e., Jeraḥmeel (for David's connection with which cp again 1 S. 30 29). T. K. C.

SHAPHER, RV Shepher, Mount (הַר־שָׁפֶר, 'mount of glitter'? see SAPHIR), a stage in the wandering in the wilderness (Nu. 33 23 f.†; ϲαφαρ [BL], αρϲαφαρ, ϲαρϲαφαρ [A], αρϲαφαθ [F]). If the wanderings were in N. Arabia, and if (as has been rendered probable) P is apt to make up lists by combining various corrupt variants of the same name, the neighbourhood of several (probable) corrupt forms of Jeraḥmeel suggests that שפר (Shepher) comes from צרפת; cp ספרה הר הקדם ('to Zarephath, mount Jeraḥmeel'?) in Gen. 10 31. Cp SEPHAR. See WILDERNESS OF WANDERINGS.

SHAPHIR (Mic. 1 11), RV, AV SAPHIR.

SHARAI (שָׁרַי; ϲαριου [B], αρου [A], ϲαρουε [ℵ], -α [L]), b. Bani, a layman, temp. Ezra; Ezra 10 40 (‖ 1 Esd. 9 34 probably εζωρα [BA], ϲαρουα [L], see EZORA, MACHNADEBAI). Cp SHEARIAH.

SHARAIM (שַׁעֲרַיִם), Josh. 15 36 AV, RV SHAARAIM.

SHARAR (שָׁרָר), the HARARITE, the father of AHIAM [qq.v.] (2 S. 23 33† [ϲ]αραι [B], [ϲ]αραδ [A], notice that υιοϲ precedes, ϲαραχω αρεριμα [L] for ϲαραχ ο αρερι). In 1 Ch. 11 35 his name appears as SACAR ([ϲ]αχαρ [BℵA], ιϲϲαχαρ [L]; cp ISSACHAR, § 6, end). Some of these readings suggest שֶׁרַח (see SERAH) as the original; Marq. (Fund. 21), however, thinks of שֹׁבָב (see SHOBAB). T. K. C.

[1] 1 Ch. 5 11-17 is a record of the settlement of Gadites in the Negeb, for which the Chronicler (v. 17) claims the authority of a list made in the days of Jotham and Jeroboam II. v. 11 places their home 'in the land of Cushan as far as Ḥaluṣah' (? see ZIKLAG); v. 16, 'in Gilead [the southern Gilead], in Cushan, and in its towns, and in all the suburbs (?) of Sharḥon (see SHARON, SHARUHEN), to the point where they end.'

SHARE (מַחֲרֶשֶׁת, מַחֲרֵשָׁה), an implement mentioned in 1 S. 13 20*a*; in vv. 20*b* 21*a* (where it is rendered 'mattock'). That it was a dividing instrument of some kind appears from the etymology; EV seems to suggest a ploughshare, but this is represented here by ēth (אֵת), 'coulter,' elsewhere rendered 'ploughshare.' 𝔊^B θέριστρον . . . θερίζειν (𝔊^A wanting, θεριστήριον . . . θερίζειν [L]) seems to suggest some reaping implement. See AGRICULTURE, § 3 f.

SHAREZER, or, more correctly, ŚAREZER (שַׂרְאֶצֶר, so Bä. Gi., cp Del. Complut. Var. 16; '. . . protect the king'; cp NERGAL-SHAREZER).

1. An Assyrian, perhaps a son of Sennacherib, who, with Adrammelech (perhaps his brother), slew that king (2 K. 19 37 Is. 37 38; σαρασαρ [BAO], σαρασα [LℵAQ]). It is urged elsewhere (SENNACHERIB, § 5), that in the admittedly composite narrative of the peril from 'Sennacherib' two different invasions have been mixed up, and that parts of the existing narrative relate to the one and parts to the other. The one invasion was, it is held, the well-known Assyrian invasion of Sennacherib, the other an invasion of a N. Arabian people sometimes called Asshur, but perhaps more correctly Ashḥur (אַשְׁחוּר). Whether we can say that each of the accounts which have been welded together relates solely and entirely to one of the two invasions, is doubtful; but it is at any rate very possible that the passage 2 K. 19 36 f. = Is. 37 37 f. refers to the death of the king of the N. Arabian Assḥur, who was said (we may reasonably hold) to have perished in the house of his god Nimrod, by the sword of 'Jeraḥmeel, a prince of Asshur' (read יְרַחְמְאֵל שַׂר אַשּׁוּר for אַדְרַמֶּלֶךְ וְשַׂרְאֶצֶר); observe that in 2 K. בָּנָיו, 'his sons' is omitted. Upon this theory the form Śarezer is due to the editor, who supposed only one invasion, viz., the Assyrian, to be meant, and sought to adjust the geographical and personal names accordingly. Still, apart from this, the existing name Śar-ezer inevitably suggests comparison with the Ass. šar-uṣur, 'protect the king.' Commonly, but not always, we find this form preceded by some divine name such as Bel, Nergal, etc. (see Schr. Die Ass.-Bab. Keilinischr., 156). It has been noticed already (see ADRAMMELECH) that Abydenus in Eus. Armen. Chron. (Schoene, 135) mentions a Nergilus as the successor of Sennacherib. By some ingenious combinations, Hitzig (Begriff der Kritik, 194 ff. [1831]) identified Śarezer with this Nergilus (supposing the full name to have been Nergal-šarezer [-šar-uṣur]. This view, however, though supported by A. v. Gutschmid and Schrader (KAT(2) 330), is inadmissible, not because it conflicts with the theory mentioned above, but because (see Wi. ZA, 1887, pp. 392 ff.) the words of Abydenus, 'Deinceps autem post eum (Sinecheribum) Nergilus regnavit,' are misplaced, and refer properly to Nergal-ušizib, who was a Babylonian king, set up by an Elamite invader in 694-3 B.C.

We might, of course, suppose that the Hebrew writer had a confused recollection of the murderer and successor of Evil-merodach who was called Nergal-šarezer, or, with W. M. Müller (ZATW 17 333), that the name Śarezer is a mere guess, due to an early editor who was struck by the un-Assyrian character of the name Adrammelech and determined as well as he could to Assyrianise it. Winckler, however (AOF 2 58), thinks that Śarezer may be a distorted form of the historical name Šariṭir-Aššur. This name was borne by a person who seems to have claimed royal rank; Winckler supposes him to have been the brother whom ESARHADDON [q.v.] drove from Babylon into the NW. of the Assyrian kingdom. Cp Exp. T 9 429 [1898].

2. AV SHEREZER. A contemporary of Zechariah, Zech. 7 2 (σαρασαρ [BℵAQΓ]). The name, if correctly read, seems to be incomplete. Siegfr.-Stade would read Bel-śarezer, whilst Marti (in Kau. HS) prefers El-śarezer; that is to say, Siegfr.-Stade think that בית־אל שר' is an arbitrary expansion of בֵּל שר', and Marti renders the text 'the house (i.e., family) of El-śarezer (אֵל שר') sent.' If, however, we are right in explaining REGEM-MELECH (= Raamiah) as a corruption of Jeraḥmeel, the question arises whether ביתאל may not be a corruption of תֻּבַל (the N. Arabian Tubal). In this case we can hardly read בל שראצר. ואנשיו at the end of the clause should perhaps be וְיֵשׁוּעַ, 'and Jeshua' (a corruption of Shua or Sheba). Render, therefore, 'Tubal, and . . ., and Jerahmeel, and Jeshua[1] (Sheba) sent saying,' etc. But what is the name underlying Sarezer? We see from Zechariah's answer (Zech. 7 5) that he was in some way a leader and representative of the people. Wellhausen (Kl. Pr.) suspects that he may have been Zerubbabel. This cannot be correct; elsewhere Zechariah calls the governor by his usual name. It has therefore been suggested (col. 574) that [Bel-]sarezer may be the same as Belsar (an impossible name till we add -ezer = Bab. uṣur), one of the twelve (?) 'heads' of the Jews of Judæa (see GOVERNMENT, § 26), according to a well-attested reading (on Ezra 2 2 Neh. 7 7 see BILSHAN). Plausible as this view is (cp MELZAR), the conjecture reached elsewhere that the principal captivity was really a N. Arabian and not a Babylonian one, makes it prudent to revise it. Just as SISERA [q.v.] comes most probably from Asshur, so Sarezer may be a corruption of Asshur or Asshuri. A later editor, imperfectly informed, may well have Assyrianised it, as W. M. Müller supposes an editor to have Assyrianised 'Adrammelech.' On the objects of the deputation to Zechariah, see Nowack, and cp Jew. Rel. Life, 10, 17. See also REGEM-MELECH.

SHARON (הַשָּׁרוֹן with art.; Is. 33 9 ο CAPωN [B$\aleph^{c.b}$AQ^{a}], ασαρων [ℵ*], ο Σααρων [Q*], Saron; Is. 35 2 𝔊 om. Saron; Is. 65 10 ἐν τῷ δρυμῷ [BℵAQ], campestria; 1 Ch. 27 29 ἐν τῷ Ασειδων [B], σαρων [A], ασαρων [L]; Cant. 2 1 τοῦ πεδιου [BℵAC], campi; Acts 9 35, τὸν σαρωνα; gentilic הַשָּׁרוֹנִי, ὁ σαρων[ε]ιτης [BA], ὁ ασαρ. [L], the Sharonite).

A plain of Palestine, extending from the Nahr ez-Zerḳā, 44 m. southward to the mouth of the Nahr Rūbīn, by which and by the Ramleh Hills (Abū Shūsheh, 756 ft. in height) it is divided from the Philistian Plain. It was famous for its pastures (1 Ch. 27 29 Is. 65 10) and for its luxuriant vegetation (Is. 35 2, Cant. 2 1). In describing the desolation of Judah a prophet of woe exclaims, 'Sharon is like a desert' (Is. 33 9). The name Sharon signifies 'level country,' but this only implies the absence of conspicuous heights (cp NAMES, § 99 [b]). Undulating hills occur over a large part of Sharon. Some are well wooded, and there is a long extent of park-like scenery in the neighbourhood of Mukhâlid in the very N., 'where groups of sindian, the ordinary oak of Palestine (Quercus infectoria; see TEREBINTH) are dotted over the rolling plateau of red semi-consolidated sand' (Conder, PEFQ, 1875, p. 92). These groups of oaks are the representatives of large oak groves. There is Egyptological evidence[2] for a forest in Sharon, and only an extensive woodland would justify the phrase in Is. 35 2, 'the magnificence (הָדָר) of Carmel and Sharon.' The otherwise strange expression of 𝔊 in Is. 65 10 (ὁ δρυμός = הַשָּׁרוֹן), which agrees with the phraseology of Greek writers, including Josephus,[3] is thus to be accounted for. Nor must we overlook the statement of the Itinerary of King Richard (4 14) respecting the forest of Assur, S. of the Salt River, through which the Crusaders passed in 1191 A.D. to meet Saladin in battle.[4]

The 'Plain of Sharon' is divided into three distinct river basins—those of the Nahr Zerḳā (with its wild moorland and marshland), the Nahr el-Mufjir, and the Nahr Iskanderūneh (the Crusaders' Salt River). The southernmost portion, which receives the Wādys Budrus and Salmān, is the most cultivated and attractive; the view of it which the traveller obtains in springtime from the Tower of Ramleh is highly enjoyable. Spring, indeed, works a miracle in the aspect of this region. The richest grass and the brightest flowers adorn the landscape. Even in the marshlands the tall and graceful papyrus (with which Friedr. Delitzsch too boldly identifies the Rose of Sharon) is, in its autumnal flowering time, pleasant to behold. There can be no doubt that but for the encroaching sand the Plain of Sharôn would give a rich reward to the agriculturist, and the words of Is. 65 10 would be verified, 'Sharon shall be a fold for flocks.'

Eusebius and Jerome describe our Sharon as extending from Cæsarea on the sea-coast to Joppa; they give it the name of σαρωνας. They also mention a Sharon between Tabor and Tiberias, which they imagine to be referred to in Is. 33 9 (OS 296 6, 154 6). Later writers have supposed references to this NE. Sharon in Josh. 12 18 (see LASHARON) and Cant. 2 1 (see 2).

2. A district between Mt. Tabor and Tiberias, as Delitzsch and Oettli think (Cant. 2 1, 'rose of Sharon'), but erroneously, though the name Sārōna, attached to a village in the region called Arḍ el-Ḥamma (see Rob. BR 3 237), confirms the statement of Onom. (see 1) that a second Sharon really existed. Delitzsch's view is connected with the theory that the bride in Cant. was a Galilæan maiden (see CANTICLES, § 6). Wellhausen decides against it because the 'rose' (see ROSE, 1) is mentioned in Is. 35 1 f. as blooming in the better-known Sharon (see Che. Proph. Is., ad loc.). 'Rose of Sharon' was apparently a proverbial phrase.

3. A region (?) on the E. of Jordan, occupied by the b'ne GAD (§ 13, begin.), 1 Ch. 5 16†. 𝔊^{AL} σαρων, but 𝔊^{B} γεριαμ, whence Kittel (SBOT 'Chron.') deduces שִׂרְיוֹן = שִׂרְיֹן, Sirion. Stanley, G. A. Smith, and Buhl, however, suppose that the מִישׁוֹר or table-land of Gilead generally (Josh. 13 9 17 21) is meant. A place called שרן is mentioned in Mesha's inscription (l. 13). But that, as Nöldeke points out,[1] was probably farther to the S. The truth, however, probably is that 1 Ch. 5 11-17 comes from a document relating to the Negeb, so that שרון may very well represent שרחון (miswritten SHARUHEN). T. K. C.

SHARUHEN (שָׁרוּחֶן; οι ΑΓΡΟΙ ΑΥΤωΝ [BAL]), a Simeonite city in Judah (Josh. 19 6), generally thought to be the SHILHIM (שִׁלְחִים; CΑΛΗ [B], CΕΛΕΕΙΜ [AL]), and SHAARAIM (שַׁעֲרַיִם; Sam. [i. 17 52] ΤωΝ ΠΥΛωΝ [BAL]; Ch. CΕωΡΕΙΜ [BA], CΑΑΡΙΜ [L]) of the corresponding lists in Josh. 15 32 (not 36) and 1 Ch. 4 31. It is plausible to suppose that Sharuhen, not Hebron,[2] is the place opposite which, on a hill-top, Samson, according to legend, deposited the doors and posts of one of the gates of Gaza (Judg. 16 3). Certainly a spot in the SW. of Palestine is more likely than Hebron, and Sharuhen has this recommendation: it had for a second name (if 1 Ch. l.c. is correct) Shaaraim—i.e., 'the place of a gate.' The legend was perhaps to account for the name. We cannot point out the locality intended; but it is tempting to identify Sharuhen (שָׁרְחוֹן, Sharḥôn ?) with Šarahan, a name which, in the Egyptian inscriptions, designates a fortress of some importance on the road from Egypt to Gaza. For a time Šarahan was occupied by the Hyksos, and that brave warrior Aahmes, whose tomb has furnished an account of the war of liberation, took part in the siege of it ($RP^{(1)}$ 6 8, Renouf; Brugsch, GÅ 232, cp 255). The place is also mentioned in the Annals of Thotmes III., at the opening of the campaign, which was distinguished by the great battle of Megiddo (WMM, As. u. Eur. 158 f.; in RP 2 38 the names are wrongly read). Cp SHARON, 3.

SHASHAI (שָׁשַׁי, § 58; CΕCΕΙ [BℵA], CΕΝCΕΙΡ [L]), b. Bani, a layman, temp. Ezra (Ezra 10 40). In 1 Esd. 9 34, SESIS (σεσ[σ]εις [BA], σεσεει [L]). Parallels suggest tracing this name to כּוּשִׁי, Cushite.

SHASHAK (שָׁשָׁק, § 58; CωCΗΚ [A], CΙCΑΧ [L]; CωΚΗΛ [B, v. 14], CωΙΗΚ [B, v. 25]). A Benjamite clan-name, 1 Ch. 8 14 25 (see BENJAMIN, 9, ii. b; JQR

SHAUL (שָׁאוּל; CAOYΛ), the same name as SAUL (q.v.).

1. Name of a clan of SIMEON (§ 9), Shaulites (שָׁאוּל מִשְׁפַּחַת הַשָּׁאוּלִי, σαουλ[ε]ι [BAFL]), Nu. 26 13, where the equivalence of 'son' and 'clan' is evident. In Gen. 46 10 Ex. 6 15 1 Ch. 4 24, Shaul is Simeon's son; the two former passages add, by a woman of Canaan (σαμουηλ υἱὸς τῆς Χαναν́ιτιδος [AD], σαουλ υἱ. τ. χ. [DL], Gen. 46 10; ὁ ἐκ τῆς Φοινίσσης [BAF], σαουλ οἱ ἐκ τ. Φ. [L], Ex. 6 15), or rather perhaps of Kenaz (קְנִז for כְּנַעַן, as in Judg. 4 2, cp SHAMGAR, § 2, and often). The name is S. Canaanitish and N. Arabian (cp SAUL, SHALISHA). SHIMEI and Saul are both Benjamite names, and another 'son' of Simeon is JAMIN (one of the best established modifications of 'Jerahmeel' [Che.]).

2. A Kohathite, and ancestor of Samuel, 1 Ch. 6 24 [9]. In 1 Ch. 6 36 [20] the name is JOEL.

3. (Gen. 36 37 f. 1 Ch. 1 48 f.). See SAUL, 2.

SHAVEH, VALE OF (עֵמֶק שָׁוֵה; THN KOIΛAΔA THN CAYHN [A] . . . CAYH [DL]), the place where the king of Sodom met Abraham after the latter's victory over CHEDORLAOMER (q.v.), Gen. 14 17. An appended notice explains it as 'the king's vale' (see MELCHIZEDEK, § 3). Shaveh can hardly mean 'the level' or 'plain' (on v. 5, where 𝔊^AEL again gives σαυη, see SHAVEH-KIRIATHAIM). Hommel (AHT 151, n. 1) would amend שוה into שׂרה. The Vale of Shaveh then becomes the Vale of the King (Ass.-Bab. Šarri).[1] More probably we should read שְׂרֵה מַעֲכָה, 'the highland of Maacath,' and the following gloss, 'that is, Maacath-jerahmeel.' Cp SODOM. T. K. C.

SHAVEH-KIRIATHAIM (שָׁוֵה קִרְיָתַיִם; EN CAYH TH ΠΟΛΕΙ [AEL]), generally explained (e.g., EV^mg.) 'plain of Kiriathaim' (see KIRJATHAIM), Gen. 14 5. It was the residence of the EMIM (q.v.). שָׁוֵה, however, occurs again only in Gen. 14 17, where it is corrupt (see SHAVEH, VALLEY OF). C. J. Ball (Gen. 118) suggests here שְׂרֵה. Read probably שְׂרֵה רְחֹבֹתִי, 'the highland of the Rehobothite.' See SODOM. T. K. C.

SHAVSHA (שַׁוְשָׁא, § 58; 1 Ch. 18 16; IHCOYC [B], σους [א], σουσα [AL]) also called, less correctly, SHISHA (1 K. 4 3, שִׁישָׁא; σαβα [B], σεισα [A], 𝔊^L, however, σαφατ), and SHEVA (2 S. 20 25, שְׁיָא Kt. שְׁוָא, Kr.; ιησους [B], ισους [A], σουσα [L]), and SERAIAH (שְׂרָיָה, ר being inserted in the form שְׁיָה, 2 S. 8 17, ασα [B]).

Shavsha was David's scribe or secretary. His name is either = Bab. savsu = samsu, 'sun,'[2] so that Babylonian scribes were still in request (Marq. Fund. 22) or (cp SHESHAI) is a corruption of כוש (final א as in צִיבָא, ZIBA). Driver, Wellhausen, and others agree in rejecting Seraiah. The question is of some historical importance; which country influenced David most—Babylonia or N. Arabia? T. K. C.

SHAWL, RV for מִטְפַּחַת, AV 'wimple,' Is. 3 22. See MANTLE, § 2 [3], VEIL.

SHEAL (שְׁאָל; CAΛOYIA [Bא], CAAΛ [AL]), b. Bani, a layman, temp. Ezra; Ezra 10 29 = 1 Esd. 9 30 (ασαηλος [BA], ασσαηλ [L]), EV JASAEL, RV JASAELUS.

SHEALTIEL (שְׁאַלְתִּיאֵל [but in Hag. 1 12 14 2 2 שַׁלְתִּיאֵל], as if 'I have asked God,' §§ 34, 56, 79, but this is doubtful, since אל in names formed on this model may be formative; we expect, according to this theory, a gentilic, and 'Eshtauli' [see ESHTAOL] suggests itself as the genuine name instead of Shealtiel; CAΛAΘIHΛ), b. Jeconiah 'the captive' (see ASSIR), or perhaps Asshur (אַשּׁוּר; see Crit. Bib.), according to 1 Ch. 3 17 ff. the uncle, but elsewhere the father, of ZERUBBABEL [q.v.] (Ezra 3 2 [𝔊^B om.] 8 5 2 Hag. 1 1, etc.).

In accordance with 𝔊 the name is spelt SALATHIEL by EV in 1 Esd. 5 5 48 56 6 2, and by AV in 1 Ch. 3 17 Mt. 1 12 and Lk. 3 27. In Lk. he is called 'the son of Neri,' on which see GENEALOGIES ii., § 3. In 2 Esd. 5 16 SALATHIEL, RV PHALTIEL, the 'captain of the people,' is an uncertain reading; Pesh. reads 'Psaltiel.' See, further, Ball, Var. Apoc. (ad loc.). T. K. C.

SHEARIAH (שְׁעַרְיָה; CAPAIA [BA], CAPIA [BאA], σαρια, σααρια [L]), b. Azel in a genealogy of BENJAMIN (q.v. § 9, ii. β); 1 Ch. 8 38 = 9 44. On the name cp SHAARAIM.

SHEARING HOUSE (בֵּית־עֵקֶד), 2 K. 10 12 14; Heb. BETH-EKED (q.v.).

SHEAR-JASHUB (שְׁאָר יָשׁוּב, 'a remnant shall return,' § 23). One of Isaiah's sons (Is. 7 3). See ISAIAH, PROPHET, § 4.

SHEBA (שֶׁבַע; CAMAA [B], CABEE [A], CABE [L]), a Simeonitish town, Josh. 19 2 (SIMEON, § 10).

It is omitted in a very few MSS, and in the parallel passage, 1 Ch. 4 28. Its inclusion makes the reckoning in Josh. 19 6 inaccurate, unless for שרוחן we there read שְׁרִיהֶן with 𝔊 (see SHARUHEN). For a possible way out of the difficulty see JESHUA.

SHEBA (שֶׁבַע, perhaps from Elisheba [§ 50]; otherwise explained as a clan-name = Shema [SOLOMON, § 2]; or a name of the moon-god [Wi. GI 2 221]; cp בת־שבע, BATH-SHEBA, and perhaps Nab. שבען, CIS 2 115; but cp SOLOMON, § 2; CABEE).

1. Called b. Bikri (Bichri)—i.e., a member (like Saul probably) of the Benjamite clan BECHER (cp BENJAMIN, § 9, ii. β).

For the story of his revolt see 2 S. 20 (αβεε [A, vv. 1, 7]; L σαβεε υἱὸς βεδδαδι ἀνὴρ αραχει [Archite?[1]]).

David was on his return to Jerusalem after Absalom's death, and a fierce quarrel had arisen between the men of Judah and the men of Israel. Sheba who 'happened' to be near, saw his opportunity, and called upon the latter to secede from David and claim their independence. The spark burst into a flame. All Israel took the side of Sheba; 'but the men of Judah from Jordan[2] as far as Jerusalem clave to their king.' There is reason, however, to think that the description is influenced by that of the great secession under Jeroboam (1 K. 12 16). Sheba's revolt was, no doubt, the result of some of the disintegrating influences which afterwards had such disastrous effect, but David who had just made his peace with Israel and Judah would surely have been able to prevent a revolt on such a large scale as 2 S. 20 2 indicates (see 19 41-43 [42-44]).[3] Unless we adopt a conjecture made elsewhere (SAUL, § 1), the statement of vv. 14-22 (where BERITES [q.v.] should certainly be emended into 'Bikrites') shows that the original opening of the narrative has been lost. What we know for certain is that Sheba, a kinsman of Saul, supported by his clan, made a bold attempt to revive the Israelitish kingdom. He sought in vain to stir up the northern tribes, and was besieged in the ancient city of ABEL-BETH-MAACAH (q.v.) by Joab. The walls were on the point of giving way to the attacks of the besiegers when a 'wise woman' (cp Eccles. 9 14 f.) made an arrangement with Joab, and saved the city. Sheba's head was

1 Wellhausen (TBS 202) suggests אשרה, Asherah, as the origin; he connects this view with a very difficult explanation of 2 S. 18 18, where he makes Absalom take 'the pillar (of the Asherah) in the King's Vale,' and set it up in his own behalf.

2 Cp in an old Aram. bilingual כישש (CIS 2 65) = Ass. kišamas.

1 [Most probably ארכי, like the proper names ארח and אחר in 1 Ch., and מכיר (cp 𝔊^A in 1 S. 9 1), comes from ירחמאל.—T. K. C.]

2 From the context, the S. border of Judah must be intended. It is probable that we should take ירדן here to be the naḥal Miṣrim (see EGYPT, RIVER OF, and cp Wi. GI 1 174; AOF 1 34, and Marq. Fund. 74).

3 The Bikrites joined Sheba, just as in a similar revolt the Benjamites joined Abner (cp 2 25). The passage (20 14), however, is in some disorder. Perhaps we should read (transposing a and b), 'and all the Bikrites assembled and came after him, and they passed through' (וַיַּעַבְרוּ), etc.

cut off and thrown out to Joab.[1] Thus the revolt was crushed.

Cheyne, however, maintains (SAUL, § 1) that 'Abel-beth-maacah' is an editorial attempt to make sense of a corrupt passage, and that the true text of 2 S. 20 14 f. only states that Sheba passed on to Beth-jerahme'el,' and was there besieged by Joab.[2] Beth-jerahme'el (=Beth-gilgal) is, on his theory, the centre of Saul's clan, where Sheba, like Mephibosheth, naturally sought refuge in distress.

The story of the revolt is contained in 2 S. 20 1 f. 6 f. 14-22. Verse 3 seems to be a parenthesis, introduced to connect the story more closely with the episode of Absalom. It is just possible, however, that this connection is a mistake, and that Sheba's revolt and that of Absalom happened in different parts of the reign of David (similarly Wi. GI 1 173 2 192). Verses 4 f. 8-13 contain a confused account of AMASA [q.v., 1], interspersed with notices of the pursuit of Sheba (cp 10*b*, 13*b* with 7*b*). The precise relation between the stories of Amasa and Sheba is not clearly indicated,[3] and it is not at all certain that the account of Amasa's death formed part of the earliest narrative.

SHEBA (שְׁבָא, usually σαβα [BNA, etc., L], once or twice σαβαν [BAQEL], σαβαυ [E], σαβεν [A], σαβαι [B]; in Job 6 19 σαβων [BN*C], ασεβων [A^vid.], εσεβων [N^c.a]; in Ps. 72 15 τῆς ἀραβίας [BNRT]; on Job 1 15, see below; Syr. shebā; Ar. saba, in Sabæan inscriptions סבא, Assyr. sab'u; name of people שְׁבָאִים, Joel 3 8 [4 8]—unless with Merx we follow 𝔊, αἰχμαλωσίαν [BNA] in reading שְׁבִי, 'captivity').[4]

One of the sons of Joktan, Gen. 10 28 [J_2], 1 Ch. 1 22. He is the eponym of the well-known Sabæans (in SW. Arabia) who are mentioned also, with different genealogical connections, in Gen. 10 7 [P] and 25 3 [JE?]= 1 Ch. 1 9 32. Whether Jokshan be the same as Joktan or not (see JOKSHAN), we need not suppose two Shebas, a N. and S. Arabian, connected or distinct, still less three (so Knobel), as the three ethnographical classifications (Gen. 10 7 10 28 25 3) are probably drawn from three, certainly from two sources. It is doubtless these Sabæans from whom Tiglath-pileser III. reports that he received tribute, and to some of whose settlements Sargon refers as being tributary (KAT(2) 145 f.). Their queen came to visit Solomon, with camels, gold, and precious stones (1 K. 10 1 4 10 13 = 2 Ch. 9 1 3 9 12); cp 'kings of Sheba and Seba,' Ps. 72 10 (𝔊 ἀράβων, but cp Che.(2) ad loc.); in Is. 60 6 'they from Sheba' bring gold and incense, cp Jer. 6 20; in Job 6 19 they appear in caravans, and in Ezek. 27 22 (so v. 23, but Co. with 𝔊 omits) they are traders in spices, jewels, and gold, cp Ezek. 38 13 Ps. 72 10 Is. 60 6 (burdened with a gloss, see SBOT). In Joel 3 8 [4 8] they (plur. שְׁבָאִים) are 'a people far off,' to which the sons and daughters of Tyre and Sidon are to be sold by Judah, in judgment. Job 1 15 represents them as plunderers;[5] but elsewhere they are unknown in this character. It is to this people that the Sabæan inscriptions are due; the name is סבא in Sabæan (cp CUSH, 2).

SHEBAH, RV SHIBAH (שִׁבְעָה, 'seven'; perhaps taken as equivalent to שְׁבֻעָה, 'oath'), the original name of Beer-sheba according to J (Gen. 26 33; ορκος [ADEL]). See BEERSHEBA.

SHEBAM (שְׂבָם), Nu. 32 3, RV 'Sebam'; in v. 38 SIBMAH.

SHEBANIAH (שְׁבַנְיָה and שבניהו either for שְׁבַנְיָהוּ, 'Yahwè has brought me back'[1]: see NAMES, § 39; or an early error, found also on seals [cp PEFQ, 1902, pp. 263 f.] for SHECANIAH).

1. A Levite (Neh. 9 4 f.; BA^om., σεχενιας [L]—i.e., Shecaniah; in v. 5 the σαβανιας of L (but σεχενιας occurs as well) seems to represent rather HASHABNIAH [q.v.]).

2. Priestly signatory to the covenant (see EZRA i., § 7); Neh. 10 4 [5] [σ]εβανει [B], [σ]αβανει [N* N^c.a], σεβανι [A], βαναιας [L]), cp 12 14, σεχελιου [N^c.a mg. inf. om. BN*A], σεχενια [L], and see SHECANIAH (1)

3, 4. Two names occurring among the signatory Levites (Neh. 10 10 σαβανια [B], σεβανια [NA], σεχενιας [L], v. 12 σεβανια [BNA] σαβανιας [L]).

5. A priest of the time of David (1 Ch. 15 24, שְׁבַנְיָהוּ, σομνια [B], σοβνεια [N], σωβενια [A], σαβανια [L]).

SHEBARIM (הַשְּׁבָרִים; Sabarim). The point to which (עַד) the Israelites were chased from the gate of Ai (Josh. 7 5). Apparently it was not far from Ai, for it is added that they were 'smitten on the slope (descent).' RV^mg. gives 'the quarries'; 'the fragments (of rock)' might be better (Di.). But surely there must be an error in the text. 𝔊's συνέτριψαν αὐτούς (similarly Pesh. Tg.) presupposes שבר; cp Bennett in SBOT. Grätz suggests וירדפו מלפני השער את־הנשארים, 'and they chased those who were left from before the gate.' But cp SHEBER.

SHEBAT (שְׁבָט), Zech. 1 7, AV SEBAT; see MONTH.

SHEBER (שֶׁבֶר; σαβερ [B], σε. [A], σαβαρ [L]), one of the sons of CALEB (q.v.) b. Hezron by his concubine Maacah (1 Ch. 2 48). Cp SHEREBIAH, which may be an expansion of Shirbi=Shibri, and may be a Negeb name (see AJSL 5 435).
